PREFACE

TO THE FIRST EDITION.

THERE is, perhaps, no department of literature so generally interesting, or so frequently referred to, as Biography. The lives of those who have figured prominently in the world, either in the domain of thought or of action, possess an ever-fresh attraction for their fellows; and the demand for knowledge concerning the sayings and doings of the great and gifted, has employed many pens, and called into existence a special department of literary labour. Biographical dictionaries there are in plenty; but, though many of these works are characterized by high excellence, most of them are too elaborate, and therefore too expensive, to be within the reach of the great bulk of buyers; while the few that are professedly designed for the million are so full of old stock names of no real significance, and are often such mere dry records of dates, as to be utterly uninteresting, and even repulsive. The aim of the compilers of the following work has been to avoid those faults, and while giving accurate records of facts, to make this volume not merely useful as a work of reference, but interesting and instructive for ordinary perusal. In carrying out this idea, the following distinctive objects have been kept in view, and, it is hoped, successfully accomplished:—

1. By careful selection, by refraining from commentary and criticism, and excluding names of no positive value, space has been so economized as to admit of giving such life-like touches of character and conduct as would enable the reader to form some conception as to “what manner of man” the subject of the particular notice really was. Of course this idea could only be partially carried out in the limits to which the work was confined; but it is believed that to some extent, at least, an improvement in this respect has been here achieved, as compared with other works of a similar character.

2. The pronunciation of the names given will, it is hoped, be useful to those who, unacquainted with foreign languages, may yet be anxious to pronounce correctly the names of persons of whom they may have occasion to speak. That absolute accuracy in all cases has been attained, it would perhaps be too much to expect; as near an approximation as possible has been given; and any defects in this respect will be most readily pardoned by those who are best acquainted with the difficulty of representing uttered sounds by any mere combination of letters.

3. Persons bearing the same name have been arranged chronologically, so that sons follow sires, and a natural and connected sequence of events often depending upon each other has been preserved—a result which, while keeping up an almost unbroken narrative, serves to show at a glance those instances in which one generation has sustained, or even extended, the fame and reputation won by the preceding.

4. By deviating from the usual rule, in such works as the present, of including only those whose career has been closed by death, so far as to embrace persons who have already made their name and position, and in whose lives and characters no very marked events or changes are likely to occur, the work is made to subserve the purpose of a record of the lives of persons of eminence both of past and present times.

NOTE TO THE NEW EDITION.

As indicated on the Title-page, the Volume has been Revised and Corrected. Also a considerable number of Modern Biographies have been added. The Portraits did not appear in the first edition.

DICTIONARY OF BIOGRAPHY.

Aa

There a is used in the explanatory pronunciation, it is sounded as a in bar, ear, tar; where ä is used, it is sounded as a in can, fan, tan; where ai is used, it is sounded as a in fate, hate, late; where aw is used, it is sounded as a in fall, tall, wall; and a final has an obscure sound, between the a in bar and the a in fan.]

AA, Gerard van der, a-a. This individual, and his two sons, Philip and Adolphus, have acquired honourable historical notice in the annals of the United Provinces, from the strenuous efforts they made to resist Philip II. of Spain in his endeavours to tyrannize over their country, as well as from the distinguished part they took in its liberation, 1571.

AA, Charles Henry van der, a native of Zwolle, and an active Lutheran minister, greatly instrumental in establishing the Academy of Sciences, and the Society for the Study of Economics, at Haerlem. b. 1718; d. 1795.

AA, Peter van der, an eminent lawyer, who, in 1574, became president of the Council of Luxembourg. b. at Louvain.

AA, Peter van der, a bookseller of Leyden, and an extensive compiler and publisher of travels and voyages. b. 1730.—This person issued an illustrative atlas, which was entitled "Galerie du Monde," and which extended to sixty-six vols.

AAGARD, Christian, a-gard, a Danish professor of poetry at Sora, and a poet himself. b. 1596; d. 1664.

AAGARD, Nicholas, brother of the above, and also a professor at Sora, and a writer on philosophical subjects. b. 1612; d. 1657.

AALI PASHA, Mehmet Emin, an eminent Turkish statesman, ambassador to England, 1841-4, and representative of the Porte at the Conferences of Vienna (1855), and Paris (1856). He was appointed grand vizier for the fifth time, April 11, 1867. b. at Constantinople, 1815.

AALST, Everard, a Dutch artist, distinguished for the accuracy with which he painted armour and fruit pieces. b. at Delft, 1602; d. 1658.

AALST, William, nephew of the above, and reckoned superior to him as an artist. b. 1620; d. 1679.

AABE, Dirk van der, aar, bishop of Utrecht, who, although a priest, was much better fitted for wearing the helmet than the cowl. He was constantly at war with William Count of Holland, each being prisoner to the other almost alternately, though the churchman in the end was worsted. b. 1212, at Deventer, after ruling Utrecht for 14 years.

AARON, air-on, signifying mountain of strength, or a teacher, the brother of Moses, and first high priest of the Israelites. b. on Mount Hor, in the 123rd year of his age, A.X. 2553, B.C. 1451.

AARON, a priest and physician who flourished at Alexandria in the 7th century. He wrote a variety of works, among others a description of measles and small-pox, then new diseases in Egypt, and, as he supposed, originating there.

AARON, St., a British Martyr, who suffered in the persecution of the Christians by Diocletian, A.D. 303. He was canonized 1000 years later.—There is another St. Aaron, who founded the first Monastery in Bretagne, and flourished in the 6th century.

AARON, Isaac, a Greek, and attached to the emperor Manuel Comnenus as interpreter. He was charged with wilful misinterpretation, and deprived both of his office and his sight, but subsequently reinstated in office, when he revenged himself cruelly upon his enemies. He ultimately died of torture, which the emperor Isaac Angelus ordered to be inflicted upon him, in 1213.

AARON, a Spanish Jew of Barcelona, who lived in the 13th century, and wrote "Precepts on Moses," published at Venice in 1523.

AARON, Pietro, canon of Rimini, and a voluminous writer on music. He flourished at Florence in the 16th century.

AARON BEN ASSER, a Jew of the 5th century, to whom is attributed the invention of the Hebrew points and accents.

AARON HACHARON, a Nicomedian Jew, b. 1343, and author of "The Garden of Eden," a work explanatory of Jewish customs and doctrines.

AARON SCHASCON, a Jewish rabbi, and author of the "Law of Truth," printed in 1631, at Venice.

AARON, Ben Chaim, a rabbi of Fez, and reckoned the most learned of the Jews of Africa, whose commentaries are still held in high esteem by his people. d. about 1610.

AARON, or HABOVV. (See HABOVV AL RASCHID.)

AARON, of ARSENEN. Peter, aar-sens, a celebrated Dutch artist. He painted a fine altarpiece, representing the crucifixion, at Antwerp, which was destroyed in an insurrection in 1566, p. at Antwerp, 1519; D. 1555.—Aarsens left three sons, a celebrated painters.

AARSEN, Arctiens, a Brabant statesman, but not distinguished either for ability or Sis, Franz van, son of the above, and extraordinary to England, to settle the marriage between the Princess Mary and Prince William, the Stadtholder's son. B. a the Hague, 1572; D. 1641.—Some other person of this name appear in the history of Holland, one of whom was governor of Surinam, and was murdered by his soldiers in 1688; another wrote an account of his travels in Spain.

AARTGENS, art-jens, a Dutch artist who gained some fame, but died poor in consequence of his dissipated habits. B. 1493; D. 1544.

AARTSEN, art-sen, an artist of Holland, born at Amsterdam, who was eminent for his power of depicting vulgar subjects, and for the minute finish of his pictures. B. 1507; D. 1575.

ABA, or ABLOS, a-ba, king of Hungary, who involved his country in perpetual wars, and cruelly oppressed his subjects. He was put to death in 1044.

ABACCO, Antonio, ab-uk-ko, an architect and engraver, and pupil of San Gallo. He published engravings of the antiquities of Rome, and of plans from St. Peter's in that city, after designs by San Gallo. Flourished about 1558.

ABACO, a-ba-ko. There were two individuals of this name, who lived in the eighteenth century, and who were celebrated, both as composers of music and players on the violin and violoncello.

ABAD I., a-bad, who, at first governor of Seville, afterwards declared himself independent, and erected his states into a monarchy, 1015. He was able to add Cordova to his kingdom, when stayed by death in 1041.

ABAD II., son of the above, but superior to him in reputation, aimed at the subjugation of the whole of Southern Spain, of which he succeeded to the sovereignty of a considerable portion; but his indolence and love of pleasure frustrated his ambitious designs. He had at one time 800 females in his harem; and this, and building many palaces and but few mosques, greatly scandalized the faithful Moslem. He was a poet and man of letters. B. 1002; D. 1069, of grief for the loss of a favourite daughter.

ABAD III., who succeeded his father Abad II., was subject to singularly diversified fortunes. At the very beginning of his reign, he lost his principal cities, Seville and Cordova, from which blow, however, he recovered. He then made an alliance with Alfonso VI. of Leon, but found the Christian king a dangerous ally, and invited into Spain, Yussuf-Ben-Tuxiyu, greatest of the dynasty of the Almoravides, who, however, proved even worse than Alfonso; for after defeating the latter on the plains of Zalaca, he compelled Abad to the humiliation of being his tributary. The latter made an attempt to shake off his dependence, but it was defeated, expelled from his dominions, and sent a prisoner to Africa, where he suffered great hardships from poverty and neglect. Nevertheless, he bore his privations with resignation and fortitude for above five years, when he died, and with him his dynasty. He bore the character of being a wise, prudent, and just ruler, as well as that of a poet of superior ability. D. 1075, A.D.

ABAFFI, ab-uf-fe, Michael, ruler of Transylvania in the 17th century, was in the disagreeable dilemma of having two masters, Turkey and Austria, to both of whom he had to pay tribute. He leant most to the Turks, however, and in 1681

Austrians conquered him; and incorporated Transylvania with the Austrian empire. D. 1718.

ABAKA KHAN, a-ba-ku' kan, eighth emperor of the Moguls of the race of Zingis. He defeated the king of Bokhara and the Egyptians, who had invaded his dominions. D. 1282.

ABAMOUTI, a-ba-mou-te, a Neapolitan, B. 1703. Was a liberal in politics, and a member of the executive when Ferdinand IV. left Naples in 1806. He retired from office on the restoration of the monarchy.

ABANO, Pietro di, a-ba-no, a learned Italian, who first studied at Padua, and afterwards at Paris. He travelled in England and Scotland, whence he was recalled to take the professorship of medicine at Padua on its becoming vacant. He was not only an astronomer, but an astrologist, and had some pretensions to magic. In 1315, for the second time, he was brought before the Inquisition, on account of his doctrines, but died before the inquiry was completed. B. at Abano, 1250; D. 1316.

ABANTIDAS, ab-un-ai-das, made himself master of Sicily, after he had murdered Clinias, the father of Aratus. He was himself assassinated soon after, 267 B.C.

ABARCA, Maria de, ab-ar-ka, a Spanish lady who, in the middle of the 17th century, distinguished herself by the excellence of the portraits she painted. She was contemporary with Velasquez and Rubens, who held her in much esteem. The date of her death is not known.

ABARCA, Don Joaquin, a Spanish ecclesiastic, bishop of Leon, who supported Don Carlos in his attempt to gain the Spanish crown, 1834-6, and became one of the chiefs of his party. He was banished from Spain in 1839, and died near Turin in 1841. B. 1780.

ABARIS, ab-a-ris, the Hyperborean, a personage of antiquity, of whose learning and accomplishments several writers speak highly, but from what country he came is an undecided question. Some say he was of Scythia, and others of the western islands of Scotland. The Greeks say that he rode through the air on a sacred arrow, which he gave to Pythagoras, in return for the instructions he received from that philosopher.

ABARUS, ab-air-us, an Arabian prince, who perfidiously deserted Crassus in his expedition against Parthia.

ABASCAL, José Fernando, ab-bas-cal, a Spanish General who was long engaged in the service of his country, in the West Indies and in South America. He was governor of Peru from 1804 to 1816, and preserved that fine province to the mother country when her other possessions in America threw off their dependence. He was mable, however, ultimately to withstand the tide of rebellion, and was recalled by Ferdinand II. B. 1743; D. 1821.

ABATE, Andrea, a-bat, a famous painter of fruit and still life. B. at Naples; D. 1732.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Abati

ABATI, Niccolo, a-ba-té', a fresco painter of Modena, who assisted in decorating the palace of Fontainebleau. His finest easel-piece in oil is in the Dresden Gallery, representing the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul. b. 1512; d. 1571. There are several other painters of his name mentioned in Lanzi.

ABATIA, Bernard, a-ba-te-a, an astrologer of Toulouse, who lived in the 16th century, and was famous in his day.

ABATINI, Guido Ubaldo, a-ba-té-ne, an artist of the Roman school, who became eminent as a painter of sacred subjects in fresco. Most of who lost his father early, and was sent by his mother to Geneva, to prevent his being brought up in the Romish persuasion. For this she was confined in the castle of Somières; and did not arrive at Geneva till two years after her son. Having finished his studies, he went to Holland and England, and in the latter country formed an intimacy with Sir Isaac Newton. King William wished him to settle there, but filial affection recalled him to Geneva, where he was admitted a citizen, and in 1730 published an improved edition of Spon's History of Geneva. b. at Usés, 1679; d. at Geneva, 1767.

ABBADIE, James, ab'-ba-de', an eminent divine, who took the degree of D.D. at Sedan, and afterwards made minister of the French church at Berlin. In 1638 he accompanied Marshal g to England with the Prince of Orange, and was with that great man when he fell at the battle of the Boyne. On his return to London, he was appointed minister of the French church in the Savoy; and not long after promoted to the deanery of Killaloe, in Ireland. b. at Nay, in Béarn, 1638; d. in London, 1737.

ABBAS, Halli, or Magus, ab-ba, one of the Magi, and a physical author, who flourished in the 10th century. A treatise of his, entitled "The Royal Work," is still extant.

ABBAS, son of Abd-al-Mottaleb, uncle of Mahomet, was at first an enemy to that impostor, but being taken prisoner by him, he changed his sentiments, and became a zealous Mussulman. d. 633. In 749, his grandson, Abul-Abbas, surnamed Al-Saffah, or the "blood-shedder," was chosen caliph, in whom began the dynasty of the Abbasides, who enjoyed that dignity till about 1260.

ABBAS I. (Shah) the Great, á-ba sha, 5th shah of Persia, ascended the throne in 1586. He was the first who made Ispahan the capital of Persia. With the assistance of the English, in 1623, he took Ormuz from the Portuguese. d. 1628.

ABBAS II. (Shah) great-grandson of the preceding, began to reign in 1642. He was a tolerant prince, who used to say, that "God alone was lord of men's consciences;" and that "it was his duty to watch over the government of his country, and to administer justice with impartiality to all his subjects of every persuasion." d. 1666, aged 37.

ABBAS-MIRZA, son of Futteh Ali, shah of Persia from 1793 to 1831. He gained considerable reputation as a general in the wars carried on by his father against the Russians in 1814, and the Turks in 1823. b. 1783; d. 1833.

ABBASSA, ab-bas'-sa, sister of the caliph Haroun-l-Raschid, by whom she was married to Giafar, his vizier, on a singular condition of wedlock, which failed to be fulfilled. There are extant some Arabic verses by her, on the subject of her love for Giafar.—Lived in the 8th century.

ABBA THELLE, ab-ba-tool, king of the Pelew Islands. He allowed his second son, Prince Lee Boo, to visit England, where he died. When the king heard of the event, his conduct was marked by great resignation, and he continued till his death the friend of englishmen. d. 1791.

ABBATISSA, Paul, a Sicilian poet, who lived about the year 1570, and wrote a translation of the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" in Latin verse.

ABBATUCCI, Jacques Pierre, ab-a-tu'-cis, a Corsican, who, after serving under Paoli, joined the French army, in which he served with ABBATUCCI, Charles, son of the preceding, who entered the French army about the same time as Napoleon, rose to the rank of general, and fell in the Dutch campaign of 1796. b. 1771.

ABBE, Louise, abb, a poetess of France, who flourished in the 16th century, and was surnamed La Belle Cordouanière—the fair cobbler.

ABBIATI, Filippo, ab-be-a-té, an Italian painter, was born at Milan in 1640, and died in 1715.

ABBOY, de Fleury, ab-bong, a learned French abbot of the monastery of Fleury. King Robert sent him to Rome to avert the wrath of Gregory V., who threatened to lay the kingdom under an interdict, and Abbon obtained all that he asked. Killed in a quarrel between the French and the Gascons, 1004. b. about 945.

ABBOY, called le Courbe, a monk of St. Germain-des-Prés, who lived towards the close of the 9th century; and wrote an epic poem in Latin on the siege of Paris by the Northmen, which he had witnessed. His work, of little merit as a poem, is useful to the historian. d. 923.

ABBOT, George, ab'-bot, an English prelate, whose father was a weaver. After receiving a succession of preferments, he was appointed one of the divines to translate the present version of the Bible. In 1609 he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, whence the same year he was translated to London, and in 1610 to Canterbury. About the close of his life, he by accident shot to death a keeper of the deer of Lord Zouch, whilst engaged in the exercise of hunting. This calamitous event clouded the remainder of his life. He ever after kept a monthly fast on account of the misfortune, and settled £20 a year on the widow of the keeper. He attended King James on his death-bed, and assisted at the coronation of Charles I., whose favour he subsequently lost for refusing to license an objectionable sermon preached by Dr. Sibthorp. b. at Guildford, in Surrey, 1562; d. at Croydon, 1633.

ABBOT, Robert, eldest brother of the archbishop, was appointed by King James one of his chaplains in ordinary, and that monarch was so pleased with his book, "De Anti-christo," that he ordered it to be reprinted with his own on the Revelations. The zeal which Abbot displayed for the supremacy of king cured him the see of Salisbury. b. at G 1500; d. at Salisbury, 1617.

ABBOT, Maurice, brother of the above, was bred a merchant, and became a director of the East-India Company. He was the first person knighted by Charles I., and in 1625 was chosen one of the representatives for the city of London, of which, in 1638, he was lord mayor. 1640. The date of his birth is uncertain.

THE DICTIONARY

Abbot

ABBOT, George, son of the above, was engaged in the great civil war on the side of the Parliament. He was author of a paraphrase of the Book of Job. b. 1800; d. 1843.

ABBOT, Charles. (See COLCHESTER, Lord.)

ABBOT, Charles. (See TENTERDEN, Lord.)

ABBOT, Robert, an English divine of the 17th century, who published several volumes of sermons, and was vicar of Cranbrook, in Kent, and afterwards incumbent of St. Austin's, Watling-street, London. b. about 1535.

ABBOT, Lemuel, a portrait painter distinguished for the truthfulness of the resemblances he produced, but devoid of any other merit. b. in Leicestershire; d. in 1803, aged 40.

ABBOTT, Jacob, a modern American divine, who has published a series of juvenile works, which enjoy a large sale in the United States, and have been reprinted in England. b. 1803.

ABBOTT, John, brother of the above, also an American divine, who has written several historical works of interest and value, the principal of which is an admirable biography of Napoleon Bonaparte, published some years since in London. b. 1806.

ABBOT, Thomas, abb, a German writer, whose precocity of talent enabled him to produce, at the age of 13, a work deemed of great ability, and entitled "Historia Vitæ Magistra." He subsequently attracted the notice of Prince Schaumburg-Lippe, by whom he was held in high estimation, and liberally patronized. b. at Ulm, in Swabia, 1738; d. at the early age of 28, 1766.

ABDALLAH, ab-dûl-la, father of Mahomet. He was only a camel-driver; but the Mussulmans, having nothing better to boast of concerning him, declare that he was offered the finest women of his tribe when he was fourscore years old, and that on his wedding night a hundred girls died of grief, for having lost the honour of being his bride. b. about 545; d. 570.

ABDALLAH-BEN-MOHAMMED, one of the Mahometan kings of Spain, and noted for his magnanimity and forbearance towards his enemies. d. 901.

ABDALLAH-BEN-YASSIN, founder of the dynasty of the Almoravides, in the 11th century—a dynasty which exercised a mighty influence on the destinies of Africa and Spain, and of which, until comparatively recent times, little of the direct history was known. (See YUSSER-BEN-TAKFIR.) Abdallah raised himself from the position of teacher to that of ruler of his people, and the tribe itself, from an obscure position in the Atlas Mountains, became one of the noted conquering races of the middle ages. d. 1058.

ABDALLAH-BEN-ALI, ab-dûl-la-ben-âli, uncle of the first two caliphs of the Abbasides, under whom he served as a general against the caliph Merwan, whom he vanquished, and proclaimed his nephew in his stead. He was guilty of horrible cruelties on the family of the Ommyades, the name of the rival family of caliphs. When his eldest nephew died, his brother Al-Mansur assumed the government, which so displeased Abdallah, that he raised an army against him, but was defeated. Put to death, 755.

ABDALLAH-BEN-ZOBEIR, ab-dûl-la-ben-zobeir, made caliph by the people of Mecca in 690, who wished to be independent of Yezid, the caliph of Syria. He fell fighting bravely in the defence of Mecca, in his 72nd year.

ABDALLATIF, ab-dûl-lâ-tif, a distinguished Arabic writer, who produced an admirable history of Egypt. b. at Bagdad, 1162; d. 1231.

Abd-el-Kader

ABD-AL-MELEK, âb-dûl-me-lak, fifth caliph of the race of the Ommyades. His reign was very successful; and on account of his great avarice he was named the peeler of stone. The vulgar saying of skinning a flint is supposed to be derived from this circumstance. He reigned twenty-one years, at the close of the 7th and beginning of the 8th centuries. (685-705.)

ABDALONYMUS, âb-da-lon'-i-mus, king of Sidon, who, though only a gardener, was of the blood royal, and received the crown under the following circumstances:—When Alexander conquered that country, he allowed Hephæstion to dispose of the crown. Hephæstion offered it to three brothers, who all refused it; but being requested to point out a proper person, they fixed on Abdalonymus. Being brought to Alexander, the conqueror observed the dignity of his aspect, and said to his courtiers, "I wish to know how he bore his poverty." Abdalonymus hearing this, said, "Would to Heaven I may bear my prosperity as well!" This answer so pleased Alexander that he confirmed the appointment.

ABDALRAHMAN, Ben Abdallah, âb-dûl-ra'-mân, a Saracen general, and governor of Spain, who, after ravaging France with fire and sword, was vanquished and slain at Tours by Charles Martel, in 732. Monkish writers state the carnage in this battle at 370,000, which must be a gross exaggeration.

ABDALRAHMAN I., BEN MOAWITAH, surnamed the Just, one of the family of the Ommyades, who went to Spain in 755, where he commanded the Saracens against their governor, Yusef. Abdalrahman slew that prince, and was then acknowledged caliph. He also assumed the title of king of Cordova. b. at Damascus about 731; d. about 789.

ABDALRAHMAN II., surnamed the Victorious, king of Cordova from 822 to 852, who conquered the Christian princes of Aragon, Navarre, and the Asturias.

ABDALRAHMAN III., king of Cordova, from 912 to 961. He was defeated by Ramirez II., king of Leon and the Asturias, in a great battle at Simancas (938), in which it is said that 80,000 Moors were slain.

ABDAS, âb-dâs, a Persian bishop in the time of the younger Theodosius, who brought upon the Christians a violent persecution, and was the first to fall in it. The clergy called in Theodosius, by whom the Persians were worsted; but the persecution raged forty years.

ABD-EL-KADER, âb-dêl-kai'-der, or ka'-der, the third son of a marabout of the Arab tribe of Hashem, who had risen to influence through his rank, coupled with a great sanctity of demeanour. The early days of Abd-el-Kader are lost in obscurity, and by 1828 he had not only acquired the reputation of a scholar, but that of a saint, from his having twice made a pilgrimage to Mecca, the birthplace of the Prophet. In England, however, he is best known by the persevering courage with which he opposed the aggressions of the French upon his country. Accompanied by his father, he preached a holy war, and called upon the faithful to rise and expel the infidels. In 1832, he found himself at the head of 10,000 warriors, with whom he attacked the town of Oran, but was several times repulsed with great slaughter. Notwithstanding his discomfiture, however, he might be said to be a gainer, for he had not only increased his reputation for skill and bravery, but had taught his Arabs to face artillery—an act from which they had hitherto recoiled. In 1834, he entered into a treaty with the French, in which he was recognized as emir of Mascara, with the sovereignty of Oran, and a monopoly of commerce with the interior was granted to him. This treaty added to the importance of the emir in the eyes of the natives, who naturally looked upon their chief as a personage of high consequence, from his having compelled the enemy to recognize him as a sovereign. His success, however, excited the jealousy and envy of some of his brothers in arms, who rose against his authority, but whom he was soon enabled to subdue. For a period of fifteen years he contrived to defend his country, and fight against the encroachments of France, but in 1847 he was compelled to surrender himself a prisoner, to General Lamoricière, on condition of being sent to Alexandria or St. Jean-d'Acre. The French government, however, refused to ratify the terms of the treaty, and Abd-el-Kader was consigned a prisoner to Fort Lamalgue, at Toulon. After suffering imprisonment for four years, in 1852 Louis Napoleon restored him to freedom, on condition that he would not return to Algiers, or conspire against the French. The brave but fallen Arab consented, and Brussa, in Asia Minor, was assigned him for his future residence. For that place he accordingly set out in 1853, but has since been permitted to remove to Constantinople. In 1855 he visited Paris, to see the Exposition. During the massacre of the Maronites by the Druses in the Lebanon in 1860, the ex-emir exerted his influence with his co-religionists to stay the effusion of blood. In 1863 he made a pilgrimage to Mecca, and in 1867 he again visited Paris, and stayed a short time in London. s. near Mascara, province of Oran, 1807.

ABDELMUMEM, ab-del-mu-mem, or ABDALMOM, though the son of a potter, became a general, and at last a monarch, by the style of Emir al Mumenin (head of the true believers). He took Morocco, and destroyed the whole of the family of the Almoravides. d. 1162.

ABDERAHMAN. See ABDALRAHMAN, BEN ABDALLAH.

ABDIAS, ab-de-as, of Babylon, a pretender to be one of the seventy-two disciples sent out by Jesus Christ, and to have been appointed by Simon and Jude the first bishop of Babylon.—He is the author of a legend entitled "Historia Certaminis Apostolici," printed at Basle, 1571.

ABDUL-AZZIZ, ab-dul-az-iz, sultan of Turkey, succeeded his brother Abdul-Medjid, 1861, in virtue of the law of Turkey, by which the eldest male of the family succeeds in preference to the children of the last occupant of the throne. He was born in 1830, and was thus 31 years of age at his accession. He appears to be a man of greater energy and force of character than his brother, although he had been, as usual in the East, immured in the royal palaces from his infancy, and debarred from all intercourse with the world and all share in conducting public affairs, taking no part whatever in the government of the country. Some of the first acts of his reign, however—such as the reduction of expenditure on the harem, and the dismissal of Riza Pasha and other officials accused of wholesale speculation, and the appointment to power of men who have some character for honesty and intelligence—certainly indicate that he is alive to the evils under which his empire labours, and is desirous of removing them. He has at all times shown a favourable spirit towards his Christian subjects, who in 1867 were for the first time permitted to hold offices of importance in the Turkish Council of State. The chief event of his reign has been the Cretan insurrection of 1866-8, the Cretans seeking separation from Turkey and annexation to Greece, but without much prospect of effecting their purpose. Abdul-Aziz has remodelled the Turkish army after the European system, and has done much to reform the wasteful expenditure common under former sultans. In July, 1867, he visited Paris to see the Exhibition, and afterwards spent a short time in London; this being the first occasion on which a Turkish sultan had quitted his own dominions to visit the western nations of Europe. s. 1830.

ABDUL-MEJDID, ab-dul-med-jid, sultan of Turkey, succeeded his father, Mahmoud II., on the 1st of July, 1839. Like most of the sons of sultans, he was brought up in the harem, and although his father had desired that he should receive an English education, that sovereign was compelled to resign his wishes, and yield to the power of a Mahometan priesthood, who revolted against such an innovation upon the established usages of their country. When he ascended the throne, Turkey was in a very precarious condition. The minds of its people were unsettled by the reforms of his father, whose resolute will was sufficient to keep in check the spirit of open rebellion, but whose demise now seemed to have opened a road for a return to the old system of things. The revolt of Mehemet Ali was checked, however, by the interference of the principal European powers, and the ancient dynasty was saved. The dangers from assassination which beset the first few years of the sultan's reign were happily averted, and Abdul-Mejid gradually rose in popular estimation, until he came to be regarded, not only with respect, but with affection by his people. Revolts in different parts of his dominions were suppressed, and the strong desire he always evinced to improve the condition of his subjects, has been testified to by English statesmen, eminent themselves in the annals of social reform. However popular the name of the sultan might be in his own country, it was not until the breaking out of the war with Russia that he came to be more especially regarded in this country with a feeling of deep interest. It had long been considered a design of the emperors of Russia to appropriate as much of Turkey as possible on the north side of the Bosphorus, and the time seemed to have arrived when an attempt would be made to effect this long-coveted object. Accordingly, in 1853, the emp Nicholas availed himself of a slight dispute which had arisen about the guardianship of the "Holy Places" to advance his claim to the protectorship of the Greek Christians in Turkey. This was refused by the sultan, and the Russian war was the result. The firmness with which the sultan preserved his position throughout this trying period procured for him universal sympathy, and the consequence was, that France and England united with Turkey in repelling the pretensions of Russia. The war was prosecuted with vigour until 1855, when the allies were joined by a contingent from Sardinia. In the same year Sebastopol fell, and peace was concluded shortly afterwards. Abdul-Mejid, although apparently of a weak and compliant disposition, occasionally showed that he could be firm when he liked. His refusal to surrender the Hungarian refugees, after the revolution of 1848, is a proof of this; and throughout the war his conduct was marked by many traits which could not fail to give additional lustre to his character in the eyes of his subjects, whilst in those of his allies they raised his reputation both as a man and a sovereign. His great fault as a ruler was his extravagance, or rather the weakness that permitted extravagance in others. The sums expended by him on his harem, and in building royal palaces, were immense; and the result was serious embarrassments in the public finances. He is also accused of advancing unworthy favourites, who practised the most shameless embezzlement with impunity. b. 1523; d. 1561.

A'BECKETT, Gilbert Abbott, a comic dramatic writer and humourist, was born in Golden-square, London, in 1811. He was the son of a solicitor, was educated at Westminster school, and chose the bar as his profession. He early, however, displayed remarkable talent for comic and burlesque writing, and produced a variety of pieces, which were very popular, both on the stage and when published. He was one of the earliest and most constant contributors to "Punch," for which he wrote the "Adventures of Mr. Dunup," and other witty morceaux. He was also the author of the "Comic Blackstone," a "Comic History of England," and a "Comic History of Rome." Of a serious character, he produced some works connected with law. In 1849, he was appointed one of the stipendiary magistrates of London, the duties of which office he continued to discharge till shortly before his death in 1856.

ABEDNEGO, ai-b d', signifying the "servant of light," is the Chaldee name conferred by the king of Babylon's officer upon Azariah, one of the three companions of Daniel.

ABELLE, Gaspard, d'-bail, a native of Riez, in Provence, who went to Paris when very young, and became secretary to the Marshal de Luxembourg.—Known as a writer of odes, epistles, and some dramatic pieces. b. at Paris in 1718.

ABELLE, Scipio, brother of the above, surgeon-major in the army, and author of "The Complete Army Surgeon," and a "History of the Bones." b. in 1697.

ABEL, ai-bel, signifying "mourning," the second son of our first parents. He was murdered by his brother Cain, from envy, because Abel's offering was accepted and Cain's rejected.

ABEL, Frederic Gottfried, a German physician and poet, but bred a divine. Not obtaining the preferment he expected, he turned his attention to physic, in which he took his doctor's degree at Königsberg, and practised at Halberstadt with great reputation. He published a German translation of Juvenal in 1788. b. at Halberstadt; d. 1794.

ABEL, king of Denmark, the son of Waldemar II. He assassinated his brother Eric IV., in 1250, and took possession of the throne. He was killed (1252) by the Frisians, who revolted against him on account of the heavy taxes imposed upon them.

ABEL, Charles Frederic, an eminent German musician. b. 1725; d. in London, 1787.

ABELL, Gaspard, an historian of Germany. b. at Hindenburg in 1675; d. 1763.

ABELL, Nicholas Henry, a distinguished mathematician, was born at Christiana, in Norway, in 1802, and died in 1829. The Swedish government published his works in 1839, in 2 vols. 4to.

ABELL, Dr. Clarke, medical officer and historian of Lord Amherst's embassy to China. He was an accomplished naturalist, a close observer of nature, and a profound thinker, besides being characterized by a highly philanthropic mind. b. 1826.

ABELA, John Francis, äb'-e-la, commander of the order of Malta, and author of a work entitled "Maltha Illustrata," 1647, folio, a description of that island and its antiquities. b. in the 17th century.

ABELARD, Peter, äb'-e-lar, a celebrated philosopher, logician, mathematician, and divine, who has become memorable in biographical annals from the romantic loves which existed between him and a young damsel named Heloise. This girl was the niece of a wealthy canon, named Fulbert, who desired that Abelard should instruct her in philosophy; but instead of leading her through the intricate paths of learning, he taught her to love, and he himself became so intoxicated with this passion, that his lectures, which had attracted admiring crowds, lost their charm, and Fulbert, perceiving the cause, turned him from his house. Heloise followed him, and he conveyed her to his sister's in Brittany, where she gave birth to a son, whom she called Astrolabius. Abelard now proposed to Fulbert to marry Heloise, and although he accepted the offer, the lady herself rejected it. She afterwards, indeed, consented to a private marriage, but never would own it, and did not scruple sometimes to swear that it was not true. This increased greatly the rage of Fulbert; and Abelard sent her, in consequence, to the monastery of Argenteuil, where she put on the religious habit, but did not take the veil. Fulbert now caused Abelard to be cruelly mutilated by ruffians, when he became a monk in the abbey of St. Denis, which he soon left, and retired to Champagne, where he once more became a successful lecturer. His fame procured him numerous enemies, particularly the professors at Rheims, who charged him with heterodoxy on the subject of the Trinity, and he was censured at the council of Soissons, in 1121. Subsequently he erected an oratory in the diocese of Troyes, called the Paraclete, "the Comforter," but was soon driven from it, and next became abbot of Ruys, in the diocese of Vannes, and gave Heloise and some other nuns the Paraclete. After a life of many vicissitudes, Abelard died. Heloise lived many years after him. His body being sent to her after his death, she deposited it in the Paraclete. b. at Palais, near Nantes, 1079; d. in the priory of St. Marcel, in 1142.—Pope, in his epistles, and other poets, have immortalized the names of these unfortunate lovers. An elegant Gothic monument to their memory, built of the ruins of the abbey of the Paraclete, is one of the most interesting objects in the cemetery of Père-la-Chaise, Paris. The principal works of Abelard are composed in Latin, and consist of, "An Address to the Paraclete on the Study of Scripture," "Sermons and Festivals," &c.

ABELL, John, ai-bell, an English musician, celebrated as a singer and as a player on the lute. Although he gained considerable sums, his improvidence frequently reduced him to painful necessities. Travelling on one occasion on the continent, he arrived at Warsaw, when he was sent for by the king of Poland to come to court. Abell, however, refused to comply, when peremptory orders were given to compel his attendance. On his arrival he was seated in a chair in a spacious hall, and drawn up by machinery to a great height, when the king and his train appeared in a gallery opposite to him. Several wild bears were then turned into the hall, and the king told him to take his choice, either to sing or be let down among the bears. Abell preferred the former alternative, and used to say that he never sang so well in his life. The year of his death is unknown, but in 1701 he published a collection of songs in several languages.

ABELLY, Louis, ab-el-le, a French prelate, who wrote "Medulla Theologica." He obtained the bishopric of Rodez in 1684, but resigned it three years afterwards, and retired to St. Lazare b. 1693; d. at St. Lazare, 1691.

ABEN, ESRA, at-ben, a Jewish scholar, who passed a considerable portion of his life in travelling in various countries, and who is best known to us by his commentary on the Old Testament, which he would seem to have written in the Hebrew language between 1149 and 1167. He also wrote on astronomy, philosophy, mathematics, medicine, philology, and astrology. He appears to have been possessed of some skill as a poet as well, for he composed a treatise in verse on the game of chess, which was translated by Thomas Hyde, and published at Oxford in 1667. He visited this country in 1130. His own countrymen, the Jews, styled him the great, wise, and admirable doctor. His name in full was Abraham ben Meir ben Esra, which is abbreviated into Aben Esra. b. at Toledo about 1119; d. about 1194. According to some authorities he is said to have died at Rhodes in 1174.

ABENDANA, Jacob, ab-en-da-na, a Spanish Jew, and prefect of a synagogue in London. b. 1635.—He wrote a Hebrew commentary on several passages of Scripture, which appeared at Amsterdam the same year that he died.

ABENGEFFEL, ab-en-ge-fel, an Arabian physician of the 12th century.—Author of a book, a translation of which, entitled, "De Virtutibus Medicinarum et Ciborum," was printed at Venice in 1581, folio.

ABEN-MELEK, ab-en-me-lek, a Jewish rabbi.—Author of a Hebrew commentary on the Bible, entitled, "The Perfection of Beauty," Amsterdam, 1661, folio.

ABERLI, John Louis, ab-er-le, a landscape and portrait painter of considerable eminence b. at Winterthur, 1723; d. at Berne, 1786.

ABERCROMBIE, Thomas, ab-er-krom-be, a Scottish physician. b. 1726.—Author of "Martial Achievements of Scotland," and a "Treatise on Wit." He became the medical adviser of James II. of England.

ABERCROMBIE, John, M.D., an eminent Scottish physician, was the son of the Rev. Mr. Abercrombie, one of the ministers of Aberdeen. Dr. Abercrombie studied in Edinburgh, then the most distinguished seat of medical education in Great Britain. He took his degree on the 4th of June, 1803, and applying himself diligently to the practice and study of his profession, he soon rose to be one of its most eminent members. He at first practised surgery as well as physic, which was usually done by the Scottish faculty; but after the death of the celebrated Dr. Gregory, in the year 1821, he devoted himself entirely to medicine. In 1823 he became a Licentiate, and in the following year a Fellow, of the Royal College of Physicians. The University of

Abercromby

Oxford, in 1831, granted him their honorary decree of Doctor of Medicine—an honour seldom conferred on alumni of northern universities; and in 1835 he was

Lord Rector of Marischal College, Aberdeen. He was also physician in ordinary to her Majesty in Scotland, was vice-president of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and held numerous other honorary distinctions, chiefly connected with charitable and learned bodies. He was a voluminous contributor to the literature of his profession, and in the earlier portion of his career published numerous papers in the "Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal," and other periodicals. He subsequently printed several valuable works—such as "Pathological and Practical Researches on Diseases of the Brain and Spinal Cord" (1828); "Pathological and Practical Researches into the Diseases of the Intestinal Canal, Liver, and other Viscera of the Abdomen" (1829). He next devoted his attention to the higher walks of mental philosophy, and gave the results of his investigations to the world in the shape of two works, entitled respectively, "Inquiries respecting the Intellectual Powers and the Investigation of Truth" (1830), and "The Philosophy of the Moral Feelings" (1833). These works were at once recognised as of high value, especially as regards the light he threw on the difficult subject of spectral illusions. Dr. Abercrombie died suddenly from bursting of the coronary artery of the heart on the 14th of November, 1834.

ABERCROMBY, Sir Ralph, a British general, descended from an ancient family in Scotland. The first commission of Sir Ralph was a cornetcy in the Guards, and in 1760 he obtained a lieutenantancy. Passing through several degrees of rank, which he attained by his great military talents, he was made a Knight of the Bath in 1795. In 1797 he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general. He was then employed under the Duke of York in the enterprise against Holland, where it was confessed, even by the enemy, that his abilities were of the most brilliant order. It being resolved to send an army to dispossess the French of Egypt, Sir Ralph was appointed to the command of the expedition. He landed at the head of his troops, March 8th, 1801, and defeated the French at Aboukir. On the 21st of the same month was fought, near Alexandria, a memorable battle, in which the English were again the victors, but in which their general was wounded. This took place early in the action, but he concealed the circumstance from his troops until some time after the battle was over. It was then found to be too late for surgical skill to be of any avail to him. He was immediately conveyed to the ship of the admiral, Lord Keith, where he lingered till the 28th, when he expired. His body was conveyed to Malta, and buried under the ramparts of St. Elmo, near the town of Valetta. b. at Menstry, Clackmannanshire, Scotland, 1734; d. 1801.—A monument to his memory is to be seen in St. Paul's Cathedral.

y. Sir Robert, the younger brother of Sir Ralph, for thirty years governor of Edinburgh Castle. b. 1827.

ABERCROMBY, Hon. Alexander, a judge of the courts of session in Scotland, and judiciary of that country, was the youngest son of George Abercromby of Tullibodie, Clackmannanshire. He was born in 1745, called to the Scottish b. in 1768 where he soon distinguished

In 1792 he was raised to the bench by the title of Lord Aberromby. Besides his eminence as a lawyer and judge, he was an elegant writer, and contributed numerous papers to the Mirror and Lounger. D. 1795.

ABERDEEN, George Hamilton Gordon, Earl of, ab'-er-deen, succeeded to the title on the death of his grandfather in 1802, and in 1814 was created Viscount Gordon, in right of which he sat in the House of Lords. On account of his former classic researches into antiquarian remains, he was called in Lord Byron's "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," "the travelledthane, Athenian Aberdeen." It is as a politician and statesman, however, that he is best known. In 1813 he was sent on a special mission to Vienna, and was the means of bringing over Austria to the alliance against France. Subsequently he was recognised as a staunch adherent of the Tory party, and accepted, under the first administration of the Duke of Wellington, the office of Secretary for Foreign Affairs, which he retained till the ministry resigned, in 1830. Whilst in office he assisted in establishing the independence of Greece. Under the brief administration of Sir Robert Peel (1834-5), he was Colonial Secretary, and on the restoration to power of that statesman, in 1841, he once more became Foreign Secretary, which office he held until the ministry fell, in 1846. On the death of Sir Robert, the Earl of Aberdeen was considered to be the virtual representative of what was known as the Peel party, and on the fall of the Derby ministry, in 1852, he was empowered to form a new administration. This he effected, and he steadily endeavoured to prevent the country from entering upon the conflict with Russia. All his efforts, however, were unavailing, and war was declared against the northern autocrat. Under the remainder of his administration, the public believed that the war was not conducted with that degree of vigour necessary to insure favourable results. Failing to receive sufficient support to enable him to carry out his measures, the earl resigned in 1855. He afterwards took no active part in public affairs, and died in Dec. 1860, aged 78, having been born in 1784. As an author, the earl is known by a work entitled, "An Inquiry into the Principles of Beauty in Grecian Architecture," embodying the result of his antiquarian researches in Greece.

ABERNETHY, John, ab'-er-ne-thy, a divine, was born in 1680, at Coleraine, in Ireland, educated at Glasgow, where he took the degree of M.A., and then went to Edinburgh, and studied divinity. In 1708 he became pastor of a congregation at Antrim, but subsequently accepted an invitation from the congregation of Wood-street, Dublin. D. at Dublin, 1740.—Two volumes of his sermons were printed at London in 1743, and are held in great estimation.

ABERNETHY, John, F.R.S., a surgeon of distinguished practice and reputation. In 1786 he succeeded Mr. Pott as assistant-surgeon at St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and shortly afterwards took the place of that gentleman as lecturer in surgery and anatomy. On the decease of Sir Charles Blizard, his former instructor, Abernethy was elected master surgeon, when St. Bartholomew's Hospital began to increase in reputation, and soon acquired a degree of celebrity far beyond anything it had hitherto attained. He was the first to enunciate and establish the great principle "that local diseases are symptoms of a disordered constitution, not primary and independent maladies, and that they are to be cured by remedies calculated to make a salutary impression on the general frame, not by topical dressing, nor any mere manipulations of surgery." To this he added a second, namely, "that this disordered state of the constitution either originates from, or is rigorously allied to, derangements of the stomach and bowels, and that it can only be reached by remedies which first exercise a curative influence upon these organs." These principles revolutionized the whole field of surgery, and raised it from the rank of a manual art to the position of a science.—In private life the character of this eminent man was as spotless as his public life was humane and useful. B. at Abernethy, in Scotland, or Derry, in Ireland, 1764; D. 1831.

ABGARUS, ab'-ga-rus, king of Edessa, in Mesopotamia. This sovereign, it is said, wrote a letter to our Saviour, and received an answer, which, with the other, is extant and well known. Both letters, however, have been declared to be forgeries. Flourished in the time of our Saviour.

ABGILLUS, ab'-gil-lus, surnamed Prester John, a king of the Frisians. He attended Charlemagne to the Holy Land, and did not return with him, but made great conquests in Abyssinia, which was called from him the empire of Prester John. He is said to have written the history of Charlemagne's journey, and of his own to the East. Lived in the 8th century.

ABIATHAR, äi-bi-a-thar, "father of abundance," a Jewish high-priest, was the son of Abimelech, who was killed by Saul. He succeeded his father, and attached himself to David, but, on his death, attempting to put Adonijah on the throne, he was deposed and banished by Solomon, 1014 B.C.

ABIGAIL, ab'-e-gale, signifying "my father's joy," the wife of Nabal, and afterwards of David, a woman of great personal attractions and sound understanding.—Another, of the same name, a sister of David, and the mother of Amasa.

ABIHU, ab-i'-huo, signifying "The father of him," the second son of Aaron, and who, with his brother Nadab, was struck dead for disregarding the divine injunctions, and kindling their censers with unholy fire.

ABIJAH, äi-bi-jah, "the Lord my father," king of Judah, was the son of Rehoboam. In the second year of his reign he defeated Jeroboam, king of Israel. Began to reign 958 B.C.

ABILDGAARD, Philip Christian, ab'-il-gord, a physician of Denmark, and one of the most accomplished naturalists of the 15th century.

ABILDGAARD, Nicholas Abraham, a brother of Philip, author of some useful works on art, and an historical painter of considerable ability. B. 1744; D. 1809.

ABINGER, James Scarlett, Lord, ab'-in-ger, an able advocate, who rose to be a peer of the realm and chief baron of the Exchequer, taking his title from Abinger, in Surrey. B. in Jamaica, 1769; D. at Bury St. Edmunds, while on his circuit, 1844.

ABINGTON, Frances, a comic actress of great celebrity, whose maiden name was Barton, and whose father was a common soldier. ABLANCOURT, Perrot Nicholas d', ab-lan-koo-er, one of the best French translators of the classic authors of the 17th century. He was proposed by Colbert to Louis XIV., to be the historian of his reign, but that monarch would not entertain the proposition, on account of the author being a Protestant. B. at Chalons-sur-Marne, in Champagne, 1606; D. at Ablancourt, 1664.

ABLAUVIUS, ab-lau'-ue-us, a minister of state under Constantine the Great, and treacherously put to death by the son of that sovereign.

ABLE, or ABEL, Thomas, abel, chaplain to Katherine of Aragon, whom he taught music and the languages. His attachment to his royal mistress brought him into great trouble. He suffered death for denying the king's supremacy, 1534.—He wrote a treatise against the divorce of the queen, and was attainted for being implicated in the affair of the Holy Maid of Kent.

ABNER, ab'-ner, the cousin of Saul, whom he served with great loyalty against David. Murdered by Joab, 1048 B.C.

ABNEY, ab'-ne, Sir Thomas, a distinguished magistrate of London, lord mayor, member for the City, and one of the first promoters, and subsequently a director, of the Bank of England. When the Pretender was proclaimed king of Great Britain by the king of France, Abney proposed an address to King William, afterwards adopted and followed by other corporations, which was so encouraging to the king that he dissolved the Parliament, and took the sense of the people upon the state of parties, which proved to be almost universally in favour of the Protestant succession. B. 1639; D. 1722.

ABOUGHEHEL, ab-oo'-gai'-hel, an Arabian idolator, and a bitter enemy to Mahomet.—The Mahometans, by way of contempt, call colocynthis the melon or cucumber of Abougehel.

ABOT-HANIFAH, ab-boo-han'-e-fa, was the son of Thabet, and esteemed among the Mussulmans for his expositions of their law, but persecuted for denying predestination. B. at Coufa, A.D. 699; D. at Bagdad, A.D. 767.—A caliph who reigned 335 years after the death of this learned man, erected a mausoleum to his memory, and founded a college for his followers.

ABOT-JOSEPH, ab-boo-jo'-ef, a Mussulman doctor, who was the first that had the title of Kadhi al kodhat, or judge of the judges. He lived in the caliphate of Haroun-al-Raschid.

ABOULAINA, ab-boo-lai'-na, a Mahometan doctor, famous for his wit.

ABOULFEDA, or ABULFEDA, considered to be the most eminent Arabian writer on geography and history, and also distinguished as a soldier and statesman. He belonged to the family of Mahometan sovereigns known as the Ayoubites, was prince of Hamah in Syria, where his court was the resort of all the learned men of his time. At an early age, he joined the armies of his country, and was engaged in all the wars the Turks had upon their hands at the period. Later in life, he retired to his principality of Hamah, where he devoted himself to study and to the government of his province. His principal works are his "History" and "Geography," copies of both of which exist in MS. in several of the principal libraries of Europe, but have hitherto only been printed in fragments. B. at Damascus, in 1273 A.D.; D. 1331.

ABOUT, Edmond François Valentin, ab-boo, a French political writer, and the author of several novels and dramatic pieces. His pamphlet "La Question Romaine" was directed against the temporal power of the Pope. B. at Dieuze, in the department of the Meurthe, Feb. 14, 1823.

ABRABANEL, Isaac, ab-bra-bu'-nel, a learned rabbi, and a member of the council of Alphonso V., king of Portugal. Falling into disgrace on the death of that monarch, he fled to Castile, where he was protected by Ferdinand and Isabella. In 1492 he was obliged to quit Spain, in consequence of an edict against the Jews, and continued to pass a life of vicissitude. B. at Lisbon, 1437; D. at Venice, 1508.—He is the author of a commentary on the Scriptures.

ABRAHAM, ai'-bra-ham, the patriarch, was at first called Abram, which was altered by divine appointment. His father, Terah, in his old age, went to reside at Haran, in Canaan, where Abram received a promise that he should be the father of a great nation; on which he, with his wife Sarah, and his nephew Lot, left Haran, and dwelt at Sichem. A famine drove them thence into Egypt, and on their return, a dispute having arisen between the servants of Abram and those of Lot, the two kinsmen were induced to part, Lot being taken prisoner by the prince of Elam, Abram armed his servants, and retook his nephew, with a great spoil. Having no prospect of a child by Sarah, he took Hagar, an Egyptian, by whom he had Ishmael; but at the age of ninety, he received a promise that Sarah should have a son, and, in consequence, his name was changed to Abraham, which signifies "the father of a great multitude." At this time circumcision was instituted. Going afterwards to Gerar, Sarah was delivered of a son, named Isaac. When Isaac was grown to maturity, Abraham was commanded, as a trial of his faith, to offer him up as a sacrifice; but as he was about to obey the mandate, an angel stayed his hand, and provided a ram for a burnt-offering. After the death of Sarah, Abraham married Keturah, by whom he had six sons. B. at Uz, in Chaldea, A.M. 2004; D. about A.M. 2179.

ABRAHAM, Nicholas, a learned Jesuit, and theological professor in the university of Pont-à-Mousson. B. in Lorraine, 1589; D. at Pont-à-Mousson, 1655.—He wrote a commentary on Virgil, and on some of the orations of Cicero.

ABRAHAM, Ben Chaila, a Jewish rabbi and astrologer, who predicted the birth of the Messiah, but did not live to be disappointed by the non-fulfilment of his prophecy. Flourished in Spain during the 14th century.—He wrote a treatise on the figure of the earth.

ABRAHAM, a musician at Paris, composer of airs for the clarinet, and author of a method for the bassoon. D. 1805.

ABRAHAM USQUE, a Portuguese Jew, but thought by some to have been a Christian.—He published, in conjunction with Tobias Athias, in 1553, a translation of the Bible into Spanish.

who, when his wife Panthea had been taken prisoner by Cyrus, and humanely treated, surrendered himself and his troops to the conqueror. He was killed in the first battle he undertook in the cause of Cyrus, and his wife stabbed herself on his corpse. Cyrus raised a monument on their tomb.

ABRENTIUS, ab-reñt'-she-us, a man made governor of Tarentum, by Hannibal. To gain the favour of a beautiful woman, whose brother was in the Roman army, he betrayed his trust to the enemy.

ABRESCHE, Frederick Louis, an'-resh, a Dutch critic and excellent Greek scholar. His scholia on Greek authors are highly esteemed. B. at Hamburg, 1649; D. in Switzerland, 1731.

ABROSI, John, ab-ro'-se', an Italian physician and astronomer, who lived in the beginning of the 16th century.—His "Dialogue on Astrology," 4to, Venice, 1494, is in the "Index Expurgatorius."

ABRUZZO, Balthasar, ab'-rud-ze, a Sicilian philosopher. B. 1601; D. 1665.

ABRUZZO, Peter, a Neapolitan architect of the 17th century.

ABSALOM, ab-sa'-lom, the son of David, who assassinated his brother-in-law Amnon, for violating his sister Tamar, and raised a rebellion against his father; but his army being routed, he was slain by Joab, B.C. 1030. He was deemed the handsomest man of his race, and was particularly remarkable for the beauty and profusion of his hair.

ABRAHAM, or Axel, John, archbishop of Lund, in Denmark; founder of the castle and city of Copenhagen, and a distinguished warrior and statesman. B. 1129; D. 1201.

ABSHOVEN, M., abs-hoo'-ven, a native of Antwerp, and scholar of the younger Teniers, whom he closely imitated. Painted rural sports, ale-houses, &c. D. about 1660.

ABSTEMIUS, Laurentius, ab-st'e-me-us, an Italian writer, who was librarian and professor at Urbino, where he taught the belles lettres. Flourished in the 16th century.—He wrote some pieces of repute, but the best known are his fables, which have been frequently printed with those of Æsop, Phædrus, &c.

ABU-BEKER, ab-u-be'-ker, the successor of Mahomet, and the first who assumed the title of caliph. D. 634. Another Mahometan ruler of this name, of the dynasty of the Almoravides, was supplanted by Yussuf-ben-Taxfy (whom see).

ABUCARAS, Theodore, ab-u-car'-as, a bishop of Caria, who was a partisan of Photius, but recanted at the council of Constantinople, and was re-admitted to his seat. Flourished in the 8th century.—He wrote several controversial treatises, which were published at Ingoldstadt, in 1606.

ABUDAHER, ab-ude-hai-her, founder of the sect called Karmatians, and a great enemy to the Mussulmans. He plundered Mecca, and carried away the black stone, which the Turks pretend came down from heaven. The relic, however, was returned when the Karmatians found it to be of no value. D. 933.

ABULFARAGUS, Gregory, ab-ul-fa'-rai-ge-us, an Armenian physician, bishop, and historian. B. at Malatia, 1226; D. 1286.—This person wrote, in Arabic, a universal history, published with a Latin translation and a supplement, in 1663.

ABULFAZL, ab-ul-fa'-zil, vizier of Akbar, the Mogul emperor. Author of "Ayeen Ak-beri," a history of the reign of his sovereign, and a geographical and statistical account of the Mogul empire. This work was translated into English by a Mr. Gladwin, in 1785. Assassinated, 1602.

ABULGASI-BAYATUR, ab-ul-gas'-se-u-yu..., khan of the Tartars. B. at Urgens, capital of Khorasan, 1005; D. 1663.—After a reign of twenty years, he, like Charles V. of Spain, resigned the crown to his son, and led a retired life, during which he wrote the history of the Tartars, which valuable work was afterwards translated into German and French.

ABULITES, ab-u-lit'-es, governor of Susa, who betrayed his trust to Alexander, and was rewarded with a province.

ABULOLA, a-bu-ló'-la, an Arabian poet. B. 973; D. 1057. About the middle of the 17th century some of the effusions of this poet were published.

ABUMANSUR, an eminent Arabian astronomer, who did good service to science by the accuracy of his observations. He was also a writer of biography, and composed the lives of the poets of Arabia; this work is not known in Europe. Lived in the 9th and 10th centuries.

ABUMOSLEM, ab-u-mos'-lem, governor of Khorasan, who, in 747, transferred the caliphate from the family of the Ommeiades to that of the Abbasides; in accomplishing which change, above 600,000 men lost their lives. After rendering the caliph Almanzor the most important services, that prince caused him to be assassinated.

ABUNDANCE, John, a-bun'-duns, a name assumed by a French poet who flourished in the 16th century.

ABUNOWAS, a-bu-no'-as, an Arabian poet who dwelt in the palace of Haroun-al-Raschid, with Masat and Rekash, two other poets. B. at Bara, 762; D. 810.—The works of this poet are still extant.

ABU-ORÉIDAH, ab-u-o-ri'-da, a companion of Mahomet, who served under Calad, but gaining the supreme command, Calad served as his second. D. 639.

ABUSAID KHAN, ab-u-said'-kan, the last sultan of the race of Genghis Khan. D. 1336.

ABUSAID MIRZA, ab-u-said'-mer'-za, served in the army of Uleg Beg, when he was at war with his son. He took advantage of this dissension, and set up for himself in 1450. He greatly extended his dominions. Killed, 1463.

ABUTEMAN, surnamed ALTAYI, ab-u'-te-man, the prince of the Arabian poets. B. 842, or 846, at Yasem, near Damascus.

ABYDENUS, ab-i-de'-nus, author of the history of the Chaldeans and Abyssinians, the only remains of which are in the "De Emendatione Temporum" of Scaliger.

ACACIUS, a-kai'-se-us, a bishop of Amida, on the Tigris. D. in the 5th century.—This bishop sold the plate of his church, and with the proceeds ransomed 7000 Persian slaves, and sent them to their king.

ACACIUS, surnamed MONOPHTHALMUS, from having lost an eye, was the disciple and successor of Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea. He was deposed by the council of Sardica, for heresy; on which he and some others assembled at Philippopolis, and anathematized Athanasius and the rest of their adversaries. Acacius was concerned in banishing Pope Liberius, and settling Felix in the see of Rome. D. about 365.—Was the founder of a sect called Acaciani, and wrote the "Life of Eusebius," and other works.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Acacius

ACACIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, who was excommunicated by Pope Felix III., and in his turn commanded the name of that prelate to be struck out of the list of bishops who were to be mentioned in the public prayers. b. 488.

ACACIUS, bishop of Bercea, in Syria, who was the means of deposing St. Chrysostom, and also Cyril, bishop of Alexandria. b. 436.—There were several other persons of this name—1. a martyr in the persecution by the emperor Darius; 2. a patriarch of Antioch, A.D. 468; 3. a famous rhetorician who flourished in the time of the emperor Julian.

ACADEMUS, à-ka-de-mus, or ECADEMUS, an Athenian, whose house was occupied as a philosophical school in the time of Theseus. He had the honour of giving his name to a sect of philosophers, or rather three sects, called Academics. The old academy had Plato for its chief, the second Arcesilaus, and the last Carneades.—No one was suffered to laugh in the academy at Athens, under the penalty of expulsion.

ACCA, àk-ka, bishop of Hexham, in Northumberland. b. 740.—This personage was a liberal patron of the arts, an improver of the music of the church, and author of a work entitled, 'Sufferings of Saints.'

ACCABISI, Francis, àk-ka-re-se, professor of civil law at Sienna, and afterwards at Pisa. b. at Ancona; d. at Sienna, 1623.

ACCARIETI, James, a professor of rhetoric at Mantua, who subsequently became bishop of Vesta. b. at Bologna; d. at Vesta, 1654.

ACCIAIOLI, Renato, àk-ke-a-e-o-le, a Florentine, who conquered Athens, Corinth, and part of Bœotia. Lived in the beginning of the 14th century.—He bequeathed Athens to the Venetians; Corinth to Theodosius Paleologus, who married his eldest daughter; and Bœotia, with Thebes, to his natural son Anthony, who also got Athens; but this was retaken in 1455 by Mahomet II.

ACCIAIOLI, Angelo, àk-ke-a-e-o-le, a native of Florence, of which he became archbishop, and by his merit obtained a cardinalship. b. 1407.

ACCIAIOLI, Donato, a noble and learned Florentine and disciple of Argyropylus, who flourished in the 15th century. b. at Milan, 1478.—He wrote a commentary on the "Ethics" of Aristotle, and translated some of the "Lives" of Plutarch, to which he added those of Hannibal, Scipio, &c. He also wrote a life of Charlemagne.

ACCIAIOLI, Zenobio, a churchman of the order of St. Dominic, and librarian to Pope Leo X. b. 1461; d. 1520.—He translated some of the Fathers into Latin, and left several pieces of his own, some of which were published.

ACCISIUS, Lucius, àk-ke-us, a Latin tragic poet, none of whose works are extant. Flourished about 170 B.C.—There was also, in the same age, an orator of the name of Accius, against whom Cicero defended Cluentius. He was a native of Pisaurum.

ACCISIUS TULLIUS, prince of the Volsci, a determined enemy of the Romans, and to whom Coriolanus fled for refuge.

ACCOLTI, Benedict, àc-col-ti, secretary to the state of Florence. b. 1466.—He wrote a history of the Holy War, printed at Venice, in 1532, which was consulted by Tasso in the composition of his "Jerusalem Delivered." He likewise wrote a little book of the famous men of his time. b. 1455.

Achæus

ACCOLTI, Francis, brother to Benedict, was called the prince of lawyers. b. vastly rich, about 1470.

ACCOLTI, Benedict, a cardinal, related to the above, called the Cicero of his age, and distinguished by several popes. b. 1467; d. 1519.

ACCOLTI, Benedict, an Italian conspirator who, with five others, meditated the murder of Pius IV.—Put to death 1564.

ACCORDS, Stephen Tabouret, àk-ker, an advocate in the parliament of Dijon. b. 1561.—He was the author of two trifling books, one entitled, "Les Bigarrures," and the other "Les Touches."

ACCORSO, Francis, àk-ker-so, professor of law at Bologna. b. at Florence, 1182; d. 1224. Reduced the Code, Digests, and Institutes into one system, printed at Lyons, in 5 vols. folio 1627.

ACCORSO, Mariangelo, a learned Neapolitan who was very industrious in collecting ancient MSS. Flourished in the 16th century.—Published remarks on Ausonius, Solinus, and Ovid, in 1524, entitled "Diatriba;" also an edition of Ammianus Marcellinus, at Augsburg, in 1593, and some other valuable works.

ACCOMPIGLI, àk-um-pi-à-le, the first king of the ancient Mexicans, a legislator, and the founder of the capital of his kingdom. b. 1149.

ACEBATIS, àk-er-a-tus, a soothsayer of Delphi, who alone remained when the approach of Xerxes frightened away the inhabitants.

ACESIUS, a-ke-se-us, bishop of Constantinople in the time of Constantine, who, on account of his rigid doctrine, said to him, "Make a ladder for yourself, Acesius, and go up to heaven alone." Flourished in the 3rd century.

ACESTOR, surnamed Sages, a tragic poet at Athens, and contemporary of Aristophanes.—Also a sculptor of Cnassus, mentioned by Pausanias.—This was also the name of Apollo in his capacity of god of medicine.

ACH, John van, or ACHEN, zà, was born at Cologne, in 1556, and became eminent in historical and portrait painting. b. 1611.

ACHÆUS, à-ke-e-us, was the son of Xuthus, and grandson of Helen. Achæus having committed manslaughter, was compelled to take refuge in Laconia, where he died, and where his posterity remained under the name of Àchéi, until they were expelled by the Heraclidae. Upon this, they passed into the northern parts of Peloponnesus, and, under the command of Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, took possession of the country of the Ionians, and called it Achaia. The successors of Tisamenus ruled until the time of Gyges's tyranny, when Achaia was parcelled into twelve small republics, or so many cities with their respective districts, each of which comprised seven or eight cantons. Three of these—Patræ, Dyme, and Phars—became famous as a confederacy, 384 years B.C., which continued formidable upwards of 130 years, under the name of the Achæan League, and was most illustrious whilst supported by the splendid virtues and abilities of Aratus and Philopomen. They directed their arms for three years against the Ætolians, and rose to be powerful by the accession of neighbouring states, and freed their country from foreign slavery. At last, however, they were attacked by the Romans, and after one year's hostilities, the Achæan League was totally destroyed, B.C. 147. From this period the Peloponnesus was reduced to the condition of a Roman province, bearing the name of Achaia.—

THE DICTIONARY

Achæmenus

The name of Achai is generally applied by the poets to all the Greeks indiscriminately.

ACHÆMENUS, â-ke'-mên-us, a king of Persia among the progenitors of Cyrus the Great; his descendants were called Achæmenides, and formed a separate tribe in Persia, of which the kings were members. Cambyzes, son of Cyrus, on his death-bed, charged his nobles, and particularly the Achæmenides, not to suffer the Medes to recover their former power, and abolish the Persian empire.

ACHÆLEN, âk-ai-len, a sovereign of the northern Britons, who on losing his territory, fled into Wales. Reigned in the 6th century.—He and his brother, Arthanad, are famous for a journey performed on one horse, up the hill of Waelwig, in Cardiganshire, to revenge the death of their father.

ACHAN, âk-an, the son of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah, stoned to death for his covetousness at the taking of Jericho.

ACHARD, François Charles, a-ka-r, an experimental philosopher and chemist of supposed French extraction. He was among the first who proposed to extract sugar from beet-root. b. at Berlin, 1754; d. 1821.—Was author of various works in German, on experimental physics, agriculture, and chemistry.

ACHARDS, Eleazar, a-ka-r, bishop of Avignon. When the plague raged there, he continued, at the hazard of his life, to perform the offices of charity and religion, and Clement XII. sent him to China to settle the disputes which prevailed among the missionaries. b. at Avignon, 1679; d. at Cochín, 1741.

ACHATES, â-kai-tees, a friend of Æneas, whose fidelity was so exemplary that fidus Achates (the faithful Achates) became a proverb.

ACHELOUS, a'-ke-lo-us, the son of Oceanus and Terra, or Tethys, god of the river of the same name in Epirus.—As one of the numerous suitors of Dejanira, daughter of Æneus, Achælon entered the lists against Hercules, and being inferior, changed himself into a serpent, and afterwards into an ox. Hercules broke off one of his horns, and Achælon being defeated, retired into his bed of waters. The broken horn was given to the goddess of Plenty.

ACHERL, Luc de, a-ke-re, a Benedictine monk. b. at St. Quentin, 1603; d. at Paris, 1685.—He published several books on ecclesiastical history; as the "Lives of Saints," &c.

ACHILLINI, Alexander, a-kil-lé-ne, an eminent philosopher and physician of Bologna. b. 1463; d. 1512.—He is said to have discovered the hammer and anvil, two small bones in the organ of hearing.—His works were published in folio, at Venice, in 1568.

ACHILLES, a-kil'-lee, the son of Peleus, king of Phthia, and a sea-goddess called Thetis. His story is told by Homer in his "Iliad," or account of the siege of Troy. Achilles was said to be invulnerable in every part of his body except his heel. After killing Hector, the champion of the Trojans, he was shot in the heel by Paris towards the close of the siege.

ACHILLES TATTUS, a Greek astronomer, who lived in the early part of the 4th century.

ACHILLES STATUS, a Greek writer of the 5th century, author of the "History of Leucippe and Clitophon."

ACHMET I., ak'-met, emperor of the Turks, succeeded his father, Mahomet III., in 1603. He was then only fifteen years of age, and began his reign by endeavouring to suppress a rebellion, which lasted two years. He next engaged in a war with the Germans, in which he was assisted by the famous Bethlem Gabor. Peace was concluded in 1606; but he continued to be disturbed by insurrections, and the security of his throne was threatened by a pretender to his rightful inheritance. He indulged in sensual pleasures and in field sports; but, though proud and ambitious, was less sanguinary than some of his predecessors. b. 1558; d. 1617.

ACHMET II., succeeded to his brother Solymán, in 1691. He was a feeble ruler, and in his reign the empire suffered many humiliations at the hands of the Imperialists, the Venetians, and even the Arabs. He was, however, amiable in private life, and fond of music and poetry. b. about 1645; d. 1695.

ACHMET III. son of Mahomet IV., on the deposition of his brother, Mustapha II., in 1703, ascended the imperial throne. He sheltered Charles XII. of Sweden after the battle of Pultowa, and declared war against the Russians, but soon after concluded an advantageous peace. He likewise made war on the Venetians, and recovered from them the Morea; but in an attack on Hungary, his army was defeated by Prince Eugene, in 1716, at the Battle of Peterwardein.—Achmet was dethroned in 1730. d. in prison, 1736.

ACHMET, son of Seirim, an Arabian writer, who composed a work on the interpretation of dreams, which was translated into both Greek and Latin. Supposed to be the same as Abu Bekr Mahommed Ben Sirim, a work by whom, in Arabic, exists in the Imperial Library at Paris, and who flourished in the 7th century.

ACHMET GEDUC, a Turkish general, who, after having been the means of obtaining the crown for Bajazet, was killed by order of that tyrant. Lived in the 15th century.

ACHTSCHELLING, Lucas, a landscape painter of Brussels, who lived in the end of the 16th and beginning of the 17th century. He was a very close imitator of Nature, and the scenery in his pictures is grand, admirably diversified, and so beautifully coloured as to be almost transparent.

ACIDALIUS, Valens, ai-se-dai-le-us, a promising young scholar of Germany, who wrote a commentary on Q. Curtius, Tacitus, and other classic authors, besides letters, speeches, and poems. Excessive application to study caused his death in 1595, at 28 years of age. Had he lived, it is thought he would have been one of the greatest critics of modern times. b. at Witstock, Brandenburg, in 1567.

ACILIUS GLABRIO, M., a tribune of the people at Rome, a.u.c. 553. With a legion, he quelled the insurgent slaves in Etruria; being consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, a.u.c. 581, he conquered Antiochus at Thermopylae, for which he obtained a three days' triumph. He stood for consul against Cato, but desisted in consequence of the unfair measures adopted by his opponent. His son erected a temple to Piety, which the older Glabrio had vowed while fighting with Antiochus, on the spot where once a woman had fed with her milk her aged father, whom the senate had imprisoned and excluded from all aliment. The son also erected to his father's memory a golden statue, the first ever seen at Rome.—There were several other Romans of the same name, but none of them of marked celebrity.

ACKERMANN, Conrad, âk-er-man, a comedian

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Ackermann

of Germany, who founded the modern German theatre. d. 1771.

ACKERMANN, John Christian Gottlieb, a distinguished German physician, and author of a variety of works on medical subjects. b. 1756; d. at Altdorf, in Franconia, 1801.

ACKERMANN, Rudolph, a carriage-draughtsman, who, previously to the French Revolution, arrived in England, where, after a short time he settled down in the Strand as a printseller. He produced an elegant annual, which was called "Forget-me-not," and was the first of that class of works which, for several years, were so popular in this country. He greatly promoted the art of lithography, and by his embellished "Histories" of Westminster, Oxford, &c., improved the public taste, and added to his own reputation as an enterprising publisher. b. at Stolberg, in Saxony, 1764; d. 1834.

ACKMAN. See AIKMAN.

ACLAND, Henry Wentworth, ak'-land, physician to the Radcliffe Infirmary, Oxford, an earnest advocate of cleanliness, good drainage, and athletic exercises as preventives of disease. Accompanied Prince of Wales to America, 1860. b. 1815.

ACOLUTUS, Andrew, ak'-lu-tus, an archdeacon, and professor of the Oriental languages at Breslau. b. at Breslau; d. 1704.—He wrote a treatise "De Aquis Amaris," 1692, 4to, and a Latin translation of the Armenian version of the prophet Obadiah, 4to, Leipsic.

ACONTIUS, James, ak'-kon-te-us, originally a Catholic, but who, becoming Protestant, came to England, where he met with a kind reception from Queen Elizabeth, to whom he dedicated a work entitled "The Stratagems of Satan," printed at Basle, in 1565. He died soon after. b. at Trent.—Another edition of his work appeared at Basle in 1610, to which was added a letter of Acontius, "De Ratione edendorum Librorum," but his best work is a treatise "On Method," printed at Utrecht, in 1658.

ACOSTA, Gabriel, a'-ko'-ta, a canon and professor of divinity at Coimbra. b. 1616.—Wrote a commentary on part of the Old Testament, folio, 1641.

ACOSTA, Joseph, a Spanish Jesuit, who, from being a missionary in Peru, became provincial of his order. b. at Medina del Campo, about 1539; d. at Salamanca, 1600.—His "History of the West-Indies," first printed in Spanish, in 1590, 8vo, is universally known and esteemed.

ACOSTA, Uriel, an extraordinary character, who, at the age of twenty-five, was made treasurer of a Church in Oporto, but, having embraced Judaism, resolved to quit Portugal, with his mother and brothers, whom he had converted to the same faith. They proceeded to Amsterdam, and were received into a synagogue. Not long after, becoming dissatisfied with the Jewish rites, and expressing his sentiments with freedom, he was excommunicated. He then wrote a book, in which he denied the immortality of the soul; for which he was thrown into prison, whence he was bailed; but all the copies of this book were seized, and a fine levied upon the author. After lying under excommunication fifteen years, he was, on making submission, re-admitted into the synagogue, but was again expelled for not conforming to the laws of Moses, and for dissuading two Christians from turning Jews. In this state he remained seven years, abandoned by his friends, and reduced to the utmost destitution. At the end of that time he made another submission, and underwent an extraordinary penance in the synagogue; where, after making his recantation, he was publicly scourged, and had to lay himself down on the threshold, and allow all the people to walk over him. b. at Oporto; shot himself in 1640, or, according to others, 1647.

ACQUAVIVA, Andrew Matthew, duke of Atri and prince of Teramo, in the kingdom of Naples. b. 1456; d. 1528.—Was one of the greatest luminaries of his age, and seems to have been the first who conceived the idea of an Encyclopædia, or Universal Dictionary of Arts and Sciences. He published a work under that title in 2 vols. folio, which, though scanty and defective, was found sufficient to give some hints for conducting a compilation of that kind.

ACRATUS, ak'-rai-tus, a freed man of Nero, sent into Asia to plunder the temples of the gods.

ACRON, or ACRO, ak'-ron, an ancient scholiast on Horace. Lived in the 7th century.—His work is extant in an edition of Horace printed at Basle in 1527, 8vo.

ACRON, a Sicilian physician who expelled the plague from Athens by burning perfumes. Flourished b.c. 439.

ACRON, a king of the Cæcænes, who, after the rape of the Sabinæ, was slain by Romulus in single combat. His spoils were dedicated to Jupiter, under the name of Feretrium, because they were carried on a frame.

ACROPOLITA, George, ak'-ro-pol'-e-ta, a writer on the Byzantine history, who, at the age of twenty-one, disputed with a physician concerning solar eclipses, before the emperor John. He afterwards rose to the rank of chancellor of the empire. b. at Constantinople 1220; d. 1282.—His "Chronicle of the Greek Empire" was printed at Paris, in Greek and Latin, in 1651, folio.

ACROPOLITA, Constantine, son of the above, was called the younger Metaphrastes, and was great chancellor of the empire. Flourished about 1270.

ACTÆUS, ak'-tee-us, a powerful person who made himself master of a part of Greece, which he called Attica. His daughter Agraulos married Cecrops, whom the Athenians called their first king, though Actæus reigned before him. This word has the same signification as Atticus, an inhabitant of Attica.

ACTIA, ak'-te-a, the mother of Augustus.

ACTIS, ak'-tis, went from Greece into Egypt, where he taught astrology, and founded Heliopolis.

ACTISANES, ak'-tis-a-nes, a king of Ethiopia, who conquered Egypt, and expelled King Amasis. He was famous for his equity, which is in some measure contradicted by his severity to robbers, whose noses he cut off, and whom he banished to a desert place, where they were in want of all aliment, and lived only upon crows.

ACTIUS NAVIUS, ak'-te-us nai'-ve-us, an augur who cut a whetstone in two with a razor, before Tarquin and the Roman people, to convince them of his skill in his art.

ACTON, Joseph, ak'-ton, originally in the French naval service, but subsequently prime minister at the court of Naples. b. at Besançon, France, 1737; d. in obscurity, in Sicily, 1806.—Many of the political persecutions which took place in Naples after the French invasion of 1799 are attributed to the influence of Acton at the Neapolitan court.

ACTUARIUS, John, ak'-tu-ai'-e-us, a Greek physician of the Jewish faith, who flourished at Constantinople in the 13th century.—His books on Therapeutics, the Animal-Spiciæ. —

THE DICTIONARY

Acuna

Urines, &c., have been printed together, and in parts.

ACUNA, Christopher, â-kû-na, a Spanish Jesuit, many years a missionary in South America. B. at Burgos, 1597.—He published, in 1641, "A Description of the Great River of the Amazons," which was afterwards translated into French, in 2 vols. 12mo, 1682. D. at Lima about 1675.

ACUSILAUS and DAMAGETTES, âk-u-se-lai-us, two brothers, conquerors at the Olympic games. The Greeks covered their father, whose name was Diagoras, with flowers, and proclaimed him happy in having such worthy sons.

ACUSILAUS, a Greek historian, who was born at Argos, and flourished at the same time with Cadmus the Milesian (about 1500 B.C.). He composed a work on the genealogies of the principal families of Greece, from some brazen tablets, which his father was reported to have found while digging in his house.

ADA, ai'-da, the wife of Adricus, and sister to Queen Artemisia. On the death of her husband she succeeded to the throne of Caria, but was expelled by her younger brother, when she retired to Alinda, which she gave up to Alexander, after adopting him as her son.

ADAIR, James, â-dair, son of an army agent, and an eminent lawyer. After passing through the usual course of study, in 1774 he was raised to the degree of serjeant-at-law, and on the death of Serjeant Glynn, was chosen recorder of London. On being promoted to be one of his majesty's serjeants-at-law, he resigned the recordership, in expectation of higher preferment, but was disappointed. D. 1798.—He sat as member of parliament, first for Cockermouth, and afterwards for Higham Ferrars, and wrote two tracts, one entitled "Thoughts on the Dismission of Officers for their Conduct in Parliament," and the other, "Observations on the Power of Alienations of the Crown, before the first of Queen Anne."

ADAIR, Sir Robert, a statesman who espoused the political views of Mr. Fox. He was the son of Robert Adair, serjeant-surgeon to George III. In 1808 he was specially selected for a mission to the Porte, where he successfully negotiated the treaty of the Dardanelles, 1809. In the same year he was appointed ambassador at Constantinople, in which he remained till 1811. In 1831 he was despatched on a special mission to Prince Leopold, when besieged by William, prince of Orange, in Liège. Sir Robert, on seeing the situation of Leopold, pressed him to fly; but that prince, having only recently been elected to the throne, declined to adopt advice which might so easily have brought discredit on his reign. "I am ready to fight," said he, "but will allow you to negotiate." Accordingly, Sir Robert, fastening a handkerchief to a ramrod, went to the hostile army, and in an interview with Prince William, succeeded in obtaining his connivance for Leopold to withdraw to Malines, where Sir Robert accompanied him. B. in London, 1763; D. 1855.—Sir Robert married a daughter of the marquis of Hazincourt, in 1805, but had no issue. In 1802 he represented Appleby, and in 1806-7, Camelford. He published accounts of two of his missions, and as he was possessed of great information, and had mingled much in the politics of Europe, he was enabled to penetrate the designs of Russia, and predict many events which have since occurred.

ADARD, or ADELARD, â-dâ-lar, cousin-german of Charlemagne. In 823 he founded the abbey of New Corbie, in Saxony. B. about 753; D. 828.—Some fragments of his writings are extant.

ADALBERON, a-dal-be-ron, archbishop of Rheims, and chancellor under Lothaire and Louis V., who consecrated Hugh Capet on his accession to the throne of France in 987.

ADALBERON, bishop of Laon, who contributed to the success of the revolution which placed Hugh Capet on the throne, by betraying his rival, Charles of Lorraine, into his hands. There is a satirical poem of his extant in the tenth volume of the "Historians of France," which contains some curious details of the times in which he lived.

ADALBERT, St., archbishop of Prague, and a successful missionary in Hungary, Prussia, and Lithuania, where he was murdered by a pagan priest in the 10th century.—It is affirmed that Boleslaus, prince of Poland, ransomed the body of this archbishop with its weight in gold.

ADAM, âd-am, the father of mankind, was created out of the earth, and placed in the garden of Eden, whence he was expelled for eating the forbidden fruit. The creation of Adam is generally placed in the year 4004 before Christ. After his exile from Paradise he lived 930 years.

ADAM, Alexander, rector of the Edinburgh High School, and author of several works on Roman history and literature. His "Roman Antiquities" is held in high esteem, and is a class-book in many eminent educational establishments. He also published a Summary of Geography and History, and a Latin Dictionary, which was to have been followed by a larger work, which he left unfinished. He held a high position as a scholar and educator, and was at the same time much esteemed for his kindly disposition and unassuming manners. B. 1741; D. 1809.

ADAM, Melchior, a German biographer, born in Silesia, and educated in the college of Brieg. D. 1622.—He published 5 vols. of "Memoirs of Eminent Men," a work still esteemed.

ADAM, Scotus, a Scotch monkish historian, educated in the monastery of Lindisfarne. Thence he went to Paris, and became a member of the Sorbonne. He afterwards returned to his native country, and was a monk, first at Melrose, and lastly at Durham. Flourished in the 12th century.—Adam Scotus wrote the life of St. Columbus, and that of David I., king of Scotland, which were printed at Antwerp in 16-9, folio.

ADAM, Lambert Sigisbert, a French sculptor. Various works of his are scattered over France, and are greatly admired. B. at Nancy, 1700; D. 1759.

ADAM, Nicholas, brother of the above, also an eminent artist. He executed the mausoleum of the Queen of Poland, at Bonsecours, and some other fine pieces. B. at Nancy, 1705; D. 1778.

ADAM, Francis Gaspard, a younger brother of the above, who followed the same occupation with his brothers. He went to Prussia, where he gained a great reputation. B. at Nancy, 1710; D. at Paris, 1759.

ADAM, a canon of Bremen, lived in the 11th century.—His work, entitled "Historia Ecclesiastica Ecclesiarum Hamburgensis et Bremensis," was printed in 1670, 4to.

ADAM BILLAUT, a French poet, originally a oiner of Nevers, and patronized by Cardinal Richelieu, who gave him a pension. p. 1662. His poems are now extremely scarce.

ADAM, Robert, an architect, who studied in Italy, and on his return was made architect to King George III., which office he resigned, in 1768, on becoming a member of Parliament. He gave a new turn to the architecture of this country, and procured great fame by the number and elegance of his designs. b. at Kirkcaldy, Fifeshire, 1723; d. 1792. Adam represented in Parliament the county of Kinross, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. He and his brother were the first to make use of stucco in London, as an imitation of stone.

ADAM, Thomas, an English divine, who at Hertford College, Oxford, took his degree of B.A. On entering into orders, he obtained the living of Winttingham, in Lincolnshire, of which he continued rector fifty-eight years, though he might have had considerable preferment; but being opposed to pluralities, he refused every offer of promotion. a. at Leeds, 1701; d. at Winttingham, 1784.—He published a paraphrase of the first eleven chapters of the Romans, &c. His other works are lectures on the Church Catechism, a volume of sermons, and a posthumous collection of "Thoughts," to which his life is prefixed.

ADAM, William, an eminent lawyer, who after being a member of Parliament, and filling several important legal offices in England, as well that of Chancellor of the Duchy of Cornwall under the Grey and Grenville administration, in 1806, was appointed chief commissioner of the Jury Court of Scotland, on its institution in 1816. He was proprietor of the estate of Blair Adam in Kinross-shire, from the mansion of which there is a remarkably fine view of Bonarty-hill and its environs. Sheridan once paid Mr. Adam a visit here, and was so pleased with the quiet beauty of the scenery around him, that he wrote the following couplet with diamond on a window in his room—

"Happy the man, who, free from all party, Looks from his window on bonny Bonarty."

B. 1757; d. 1839.

ADAM, Adolphe Charles, a distinguished French composer, the son of a professor at the Conservatoire, was early placed under the care of Boieldieu to acquire a knowledge of pianism. Adolphe, however, soon turned his attention to musical composition, in which he displayed eminent ability. In 1829, his first opera, "Peter and Catherine," was produced; in 1830, his "Damiowa;" and in 1836, his "Postillon of Longjumeau." M. Adam is also author of several lighter pieces, besides being a skillful pianist. b. in Paris, 1803; d. 1856.

ADAMS, Sir Thomas, admiral, Lord Mayor of London, and brought up a draper in that city. In 1609 he was chosen an alderman, and in 1645 served the office of lord mayor. He was so noted for his loyalty, that the republicans searched his house in hopes of finding King Charles I., and, though disappointed, they confined Adams in the Tower. He sent Charles II. £10,000 during his exile, and when the restoration was resolved on, he was appointed by the City to wait on that sovereign, who knighted him at the flag, and in 1661 created him a baronet. b. at Wem, Shropshire, 1566; d. 1667.—After his death, a stone was taken from him weighing twenty-five ounces, which is now in the laboratory at Cambridge. He founded a school at Wem, and an Arabic professorship at Cambridge, and was at the expense of printing the Gospels in Persian, and sending them to the East.

Adams

ADAMS, Thomas, A.M., a fellow of Brasenose College, Oxford, who was elected in 1663 for nonconformity. He then became chaplain to Sir Samuel Jones, of Shropshire, and afterwards to Lady Clare, in Northamptonshire. p. in 1670.—He wrote "Protestant Union, or Principles of Religion," a very useful work.

ADAMS, Richard, A.M., was also educated at Brasenose College, Oxford, and afterwards had the living of St. Mildred, Broad-street, London, whence he was ejected in 1662. p. in 1694.—He was one of the editors of Charnock's works, and helped to finish Matthew Poole's annotations on the Bible.

ADAMS, John, an eminent American statesman, who took an active part in effecting the independence of his country. Before the rupture between Great Britain and America he practised as a lawyer, and, in 1770, met in convention at Boston, when the British government had announced their intention of stationing a military force in that city, to make the people submit to the new imposts on tea, glass, paper, &c. In 1773 he became a member of the Council of State, and devoted all his energies to promote the cause he had espoused. He advocated and seconded the Declaration of Independence, which was passed on the 4th of July, 1776, and which had been drawn up by Mr. Jefferson. In 1780 he represented the United States in Holland, and in 1782 co-operated with Franklin and the other American commissioners in negotiating a treaty of peace with the mother country. In 1785 he became the first ambassador from the United States to Great Britain, and in that capacity had his first audience with George III. on the 2nd of June. He stayed in England till 1787. In 1789, when Washington was elected president, he was made vice-president, and in 1793 had the same office again conferred on him. In 1797, on the retirement of Washington, he was chosen president, and at the close of his term of four years, being defeated by Jefferson in the candidature for re-election, he retired from public life. b. at Braintree, near Boston, Massachusetts, 1735; d. at Quincy, 1826.—It was on the 50th anniversary of the Declaration of American Independence that Mr. Adams died, and Jefferson, his coadjutor in laying the foundations of the great commonwealth of the New World, expired on the same day. As an author, Mr. Adams is known by a work entitled "A Defence of the Constitution and Government of the United States," which, in a new dress, again appeared with the title of "History of the Principal Republics of the World."

ADAMS, John Quincy, the eldest son of the second President of the United States. He represented his country at Berlin, and in 1814 was plenipotentiary of the United States at the congress of Vienna. In 1815 he was ambassador at the court of St. James's. In 1817 he became secretary, and in 1825 President, of the Union, in which office he was succeeded by General Jackson. b. in Boston, Mass., 1767; d. at Washington, 1848.—Mr. Adams published, in a volume, a series of letters on the state of Siberia, which were the result of his observations made while on a tour through that country. He was warm advocate of the abolition of slavery.

ADAMS, Charles Francis, son of the preceding American statesman, at St. Peters burg and London, and a graduate of Harvard University. He was candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the United States, with Mr. Van Buren, in 1848. In 1861 he succeeded Mr. Dallas as American minister at the court of St. James's, a post which he held until 1863, when he was recalled. b. at Boston, Mass., Aug. 13, 1767.

ADAMS, John, the "Patriarch of Pitcairn's Island," and one of the mutineers in his majesty's ship Bounty, 1789. He settled, with several other of the mutineers and some Tahitians, on Pitcairn's Island, where, after the death or destruction of his English companions, he became, from a rough and desperate character, a humane and religious man; he introduced Christianity and the laws of marriage amongst those that were with him on the island, and regulated the community entirely upon Christian principles. b. 1829.—A portrait of Adams, whose original name was Smith, and a fac-simile of his handwriting, were published in Captain Beechey's "Voyages." Circumstances made him, as they do most celebrated men, an extraordinary character.

ADAMS, John Couch, an astronomer, and one of the discoverers of the planet Neptune. He became president of the Astronomical Society and in 1845 received the Copley medal, as the highest scientific award of the Royal Society. b. in a small farmhouse in the Bodmin Moor, Cornwall, about 1817.

ADAMS, Samuel, a member of the American Congress, and one of the warmest advocates of the political separation of that country from Britain. b. 1722; d. 1803.

ADAMS, Lieutenant-General, a distinguished soldier, who fought under Wellington in India and who, for his meritorious services, was gradually promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general. b. in Pembrroke, 1834.—The death of the soldier occurred under melancholy circumstances. He was shooting on his own estate when his fowling-piece, accidentally discharging itself whilst he was getting over a hedge, blew one side of his head completely off.

ADAMSON, Patrick, ad-am-sun, a Scotch prelate, who, passing through several vicissitudes in various countries in which he travelled, returned to his own in 1573, and became minister of Paisley. In 1575 he sat as commissioner settling the government of the church, and soon after was appointed to the see of St. Andrew's, in which he was violently persecuted by the Presbyterians. In 1583 he was sent ambassador to Queen Elizabeth; but on his return to Scotland in 1584, he found the Presbyterian party violent, and at a synod, in 1588, they excommunicated him. The king also alienated the revenues of his see, and thereby reduced him and his family to a wretched condition. His works have been collected and published in 4to. b. : Perth, 1543; d. 1591.—Adamson wrote a Latin poem on the birth of James VI., for which he was arrested at Paris, and confined six months. Whilst under concealment, at an inn in Bourges, for seven months, he employed himself in translating the book of Job into Latin verse, and in writing a tragedy in the same tongue, founded on the life of Herod of Jewry.

ADAMSON, Michael, ad'-an-sun, a French naturalist, of Scotch extraction, who is supposed to have imbibed his love of natural history from his preceptors, the celebrated Reaumur and Bernard de Jussieu. His genius being of that active kind which delights in adventure, in his 21st year he set out on a voyage to Senegal where he spent five years in making collections illustrative of his favourite pursuits. In 1753 he returned to Paris, greatly reduced in circumstances; but it is to be presumed that his vastly increased fund of knowledge helped to restore his fortunes. He continued to pursue his studies until the breaking out of the French revolution which involved him in ruin. We find him, after this, so poor that, on being invited to become a member on the establishment of the Institute of France, he was compelled to refuse, because he could not make his appearance, for the "want of shoes." About the close of his life he enjoyed a small pension from the French government. b. at Aix, in Provence, 1727; d. at Paris, 1806.—Adamson wrote a work entitled "The Natural History of Senegal," and another under the name of "The Families of Plants," in which he advocated a system of classification different from that of Linnæus. For many years previous to his death, he entertained the plan of producing an "Encyclopedia of Natural History," to be embellished with 40,000 figures, but it fell to the ground. Adamson was a great friend to civil liberty, and an ardent philanthropist, being among the first to advocate slave emancipation.

ADDINGTON, Anthony, ad'-ing-ton, a physician who settled at Reading, where he had considerable practice, particularly in cases of insanity. b. 1713; d. 1790.—Wrote an "Essay on the Scurvy, with the Method of preserving Water Sweet at Sea," 8vo; another on "Mortality among Cattle," 8vo; and a pamphlet concerning a negotiation between Lord Chatham and Lord Bute, 8vo. He was the father of Viscount Sidmouth.

ADDINGTON, Henry. (See SIDMOUTH, Lord.) ADDISON, Lancelot, ad'-de-sun, a divine, who was sent to Queen's College, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts. He was chosen one of the terre filii at the Act in 1658, but being satirical on the men in power in his oration, he was obliged to ask pardon on his knees. He soon after quitted Oxford, and lived retired till the Restoration, when he became chaplain to the garrison at Dunkirk; and in 1683, to that at Tangier. He returned to England in 1670, and was made chaplain in ordinary to his majesty. Shortly afterwards he obtained the living of Milston, in Wiltshire, and a prebend in the cathedral of Salisbury. In 1683 he was promoted to the deanery of Lichfield. b. at Crosby Ravensworth, Westmoreland, 1632; d. 1703.—He is the author of "An Account of the Present State of the Jews," and a "Description of West Barbary," which show him to have been a man of learning and observation.

ADDISON, Joseph, son of the above, was, after receiving the rudiments of his education, sent to the Charter-house, where he contracted an intimacy with Sir Richard Steele. In 1687 he was admitted at Queen's College, Oxford, but afterwards was entered at Magdalen. In 1692 he took his degree of M.A., and became eminent for his Latin poetry. At the age of 22 he addressed some verses to Dryden, in English, and not long after published a translation of part of Virgil's fourth "Georgic." About this time he wrote the arguments prefixed to the several books of Dryden's Virgil, and composed the "Essay on the Georgics." In 1695 he addressed a poem to King William, which recommended pension of £300 a year, to enable him to travel. He made the tour of France and Italy, improving his mind to the best advantage, as appears from his "Letter to Lord Halifax," which is considered the most elegant of his poetical works, and his "Travels in Italy," which he dedicated, on his return, to Lord Somers. He came home in 1702, and found his old friends out of office. In 1704 he was introduced to Lord Godolphin as a fit person to celebrate the victory of Blenheim, and produced "The Campaign," for which he was rewarded with the place of commissioner of appeals. Next year he went to Hanover with Lord Halifax, and soon after was appointed under-secretary of state. The rage for Italian operas which then prevailed, induced him to write his "Rosamond." When the marquis of Wharton went to Ireland as lord-lieutenant, Addison accompanied him as secretary, and was made keeper of the records there, with a salary of £300 a year. While he was in Ireland, Steele commenced the "Tatler," to which Addison liberally contributed. This was followed by the "Spectator," which he also enriched by his contributions, distinguished by one of the letters of the word CLIO. In 1713 his tragedy of "Cato" was brought upon the stage, amidst the plaudits of both Whigs and Tories. At this time the "Guardian" appeared, to which Addison contributed those papers which are marked thus G. An attempt was afterwards made to revive the "Spectator," but after the publication of eighty numbers, the work was relinquished. Addison's quota amounts to about a fourth part of this second attempt. In 1715 he began the "Freeholder," and continued it till the middle of the next year, in defence of the government. In 1716 he married the Countess Dowager of Warwick, to whose son he had been tutor; but the marriage did not prove happy. In 1717 he became secretary of state, which office he soon resigned, on a pension of £1500 a year. In his retirement he planned a tragedy on the death of Socrates, but did not execute it. What was perhaps more in accordance with his sentiments, he commenced "A Defence of the Christian Religion," part of which appeared after his death, and makes us regret that he did not live to perfect it. He also conceived the plan of an English dictionary, to be carried out in the manner subsequently adopted by Dr. Johnson. In 1719 he engaged in a political dispute with Steele, whom, in his pamphlet of the "Old Whig," he contemptuously styled "Little Dick." B. at Milton, Wilts, 1672; D. at Holland House, 1719.—It is to be regretted that the same year which witnessed the demise of Addison should have been clouded by a dispute between him and his old friend and coadjutor, Steele. It is said that when he felt the finger of death upon him, he sent for Lord Warwick, and, affectionately pressing his hand, whispered, "See in what peace a Christian can die!" He left only one daughter, who died, unmarried, in 1797. Dr. Johnson says, "Whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the volumes of Addison." His style, however, is deficient in force.

ADELAIDE, Madame, ad-e-laid, an aunt of Louis XVI. of France. On the 19th of February, 1791, she, with her sister Victoire, fled from the horrors of the French revolution, and sought an asylum in Rome, Naples, and several other places, without success. At length they arrived at Corfu, where they obtained protection until the Russian general Outchacoff took them to Trieste, where they fixed their residence. Victoire died in 1791, and her sister followed her to the grave nine months afterwards.

ADELAIDE, Amelia Louisa Teresa Caroline, wife of William IV., and queen of England. She was sister to the duke of Saxe-Meiningen, and was married July 11, 1818. She was a lady possessed of many exalted virtues, and was a liberal benefactress of the poor. B. 1792; D. 1849.

ADELAID, ad-e-lad, a monk of Bath, who travelled into Egypt and Arabia, and translated the "Elements of Euclid" out of Arabic into Latin, before any Greek copies of that celebrated work had been discovered. He also translated al and medical subjects, which are to be seen in M.S. in the libraries of Corpus Christi and and obtained a pension for his meritorious conduct. On leaving the Venetian service, he went to Amsterdam, where he married a lady of rank. We next find him admiral-in-chief of the Danish fleet, and created a noble. B. 1622; D. at Copenhagen, 1676.

ADELGREIFF, John Albrecht, ad-el-greif, a German, supposed to be a magician, whose reputed blasphemous innovations and sedition caused him to be put to death at Konigsburg, 1636.

ADELMAN, ad-el-man, a bishop of Brescia, who wrote a letter on the Eucharist, which is in a collection printed at Louvain in 1561, in 8vo. D. 1662.

ADELPHUS, ad-del-phus, a disciple of Plato, and the originator of a singular theory, compounded of the doctrines of Plato, the Stoics, and others; he was greatly followed, though opposed by Plotinus.—Flourished in the third century.

ADELUNG, Johann Christoph, ad-e-lung, a universal linguist and grammarian, who finished his education at the university of Halle. He became professor in the Evangelical Gymnasium at Erfurt, which appointment he resigned in 1761, on account of a religious dispute with the Catholic town magistrates. He then went to Leipsic, where he supported himself by literature till 1787, when he was appointed to the office of principal librarian at Dresden. B. at Spantekon, in Pomerania, in August, 1732; D. at Dresden, September, 1806.—He is best known by his "Grammatical and Critical Dictionary."

ADEMAR, ad-e-mar, a monk, who wrote a "Chronicle of France," which was published by Labbe. D. 1630.

ADEODATUS, ad-de-o-dai-tus, "God's gift," a pious and charitable pontiff, who obtained the tiara in 672. B. at Rome; D. 676.

ADEP, William, ad-der, a physician of Toulouse, who wrote a book entitled, "De Egrotis et Morbis Evangelicis;" in which he proves that the diseases healed by our Saviour were incurable by medicine.—Flourished in the 17th century.

THE DICTIONARY

Adet

ADET, P. A., a'-dal, an envoy who represented France in the United States, 1796. He is known both as an original writer on chemistry and as a translator; he suggested new chemical characters and nomenclature.

ADGANESTRIUS, ad-gan-es-tre-us, a prince of Gaul, who sent to Rome for poison to destroy Arminius, and was answered by the senate that the Romans fought their enemies openly, and did not use perfidious measures.

ADHAD-EDDOULAT, ad-ha-ed'-doo-la, a Persian emperor who succeeded his uncle, Amad-Eddoulat, and by his conquests greatly enlarged his territories. In 977 he took Ba'-dad, and increased its beauty by the erection of hospitals, mosques, and other public works. p. 982.—This emperor was a friend to literature, and gave great encouragement to poets and men of learning.

ADHELME, ad-helm, son of Kenred and nephew of Ina, king of the West Saxons. He became abbot of Malmesbury, was the first bishop of Sherborne, as he was also the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, and the first who introduced poetry into this country. p. 709, and was canonized.

ADHEMAR, William, ad-he'-mar, a celebrated poet of Provence. p. about 1190.

ADIATORIX, ai-de-at'-o-rix, a governor of Galatia, who, to gain Antony's favour, slaughtered, in one night, all the inhabitants of the Roman colony of Heraclea, in Pontus. He was made prisoner at Actium, and after being led in triumph by Augustus, was strangled in prison.

ADIMANTUS, ad-e-man'-tus, one of the sect of the Manichees, who denied the authority of the Old Testament, in a book which was answered by St. Augustine.—Flourished at the end of the 3rd century.

ADIMARI, Raphael, ad-e-ma'-re, an Italian author, who wrote the history of Rimini. Flourished in the 16th century.

ADIMARI, Alexander, a Florentine poet, who acquired a high reputation. p. at Florence, 1579; p. 1649.

ADLER, James George, ad'-ler, a Danish orientalist and philosopher. He produced a work entitled "Museum Cuficum," and several works on the language, laws, and rites of the Jews. p. 1756.

ADLER, Philip, a German engraver, and apparently the founder of the school which gave rise to the Hoppers and Hollar.—He flourished in the 16th century.

ADLERFELDT, Gustavus, ad'-ler-felt, a gentleman of the bedchamber of Charles XII. of Sweden, whose history he wrote with great fidelity. p. at Stockholm. Fell at the battle of Pultowa, 1709.—A French translation of his history was published in 1740.

ADLERKREITER, John, ad-creit-ter, a German, chancellor of Bavaria, who wrote the annals of that country in Latin.—Flourished in the 17th century.—His "Annals" were printed at Leipzig in 1710, folio.

ADOLFI, Giacomo and Ciro, brothers, ad-dol'-fe, Italian painters of Bergamo, where they flourished in the first half of the 18th century.

ADO, a-do, archbishop of Vienna, in Dauphiny. p. 875, aged 75.—He wrote a "Universal Chronicle," printed at Paris, 1522, and at Rome in 1745, folio; and a "Martyrology," published in 1613.

ADOLPHATI, a-dol-fa'-te, an Italian musician, who composed a piece in which there were two kinds of time—one of two notes, and the other of three—in the same air. He was, besides, both the author and composer of several operas.

ADOLPHUS, John, ad-dol'-fus, a barrister of considerable standing in the criminal courts, being a ready speaker, a sharp advocate, and a sound lawyer. He was leading counsel in the Thistlewood conspiracy of 1820, in which case he greatly distinguished himself, although he was retained for the conspirators but a few hours before the trial of the prisoners. p. 1770; p. 1845.—As an author, Adolphus is known by a "History of England from the Accession of George III." He was also the author of the "Political State of the British Empire," "Biographical Memoirs," and fugitive pieces and pamphlets now forgotten.

ADOLPHUS, Count of Nassau, elected emperor of Germany in 1292. His rapacity and tyrannical conduct caused a confederation to be formed against him, at the head of which was Albert, duke of Austria. He fell in battle, July 2, 1298.

ADOLPHUS, Count of Cleves, who instituted the Order of Fools, 1380, which consisted of the principal noblemen of Cleves, and which has long since ceased to exist.

ADOLPHUS, G., a warlike duke of Holstein, and son of Frederick, king of Denmark. p. 1526; p. 1586.—His name frequently occurs in the military transactions of Germany.

ADOLPHUS-FREDERICK II. of Holstein-Gottorp, king of Sweden, succeeded his father in 1751. He reformed the laws, and encouraged learning and the arts of peace. p. 1710; p. 1771.—This sovereign instituted, at Tomea, in Lapland, an academy of inscriptions and belles-lettres.

ADONI-BEZEK, ad-o-ni-be'-zek, king of Bezek, in Canaan. He was a cruel prince, on account of which his thumbs and great toes were cut off by the tribes of Judah and Simeon, after they had defeated him in a great battle. p. at Jerusalem, b.c. 1443.

ADONIJAH, ad-o-ni'-ja, the fourth son of King David, by Hagith. He aimed at his father's crown, but Solomon was proclaimed king of Israel, when Adonijah fled to the tabernacle for protection. b.c. 1015.

ADOENE, Francis, ad-orn, a Jesuit of Genoa, who wrote a treatise on ecclesiastical discipline. p. 1586.

ADRAMMELECH, ad-ram'-e-lek, "magnificence of the king," a son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, slain by his sons, b.c. 713.

ADRASTUS, ad-ris'-tus. There are many of this name in ancient history, the most remarkable of whom is the son of Talauus and Lysimache, and who was king of Argos. Polynices being banished from Thebes by his brother Eteocles, fled to Argos, where he married Argia, daughter of Adrastus. The king assisted his son-in-law, and marched against Thebes with an army led by seven of his most famous generals. All perished in the war except Adrastus, who, with a few men who were saved from slaughter, fled to Athens, and implored the aid of Theseus against the Thebans, who opposed the burying of the Argives fallen in battle. Theseus went to his assistance, and was victorious.—Adrastus, after a long reign, died through grief, occasioned by the death of his son Egialeus. A temple was raised to his memory at Sicyon.

ad'-rai, a violent Huguenot, who signalized himself by many daring exploits, as well as cruelties. He subsequently became a Catholic, but died as he had lived, in general detestation. d. 1587.—At some places he obliged his prisoners to throw themselves from the battlements, upon the pikes of his soldiers. Reproaching one for retreating twice from the fatal leap, "Sir," replied the man, "I defy you, with all your bravery, to take it in three." This keen rejoinder saved his life.

ADRIA, John James, ad'-re-a, a Sicilian writer, who became physician-general to Charles V. of Spain. d. 1560.

ADRIAM, Marie, a-dre-am, a female who, at the age of 16, defended her native town of Lyons with the utmost valour throughout the whole time of its being besieged, in 1793, by the French army of the Convention. At the close of the siege she was arrested and executed, with many others, who had so bravely exerted themselves, for a period of two months, in defence of the beleaguered city.

ADRIAN, Publius Ælius, ai-dre-an, one of the greatest of the Roman emperors. He entered early into the army, and became tribune of a legion, when he married Sabina, the heiress of Trajan, whom he accompanied in his expeditions, and became successively prætor, governor of Pannonia, and consul. On the death of Trajan, in 117 A.D., he assumed the government, made peace with the Persians, and remitted the debts of the Roman people. No monarch informed himself more by travelling than Adrian. In 120 he visited Gaul, whence he passed over to Britain, where he erected a wall extending from the Solway Frith to the mouth of the Tyne. The object of this was to secure the Roman province from the incursions of the Caledonians. On leaving Britain he went into Africa and Asia, and in 125 A.D. was initiated into the Eleusinian mysteries at Athens. This, as a matter of course, according to Greek superstition, secured him an abode in the Elysian fields after his death. In his reign the Christians underwent a dreadful persecution. He built a temple to Jupiter, on Mount Calvary, and placed a statue of Adonis in the manger of Bethlehem; he also had images of swine engraved on the gates of Jerusalem, all of which acts indicate a contempt for Christianity. E. A.D. 76; D. at Baie, 138.—On his deathbed he composed some Latin verses, addressed to his soul, which betray his uncertainty with regard to a future state. He had great virtues, which were, however, blended with as great vices. He adopted as his son Titus Antoninus, on condition that he should adopt Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus, all of whom succeeded to the purple.

ADRIAN, an author who wrote an introduction to the Scriptures in Greek, printed at Augsburg in 1602, 4to; and in Latin, in 1650, folio. Lived in the fifth century.

ADRIAN, a Carthusian monk, known by a treatise, entitled "De Remediis Utriusque Fortune," printed at Cologne in 1471, folio.

ADRIAN I., one of a Roman patrician family, elected to the pontificate in 772. He sanctioned the worship of images, which had been allowed in a council held at Nice, in 787, but which was opposed by the kings of France and England. d. 795.

ADRIAN II., an ecclesiastic who succeeded to the papal chair in 867. He contended, without success, for superiority over the patriarch of Constantinople and the crowned heads of the West. B. at Rome; d. 572.

Adrian de Castello

ADRIAN III., a Roman, raised to the pontificate in 884, but died the next year, on his journey to a diet at Worms.

ADRIAN IV., the only Englishman who was nastery of St. Alban's. Being refused the habit in that house, he went to France, and became a clerk in the monastery of St. Rufus, in Provence, of which he was afterwards chosen abbot. Eugenius III. created him a cardinal in 1146, and in 1148 sent him legate to Denmark and Norway, which nations he converted to the Christian faith. In 1154 he obtained the tiara, and Henry II., king of England, sent the abbot of St. Alban's, with three bishops, to congratulate him, Adrian, forgetting the slight formerly put upon him by the brethren of St. Alban's, granted considerable privileges to that monastery, and a bull to Henry for the conquest of Ireland. In 1155 he excommunicated the king of Sicily; and about the same time, the emperor Frederic, meeting him near Sutrium, held his stirrup while he mounted his horse. With this act his holiness seems to have been pleased, for he took the emperor to Rome with him, and consecrated him king of the Romans in St. Peter's church. The next year the king of Sicily submitted, and was absolved. B. at Langley, near St. Alban's; D., supposed of poison, 1159.—Adrian, by his active conduct, left the papal territory in a better state than he found it, and bequeathed to posterity some letters and homilies still extant.

ADRIAN V. ascended the papal throne in 1276. He was despatched as legate to England in 1254, and again in 1265, to settle the disputes between Henry III. and his barons. B. at Genoa; d. 1276.—He only lived thirty-eight days after his election.

ADRIAN VI., a Dutchman, was educated on charity at Louvain. The bishopric of Tortosa was conferred upon him by Ferdinand, king of Spain; and his successor Charles, during his minority, chose him to be regent. When that prince became emperor, by the title of Charles V., he placed unlimited confidence in Adrian, who, on the death of Leo X., in 1522, was elected pope. B. at Utrecht, 1459; d. 1523.

ADRIAN DE CASTELLO, an Italian, who, passing through several employments, it is presumed without success, at last found his way to England, where Henry VII. first made him his agent at Rome, then gave him the bishopric of Hereford, and afterwards that of Bath and Wells. He farmed out his bishopric, preferring to live at Rome, where he built a superb palace, which he left to the king of England and his successors. Alexander VI. created him cardinal in 1503; soon after which he narrowly escaped being poisoned, with others of his order, at a feast given by the pope and his son Cesar Borgia. Engaging in a lot against Pope Leo X., into which he was led by the prediction of a fortune-teller, that he should die a violent death, and be succeeded by one Adrian, he was fined 12,500 ducats, and prohibited from leaving Rome. However, in 1518, he fled from that city and was excommunicated. At this time he went to Venice; but what became of him afterwards is unknown. Polydore Virgil says he ended his days at Riva, in the diocese of Trent; and gives him a high character for erudition. B. at Corneto, in Tuscan.

ADRIANI, John Baptist, a-dre-a-ne, a Florentine who wrote the history of his own times in Italian. B. at Florence, 1506; D. there, 1579.

ADRIANI, Marcel Virgil, a chancellor of the republic of Florence, and an expert scholar in the Greek and Latin lang. He translated Dioscorides from the former into the latter. B. 1464; D. 1521.

ADRIANI, Marcel, secretary to the Florentine republic, and son of the above chancellor. B. at Florence, 1513; D. 1579.—He wrote a "History of his Own Times," which has considerable merit.

ADRIANO, a-dre-a-no, a Carmelite friar, of Cordova, in Spain, and a painter of some excellence, who destroyed his works almost as soon as he had finished them. D. 1650.

ADRICOMIA, Cornelia, ad-re-ko-me-a, a Dutch nun of a noble family, who in the sixteenth century wrote a poetical version of the Psalms.

ADRICOMITS, Christian, ad-re-ko-me-us, a Dutch author, who wrote a description of the Holy Land, and a chronicle of the Old and New Testaments, published in 1593. B. at Delft, 1533; D. at Cologne, 1593.

ADRIANSEN, Alexander, a Flemish artist, who was peculiarly excellent as a painter of fruit, flowers, marble vases, and fish. He was also a good colourist. B. at Antwerp about 1625.

ADRY, J. F., a-dry, a professor of rhetoric in France, and a voluminous author. B. 1749; D. 1813.—Among his works we may notice his "Life of the Duchess of Schomberg;" a "Biography of Malbranche," and a "History of Vittoria Accarabonno."

AD-ERN, abbot of Luxeuil, who was the author of a book on the Miracles of St. Wandalbert, and of another concerning Antichrist.—Lived in the 10th century.

ADRIANUS, a-dre-a-us, a Platonic philosopher, who succeeded Iamblichus as teacher of philosophy in Cappadocia. He pretended to hold communion with the deities. Flourished in the 4th century.

ADRIANUS, John, a-dre-a-us, a Nestorian monk, who wrote an ecclesiastical history, and a treatise against the council of Chalcedon. Flourished in the 5th century.

ÆGEUS, e-je-us, king of Athens, son of Pandion, being desirous of having children, went to consult the oracle, and in his return stopped at the court of Pittheus, king of Troezen, who gave him his daughter Æthra in marriage. He left her pregnant, and told her if she had a son to send him to Athens as soon as he could lift a stone under which he had concealed his sword. By this sword the son was to be known to Ægeus, who did not wish to make any public discovery of offspring, for fear of his nephews, the Pallantides, who expected his crown. Æthra became mother of Theseus, whom she accordingly sent to Athens with his father's sword. At that time Ægeus lived with Medea, the divorced wife of Jason. When Theseus came to Athens, Medea attempted to poison him; but he escaped, and upon showing Ægeus the sword he wore, discovered himself to be his son. The Ægean Sea is supposed by some to be called after him. Theseus had agreed with Ægeus, that on his return from Crete, he should hoist white sails, as a signal of his having subdued the Minotaur; forgetting to do so, his disconsolate father, at the sight of the black sails, threw himself into the sea. Ægeus reigned forty-eight years, and died B.C. 1235.

ÆJIALEUS, e-ji-a-le-us, son of Adrastus, by Amphitea, was one of the Epigoni, or sons of the seven generals who were killed in the first Theban war. They went against the Thebans, who had refused to give burial to their fathers, and were victorious. They all returned home safe except Æzaleus, who was killed. This expedition is called the War of the Epigoni.

ÆGIDRUS, Petrus Albiensis, e-ji-d-rus, an Asiatic and African traveller, who wrote a description of Thrace and Constantinople, together with other works. D. 1555.

ÆGIDIUS ATHENIENSIS, a Greek ecclesiastic and physician, who wrote several books, the chief of which are, "De Pulsibus et de Venenis." Flourished in the 5th century.

ÆGIDIUS DE COLMNA, a monk of the Augustine order, who taught divinity at Paris with great reputation, but whose works have long since sunk into oblivion. One of his books, however, as an early specimen of typography, is still sought for. D. 1310.

ÆGINETA, Paulus, e-ji-ne-ta, a native of the island Ægina, who first noticed the cathartic quality of rhubarb. Lived in the 7th century. His works were published in Paris in 1532, folio.

ÆGINHARD, e-ji-n-hard, the secretary of Charlemagne, beloved by Emma, the daughter of that monarch, who carried him through the snow from her chamber, to prevent his being traced by his footsteps. Being seen by her father, however, Charler consented to their union. Æginhard was a German, and wrote the life of Charlemagne, also a book of annals from 741 to 829. The first edition is that published at Paris, in 1576, 2 vols. folio. An improved edition of his works, with notes by Hermann Schmincke, was published in 4to in 1711.

ÆGLES, e-glee, a Samian wrestler, born dumb. Seeing some unfair measures practised in a contest, he broke the string which held his tongue, through the desire of speaking, and always afterwards spoke with ease.

ÆLFRIC, el-frik, a distinguished Saxon prelate, supposed to have been the son of an earl of Kent. He entered the monastery of Abingdon as a Benedictine, and subsequently became one of the priests of the cathedral of Winchester. He was afterwards removed to Cerne Abbey, and next was created abbot of St. Alban's, and then bishop of Wilton. In 994 he was made archbishop of Canterbury, over which see he presided till his death. D. 1005.—This churchman possessed great ability, which he employed in the diffusion of such knowledge as the age in which he lived enabled him to possess. His principal productions are, a Saxon translation of the greater number of the historical books of the Old Testament; a Latin and Saxon Glossary; a Saxon Grammar in Latin, and two volumes of Homilies translated from the Latin fathers.

ÆLIANUS, Claudius, e-le-a-nus, an Italian historian and rhetorician, who, though he never left his native country, became so perfect in the Greek language as to write it with the greatest purity. In the reign of Adrian, as some suppose, though others place him in that of Alexander Severus, he taught rhetoric at Rome, and wrote a "Various History," which consists of a curious collection of anecdotes. He also wrote a valuable "History of Animals." His works were collected and published by Gesner, at Zurich, in 1556.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Ælianus

ÆLIANUS, Meecius, a physician of whom Galen speaks with great praise. He was the first who used a compound similar to Venice treacle as a preventive against the plague.

ÆLIUS, e'-le-us. There were several Romans of this name, the most remarkable of whom is Q. Æl. Pactus, son of Sextus, or Publius. As he sat in the senate-house, a woodpecker perched on his head: upon which a soothsayer exclaimed, that if he preserved the bird, his house would flourish, and Rome decay; and if he killed it, the contrary must happen. Hearing this, Ælius, in the presence of the senate, bit off the head of the bird. All the youths of his family were killed at Cannæ, and the Roman arms were soon attended with success.

ÆLIUS, Saturnius, a Roman satirist, thrown from the Tarpeian Rock for writing verses against Tiberius.

ÆLIUS, Sextus Catus, censor with M. Cethegus. He separated the senators from the people in the public spectacles. During his consulship, the ambassadors of the Ætolians found him feasting off earthen dishes, and offered him silver vessels, which he refused, satisfied with the others, which for his virtues he had received from his father-in-law, Paulus, after the conquest of Macedonia.

ÆLIUS, Spartianus, author of the lives of the emperors Adrian, Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius. He flourished in the first half of the 3rd century, A.D.

ÆLST, Everhard, van, eelst, a Dutch painter, famous for his dead-game and fruit pieces. b. at Delft, 1602; d. 1653.

ÆLST, William van, called by the Italians Gulielmo, was the nephew and pupil of the above, but was more famous than his instructor. His pencil was so light and elegant that his productions seem to be real. He followed his profession for some years in France and Italy, and then returned to Holland, where his pictures were in great request. b. at Delft in 1620; d. 1678.

ÆMILIAN, Jerome, e-mil'-e-al-ne, a Venetian of a noble family, and one of the founders of the regular clerks of St. Malcol, in the 16th century.

ÆMILIANUS, C. Julius, e-mil'-e-al-nus, a Moor, who, from the lowest station, rose to be emperor of Rome. He reigned only four months, when he was killed, in his forty-sixth year, by his own soldiers, who then offered the crown to Valerian. d. 253.

ÆMILIUS, Paulus, e-mil'-e-us, a Roman general, who was of noble family, and passed through several civil offices with reputation, until he obtained a military command, in which he acquired great glory. At the age of 46 he held the office of consul; and at 60 accepted the command of the armies against Perseus, king of Macedonia, whom he made prisoner, leading him and the king of Illyria, his ally, in triumph through Italy. On his arrival at Rome, he obtained a magnificent triumph, in which Perseus and his family, as captives, led the procession. He afterwards served the office of censor. b. 228 B.C.; d. universally regretted, 180 B.C.

ÆMILIUS, Censorinus, a cruel tyrant of Sicily, who liberally rewarded those who invented new means of torture. Paterculus gave him a brazen horse for this purpose, and the tyrant made the first experiments upon the donor.

ÆMILIUS, Paulus, a canon in the cathedral of Paris, who was employed thirty years in writing the history of the kings of France, which he did not live to finish. It was, however, continued by Arnold Féron, and published in 1576. b. at Verona; d. at Paris, 1529.

ÆNEAS, e-ne'-is, a Trojan prince, and, according to Greek fable, the son of Anchises and the goddess Venus. The care of his infancy was intrusted to a nymph; but at the age of five he was recalled to Troy, and placed under the inspection of Alcathous, the friend and companion of his father. He afterwards improved himself in Thessaly, under Chiron, whose house was frequented by all the young princes and heroes of the age. Soon after his return home, he married Creusa, Priam's daughter, by whom he had a son, called Ascanius. During the Trojan war he behaved with great valour in defence of his country, and encountered Diomedes and Achilles. Yet he is accused, with Antenor, of betraying his country to the Greeks, and of preserving his life and fortune by this treacherous measure. He lived at variance with Priam, on account of not receiving sufficient marks of distinction from the king and his family, a circumstance which might have provoked him to seek revenge by perjury. When Troy was in flames, he carried away upon his shoulders his father Anchises and the statues of his household gods, leading his son Ascanius by his hand, and leaving his wife to follow behind. Some say that he retired to Mount Ida, where he built a fleet of twenty ships, and set sail in quest of a settlement. Strabo, on the contrary, says that Æneas never returned to his country, but remained at sea, where he reigned, and his posterity after him. Even Homer, who lived four hundred years after the Trojan war, says that the gods destined Æneas and his posterity to reign over the Trojans. According to Virgil and other Latin authors, he was sailing from Sicily to Italy, when he landed in Epirus, and, driven on the coasts of Africa, was received by Dido, queen of Carthage, to whom, on his first interview, he gave one of the garments of the beautiful Helen. Dido being enamoured of him, wished to marry him; but he left Carthage, and after a voyage of seven years, and the loss of thirteen ships, arrived in the Tiber. Latinus, the king of the country, received him with hospitality, and promised him his daughter Lavinia, who had been before betrothed to King Turnus by her mother Amata. To prevent this marriage, Turnus made war against Æneas; and after many battles, it was terminated by a combat between the two rivals, in which Turnus was killed. Æneas married Lavinia, in whose honour he built the town of Lavinium, and succeeded his father-in-law. His reign was but of short duration, various accounts being given of the cause of his death.—Æneas has been praised for his piety and submission to the will of Heaven. The story of the loves of Dido and Æneas is allowed to be a mere poetical ornament, introduced by a violent anachronism. (See the "Iliad" of Homer, and the "Æneid" of Virgil.)

ÆNEAS, Gazeus, a disciple of the doctrines of Plato, who, becoming a convert to Christianity, wrote a dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul and the Resurrection of the Body. Flourished in the 5th century.—His dialogue was printed in Greek and Latin, at Basle, 1560, and at Leipsic in 1555.

ÆNEAS or ÆNEUS, an Irish bishop, who composed the history of the Old Testament in verse, and compiled, in five books, a history of Irish saints. D. about 820.

THE DICTIONARY

Æsopus

ÆNEAS, Tacticus, a Greek author, who wrote on the art of war. Flourished about 336 B.C.—His work was prefixed by Casaubon to his edition of Polybius, Paris, 1609, and reprinted at Leyden in 1733.

ÆRISTUS, John, e-pi-nus, a Franciscan friar, a fellow-labourer with Luther and Melancthon in the great cause of the Reformation. He became a convert to Lutheranism, and pastor of St. Peter's church, Hamburg. B. 1390; D. 1533.

ÆRISTUS, Francis Maria Ulric Theodore, a distinguished electrician, who was the first to see the affinity between magnetism and electricity in its full extent, and to perceive how these may illustrate each other. He is also the inventor of the condenser of electricity and of the electropus. He published several memoirs relating to philosophical subjects, and seems to have devoted a considerable portion of his time to mechanical pursuits. B. at Rostock, Lower Saxony, 1724; D. at Dorpat, in Livonia, 1802.

ÆRIUS, ai-e-re-us, an Asiatic presbyter, who, from being a follower of Arius (the founder of ism), advocated the notion that there was no distinction between bishops and presbyters, and procured many followers, who were named Arians. Flourished at Sebastia, Pontus, in the 4th century.

ÆRSCHOT, aar'-shot, a noble of the Netherlands, celebrated in the struggle of the Dutch Republic against Philip of Spain. He refused to join the league that was formed against Cardinal Granvelle (archbishop of Mechlin), the governor of the Netherlands. He was governor of Antwerp, and subsequently of Flanders; but the treachery of his disposition made him no favourite with the people, who took him prisoner and confined him at Ghent for a long period. Lived in the middle of the 16th century.

ÆRTS, Richard, aarts, a Dutch painter of sacred subjects chiefly. When a boy, he lost one of his legs, and while suffering from this deprivation, he amused himself with drawing in chalk. He afterwards was placed with a master, and attained to some eminence. B. at Wyck, 1482; D. at Antwerp, 1577.

ÆRSEN, Peter, ar-sen, a Dutch painter, surnamed Longo. B. at Amsterdam, 1519; D. 1575.

ÆSCHINES, e'-shi-nees, a disciple of Socrates and the son of a sausage-maker. He went to the court of Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily, and afterwards maintained himself by teaching philosophy at Athens. His dialogues so closely resemble those of Socrates, that Menodemus charges him with having stolen them from that philosopher. Flourished B.C. 350. Only three of his dialogues are extant; of which Le Clerc published a Latin translation, with notes, in 1711.

ÆSCHINES, usually distinguished as "the Orator," was the contemporary and rival of Demosthenes. He was first a schoolmaster, then a clerk, then an actor, and finally a political orator. There are only three of his orations extant, which are exquisitely beautiful. B. at Athens, B.C. 393; D. at Samos, 317.—He was considered the founder of the Rhodian school of eloquence, and his style, though wanting in the close sententious severity of the Athenian school, is marked by great correctness and clearness.

ÆSCHRIOS, e'-skre-on, a poet of Mitylene, intimate with Aristotle. He accompanied Alexander in his Asiatic expedition.—Another Iambic poet of Samos.

ÆSCHYLUS, e'-ski-lus, the father of the Athenian drama. He was in the sea-fight at Salamis, and received a wound on the plains of Marathon. His most solid fame, however, rests on his powers as a tragic poet. Of ninety tragedies produced by him, forty were rewarded with the public prize, but only seven have come down to us. He was the first to introduce two actors on the stage, and to clothe them with dresses suitable to their character. He likewise removed murder from the sight of the audience. He decorated the theatre with the best paintings of the time, and on the ancient, as is done on the modern stage, exhibited temples, sepulchres, armies, fleets, flying cars, and apparitions. He mounted the actors on stilts, and gave them masks to augment the natural sounds of their voices. The priests accused him before the Areopagus of bringing upon the stage the mysteries of religion; but the wounds he had received at Marathon pleaded his cause and obtained his acquittal. B. at Athens, 525 B.C.; D. in Sicily, in his 69th year.—It is fabled that an eagle mistaking his bald head for a stone, as he slept in a field, dropped upon it a tortoise, which instantly killed him. His imagination was strong but wild, vast in its conceptions, but dealing largely in improbabilities. The obscurity of his style is admitted, and an excellent modern critic has pronounced him the most difficult of all the Greek classics.

ÆSCULAPIUS, e'-sku-lai-pe-us, was the father of medicine. He was taught the healing art by Chiron, and became physician to the Argonauts. Æsculapius received divine honours after death, chiefly at Epidaurus, Pergamus, Athens, Smyrna, &c. Goats, bulls, lambs, and pigs, were sacrificed to him, and the cock and the serpent were sacred to him. Æsculapius is represented with a large beard, holding a staff round which a serpent is wreathed. He married Epione, by whom he had two sons, famous for their skill in medicine, and four daughters, of whom Hygeia, worshipped as the goddess of health, was one. Some have supposed that he lived a short time after the Trojan war.

ÆSOR, e'-sop, the fable writer, is usually held as the inventor of those short pieces of moral wisdom with which the readers of all ages, since his time, have been delighted. He is said to have been first bought as a slave by an Athenian, from whom he learned the Greek language, and then passed successively into the service of Xanthus and Idmon, both of Samos. The latter gave him his freedom, on which he was retained by Croesus. The scenes and dates of his birth and death are both uncertain. He was contemporary, however, with Solon and Pisistratus; therefore flourished in the 6th century, B.C. The only version in Greek of Æsop's fables is the collection made by Babrius, an excellent edition of which was produced by Sir G. C. Lewis, in 1847.

ÆSOR, the author of a romantic history of Alexander the Great, in Greek, which has been translated into Latin and German. The age in which he lived is unknown.

ÆSORUS, Clodius, e'-so'-pus, a famous actor, who had the honour of instructing Cicero in oratory. He was a great epicure, and at an entertainment is said to have had a dish of singing birds which cost above £900. n. worth £160,000, about b.c.—His son was also noted for his luxuriousness; and Horace says that he swallowed a pearl of great value dissolved in vinegar.

ÆTHERIUS, a-eth-re-us, an architect of Constantinople, who is supposed to have built the wall which runs from the sea to Selimbria, to keep out the Bulgarians and Scythians. Lived in the 6th century.

ÆTIOX, a-she-on, a Greek painter, whose picture of the nuptials of Alexander and Roxana, shown at the Olympic games, obtained for him the daughter of one of the judges in marriage, although he was quite unknown.

ÆTIUS, a-she-us, a famous general in the reign of Valentinian III., emperor of the West. He was brought up in the emperor's guards, and after the battle of Pollentia, in A.D. 403, was delivered as a hostage to Alaric, and next to the Huns. On the death of Honorius, he took the side of the usurper John, for whose service he engaged an army of Huns. He was afterwards taken into favour by Valentinian, who gave him the title of count. Being jealous of the power of Boniface, governor of Africa, he secretly advised his recall, and at the same time counselled the governor not to obey the mandate. This produced a revolt, resulting in an irruption of the Vandals into that province. The treachery of Ætius being discovered, a war ensued between him and Boniface, in which the latter was slain. Ætius now appealed to the Huns, of whom he raised a large army, and returning, so greatly alarmed Placidia, the mother of Valentinian, that she put herself into his power. He defended the declining empire with great bravery, and compelled Attila to retire beyond the Rhine. Stabbed, 454, by Valentinian.—This crime was committed under the conviction that Ætius entertained a design upon the imperial throne.

ÆTIUS, a bishop of Antioch, who, before entering into orders, was a physician, and remarkable for a contentious and sceptical spirit. He contended for a dissimilarity between the Father and the Son, for which he was banished by Constantius, but recalled by Julian. Lived in the 4th century.

ÆTIUS, a physician of Mesopotamia, who wrote on the diseases of women, and other works, which are extant in Greek. He is supposed to have been a Christian. Flourished in the 6th century.

ÆFER, Domitius, ai-fer, an ancient orator, who obtained the prætorship of Rome; but being disappointed of further promotion, he became an informer against Claudia Pulchra, cousin of Agrippa, and by his abilities succeeded in gaining the favour of Tiberius. He wrote an inscription, which he affixed to a statue of Caligula, and which embodied the remark that he had been a second time consul at the age of twenty-two. This was meant for an encomium, but the emperor took it as a sarcasm, and made a violent speech in the senate against the author. After, instead of replying, supplicated pardon, saying that he feared less the power of the emperor than his eloquence, which flattery so pleased Caligula, that he raised him to the consular dignity. b. at Nismes; d. at Rome, an. 59.—Quintilian mentions two books of his, on the subject of evidence.

ÆFESA, Peter, ai-fe-sa, a native of the Basilicata, Naples, who painted religious subjects in a good style. Lived in the 16th century.

Agamemnon

AGFLETO, Matthew, af-fle-to, a distinguished lawyer of Italy. b. at Naples; d. 1673.—He wrote several works on Neapolitan law.

AFFO, Irenæus, af-fa, an Italian historical author. b. in the Duchy of Placentia; d. about the end of the 18th century.—He is best known by his History of Parma, which, although composed in a very indifferent style, has value on account of its general truthfulness.

AFFRE, Denis Auguste, affr, a French student at the seminary of St. Sulpice, who rose to be archbishop of Paris. b. at Remy, 1793; d. 1848.—Affre fell whilst endeavouring to prevent bloodshed, between the soldiery and Parisian insurgents. Although previously warned by General Cavaignac of the danger to be apprehended from appearing amongst an excited mob, he replied that "his life was of small consequence," and, preceded by a man in a workman's dress, with a green branch, as an emblem of peace, in his hand, he went forth to stay the fury of the combatants. Some of the crowd who beheld him thought they were betrayed, and he was soon shot down. When he fell, he was surrounded by many of the insurgents, who blamed the Garde Mobile for the act, and on whom they vowed to avenge him. He, however, exclaimed, "No, no, my friends, blood enough has been shed; let mine be the last on this occasion." He was buried on the 7th of July, 1848, universally regretted by the people.

AFFEX, Louis Augustine Philip, Count d', af-fre, a statesman of Switzerland, who attained the chief magistracy of his country after Napoleon I. became protector of the Helvetic Confederacy. He was a true patriot, and did all that he could to resist the power of the French; but finding his efforts unavailing, he embraced the views of Napoleon, and gave his assistance in forming a new government in accordance with the theories of that conqueror. b. at Friburg, 1743; d. 1810.

AFRANIA, a-frai-ne-a, the inventor of the bassoon. He flourished at Ferrara in the 16th century.

A, a-frai-ne-us, a Roman poet, who wrote some Latin comedies, of which only a few fragments remain.—Flourished about 100 years b.c.

A, ai-nus, a senator of Rome, who was put to death by Nero for having written a satire against him.

AFRICANUS, Julius, af-re-cai-nus, the author of a letter pronouncing the story of Susannah a forgery; and another, in which he reconciled St. Matthew and St. Luke's genealogies of our Saviour.—He also compiled a chronicle of events from the commencement of the world to the early part of the 3rd century of the Christian era. Flourished in the 3rd century.

AFRICANUS. (See SCRIPPO, Publius Cornelius.) AFRICANUS, Sextus Cæcilius, a Roman jurist who flourished during the reign of the emperors Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, and was a voluminous and valuable writer on Roman law. His "Nine Books of Questions" are often quoted in the "Digest" of Justinian.

AI-GUG, a king of the Amalekites, who, on the Israelites coming out of Egypt, attacked them in the wilderness and slew all stragglers. He was hewn in pieces in Gilgal.

rity of Hesiod and others. When Atreus was dead, his brother Thyestes seized the kingdom of Argos, and removed Agamemnon and Menelaus. Agamemnon married Clytemnestra, and Menelaus became the husband of Helen, both daughters of Tyndarus, king of Sparta, who assisted them to recover their father's kingdom, where Agamemnon established himself at Mycenæ. Menelaus succeeded his father-in-law. When Helen was stolen by Paris, Agamemnon was elected commander-in-chief of the Grecian forces levied against Troy, and departed for the siege, leaving his kingdom and wife in the guardianship of Episthus, king of Aegæa. The fleet with the troops being detained at Aulis, Agamemnon there sacrificed his daughter to the goddess, whom he took from Achilles by force, was very prejudicial to the cause of the Greeks. Clytemnestra, with her adulterer Ægisthus, prepared to murder Agamemnon on his return; and as he came from the bath, in order to embarrass him, and effect her purpose, she gave him a tunic, the sleeves of which were sewed together. Whilst trying to put it on, she brought him to the ground with the stroke of a hatchet, and Ægisthus seconded her blows. His death was revenged by his son Orestes.

AGANDURÉ, Roderic Moriz, ag-an-dû-ru, a Spanish missionary, who went to Japan and other oriental parts to disseminate Christianity. Lived in the 17th century.

AGAPETUS I., ag-a-pe-tus, a Roman pontiff, who opposed the attempts of Justinian to invade the rights of the Church. He was raised to the pontificate in 535, and died the year after. b. at Rome.

AGAPETUS II., a man of great reputation for sanctity of character. He received the tiara in 939. d. 956.

AGAPETUS, a deacon of Constantinople, who wrote a letter to Justinian on the duties of a Christian prince. Flourished in the 6th century.

AGAPITES, ä-gai'-pe-us, a Greek monk, who wrote a treatise on the Salvation of a Sinner. Flourished in the 17th century.—His treatise was printed in modern Greek, at Venice, 1641.

AGARD, Arthur, äg'-ard, an English antiquary, y chamberlain in the of forty-five years.

Robert Cotton and other eminent men, he formed a society of antiquaries. b. at Foston, Derbyshire, 1540; buried in Westminster Abbey, 1615.—He wrote a treatise to explain the Domesday book, which was deposited in the Cotton Library, and several tracts of his on antiquarian subjects were published by Hearne.

AGAR, Jacques d', dag'-air, a French portrait painter. b. 1640. d. 1716.

AGASIAS, ä-gai'-se-as, a sculptor of Ephesus, celebrated for his admirable statue of the Gladiator.

AGASICLES, ä-gä's-i-clees, a king of Sparta, who used to say, "A king ought to govern his subjects as a father his family."

AGASSIZ, Louis, a-gä'-se, a distinguished French naturalist, for many years professor of natural history at Neuchâtel. In 1846 he went to America, and, in 1852, became professor of comparative anatomy in the Medical College at Charleston. As a naturalist his fame dates from 1823, and much of his attention has been devoted to fossil remains. He was the first to propose the division of fossil fishes in accordance with the formation of their scales. He was also amongst the first to confirm Mr. Shuttleworth's discovery of animalcules being in the red snow of the Alps, and has shown that there are higher forms of animal existence there than were before suspected. As a geologist he has directed attention to a large series of important phenomena, and has, in various publications, developed the views he has been led to entertain upon them. He is an upholder of the doctrine which teaches the successive creation of higher orders of organized beings on the surface of the earth, and believes that the human race has had, in its several distinct species, separate stocks of originality, both as to time and space. As an author, his contributions to natural history have been extensive, and it may be remarked that he was the founder of the "Bibliographia Zoologica et Geologica," a great work, which has been edited by the late Mr. Strickland and Sir W. Jardine, bart. On the death of the late Professor Edward Forbes, he was offered the chair of natural history in Edinburgh, but he declined it. b. in the parish of Mottier, near the lake of Neuchâtel, Switzerland, May 28, 1807.

Agathon

AGATHANGELUS, ä-gäth-än'-je-lus, an historian of Armenia, who recorded the introduction of Christianity into his native country. Flourished in the 11th century.

AGATHARCIDES, äg-ath-ar'-se-dees, a native of Cnidos, who wrote in Greek a history of the successes of Alexander. Flourished about 180 b.c.

AGATHARCUS, äg-äth-ark'-us, a Samian painter, whom Æschylus employed to paint scenes for his stage. Flourished 450 b.c.

AGATHEMER, Orthonis, äg-a-thel'-mer, the author of a "Compendium of Geography," in Greek, which was published by Hudson, at Oxford, in 1703.

AGATHIAS, ä-gai'-the-as, a Greek historian, who wrote a history of the reign of Justinian in five books. He was also a writer of epigrams, some of which are to be found in the "Anthologia." Flourished in the 6th century.—His history was published in Paris in 1600.

AGATHOCLES, äg-äth-o'-clees. There were many of this name, the most remarkable of whom was a licentious and ambitious man, the son of a potter, who, entering the Sicilian army, rose to the greatest honours, and made himself master of Syracuse. He reduced all Sicily under his power; but being defeated at Himera by the Carthaginians, he carried the war into Africa, where, for four years, he extended his conquests over his enemy. He afterwards passed into Italy, and made himself master of Crotona. d. in his 72nd year, b.c. 289, after a reign of 23 years of great prosperity mingled with the deepest adversity.

AGATHODEMON, äg-a-tho-de'-mon, a map-maker of Alexandria, and the supposed constructor of the maps found in the oldest manuscripts of the Geography of Claudius Ptolemaeus. It cannot be determined with accuracy when he flourished.

AGATHON, ä'-ga-thon, a pope, who despatched legates to the council called at Constantinople to condemn the Eutychians, a sect who denied the human nature of Christ, and asserted that his body was only an aerial vehicle. In 678 he was elected to the papal chair. b. at Palermo; d. 682.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Agathon

AGATHON, a dramatic poet, who flourished at Athens in the time of Pericles. b. about 481 B.C. Plato introduces him in his work called the "Banquet." The titles only, and a few fragments of his tragedies remain. He imitated Euripides in style.

AGELIO, Joseph, aj'-e-le-o, a native of Sorrento, in Italy, who painted good landscapes, and was much employed by historical painters to fill up their backgrounds.

AGELICS, Anthony, aj'-e-le'-us, bishop of Acerno, in the kingdom of Naples, who wrote commentaries on some parts of the Old Testament. d. 1603.

AGELNOTH, aj'-el-noth, an archbishop of Canterbury, and a favourite of King Canute. On the death of that monarch, he refused to crown his son Harold, alleging that the deceased king had commanded him to crown none but the issue of Queen Emma. It is uncertain whether Harold ever was crowned. d. 1033.—He wrote some religious pieces.

AGENOR, aj'-e-no', king of Phœnicia, was brother to Belus. He married Telephassa, called by some Aëriope, by whom he had Cadmus, Phœnix, Cilix, and Europa. As Carthage was built by his descendants, it is called agenoris urbs.

AGER, Nicholas, aj'-air, a professor of medicine at Strasburg; distinguished as a botanist and physician. Lived in the 17th century.

AGESANDER, aj'-e-san'-der, a famous sculptor of Rhodes, who, in the time of Vespasian, made a representation of the death of Laocœon, which now passes for the best relic of all ancient sculpture. The Laocœon was discovered at Rome in 1506, and afterwards deposited in the Farnese palace, where it still remains.

AGESILAUS, aj'-es'-e-lai'-us, king of Sparta, of the family of the Agide, son of Doryssus, and father of Archelaus. During his reign, Lycurgus instituted his famous laws. Reigned 850 B.C.

AGESILAUS, son of Archidamus, of the family of the Proclide, elected king of Sparta over his nephew Leotyehides. He made war against Artaxerxes, king of Persia, with success; but in the midst of his conquests he was called home to oppose the Athenians and Boeotians, who were ravaging his country. The despatch which he made on this occasion was such, that in thirty days he passed over the same extent of country which occupied the army of Xerxes a whole year. He defeated his enemies at Coronea; but sickness prevented the progress of his conquests, and the Spartans were beaten in every engagement, especially at Leuctra, till he again appeared at their head. Though deformed, small of stature, and lame, he was brave, and possessed of a magnanimity which compensated for all his physical imperfections. In his 80th year he went to assist Tachus, king of Egypt, whose servants could hardly be persuaded that the Lacedæmonian was a king, when they beheld him eating with his soldiers on the bare ground, and with no covering to his head. d. on his return from Egypt, after a reign of 36 years, 362 B.C., and his remains were embalmed and brought to Lacedæmon.—There were others of this name, but of inferior note.

AGESIPOLIS I., aj'-e-sip'-o-lis, king of Lacedæmon and son of Pausanias, and who obtained a great victory over the Mantineans. He reigned fourteen years, and was succeeded by his brother Cleombrotus, 380 B.C.

Agnesi

AGGAS, Ralph, aj'-g'-is, an engraver and surveyor, who was the first to execute a plan of London, which was published for the first time in 1500, afterwards in 1618, and again in 1748. He also produced plans of Cambridge, Oxford, and Dunwich in Suffolk. b. about 1539.

AGGAS, Robert, or more commonly called Angus, a painter of landscapes in the reign of Charles II. b. in London 1679.

AGIAS, aj'-e-as, a famous Lacedæmonian soothsayer, who foretold to Lysander his future success at Ægospotamos, and the destruction of the Athenian fleet.

AGILULF, aj'-e-loolf, duke of Turin, chosen king of the Lombards in 591. He renounced Arianism, and embraced the Catholic faith; but while engaged in a war with some of the Italian princes, he perpetrated great ravages in the Ecclesiastical States. d. 619.

AGIS, ai'-jere, king of Sparta, succeeded his father, Enrysthenes, and, after a reign of one year, was succeeded by his son Echestratus, 1059 B.C.

AGIS II., king of Sparta, waged fierce wars with the Athenians, whom he compelled to restore freedom to several Greek cities which they had subjugated. He died shortly after a successful expedition to Elis. Reigned B.C. 427 to 397.

AGIS III., king of Sparta, the son of king Archidamus III. He stirred up several of the Grecian states against Alexander, and fell fighting against the Macedonians, 331 B.C.

AGIS, a poet of Argos, who attended Alexander in his Asiatic expedition, and rendered himself agreeable by the meanest adulation. He promised his patron immortality, and declared that Bacchus, Hercules, and the sons of Leda, would yield to his superior merits in the assembly of the gods.

AGLAPHON, aj'-lai'-o-fon. There are two Grecian painters distinguished in antiquity by this name, natives of the island of Thasos. Flourished about 500 years B.C.

AGLIONBY, John, aj'-le-on'-be, a divine, who was made chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, and in 1601 elected principal of Edmund Hall. He was concerned in the translation of the New Testament as at present used. b. in Cumberland, 1567; d. at Islip, of which he was rector, 1610.—There was another John Aglionby, who was dean of Canterbury, but died a few months after his nomination, 1648. He appears to have been the son of the preceding.

AGLIONBY, Edward, a poet of the reign of Elizabeth, from whom he received a pension for writing her pedigree.

AGNAN, or ANIANUS, aj'-nan, a bishop of Orleans, who compelled Attila to raise the siege of that town. d. 453.

AGNELLES, an'-yail'-loos, an abbot of Ravenna, who wrote the lives of the bishops and archbishops of that city. Lived in the 9th century.

AGNESI, Maria Gaetana, an'-je'-se, an illustrious Italian lady, who by her application to mathematical learning, and her progress therein, so distinguished herself, that Pope Benedict XIV. appointed her, in 1750, professor of mathematics in the university of Bologna. Subsequently to this act of the pontiff, she took the veil. b. at Milan, 1718; d. about 1799.—Her "Analytical Institutions" were published at Milan in 1743. They were translated into French by M. Cousin, and published at Paris in 1775, and have appeared in English in 2 vols., with her life prefixed, taken from Montucla.

THE DICTIONARY

Agnesi

AGNESI, Maria Teresa, a sister of the above, and the composer of three operas, "Sophonisba," "Ciro," and "Nitocré." B. at Milan, 1750.

AGNOLO, Baccio d', ba-cho-o dan'-yo'-lo, a Florentine wood-engraver, which profession he abandoned for that of an architect. Whilst in Rome, pursuing his studies among the remains of antiquity, his workshop was visited by Raphael, Michael Angelo, and others, and on returning to Florence he rose into eminence, notwithstanding the ridicule and detraction which too often follow the footsteps of originality. When he died, his son Giuliano directed the works he had left unfinished. B. at Florence, 1460; D. 1511.

AGNON, ag'-non, son of Nicias, was present at the taking of Samos by Pericles. In the Peloponnesian war, he went against Potidea, but abandoned his expedition through disease. He built Amphipolis, whose inhabitants favoured Brasidas, whom they regarded as their founder, forgetful of Agnon.

AGNONIDES, ag-non'-e-dees, a rhetorician of Athens, who accused Phocion of betraying the Piræus to Nicanor. When the people recollected the services Phocion had rendered them, they raised him statues, and put his accuser to death.

AGOBARD, ag'-o-bar, an archbishop of Lyons, who was deprived of his dignity for deposing Louis the Meek, in the assembly of Compiègne, but was afterwards restored. He opposed idolatry, and wrote against the belief of witchcraft and the practice of duelling. D. 890.—His works were printed in 1668, in two vols. 8vo.

AGOR, John, a-gop, a grammarian and critic of Armenia, who flourished in the 17th century.

AGORACHITES, ag'-o-rak'-re-tus, a sculptor of Paros, and disciple of Phidias. Flourished 420 B.C.—He was such a favourite with his master, that it is said Phidias allowed him to affix his name to some works which he himself had executed.

AGOSTINI, Leonardo, ag'-os-te'-ne, an antiquary of the 17th century. He wrote a work on Sicilian medals, and another upon gems celebrated in ancient times.

AGOSTINO, Paolo da Valerano, al'-gos-te'-no, a celebrated musical composer, and master of the pope's chapel at Rome. D. 1629, aged 36.—His choruses are highly spoken of.

AGOSTINO, two brothers who greatly distinguished themselves as architects and sculptors in the infancy of art in Italy. They were natives of Siena, which they embellished with many of their best works.

AGOUTI, Guillaume d', a'-goolt, a gentleman of Provence, who wrote ballads about the year 1198.

AGREDA, Marie d', ag'-re-da, superior of the convent of the Immaculate Conception at Agreda, in Spain, who pretended to have received directions in a vision to write the life of the Virgin Mary, which she accordingly did. B. 1602; took the veil, 1620; D. 1665.—Her "Life of the Virgin Mary" was not published till after her death, when it was prohibited at Rome, and censured by the Sorbonne of Paris, though highly esteemed in Spain.

AGRESTI, Livio, ag'-res'-te, an historical painter, employed in the Vatican by Gregory XIII. He was famed for the richness of his invention, the correctness of his design, and the excellence of his colouring. D. 1590.

Agricola

AGRESTIS, Julius, ag'-res'-tis, a Roman captain, who, when Antonius revolted to Vespasian, and laid in ruins the city of Cremona, obtained leave of the emperor to survey the state of the enemy's forces. He returned with a faithful report, but not being believed, he put an end to his life, A.D. 61.

AGRICOLA, Cnæus Julius, ag'-rik'-o-la, a Roman commander, whose father, Julius Græcinus, was an orator, put to death by Caligula for refusing to plead against Silanus. Agricola was carefully brought up by his mother Julia Procilla, and sent to Massilia (Marseilles), the chief seat of learning in Gaul, to pursue his studies. After entering the army, he was sent to Britain, where he was at the time of the insurrection of Boadicea, in A.D. 61. On his return to Rome, he married Domitia Decidiana, a lady of rank. He was next made quæstor of Asia, and became tribune of the people, and prætor under Nero. In the commotions between Otho and Vitellius, his mother was murdered, and her estate in Liguria plundered by the fleet of Otho. Being informed on his journey thither, that Vespasian had assumed the government, he espoused his cause. The 20th legion having mutinied in Britain, he was despatched to reduce it to obedience, in which he succeeded. On his return to Rome, he was raised to the rank of patrician and made governor of Aquitania, in Gaul. In 77 A.D. he was chosen consul with Domitian; and, in the same year, gave his daughter in marriage to Tacitus, the historian. Next year he was appointed governor of Britain, where he restored tranquillity and brought the natives to a love of the Roman language and manners. He extended his conquests into Scotland, and built a chain of forts from the Clyde to the Frith of Forth, to prevent the incursions of the inhabitants of the north. He defeated Galgacus at the foot of the Grampian hills, and then made peace with the Caledonians. At the termination of this campaign, a Roman fleet for the first time sailed round Britain. On the accession of Domitian, Agricola had a triumph decreed him, and was recalled. By command of the emperor, he entered Rome at night, and meeting with a cold reception, retired from public life. B. at Forum Julii, now Frejus, in Provence, A.D. 37; D. at Rome, A.D. 93.—Tacitus represents the character of Agricola as that of a great and good man. He bequeathed what property he possessed to his wife Domitia, his only daughter, the wife of Tacitus, and the emperor Domitian, notwithstanding, as is asserted, that he fell a sacrifice by poison to the jealousy of the latter.

AGRICOLA, George, an eminent metallurgist and physician, who wrote a number of books on metals, &c. B. at Glauchen, Misnia, 1494; D. 1555.

AGRICOLA, Christopher Ludwig, a painter and engraver, born at Ratisbon, Germany, in 1687, who excelled in landscape and portrait, but is chiefly known for his prints.

AGRICOLA, George Andrew, a German physician, who wrote on the multiplication of plants and trees. B. at Ratisbon, 1672; D. 1738.—A French translation of his work was published in Amsterdam in 1720.

AGRICOLA, John, a German divine who studied theology at Wittenberg, where he embraced the sentiments of Luther, and acquired considerable reputation as a preacher; but entered into a dispute with Melancthon on the use of the law under the gospel dispensation. With the bishop of Nuremberg and others, he made a vain attempt to reconcile the differences between the Protestants and Catholics. B. at Eisleben, 1492; D. at Berlin, 1566.—He wrote commentaries on St. Luke, and made a collection of German proverbs.

AGRICOLA, Rodolphus, a learned writer, who was educated at Louvain, but settled at Ferrara, where he taught Latin with great reputation. Here he studied Greek, and attended the philosophical lectures of Theodore Gaza. In 1477 he returned to the Netherlands, and on visiting the city of Deventer saw Erasmus, who was then only ten years old, but who, he predicted, would be a great man. In 1483 Agricola settled in the Palatinate, giving occasional lectures at Heidelberg and Worms. B. at Bafflon, Baffel, or Bafflo, three miles from Groningen, Friesland, 1443; D. at Heidelberg, 1155. Agricola was the first who introduced the Greek language into Germany. His works were printed at Louvain in 1516, and at Cologne in 1539, 4to.

AGRICOLA, Michael, a Lutheran minister at Abo, in Finland, the first who translated the New Testament into the language of that country. D. 1556.

AGRIPPA, Agrip'p-a, a Bithynian astronomer, who was held in high estimation for the accuracy of his observations. Flourished in the 1st century A.D.

AGRIPPA, Camillo, a Milanese architect, who, during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., removed a vast obelisk to St. Peter's Square, of which he published an account at Rome, in 1533. Flourished in the 16th century.

AGRIPPA, Henry Cornelius, a French physician and astrologer of considerable learning and talent. He, being of a good family, became secretary to Maximilian I., by whom he was knighted for his bravery in the Italian wars, and afterwards created a doctor in law and physic. He travelled through various parts of Europe, and visited England, but in 1518 settled at Mentz, where he became a councillor of the city; but having, by some indiscretion, drawn upon himself the enmity of the monks, he was compelled to quit that place, and seek a residence elsewhere. In 1520 we find him at Cologne, and in the year following, at Geneva. Francis I. now gave him the appointment of physician to his mother; but for not gratifying the curiosity of that lady in an astrological experiment, he received his dismissal. From France he went to Antwerp, and was taken into the service of Margaret of Parma, governor of the Low Countries. In 1535 he was at Lyons, where he was imprisoned for defaming the king's mother, his former mistress. B. at Cologne, 1486; D. at Grenoble, 1535.—Agrippa seems to have been emphatically a man born to many changes. He was either twice or thrice married, and had several children. He wrote a goodly number of works, but the one by which he is best remembered now, is that entitled "Vanity of the Sciences," which is a satire on the various kinds of learning in vogue during his age. All his works were collected and printed at Leyden in 1550, in two vols. 8vo. He also wrote, with a view of pleasing his patroness, Margaret of Parma, a very ingenious and learned pamphlet to prove the superiority of woman over man. An excellent biography of this talented but unfortunate doctor appeared in 1856, written by Mr. Henry Morley.

Agrippina

AGRIPPA I., Herod, grandson of Herod the Great, king of Judaea in the time of Augustus Cæsar. He was made by his grandfather governor of Tiberias, where he lived so extravagantly as to incur Herod's displeasure. He then went to Rome, and attached himself to Caius, the son of Germanicus, who succeeding Tiberius, made Agrippa tetrarch of Batanæa and Trachonitis; to which Claudius added the whole kingdom of Judæa, with that of Chalcis. In order to please the Jews, he now commenced to persecute the Christians, and put St. James the Apostle to death. Being soon after at Cæsarea, he instituted games in honour of the emperor Claudius, at which the Tyrians waited on him to sue for peace. Agrippa made a pompous appearance on his throne, and when he spoke, his flatterers exclaimed his voice was that of a god, which impious adulation he was weak enough to receive with pleasure. On this he was immediately smitten by the angel of the Lord with a disorder in his bowels. D. A.D. 43.

AGRIPPA II., Herod, son of the preceding, ascended the throne at the age of seventeen. This is the sovereign before whom St. Paul pleaded with so much eloquence that he exclaimed he had almost been persuaded to become a Christian. D. at Rome A.D. 94.

AGRIPPA, Marcus Vipsanius, the friend of Augustus; he accused Cassius to the senate, and distinguished himself greatly in the naval battle of Actium, by which Octavianus gained the empire. Previous to this, he had beaten the enemy at Mylae and at Naulochus, on the coast of Sicily, and had completely broken the naval power of Sextus Pompeius. These victories procured him the reward of a naval crown, and he was, perhaps, the first who received that honour. He now rose to the highest dignities. In his third consulate he dedicated to Jupiter the Pantheon, which, to this day, is considered the most beautiful specimen of Roman architecture. It was erected to commemorate his victory near Actium, and is now called, from its form, Santa Maria della Rotonda, but it still bears the inscription, "M. Agrippa L. F. Cos. tertium fecit." B. about B.C. 63; D. in Campania B.C. 12.—Agrippa was first married to Attica, daughter of Atticus, the friend of Cicero; secondly to Marcella, the niece of Augustus and sister of Marcellus, and thirdly to Julia, the daughter of the emperor, and the young widow of Marcellus. He had five children by his third wife, every one of whom, it has been observed, came to a premature end.

AGRIPPA, Menenius, a Roman consul, who is celebrated for having appeased a commotion among the Roman people by the fable of the belly and the limbs. D. in the year of the city 261.—He was buried at the public expense, and his daughters were so poor that the people gave them dowries, out of respect for the memory of their father.

AGRIPPINA, Ag-rip-pi-na, the elder, was daughter of Marcus Agrippa and Julia, and the wife of Germanicus Cæsar, whom she accompanied in his military expeditions, and when Piso poisoned him, she carried his ashes to Italy, and accused his murderer, who stabbed himself. She fell under the displeasure of Tiberius, who banished her to the island of Pandataria, where she starved herself to death, A.D. 33.—Four famous busts of this lady are in the Cabinet of Antiquities at Dresden.

THE DICTIONARY

Agrippina

AGRIPPINA, the younger, was the daughter of Germanicus, sister of Caligula, and mother of Nero. After losing two husbands, she was married to her uncle Claudius, the emperor, whom she poisoned to make way for her son Nero. That monster caused her to be assassinated, in A.D. 61, and exhibited to the senate a list of all the infamous crimes of which she had been guilty. Agrippina was endowed with great natural gifts, but her ambition was boundless, and her disposition intriguing and dissolute. It is said that her son viewed her dead body with all the raptures of admiration, saying, that he never could have believed his mother was so beautiful. She left memoirs which assisted Tacitus in the composition of his "Annals." The town built by her at the place where she was born, on the borders of the Rhine, and called Agrippina Colonia, is the modern Cologne.

AGRIPPINA VIRGINIA, daughter of Marcus Agrippa and Marcella, and wife of the emperor Tiberius, who divorced her with great reluctance when obliged to marry Julia, the daughter of Augustus. Agrippina was afterwards married to Asinius Gallus, whom Tiberius, retaining his affection for his former wife, condemned to perpetual imprisonment, in the spirit of a jealous rival.

AGSTI, ag'-sem, the name of two distinguished Turkish authors—the one, Abderahman, who lived in the 17th century, being a writer on Anthology; and the other, Ismael, of the 18th century, a poet, historian, and mufti.

AGUESSEAU, Henry Francis d', a-gves'-so, a chancellor of France, whose father was intendant of Languedoc, and devoted himself to the education of his son. In 1691 he was admitted advocate-general of Paris; and in 1700 was named procureur-general, in which he appeared to the greatest advantage, regulating those jurisdictions which were under the control of parliament, and preserving a strict discipline in the tribunals. He improved the proceedings in criminal matters, and introduced several excellent regulations; but what he planned himself most upon was the administration of the hospitals. After the death of Louis XIV., the regent Orleans appointed him chancellor; but in 1718 he was displaced, on account of his opposition to the financial system promulgated by John Law. In 1720 he had the seals restored to him, but two years afterwards he was again deprived of them. In 1727 he once more became chancellor, which office he held with the highest honour to himself and benefit to the nation till 1750, when infirmities obliged him to resign it. n. at Limoges, 1668; d. at Paris, 1751. His works make nine volumes quarto, and are held in great estimation. D'Aguesseau never passed a day without reading some portion of Scripture, which he said was the balm of his life.—A statue of him was erected by Napoleon the Great in front of the Palais Législatif, by the side of one erected in honour of L'Hôpital. According to Voltaire, D'Aguesseau was the most learned magistrate that France ever had.

AGUILLOX, Francis, a-gwil'-on, a Flemish mathematician, of the order of Jesus, who produced a book on optics and spheric projections. n. 1568; d. at Seville, 1617.

AGUIRA, Joseph, a'-goo-eer-ra, a Spanish Benedictine monk, who received a cardinalship from Innocent XI. n. 1630; d. at Rome, 1699.

—He compiled a collection of the councils of

Ahithophiel

Spain, in six vols. folio, and wrote some theological pieces.

AGUIARI, a'-goo-a-are, an Italian vocalist of great celebrity, who was paid a salary of £100 per night, for which he only sang two songs. b. at Parma, 1788.

AGYLEE, or AGYLEUS, Henry, a'-je-lai, a lawyer and general scholar, who translated the "Nomocanon" of Photius. n. at Bois-le-Duc, 1533; d. 1595.

AHAB, ah'-hab, king of Israel, and the son of Omri, whom he succeeded. Reigned from about 918 to 897 B.C. He was married to Jezebel, whose wickedness instigated him to the commission of such acts of cruelty and idolatry, that he surpassed all his predecessors in impiety. He was slain by an arrow in a war with the Syrians, and his blood was licked by the dogs on the spot where he had caused Naboth to be murdered, about A.M. 3108.

AHASUERUS, â-hes-u-eer'-us, the Persian king whose decrees and extravagant mode of life are recorded in the book of Esther. He is called by Josephus Artaxastha, or Artaxerxes. The word Achaushverosh has been applied to him as well as other Persian monarchs, because it means a noble, or excellent prince. It is doubtful whether he is the Artaxerxes Longimanus of the Greek historians; but his reign may be fixed to have commenced about 515 B.C.

AHAZ, ah'-az, king of Judah, who, at the beginning of his reign, defeated Rezin, king of Syria, according to the promise of Isaiah. Notwithstanding this, he abandoned the worship of God, fell into idolatrous practices, and became so impious that his body was not permitted to be buried in the royal sepulchres.—Reigned from 742 B.C. to 728.

AHAZIAH, â-hû-â'-ah, king of Israel. There are two kings of this name mentioned in Scripture: the first was the son of Ahab (1 Kings xxii.) and the other king of Judah. This last was slain by Jehu, about 834 B.C.

AHIAH, a-hî'-a, "friend of Jehovah," the son and successor of the high-priest Ahitub.

AHIEZER, a-hî-e'-zer, son of Ammishaddai, and hereditary chief of the children of Dan, who came out of Egypt at the head of his tribe, consisting of 72,000 men.

AHIJAH, a-hî'-ja, the prophet who dwelt at Shiloh, and spoke twice to Jeroboam by the inspiration of God. He wrote the history of Solomon's life.—Another, who was the father of Baasha, king of Israel.

AHIMAAZ, a-hîm'-a-az, "brother of anger," the son of Zadok, and high-priest under Solomon. He rendered great service to David in his war with Absalom. Flourished in the 10th century B.C.

AHIMAN, a-hî'-man, a giant of the race of Anak, who with his brethren, Sheshai and Talmi, was driven out of Hebron when Caleb took that city. (Josh. xv. 14.)

AHIMELECH, a-hîm-e'-lek, "brother of the king," the son of Ahitub, and the successor of Ahiah in the priesthood in the time of David.

AHIO, a-hî'-o, "brotherly," he who, with his brother Uzzah, brought the ark to Jerusalem, from the house of Abinadab.

AHIRA, a-hî'-ra, chief of Naphtali, who came out of Egypt at the head of 53,400 men.

AHITHOPHEL, a-hîl'-o-fel, "brother of foolishness," a native of Giloh, and the friend of David until the rebellion of Absalom, whose cause he espoused, and, on foreseeing its probable AHLWARDT, Peter, ah'-wart, a learned German.

—He wrote, "On the Human Understanding," "The Immortality of the Soul," and "Thoughts on Thunder and Lightning." He was also the founder of the Abelite Society, which had for its object the promotion of sincerity.

AHMED BEN FARES, a'-med ben fair'-es, an eminent lawyer and lexicographer of Arabia, who was also named El Razi. Lived in the 10th century.

AHMED BEN MOHAMMED, a'-med ben moh'-ham-ed, a Moorish poet of Spain, whose effusions partook of the oriental style. He wrote historical annals of Spain. Flourished in the 10th century.

AHMED KHAN, a'-med kan, successor of Abaka Khan, and the first of the Moguls who professed Mahometanism, which gave great offence to his family. He was conspired against by his courtiers, who set up in his stead Argoun, his nephew. Put to death A.D. 1234.

AHMED SHAH EL ABDALI, a'-med sha el ab'-da'-le, the founder of the kingdom of Cabul and Candahar. He was a great warrior, and broke the power of the Mahrattas, by defeating them in the battle of Paniput, on the 7th of January, 1761. In the latter part of his life he was engaged in continual warfare with the Sikhs, but ended his days the sovereign of an empire which he had conquered, and which extended from Sirhind on the east, to Herat on the west, and from the mouths of the Indus and the Arabian Sea on the south, to the banks of the Oxus and Cashmere on the north. D. 1773.

ARENDT, or ARENTS, Martin Frederick, ah'-rent, a paleographer and distinguished antiquary, who passed forty years of his life travelling, on foot, through France, Italy, Spain, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and other European kingdoms, seeking for Scandinavian antiquities and deciphering Runic characters. He is, perhaps, one of the greatest examples of antiquarian enthusiasm on record. B. at Holstein; D. in a village near Vienna, 1824.

ARIAH, ai'-a, the concubine of Saul and daughter of Rizpah. Her children were given up by David to the Gibeonites, to be hanged before the Lord.

AIDAN, ai'-dan, a British bishop, who successfully proselytized the people of the northern parts of England to Christianity. He was bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, in Northumberland, and a prelate of exemplary piety. D. August 31, 651.

AIGNAN, Stephen, ain'-ang, an ardent French republican, a member of the French Academy, and a writer of considerable ability. At the early age of 19 his revolutionary zeal obtained him a situation of responsibility in the district of Orleans, and subsequently several official appointments under the régime of Napoleon I. B. 1773; D. 1824.—As an author, he is known by some poetical pieces and several dramas, and also by translations of the works of Pope and Goldsmith.

AIGNEAUX, Robert and Anthony, ain'-yo, two brothers, who composed some poems, and translated into French verse the works of Horace and Virgil. Flourished in the 16th century.

AIKIN, John, M.D., ai'-kin, an eminent physician, but more distinguished as a popular author. He was the only son of the Rev. John Aikin, D.D., for many years a tutor of divinity at a dissenting academy at Warrington, Lancashire. After finishing his studies at the university of Edinburgh, he became a pupil of Dr. William Hunter, and first settled as a surgeon at Chester. Thence he removed to Warrington, and ultimately succeeded in establishing himself in the metropolis of England. Here, with his sister, Mrs. Barbauld, he pursued literature with considerable success, producing several works, which aimed at making science popular amongst those classes who, without such works, would in all probability never have entered upon scientific studies of any kind. His "Evenings at Home" still commands a wide reputation; and is decidedly the most useful of all Dr. Aikin's works. To this, which extended to six volumes, Mrs. Barbauld contributed, but not to a greater extent than about half a volume. His "Natural History of the Year" is another work which has enjoyed considerable popularity. B. 1747; D. at Stoke Newington, 1822.

AIKIN, Arthur, eldest son of the above, inherited much of his father's literary talent, but chiefly applied himself to scientific pursuits. He was for several years editor of the "Annual Review," and in 1814 contributed to science a "Manual of Mineralogy." He also produced a "Dictionary of Arts and Manufactures," and another of "Chemistry and Mineralogy." B. 1784; D. in Bloomsbury, 1854.—Besides being the author of the above, Mr. Aikin was a large contributor to scientific journals, and was for several years the resident secretary to the Society of Arts.

AIKIN, Edmund, an architect, who wrote an account of St. Paul's Cathedral. D. 1820.

AIKMAN, William, ai'-man, a Scotch painter, was the only son of William Aikman, Esq., of Cairney, advocate, by Margaret, sister of Sir John Clerk, of Pennycook, bart. He was intended for the profession of the law, but his passion for the fine arts was so great that he determined to indulge it. Accordingly, he relinquished the law and applied himself assiduously to painting. After studying three years in Italy, he visited Turkey; thence he went to Rome, whence, after a short stay, he came back to England, and found a patron in the duke of Argyll. He excelled most in portrait-painting. B. 1682; D. 1731.

AILEY, Peter d', da'-le, a bishop of Cambray, and a zealous champion of popery. He presided at the council of Constance, where he condemned John Huss to the stake. Pope John XXIII. created him a cardinal. B. at Compiègne, 1350; D. 1420.

AILMER, or ÆTHELMARES, an earl of Cornwall and Devon in the time of king Edgar. He was very rich and powerful; and in 1016, when Canute invaded England, he joined the Danes along with the notorious Edric-Streona, and some others, against Edmund Ironsides. Ailmer did not long survive this treason.

ALRED, ETHELRED, or EALRED, ai'-red, abbot of Revesby, in Lincolnshire. Flourished at the beginning of the 12th century.—He wrote a "Genealogy of English Kings," "The Life of Edward the Confessor," and other productions.

AIXOIN, ai'-mong, a French Benedictine, who wrote a history of France, to be found in the third volume of Duchesne's collection. B. at Villefranche, in the province of Perigord; D. 1005.

; Henry, ains'-worth, an ingenious learned commentator on the Bible, who from a follower of the founder of the Brownists became an Independent, and proceeded to Amsterdam, where he grew so popular as to gather a congregation for himself. Quarrelling with some of the members of his church, he left them and went to Ireland for a time, but once more returned to Amsterdam. He died in this town in 1662.—He is said to have been poisoned by a Jew, who had lost a diamond of great value, which was found by Ainsworth; and when the Jew offered him a reward, he only requested to have a conference with some of the rabbis on the prophecies respecting the Messiah. This the Jew promised to obtain for him, but being unable to accomplish it, he administered to him a deadly drug. Ainsworth was well versed in the Hebrew, and his commentary on the Pentateuch is both curious and valuable.

AINSWORTH, Robert, a learned lexicographer, who was educated at Bolton, Lancashire, where he afterwards kept a school. Thence he removed to London, where for many years he followed the same profession. n. in Lancashire, 1660; D. in London, 1743.—He printed "A Short Treatise of Grammatical Institution;" but he is best known by his "Dictionary, Latin and English," 4to and 8vo, in the compilation of which he spent twenty years.

AINSWORTH, William Harrison, a writer of popular novels, who first obtained celebrity by selecting for his heroes such characters as Jack Sheppard and Dick Turpin, noted robbers and highwaymen. n. 1805.

AINSWORTH, William Francis, cousin of the above, the author of several works of travel, among which his "Travels in the Track of the Ten Thousand Greeks," and "Cilicia and its Governors," deserve especial mention. n. 1807.

—; Henry, air'-ai, an English divine, who after being a fellow of Queen's College, Oxford, was, in 1600, elected provost; and in 1606 served the office of vice-chancellor. n. in Westmoreland, 1560; D. 1616.—He was a rigid Calvinist, and wrote a few theological pieces.

AIRAY, Christopher, a divine related to the above, who had the living of Milford, in Hampshire. D. 1678.—He wrote a few pieces in Latin and English.

AIRD, Thomas, aird, an original poet of considerable power, a contributor to periodical literature, and author of the "Old Bachelor in the Old Scottish Village," "Religious Characteristics," and "The Devil's Dream," a poem pronounced "a wonderful piece of weird, supernatural imagination." He was editor of the "Edinburgh Weekly Journal" "The Dumfries Herald," and of an edition of the poems of Dr. Moir, the "Delta" of Blackwood's Magazine. n. at Bowden, Roxburghshire, 1802.

AIRY, Sir Richard, air'-e, a general engaged in the Crimea during the Russian war of 1854. In the year 1857 he was made quartermaster-general of the British army under the Duke of Cambridge as commander-in-chief. n. 1803.

AIRELLA, Angelica Veronica, ai'-roll'-ya, a lady of a noble family of Genoa, possessed of much ingenuity and taste, who learned the principles and practice of the art of painting, and executed some pictures on religious subjects. She afterwards became a nun. Lived in the 17th century.

* AIRY, George Biddell, air'-e, the present astronomer-royal, is by birth a Northumbrian. After being educated at several private schools, he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, as a sizar, at the age of 18. He stood at the head of all the men of his year as senior wrangler in 1823. In 1824 he was elected fellow of the college, and in 1826 was appointed to the Lucasian chair. Whilst holding this appointment, he delivered a course of admirable lectures on experimental philosophy. In 1823 he was chosen for the Plumian professorship of astronomy, for which he resigned his former appointment. He now earnestly devoted himself to astronomical studies, and in 1835, on the resignation of Mr. Pond, he had the honourable office of astronomer-royal conferred upon him. In this position he has been enabled to labour successfully for the advancement of science, and through his exertions the Greenwich Observatory stands second to none in the world. Mr. Airy has written much upon mechanics and optics; and has had his great abilities honourably recognised by various scientific societies. In 1823 he became a fellow of the Astronomical Society, and in 1835 was elected its president. In 1836 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and is a member of various other scientific bodies both in Europe and America. n. at Alnwick, 1801.—Mr. Airy has received two of the medals of the Astronomical Society, one for his "Planetary Observations," and the other for his "Discovery of the Inequality of Venus and the Earth." He has also received the Copley and the Royal Medals of the Royal Society, and the Lalande medal of the French Academy of Sciences.

AISTULPH, or ASTOLPHUS, ais'-tulf, king of the Lombards, who succeeded his brother Rachis in 749. The commencement of his reign was signalized by his making an inroad on the territories of the Roman see; but Pepin, king of France, besieged him in Pavia, and compelled him to restore all the places he had taken. The treaty which had been entered into was afterwards violated by Aistulph, who again invaded the Roman states. Pepin once more came to the assistance of the pope, and Aistulph retired to Pavia, where he was forced to sue for peace. He was killed in hunting, 756.

AIRTON, William, ai'-ton, a Scotch common gardener, who came to London to seek employment, obtained it, and ultimately became superintendent of the botanical garden at Kew, which he greatly improved, and in 1783 was appointed to manage also the pleasure and kitchen gardens. n. near Hamilton, Lanark, 1731; D. 1793.—In 1789 he published his "Hortus Kewensis." King George III. appointed his son to succeed him in both his places.

AITZEMA, Leo, ai'-ze-ma, a resident representative of the Hanse Towns at the Hague, who became eminent as an historian. n. at Dorkum, Friesland, 1600; D. 1669.—His "History of the United Provinces" is written in Dutch, and extends to fifteen vols., 4to. It has been continued down to 1692 and published.

AJALA, Martin Perez d', a-jal'-la, a Spanish ecclesiastic who was sent by Charles V. to the council of Trent, and afterwards made archbishop of Valencia. He discharged the duties of his station in an exemplary manner. n. at Carthage, 1504; D. 1558.—The principal of his works is entitled "De Divinis Traditionibus."—There were two others of the same name: 1. Balthazar of Antwerp, who wrote "De Jure et AJAX, ai'-jāx, the son of Telamon, by Peribœa or Eriboæ, daughter of Alcaëus, and, with the exception of Achilles, the bravest of all the Greeks in the Trojan war. He encountered Hector, with whom at parting he exchanged arms. After the death of Achilles, Ajax and Ulysses each claimed the arms of the dead hero. When they were given to the latter, Ajax was so enraged that he slaughtered a whole flock of sheep—supposing them to be the sons of Atreus, who had given the preference to Ulysses—and stabbed himself with his sword. The blood which ran to the ground from the wound was changed into the flower hyacinth. It is affirmed by some that he was killed by Paris in battle, and by others that he was murdered by Ulysses. His body was buried at Sigæum; some say on Mount Rhœtus. His tomb was visited by Alexander the Great. Hercules, according to several authors, prayed to the gods that his friend Telamon, who was childless, might have a son with a skin as impenetrable as that of the Nemean lion which he then wore. His prayers were heard, and when Ajax was born, Hercules wrapped him up in the lion's skin, which rendered his body invulnerable, except that part which was left uncovered by a hole through which Hercules hung his quiver. This vulnerable part was in the breast, or, according to some authorities, behind the neck.—Another, the son of Oileus, king of Locris, surnamed Locrian, in contradistinction to the son of Telamon. As one of Helen's suitors, he sailed with forty ships to the Trojan war. The night that Troy was taken he offered violence to Cassandra, who fled into the temple of Minerva. For this, as he was returning home, the goddess, who had obtained the thunders of Jupiter and the power of tempests from Neptune, destroyed his ship in a storm. Ajax swam to a rock, and exclaimed that he was safe in spite of the gods. Such impiety offended Neptune, who struck the rock with his trident, and Ajax fell with part of the rock into the sea, and was drowned. His body was afterwards found by the Greeks, and black sheep offered on his tomb.—According to the fanciful mythology of ancient Greece, these two heroes were supposed after death to be transported to the island of Lence, a separate place, reserved only for the bravest of antiquity.

AKAKIA, Martin, a-ka'-ke-a, a learned professor of physic at Paris. b. at Chalons, Champagne; d. 1551.—He translated into Latin "Galen de Ratione Curandi," and "Arts Medica."

AKAKIA, Martin, son of the above, and physician to Henry III. d. 1595.—He wrote a treatise "De Morbis Mulieribus, et Consilia Medica," to be published after his death.—There are several other persons of the same name and family, who acquired reputation in different professions. The true name of this family was Sans-Malice, "without malice," but this was changed into the Greek form of the name, Akakia; after a fashion much followed in those days of giving a Latin or Greek form to surnames.

AKBAR, ak'-bar, sultan of the Moguls, succeeded his father Humayun in 1556, and was the greatest of all the sovereigns who have reigned in Hindostan. He ascended the throne in his thirteenth year, when his country was torn by dissensions; but although possessed of superior intelligence, he was wholly unequal to the task of governing his kingdom. Accordingly he called in to his assistance a Turcoman nobleman named Bahram Khan, on whom he conferred the power of regent, and left the administration of affairs chiefly to him. By the severity of the measures adopted by this personage, the country was restored to comparative tranquillity; but the rigour with which he exercised his authority was felt by Akbar himself, who, in 1558, broke from his control, and took the reins of government into his own hands. Bahram now raised the standard of rebellion, and for two years endeavoured to create an independent province for himself in Malwa; failing in this, however, he submitted to Akbar, and was pardoned. The young monarch now turned his attention to the enlargement of his kingdom, which had been greatly reduced by the invasions of successful chiefs, who lost no opportunity of extending their own territories in a country in which the right of the sword was the only power recognised and acknowledged. At first his dominions only comprised the Punjab and the provinces of Agra and Delhi, but, by the fortieth year of his reign, his empire extended from the Hindoo-Coosh mountains to the borders of the Decan, and from the Bramahputra to Candahar. b. 1542; d. 1605.—Great as Akbar was as a conqueror, his sway was characterized by general mildness, wisdom, and toleration. He laboured to abolish the most cruel of the superstitious rites of the Hindoo religion, and expressed his opinion, that God could only be worshipped by following reason, and not by yielding an implicit faith to any alleged revelation. The memory of the beneficence of his reign is still vividly impressed on the mind of the Hindoo, and not without reason, as is shown by the following extract from an address presented by the rajah of Joudpoor to the emperor Aurungzebe a century after the reign of Akbar:—"Your ancestor Akbar, whose throne is now in heaven, conducted the affairs of his empire in equity and security for the space of fifty years. He preserved every tribe of men in ease and happiness, whether they were followers of Jesus or of Moses, of Brahma or Mahomet. Of whatever sect or creed they might be, they all equally enjoyed his countenance and favour, inasmuch that his people, in gratitude for the indiscriminate protection which he afforded them, distinguished him by the appellation of 'Guardian of Mankind.'"

AKENSIDE, Mark, ai'-ken-side, an English poet and physician, who, when young, was crippled by the falling of a cleaver on his foot in the shop of his father, who was a butcher. He had the singular weakness of being always ashamed of his origin, though the limp in his gait was such as to preserve it continually in his memory. His parents being dissenters, intended him for the ministry in their sect, and at the age of eighteen he was sent to Edinburgh to pursue his studies; but instead of following divinity, he devoted himself to physic. In 1741 he went to Leyden, where, in three years, he took his degree of M.D. In 1744 he published his "Pleasures of Imagination," a performance which at once attained celebrity, and proved him true poet. He soon afterwards commenced practising as a physician at Northampton. Meeting with little success, he removed to Hampstead, and a Mr. Dyson generously allowed him £300 a year till he could fix himself in practice. Having obtained his doctor's degree at Cambridge, he was elected fellow of the College of Physicians, one of the physicians of St. Thomas's Hospital, and physician to the queen. In 1761 he printed a discourse in Latin on dysentery, and was in a fair way of attaining considerable eminence in his profession, when he was carried off by a putrid fever. B. at Newcastle-on-Tyne, 1724; D. in London, 1770. His remains were interred in the church of St. James's, Westminster. His life and memoirs, written by Bucke, appeared in 1832 in a work entitled, "The Life, Writings, and Genius of Aken-side."

AKERBLAD, John David, ak-er-blad, a learned Swede, who, being appointed secretary to the Swedish embassy at Constantinople, had an opportunity of pursuing researches into Phœnician literature. He was not only able to read but to converse in several European and Oriental languages. D. at Rome, 1819.

AKIBA, ä-ki-bä, a Jewish rabbi, who was at first a shepherd, but at the age of forty devoted himself to learning, and became a teacher. He was flayed alive by the Romans, A.D. 135, at the age, as is stated, of 120 years.—Akiba was one of the first compilers of the "Mischna," or traditions of the Jews.

ALABASTER, William, ä-la-bas-ter, an English divine, of considerable attainments, who was educated in Trinity College, Cambridge, and who accompanied the Earl of Essex to Cadiz, where he turned papist. On his return to England, he again became a Protestant, and had some church preferment. Applying himself to the study of the Hebrew language, he became enthusiastically fond of the Cabala, or Jewish traditions. B. at Hadleigh, Suffolk; D. 1640.—He wrote a Latin tragedy called "Roxana," acted at Cambridge by the students; on which occasion a lady, hearing the word sequer repeated in a terrible manner, was so affected as to lose her senses. He was also the author of a Lexicon Pentaglotton, folio, 1637.

ALAIN, John, ä-lain, a Danish author, who wrote "On the Origin of the Cimbri," and other subjects. B. 1569; D. 1630.

ALAIN DE L'ISLE, ä-lain de-leä, surnamed the universal doctor, and a divine of great reputation in the university of Paris. D. 1203.—His works were printed in 1658, folio.

ALAIN, Nicholas, a French dramatic author, whose fame rests upon the production of some trifling comedies. Flourished at the beginning of the 18th century.

ALAIN CHARTIER, a French writer, who produced several pieces, the most esteemed of which is his "Chronicle of Charles VII.," to whom he was secretary. Flourished at the beginning of the 14th century.

ALAMANNES, ä-la-män-näs, a statuary of Athens, and disciple of Phidias.

ALAMANNI, Luigi, ä-la-män-nä, a Florentine, who, conspiring against Julius de Medici, was compelled to quit his native country, until Charles V. captured Rome, when he returned and was employed in public affairs, till the re-establishment of the Medici family obliged him to leave Florence again. He finally settled in France, and became a favourite of Francis I., who in 1544 sent him ambassador to the imperial court. B. at Florence, 1495; D. 1556.—Alamanni was of a noble family, and wrote many beautiful poems in the Italian language. His son Baptiste became almoner to Queen Catherine of France, and successively bishop of Dazos and Macon. D. 1531. A collection of his letters is extant, but in MS.

ALAMOS, Balthazar, ä-la-mos, a Castilian, educated at Salamanca. He entered into the service of Anthony Perez, secretary of state to Philip II., and when that minister fell into disgrace, Alamos was cast into prison, where he lay eleven years. On the accession of Philip III. he obtained his liberty, and was employed by the duke of Olivarez in several important situations. Lived in the 16th century. B. at Medina del Campo; D. in his 88th year.—He translated Tacitus into Spanish, and left other works.

ALAN of Tewkesbury, author of the "Life and Banishment of Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury." D. 1291.

ALAN, ALLEN, or ALLEYN, William, was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, and in 1550 became one of its fellows. In 1556 he was chosen principal of St. Mary's Hall, and two years afterwards was made canon of York; but on the accession of Elizabeth he went to Louvain, and was appointed head of the English college. Here he wrote, in defence of the Romish church, some treatises, which raised his reputation as a controversialist to such a degree, that he obtained several valuable preferments. In his own country, however, he was considered a traitor, and a man was hanged for bringing over from the continent some of his books. In 1586 he published a defence of the Pope's bull excommunicating Queen Elizabeth, to which he added an exhortation to her subjects to revolt against her in favour of the Spaniards. For this he obtained the archbishopric of Mechlin, with the dignity of a cardinal. B. at Rossal, in Lancashire, in 1532; D. at Rome, in 1591.

ALAN of Lynn, so called from the place of his nativity. He became famous for his theological writings. Lived in the 15th century.

ALAND, Sir John Fortescue, ä-länd, an English judge, who took the name of Aland, in compliment to his lady, who was the eldest daughter of Henry Aland, esq., of Waterford, in Ireland. He was educated at Oxford, whence he removed to the Inner Temple, and was called to the bar about 1690. In 1714, he was appointed solicitor-general to the prince of Wales, and afterwards to the king. In 1717 he was created a baron of the Exchequer, and, next year, one of the justices of the court of King's Bench. On the accession of George II. he was removed from that office, but for what cause does not appear. In 1728 he was made one of the justices of the Common Pleas, which situation he resigned in 1746, and was created a peer of Ireland, by the title of Baron Fortescue of Creden. B. in Devonshire, 1670; D. 1746.—Baron Fortescue belonged to the ancient family of Fortescue, in Devonshire, and was an able lawyer, an impartial judge, and versed in the Northern and Saxon literature. He published, in 1714, 8vo, his ancestor Sir John Fortescue's treatise on "Absolute and Limited Monarchy."

ALARCON, Don Juan Ruiz de, ä-lar-kon, a Spanish theatrical writer of the reign of Philip IV. Some of his productions are so excellent as to have been attributed to Lope de Vega and Montalvan. His drama of "La Verdad sospechosa" (suspicious truth) was imitated by Corneille in his "Le Menteur," which, in fact, is founded upon it. None of the Spanish dramatists, taken as a whole, merit a higher place in the drama than Alarcon, who is said to have written thirty plays, and whose verse glows with high, chivalrous sentiment, and is marked by those nice discriminating qualities which indicate an honourable mind. b. at Tlaseco, or Tlaseco, in Mexico, towards the end of the 16th century.

ALARD, a-lar, a Romish divine who wrote a great number of theological pieces now little known or regarded. b. at Amsterdam; d. at Louvain, 1541.

ALARD, Lambert, the inspector of the public schools in Brunswick, a theological writer and the compiler of a Greek Lexicon. b. 1672.

ALARIC I., al'-e-rik, king of the Visigoths, was descended from an illustrious family, and served in the wars between the Goths and Romans, when his countrymen submitted to Theodosius. He afterwards served in the imperial army, but being refused a chief command, he revolted, and entering Greece, devastated several of its provinces with fire and sword. Whilst thus engaged, he was encountered by the famous Stilicho, who compelled him to retire into Epirus. About this time, A.D. 400, he was acknowledged king of the Visigoths, and entered Italy, whence he carried away a large amount of plunder and a great many captives. Two years afterwards, he again entered that country, but was opposed by Stilicho, his former adversary, and after a well-contested battle, lost his wife and children, who were taken prisoners. He then entered into a treaty, and retired across the Po. He now submitted to the emperor Honorius, who was then reigning, and into whose service he entered, and, for three years, seems to have served that prince in Epirus. For this he demanded an extravagant reward, which being refused, he raised the standard of revolt, and advanced upon Rome, and laying siege to it, the Romans were ultimately compelled to comply with such terms as the conqueror chose to dictate. Having achieved this success, he withdrew into Tuscany; but finding that Honorius failed to fulfil the conditions of the treaty into which he had entered, Alaric again attacked the "Eternal city," and compelled its submission. He himself now appointed Attalus, prefect of the city, to be emperor in the room of Honorius; but the imbecility of that personage rendered him unfit for the responsibilities of his station. He was therefore deprived of his regal honours, and Honorius once more enthroned. These measures, however, had hardly been completed, when a treacherous attack made by the Romans upon the soldiers of Alaric, roused his indignation against the imperial city, which he gave up for six days to his soldiers. An indiscriminate pillage was the result of this act; but Alaric, to his honour, ordered his troops to avoid unnecessary bloodshed, to respect female chastity, and to preserve the buildings devoted to the purposes of religion. Having sufficiently satiated his vengeance, he withdrew into the southern provinces of Italy, where he died during the siege of Cosenza, in Calabria, in the year 410.—Alaric was a skilful warrior, and exhibited the qualities of promptitude and courage in a high degree. During his first siege of Rome, the inhabitants intimated to him that if they were driven to take up arms, they would fight with the utmost determination. "Do so," said the barbarian soldier; "but the closer hay is pressed, the more easily it is cut." On being further asked what he would leave to the besieged if they surrendered, "Their lives," was his laconic reply; and at the same time he demanded all their wealth.

ALARIC II., king of the Visigoths, ascended the throne in 484: he was slain in a battle which he fought with Clovis, king of France, near Poitiers, in 507. This monarch was of a much more pacific disposition than the first Alaric. He left behind him a regularly drawn up system of legislation, a code which is known as the Breviarium Alaricianum.

ALASCO, John, a-las'-ko, a Polish Roman Catholic bishop, who, having embraced the Protestant religion, came to England in the reign of Edward VI., and became pastor to a Dutch church in London. On the accession of Mary, he returned to his own country, where he distinguished himself so greatly in the cause of the Reformation, that he received the title of the Reformer of Poland. b. 1499; d. at Frankfort, 1560.—Alasco was the uncle of Sigismund, king of Poland, and was greatly esteemed by the leading men among the Reformers; particularly by Erasmus, whose library he purchased.

ALAVA, Diego Esquiesel, a-la'-va, a bishop of Cordova, in Spain, who was at the Council of Trent, and wrote a book on "General Councils." b. 1562.

ALAVA, Miguel Ricardo d', a native of Spain, who took a leading part in the troubles of his country from the time of the invasion under Napoleon till his death. He at first joined the French, but afterwards abandoned them in consequence of the oppression they practised on his countrymen. He then served under the Duke of Wellington, who appointed him one of his aides-de-camp. On the restoration of Ferdinand VII. he was cast into prison, his early defection having weighed more with the king than his late services. The Duke of Wellington, however, stood his friend, procured his release, and ultimately his appointment as ambassador to the Netherlands. In the revolution of 1820, he joined the constitutional party, was president of the Cortes in 1822, negotiated the liberation of Ferdinand with the Duc d'Angoulême in 1823; but the promises then made by the king having been broken, Alava retired to England. On the death of Ferdinand he returned to Spain, and espoused the cause of Isabella II. against Don Carlos, and was appointed ambassador successively to England and France. After the insurrection of La Granja, he declined to swear allegiance to the constitution of 1812, retired to France, and in 1843 died at Barèges. b. at Vitoria in 1771.

ALBANESE, al-ba-nai'-se, an Italian musician of high reputation. b. at Paris, 1800.

ALBANI, Francis, al-ba'-ne, an Italian painter, whose first master was Denys Calvert, who left him to the instructions of his pupil Guido, whom he accompanied to the school of the Carracci. Having finished his studies at Bologna, Albani went to Rome, where his first wife died. He married again, and his second wife was very beautiful. This lady became the mother of several fine boys, and Albani painted pieces in which his wife and children served as models for his Venuses and Cupids. He was fond of representing the fair sex, and his compositions on love-subjects are held in high esteem. b. at Bologna, 1573; d. 1660.—His brother and disciple, John Baptiste, was an eminent historical and landscape painter. He died in 1668.

THE DICTIONARY

Albani

ALBANI, John Jerome, a civilian and cardinal, who wrote some books in vindication of the papal power. b. at Bergamo; d. 1591.

ALBANI, Alexander, an Italian, created a cardinal by Innocent XIII. n. at Udine, 1692; d. 1774. This personage was a great virtuoso, and possessed a collection of drawings and engravings, which, at his death, was purchased by George III. for 14,000 crowns.

ALBANI, John Francis, also a cardinal, and nephew of the above, was distinguished as a patron of the fine arts. Although he endeavoured to prevent the suppression of the Jesuits, he was in other respects liberal and enlightened. His palace was plundered by the French invading army in 1793, when he made his escape to Naples, stripped of all his possessions. In 1800 he returned to Rome, where he took up his abode in private lodgings. b. at Rome, 1720; d. 1803.

ALBAN, St., al-ban, the proto-martyr of Britain, who served in the Roman army, and became a convert to Christianity, through one Amphibalus, a monk. b. at St. Alban's, in the third century; d. for his religion in the persecution under Diocletian, 303.

ALBANY, Louisa, Countess of, al-ba-ne, daughter of Prince Stolberg, of Godesm, in Germany, and wife of Charles James Edward, the grandson of James II., and whose adventurous spirit led him to enter Scotland with a few followers in 1745 to endeavour to recover the lost crown of his his. Their marriage took place in 1772, but the countess being much the younger, the match was ill-assorted, and she retired to a convent. Subsequently she went to France, but on the death of her husband in 1783, returned to Italy, and finally settled in Florence. Here she secretly allied herself by marriage to Count Alfieri, the poet, taking the title of Countess of Albany, as the relic of the last of the Stuarts.

b. 1753; d. at Florence, 182 and her husband, called th resided at Rome, they held a little court, and were addressed as king and queen. She was possessed of a refined mind, loved literature and the arts, and whilst in Florence her house was the resort of the most cultivated and distinguished persons. Alfieri died in her house, and in 1810 she erected to his memory, in the church of Santa Croce, a monument executed by Canova. (See CHARLES EDWARD, p. 252.)

ALBATEGNI, al-ba-ten-ge, an Arabian astronomer, who lived in Mesopotamia, and who wrote a book on the knowledge of the stars and the obliquity of the zodiac, which was printed at Nuremberg in 1517, 4to, and at Bologna in 1645. b. at Baten, Mesopotamia; d. 921.—He was the first who substituted sines for chords, and who may be said to have determined the length of the tropical year. He is considered to have had a larger number of methods in spherical trigonometry than the Greeks, and to be the greatest of the Arabian school, which connects Greek science with that of our own times.

ALBEMARLE, George Monk, Duke of, al-be-mari, a military and naval commander, who, being a younger son of a good family, entered the army as a volunteer, and served in the Netherlands under his relation, Sir Richard Grenville. On the breaking out of the war between Charles I. and the Scotch in 1639, he obtained a colonel's commission, and attended his majesty in both his expeditions to Scotland. At the commencement of the rebellion in Ireland, in 1641, he was sent to that country, where his services were so important as to obtain for him the favour of the Lords Justices, who appointed him governor of Dublin. At the time of his return to England, the town of Nantwich was invested by the Parliamentary forces, against whom he was despatched; but he was taken prisoner and confined in the Tower. Here he remained till 1646, when, on the ruin of the royal cause, he was released on condition of accepting a command in the army of the Parliament, to which he consented. He was now despatched to Ireland to subdue the rebels there; but concluding an unsatisfactory peace with them, he drew upon himself the indignation of the Parliament, who passed a vote of censure upon his conduct. Cromwell, however, had discovered the great military talents which he possessed, and, raising him to the rank of lieutenant-general, conferred upon him the chief command of the army in Scotland. Whilst here, his conduct was such as to excite the suspicions of the Protector, who, not long before his death, wrote him a letter to which he added this postscript:—

“There be that tell me that there is a certain cunning fellow in Scotland, called George Monk, who is said to lie in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart: I pray you use your diligence to apprehend him and send him up to me.” On the death of Cromwell, the position of Monk was one of extreme difficulty; but having a powerful army at his command, he determined to march into England. That he was favourable to the restoration of the Stuart dynasty, the sagacity of the late Protector had already discovered; but as he acted with extreme caution, no one could positively decide as to what were the real objects he had in view. Accordingly, when he arrived in England, he was courted by the republicans, whilst the as with his own desires, he acceded. When the assembly met, they voted the restoration of the king, with whom General Monk had carried on a secret correspondence, and who was consequently restored to his throne without violence or bloodshed. Thus was this great event effected by the prudence of one man, who became an object of the highest esteem, both with the people and the king. Wealth and honours were now heaped upon him. He was created duke of Albemarle, with a pension of £1,000 a year, and subsequently was appointed, in conjunction with Prince Rupert, admiral of the fleet, and gained a great victory over the Dutch, in 1666, in a fight which lasted three days, off the mouth of the Thames. Whilst the plague ravaged the city of London, he remained among the inhabitants, many of whom regarded his presence at such a period as great consolation. b. at Pothebridge, near Torrington, Devonshire, 1698; d. 1670.—The character of Monk, as represented by Macaulay, is that of a prudent and cautious rather than a bold and far-seeing man; and hence the impenetrable secrecy with which he veiled his policy on the death of the great Cromwell. In private life he was possessed of many virtues; and although it is said that he never feared the shot of a cannon, he had a wholesome dread of his wife, who was the daughter of a common blacksmith, had been bred a milliner, and was a proficient in the language of Billingsgate. She bore him a son, named Christopher, who afterwards figured as duke of Albemarle, and in 1638 died governor of Jamaica. The general was the author of a work on military and political affairs, which was published in 1671, and a collection of his letters was printed in 1715. He was interred in the chapel of Henry VII. in Westminster Abbey.

ALBERELLI, Giacomo, al'-bair-el-e, a native of Venice, who painted historical subjects with considerable credit. Many of his pieces are in the churches and public buildings of his native city, where he died about 1650.

ALBERGATI CAPARELLI, the Marquis Francis, al'-bair-ga'-te ca'-pa-chel'-le, an Italian senator as well as a comic writer, who spent his early youth in every kind of dissipation, and did not apply himself to study until he had attained his thirty-fourth year. At forty, however, he had not only become a powerful dramatist, but such an excellent performer, as to merit the title of the "Garrick of the Italian nobility." b. at Bologna, 1728; d. 1801. The works of this man have been pronounced unrivalled for wit, humour, facetious sallies, and knowledge of the world. A complete edition was published at Bologna in 1754.

ALBERGOTTI, Francis, al'-bair-got'-e, an Italian civilian, the disciple of Baldi, and who, after exercising his profession as an advocate at Arezzo, removed to Florence, where he received the honour of nobility. His character for veracity was so great, that he had the title of "Teacher of Solid Truth." Flourished in the 14th century.

ALBERIC, al'-be-rik, a French historian, and canon of Aix, who, not being able to take an active part in the first crusade, wrote its history from the year 1095 to 1123. Lived in the 13th century. His Chronicle was printed at Helmsstadt in 1554.

ALBERICO DE ROSATE, dai-ro-sa'-te, of Bergamo, a lawyer, who wrote Commentaries on the Decretals. Lived in the 14th century.

ALBERICI, Enrico, al'-bair-re-che, an Italian historical painter, but chiefly eminent for his religious pieces, was born near Bergamo in 1714; d. 1775.

ALBERONI, Julius, al'-bair-rol'-ne, who, having entered into orders, became curate of a village near Parma, where he happened to relieve the wants of the secretary of the duke of Vendôme, who had been robbed. Some time afterwards the duke entered Italy with his army, for which there was no means of providing, as the peasantry had taken the precaution to conceal their corn. He happened to be in the neighbourhood of the village in which the poor curate, who had formerly relieved the necessities of his secretary, resided. Recollecting this circumstance, Alberoni vassent for in the present distress of the duke, to whom he revealed the secret places in which the peasantry had concealed their grain. This service was so great, that the duke, on returning to Madrid, took him with him, and procured him the favour of the princess of Orsini, the favourite of Philip V. By her recommendation, he was appointed agent for the duke of Parma at the Spanish court, and greatly advanced the interests of his sovereign, by obtaining Elizabeth Farnese, princess of Parma, for his second wife. For this, Alberoni was made a privy councillor, was next appointed prime minister, and finally had a cardinalship conferred upon him. Having thus obtained the highest honours, he occupied himself with schemes for the benefit of the Spanish nation; but, being undermined by foreign influence, he was deprived of his posts and banished to Rome. b. at Placentia, 1664; d. there 1752.

ALBERT, al'-bert, duke of Austria, and subsequently emperor of Germany, was the son of Rudolph of Hapsburg, who founded the Austrian imperial dynasty. He was crowned in 1298, after defeating and slaying his competitor, Adolphus of Nassau, and was assassinated in 1308, by his nephew John, son of the duke of Suabia, whose paternal estates he had seized. On the bank of the Reuss, where Albert was murdered, Agnes, his eldest daughter, and queen of Hungary, built a monastery, and called it Königsteden. Here, after taking a dreadful vengeance, not only on the assassins of her father, but on many innocent families whom she supposed implicated in their crime, she shut herself up and ended her days. Her apartments are still shown in the dilapidated building, which stands on the high road from Basle to Baden and Zurich, and in the vicinity of the fortress of Hapsburg, whence originally sprung the house of Austria.

ALBERT II., emperor and duke of Austria, who, having married the daughter of Sigismund, emperor and king of Hungary, had bequeathed to him by that monarch his dominions of Hungary and Bohemia. b. 1397; d. 1439.

ALBERT, archduke of Austria, was the sixth son of the emperor Maximilian II. He adopted the ecclesiastical profession, and obtained a cardinalship and the archbishopric of Toledo. In 1583 he was made viceroy of Portugal, in which capacity his conduct was so satisfactory to his uncle, Philip II., king of Spain, that he sent him into the Low Countries to endeavour to quell the insurrection which had broken out in the seven United Provinces. In this, however, he had little success. In 1598 he married the daughter of Philip, on which he renounced the ecclesiastical character, and in 1600 encountered Prince Maurice of Nassau, at Nieuport, and was defeated. This battle decided the independence of Holland. Albert afterwards directed his energies against Ostend, to which he laid siege, and after the loss of 100,000 men on both sides, the place fell before his arms. A twelve years' truce was now concluded with the Dutch, and, before the termination of that period, Albert expired. b. 1559; d. 1621. (See Motley's Rise of the Dutch Republic.)

ALBERT, prince of Mecklenburg, was elected king of Sweden in 1364 by those nobles who had become dissatisfied with the reign of Magnus II., and by whom that monarch was deposed. The result of this measure was a war between the partisans of Albert and Magnus, which lasted several years, and which was finally closed in 1371, by Magnus making a formal resignation of the crown to Albert. The new monarch, however, was little less fortunate in pleasing his nobles than the former king. Accordingly, those disaffected chiefs offered the crown to Margaret, queen of Denmark and Norway, who marched into the country, and after a fierce battle at Talkoping, in 1388, took Albert prisoner. Albert was kept in confinement till 1394, when he recovered his liberty on condition of ceding Stockholm to Margaret. He attempted again to recover his crown, but failing, spent the remainder of his life in Mecklenburg. d. 1412.

THE DICTIONARY

Albert

ALBERT, the Warlike, marquis of Brandenburg-Culmbach, called the Alcibiades of Germany, on account of his beauty. His father dying when he was an infant, left him to the care of his uncle. In 1541 he took possession of his hereditary estates, and in the disturbances of Germany during the reign of Charles V., entered into the confederacy formed by Maurice, elector of Saxony, and other princes, against that monarch. He committed many excesses in this war, burning towns, and levying heavy contributions wherever he marched. Subsequently a league was formed against him, at the head of which was his old ally the elector of Saxony. Between these princes a great battle was fought at Siverhus, in 1553, in which Maurice was slain and Albert wounded. He was afterwards put under the ban of the empire, and deprived of his possessions. B. 1522 D. 1553.

ALBERT, margrave of Brandenburg, the first duke of Prussia, was elected grand-master of the Teutonic order in 1511, and entered into a war with Sigismund, king of Poland, in defence of the independence of that order. A peace was concluded at Cracow in 1525, by which it was stipulated that the grand-master should possess Prussia as a fief of Poland. Not long after this, Albert avowed himself a Protestant, and married a princess of Denmark. In consequence of this act, he fell under the ban of the empire. B. 1490; D. 1568.—A descendant of this prince threw off the allegiance of Poland, and his son, Frederick I., exchanged the title of duke for that of king of Prussia, in 1701.

ALBERT, PRINCE. Albert Francis Charles Emmanuel, prince of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, and consort of Queen Victoria, was the second son of Duke Ernest I., and younger brother of the present duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. He received the rudiments of his education under the consistorial councillor Florschütz, and completed it at the University of Bonn. A few days previous to his marriage with the queen, on the 10th of February, 1840, he was naturalized by an act of Parliament, and by another act, passed on the 4th of August of the same year, it was provided that he should assume the responsibility of regent should the queen die before the next lineal heir to the throne should have attained the age of eighteen. Besides assisting in many other noble undertakings, he took an active part in the Great Exhibition of 1851, and contributed not a little to its success. He had also a share in originating and in carrying out the early part of the arrangements for the Exhibition of 1862; but, unfortunately, did not live to witness their completion, having died after a short illness at Windsor Castle, on the 14th of December, 1861. The death of this excellent Prince was regarded as a national calamity, and called forth an intense and universal expression of regret, not only in the British dominions, but throughout the civilized world. A large subscription was at once made to erect a monument to his memory, which has been erected in Hyde Park, on the site of the Great Exhibition of 1851. Besides this national tribute, there is scarcely a district of the kingdom in which hospitals, museums, &c., have not been erected as monuments in his honour; so that it may be said that in a few years Great Britain and Ireland were studded over with memorials of the worth of this exemplary Prince and excellent man, as well as of the respect and esteem in which he was held by the people. The tendencies of the Prince Consort's mind were entirely of a pacific character, and all his pursuits aimed at exalting and refining the sentiments, whilst ameliorating the condition, of the subjects of the amiable sovereign whose husband he was. B. 1819; D. Dec. 14, 1861.

ALBERT EDWARD, prince of Wales, and heir-apparent to the British throne. On the 10th of November, 1858, he was gazetted as having been invested with the rank of a colonel in the army. The prince, in the summer of the year 1880, visited America, where he met with a hearty welcome both in Canada and in the United States; and in 1882, he undertook a tour in Egypt, Syria, the Holy Land, &c. On the 10th of March, 1863, he married the Princess Alexandra of Denmark, by whom he has issue, four children, two boys and two girls. B. at Buckingham Palace, November 9th, 1841.

ALBERT, Charles d', sharl d'al-bair, duke of Luynes, a favourite of Henry IV. and Louis XIII. of France. He rose to the highest honours, caused the fall of the Marshal d'Ancre, and ruled the kingdom as he pleased; so that even his master was jealous and afraid of his power. He fomented the war with the Huguenots, and in 1621 laid siege to Montauban, where he was seized with a fever, of which he died. B. 1578.—The family of D'Albert, descended from a branch of the Florentine family of Alberti, has produced many eminent men, among whom may be named Louis Charles, son of the preceding, and father of the duke of Chevreuse, and Paul d'Albert, cardinal de Luynes and archbishop of Sens in 1753.

ALBERT, Martin Alexander, originally an artisan, and subsequently a journalist, who became one of the provisional government of 1848, after the flight of Louis Philippe from Paris in that year. He was a button-maker by trade, and continued to work at his calling even while editing a paper called L'Atelier, which he had started in 1840. He took an active part in the revolution of 1848, and was subsequently elected a member of the Constituent Assembly for the department of the Seine. For taking part in the attempted rising of May 15, he was sentenced to transportation. After a detention of ten years at Doullens, Belle Isle, and Tours, he was set at liberty by the amnesty of 1859, since which time he has been employed in the gas works at Paris. B. at Bury (Oise), April 27, 1815.

ALBERT, Erasmus, a German divine, who was educated under Luther, and who is known as the author of a book entitled the "Koran of the Cordeliers," ridiculing the impiety of the Franciscans, who compare the actions of St. Francis with those of Jesus Christ. D. 1551.—His book was printed in German, with a preface by Luther, in 1531, and in Latin in 1542. The last edition of it is that of Amsterdam, in 2 vols. 12mo, 1734.

ALBERT, Krantz, a German professor of divinity. B. at Hamburg; D. 1517.—He wrote the "History of Saxony, and of the Vandals;" a Chronicle from the time of Charlemagne to 1504, &c.

ALBERT of Stade, a Benedictine monk, who wrote a Chronicle from the creation to 1256. Lived in the 13th century.

ALBERT of Strasburg, who compiled a Chronicle from 1270 to 1378. Lived in the 14th century.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Albertet

ALBERTET, al'-bair-tai, a poet and mathematician of Provence, who flourished in the 13th century.

ALBERTI, Cherubino, al-bair-te, an eminent historical painter and engraver of Italy. He was the son of Michael Alberti, an historical painter, and executed many pictures for the churches in Rome. He is, however, best known for his engravings. b. 1552; d. 1615.

ALBERTI, Solomon, a celebrated German anatomist, born at Naumburg in 1540, who made many important discoveries with regard to the structure of the human body, and wrote many works on medicine and anatomy, which were held in high estimation. d. 1600.

ALBERTI, Andrew, author of a Latin book on perspective, printed at Nuremberg, 1678, folio.

ALBERTI, Durante, a painter in oil and fresco. He lived nearly all his life at Rome, where he executed many pictures for the churches. b. 1539; d. 1613.—His son, Pietro Francesco, was also a good artist. He painted historical subjects.

ALBERTI, John, a German lawyer, who abridged the Koran, with notes, for which he was knighted. b. 1559. He published in 1556 the New Testament in Syriac, the whole edition of which, with the exception of 500 copies, was sent to the East: he also wrote a Syriac grammar.

ALBERTI, Leander, provincial of the Dominicans, and distinguished for his literary attainments. b. at Bologna; d. 1552.—He wrote—1. "A History of Illustrious Dominicans," folio. 2. "A Description of Italy," 4to. 3. Various Biographical Memoirs. 4. "The History of Bologna."

ALBERTI, Leon Baptista, an eminent architect, who was employed by Pope Nicholas V., and was the architect of several excellent works in Florence. d. 1494.—He was author of a comedy long believed to be the production of an ancient poet, and wrote upon painting, sculpture, and architecture, and also on morality and arithmetic.

ALBERTI, Giovanni, an Italian artist, who excelled in perspective and in landscape subjects. b. near Florence, 1558; d. 1601.

ALBERTI, Dominico, a Venetian musician, who was for some time in London, but who afterwards went to Rome, where he attained great eminence both as a singer and performer. He excelled on the harpsichord, and invented a new style of playing on that instrument. Lived in the eighteenth century.—In 1737 he set to music Metastasio's "Endimione," and published some other fine pieces of his own composition.

ALBERTI, Giovanni Carlo, a native of Piedmont, who painted several excellent pieces in fresco, especially two from the life of St. Augustine, for the church dedicated to that saint at Asti, where the artist was born in 1680. These pictures are full of finely-executed figures, the heads in particular being remarkable for force of expression. d. 1740.

ALBERTINELLI, Mariotto, al'-bair-to-nell'e, mar-e-ol-i, a pupil of Roselli, an imitator of Fra Bartolomeo, and one of the finest of the early Florentine painters. His chef-d'œuvre is in the Imperial Gallery of Florence, and is known as the Visitation of the Virgin to Elizabeth, mother of John the Baptist. He was a man of singularly dissipated habits, to which he fell a victim at the early age of 45. b. at Florence, 1475; d. about 1520.

Albinus

ALBERTINUS, Francis, al-bair-te'-nus, an Italian Jesuit, who wrote a system of theology, and a book in which he maintained that brutes have their guardian angels. b. 1619.

ALBERTINUS, Mussatus, an Italian, who wrote the history of the emperor Henry VII., and several poetical pieces. Lived in the 14th century.

ALBERTRANDY, John Christian, al-ber-tran'-de, a Pole, who, under the educational care of the Jesuits, rose to be bishop of Zenopolis. He subsequently became keeper of the medals of King Stanislaus, who, on account of his great merit as a numismatist, presented him with the order of St. Stanislaus, the great medal of merit, besides the bishopric of Zenopolis. In the 70th year of his age, he was called upon to preside over the newly-instituted Royal Society of the Friends of Science at Warsaw, of which he continued an active member until his death. b. at Warsaw, 1731; d. 1808.

ALBERTUS, al-ber'-tus, an archbishop of Mentz, who conspired against the emperor Henry V., for which he was imprisoned. b. in Lorraine; d. 1137.

ALBERTUS MAGNUS, a learned Dominican, who became successively vicar-general and provincial of his order, and whom Pope Alexander IV. made master of the sacred palace, and bishop of Ratisbon. These honours he soon resigned, and retired to his cell to enjoy his studies. His knowledge of nature and science was so great, that he was accounted a magician. b. at Lauingen, in Suabia, 1205; d. at Cologne 1250. Albertus was the first to give to the students of the Middle Ages an encyclopedia of knowledge, for which, with his other performances, he has been styled "the Great." His works, in 21 vols. folio, were printed at Lyons in 1615.

ALBERTUS, H. C., a German painter and engraver, was born in Saxony, and died about 1680.

ALBERTI, Bartholomew, al'-bair'-er, or Bartholomew of Pisa, a Franciscan monk, who wrote several books, the most noted of which is that on the conformity of St. Francis with Jesus Christ; in which he makes the saint equal, if not superior, to the Saviour. b. 1401.

ALBI, al'-be, Henry, a learned Jesuit, who wrote a history of illustrious cardinals. Flourished in the 17th century.

ALBICUS, al'-bē-cus, an archbishop of Prague, whose attention to Huss and other reformers has caused many writers to attack him violently. Lived in the 15th century.—He wrote some medical pieces, which were printed at Leipsic in 1494.

ALBINI, Alessandro, al-bē'-ne, a pupil of the Caracci, to whom he did much credit by the excellence of his designs. He was a native of Bologna, where there are many of his pictures. b. 1610.

ALBINOVANUS CELSUS, al'-be-no-vai'-nus sel'-sus, a Latin poet, who was intimate with Ovid. He wrote elegies, epigrams, and heroic poetry; but only two of his pieces are extant, one being an elegy on the death of Drusus, and the other on that of Mæcenæ. Flourished A.D. 16.

ALBINUS, al-bi'-nus, a Roman general, who was made governor of Britain by Commodus. After the murder of Pertinax, he was elected emperor by the soldiers in Britain. Severus had also been invested with the imperial dignity by his own army; and these two rivals, with about 50,000 men each, came into Gaul to decide the fate of the empire. Severus was victorious, and he ordered the head of Albinus to be cut off, and his body to be thrown into the Rhine, A.D. 197. Al. at Adumetum, in Africa.—A physician, sent to Syria as ambassador from the senate during the civil wars. He was put to death by Sulla's soldiers.—A Roman plebeian, who received the Vestals into his chariot in preference to his own family, when they fled from Rome, which the Gauls had sacked.

ALBINUS, Bernard, whose real name was Weiss, i.e. White, studied physic at Leyden, where, in 1702, he became professor in that faculty. p. at Dessau; d. 1721.—He wrote several valuable treatises on medicine.

ALBINUS, Bernard Scarified, son of the above, became professor of medicine at Leyden. p. at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, 1688; d. 1779.—His anatomical plates, in 3 vols. folio, 1741, 1749, and 1753, prove him to have been one of the greatest anatomists that ever lived.—His younger brother, Christian Bernard, distinguished himself also as medical professor at Utrecht.

ALBINUS, Ewazur, a writer who published a natural history of birds, a French translation of which appeared at the Hague in 1750, 2 vols. 4to.

ALBINUS, Peter, professor of poetry and mathematics at Wirtemberg, and secretary to the elector at Dresden. He published the "Chronicles of Misnia" in 1580, and other pieces.

ALBISTRE, Antoine Louis, d'Arret, one of those fierce Jacobins who distinguished themselves by the force and violence with which they advocated their principles during the great French revolution. In 1791 he was elected, with Sers for his colleague, a member of the Legislative Assembly, representing the department of the Lower Seine, whilst following, at the same time, the profession of an advocate at Dieppe. In this assembly he seems to have been actuated by a desire to annihilate everything that might be supposed to recall the recollection of a king. He and Sers obtained the passing of the resolution which decreed destruction to every statue of a sovereign, and placed a representation of Liberty in its stead. He now became a member of the National Convention, and was among those who first voted against allowing Louis XVI. counsel at his trial, and next that he should be put to death. In 1793 he carried the measure for massacring emigrants captured in foreign countries, whether found with or without arms. He seems to have been characterized by a wolfish ferocity, and to have gloated over the cruelties which he had been the means of inflicting upon his fellow-beings. He became commissioner to the armies of the republic, and rose to the military rank of adjutant-general. In this capacity he was present at the siege of Lyons, and afterwards at Toulon, where he became acquainted with Napoleon. Although his career, like that of a wild beast, was tracked with blood, he was still successful, and plunged into the greatest excesses of extravagance. At Bourg, he bathed every morning in the milk which was brought to supply the inhabitants of the town, and in his private hours would amuse himself by guillotining in effigy the king of England and the pope. Although in great danger, and voted to be arrested by the Convention, after the 20th May, 1795,—amongst the most dreadful days of the revolution,—he was so fortunate as to make his escape, and subsequently, after the general amnesty of the 26th October, 1795, was appointed by the Directory municipal commissary at Dieppe. When the Directory fell, he became a warlike partisan of Napoleon, who made him his sub-inspector of reviews. As such he accompanied the emperor in his invasion of Russia, and during the retreat from Moscow died of cold, hunger, and fatigue, 1812.—This wretch is said to have preserved his existence for three days on the remains of a flask of brandy, which in his dying moments he shared with one of his companions; and this is the only act of benevolence recounted in his history.

ALBO, Joseph, al'-bo, a Spanish rabbi, whose learning was considerable, and who, in 1412, assisted at a conference between the Jews and the Christians. Lived in the 15th century.—He wrote a book against the Gospels, and called it "Sepher Hikkarim."

ALBOIN, al-boin, a king of Lombardy, who on ascending the throne, demanded Rosamond, the daughter of Cunimond, in marriage, and being refused, commenced hostilities against Cunimond, whom he slew, and whose skull he converted into a drinking-cup. Rosamond also fell into his hands, and Alboin made her his wife. In 568 he conquered Italy, and removed the seat of his government to Pavia, where, at a feast, he sent some wine to Rosamond in her father's skull, which so excited her resentment that she caused him to be assassinated in 578.

ALBOY, Jacques d', d'jak dal'-lon, marquis of Fronsac, and marshal de St. André, a French nobleman, who in 1547 was made gentleman of the bedchamber by Henry II. In 1550 he was deputed to bear the collar of the order of St. Andrew to Henry VIII. of England, who made him a knight of the Garter. On his return, he was appointed to the command of the army in Champagne, where he greatly distinguished himself; but at the battle of St. Quentin was taken prisoner. On the death of Henry II. he was chosen one of the regency. Killed at the battle of Dreux, in 1562.—The Huguenots called Alboin "the harquebuser of the West."

ALBONI, Signora Marietta, al-bo'-ne, a charming and popular contralto singer, who made her début in England as Arsace, in "Semiramide," in the spring of 1847, the same season which introduced Jenny Lind to a London audience. From the time of her first appearance, she has maintained a great and deserved reputation as a vocalist of very considerable talent. b. at Cesena, in the Romagna, in 1824.—In 1853, Alboni was married to Count Pepoli, an Italian nobleman.

ALBONESTI, Giacomo, al-bo'-rai-se, a landscape and architectural painter of Bologna, where he was born in 1632; d. 1677.

ALBORNOZ, Gilles Alvarez Carillo, al-bo'-noth, archbishop of Toledo, was born in New Castille. On being raised to the dignity of cardinal, he resigned the archbishopric. He was of a very bold spirit, and taking up arms in favour of Pope Urban V., he brought all Italy into subjection, and then retired to Viterbo. b. at Cuenca, in Spain; d. at Viterbo, 1364.—Albornoz was a man of chivalrous spirit, and a successful military commander, although an ecclesiastical teacher. He was the instrument of saving the life of his sovereign, Alphonso XI., whilst engaged with the Moors at Tarifa. After he had subdued Italy, Urban sent for him to give an account of the manner in which he had conducted the administration of the country; when he loaded a cart with old locks and keys, and bringing them before the pontiff, said, "Here are the locks and keys of the towns and castles I have taken for you, and put into your possession, and with which I now present you." Urban was satisfied with his conduct, and remained his friend ever afterwards. He founded the grand college at Barcelona.

ALBRECHT, Wilhelm, vill-helm al-brecht, a distinguished German agriculturist, who taught the science of rural economy in Fellenberg's school at Hotwyl. b. 1786; d. in Franconia, 1848.—He wrote much on agricultural subjects, and edited a weekly journal which was devoted to the science of rural economy. He also edited "Annals of the Agricultural Society of Nassau," to which society he was perpetual secretary.

ALBRECHTSBERGER, Johann George, al-brecht-ber-jur, a German musician, a learned contrapuntist, and the instructor of Beethoven, was author of numerous compositions, about twenty of which have been published. He was also author of a "Guide to Composition," and several papers on harmony, which have been printed. b. near Vienna in 1738; d. 1809.

ALBRET, Jeanne d', dj'ne dal-bray, daughter of Henri d'Albret, the king of Navarre. At eleven she was united to the duke of Cleres, but the marriage was afterwards annulled by the pope. In 1549 she espoused Antoine de Bourbon, duke of Vendôme. In 1553 she was delivered of a son (afterwards famous as Henry IV. of France), and on the death of her father, in 1555, became queen of Navarre. In 1562 she lost her husband, when, although opposed by the kings of France and Spain, she eagerly began to establish the Reformation in her kingdom. Being invited to the French court to assist at the nuptials of her son with Margaret of Valois, she suddenly expired, not without suspicion of having been poisoned. b. 1523; d. 1572.

ALBUQUERQUE, Alphonso d', al-bu-ker-ke, a Portuguese commander, who, in 1503, was sent with a squadron to India, by Emanuel the Fortunate, king of Portugal. Part of the squadron was under Francis Albuquerque, who was either the cousin or uncle of Alphonso. The Portuguese adventurers landed in Cochin, Hindostan, and aided the king of that country to regain his capital, which had been seized by the zamorin or prince of the town and territory of Calicut. The two Albuquerque's soon after sailed for Portugal, where Alphonso arrived in safety, but the other was lost. In 1508 he sailed for Ormuz, and attacked and subdued Zeifadin, its king; but he was soon obliged to relinquish this latter conquest and return to India. Here, in a rash attack on Calicut, he was wounded, and compelled to retreat. In 1510 he took Goa, but was forced to re-embark, on account of a mutiny on board his fleet. He afterwards captured the strong city of Malacca, and had projected other enterprises when he was taken ill at Goa, where he died. b. 1452; d. 1515.—This man has been surnamed the "Great," and called the "Portuguese Mars," from the magnitude and extent of his military exploits. He was the first to lead a European fleet into the waters of the Red Sea. That he was a great and enlightened man, there can be no question; and this is testified by the rare fact of both Moors and Indians, after his death, repairing to his tomb as to that of a father, to implore redress from the cruelty and wrong which they were doomed to suffer from his successors. Fifty years after his death, his remains were conveyed to Portugal. His greatest enterprise was the capture of Ormuz, which he took in 1503, and which remained in the hands of the Portuguese until 1622, when, in conjunction with Shah Abbas, it was taken by the English. (See ABBAS.) The son of Albuquerque was ennobled by Emanuel, king of Portugal, who commanded him to take the name of Alphonso. He wrote a history of his father's enterprises, and died in 1580.

ALBUQUERQUE COELHO, Edward d', a noble Portuguese, who distinguished himself as a soldier, and wrote a "History of the Wars of Brazil." d. 1653.—His work was printed at Madrid in 1654, 4to.

ALBUTUS, al-bu'-she-us, a prince of Celtiberia, to whom Scipio restored his wife.

ALBUTUS, a sordid man, father of Canidia. According to Horace, he beat his servants before they were guilty of any offence, "lest," said he, "I should have no time to punish them when they do offend."

ALCIBIUS, Titus, a Roman philosopher, and propounder of Sardinia, who for corruption was banished by the senate. On account of his attachment to the Grecian language and customs, he is ridiculed by Cicero. d. at Athens.

ALCIBIUS, al-ke'-us, a celebrated lyric poet, of Mitylene, in Lesbos, who fled from a battle, and whose enemies hung up, in the temple of Minerva, the armour which he left in the field. He was a contemporary of the famous Sappho, to whom he paid his addresses. Flourished about 600 B.C.—Of all his works, nothing but a few fragments remain: they are found in Athenæus.

ALCEUS, an Athenian poet, who wrote what is denominated mixed comedy. He was the author of ten pieces, one of which, entitled "Pasiphae," he composed in competition with Aristophanes. Lived about 388 B.C.

ALCEUS, of Messene, a writer of epigrams, who in one of his compositions satirized Philip III. of Macedonia: the latter replied also in an epigram, in which he intimated that should the scribe fall into his hands, he would use other means of revenge.

ALCMEONES, al-ka-me'-nes, one of the Agidæ, and king of Sparta, is known by his apophthegms. He succeeded his father Teleclus, and reigned thirty-seven years. Lived 900 years B.C. The Helots rebelled in his reign.

ALCMEONES, a Greek sculptor, the disciple and rival of Phidias. He was one of the three greatest statuarys of ancient Greece, the others being Phidias and Polyclethus. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.

ALCEDO, Antonio de, an-to'-ne-o dai al-thai'-do, a native of Spanish America, who distinguished himself as a geographer. Little or nothing is known of his history, more than that he was an officer in the royal army, and an ardent geographical student. He spent twenty years of his life in compiling a "Dictionary of American Geography," which in 1786 was published in Madrid.

ALCHABITUS, al-cha-bit'-s-us, an Arabian astrologer, who lived in the 12th century. He wrote "On the Judgment of the Stars," "The Conjunction of the Planets," and "Optics," printed at Venice in 1491, and at Seville in 1591.

ALCHADELE, al-cha'-de-le, a noble of Spain, who was distinguished as an astronomer, and who lived about the close of the 15th century. Several works by him exist in MS., but only one has been printed.

ALCHINDUS, al-chin'-dus, an Arabian astrologer and physician, some of whose works are extant; one of which, upon the art of magic, is full of superstition and absurdity. Lived about the 12th century.

ALCIATI, Andrew, al'-se-a-te, a famous lawyer, who in 1529 was chosen professor of law at Anjou. He subsequently removed to Bourges, to discharge the same office, at the desire of Francis I. The duke of Milan prevailed upon him to return to his native country, where he was created a senator. b. at Milan, 1492; d. at Pavia, 1554.—His most esteemed work is his "Emblemas." A history of Milan by him was published after his death. He left his fortune to Francis Alciati, who succeeded him in the professorship at Pavia, and acquired great eminence in his profession; he was made cardinal, and died at Rome in 1580.

ALCIBIADES, al-ne-bi'-a-dee, the son of Clinias, an Athenian soldier, the disciple of Socrates, and possessed of great versatility of talent. He traced his ancestry, on the father's side, up to the heroic ages, through Ajax to Jupiter. On the mother's side, he proclaimed himself descended from the Alcmeonidae; and, himself possessed of one of the greatest fortunes in Athens, he took a wife who brought him the largest dowry that had ever been given in Greece. These advantages concurred with the vivacity of his temper and the generosity of his disposition to render him acceptable in society. By degrees he fell into excesses, and, in pursuing the flowery paths of pleasure, too often forgot the admirable lessons of virtue taught him by the greatest of moral philosophers. His profusion and ambition seemed to go hand in hand in stimulating his desire to become famous. "He contended at Olympia," says Mr. Thirlwall, in his History of Greece, "with seven chariots in the same race, and won the first, second, and third or fourth crown—success unexampled as the competition. He afterwards feasted all the spectators; and the entertainment was not more remarkable for its profusion and for the multitude of the guests, than for the new kind of homage paid to him by the subjects of Athens. The Ephesians pitched a splendid Persian tent for him; the Chians furnished provender for his horses; the Cyzicenes, victims for the sacrifice; the Lesbians, wine and other requisites for the banquet." At the age of 18, according to the Athenian law, he attained his majority, and in 432 B.C., whilst serving with Socrates at the siege of Potidea, his life was saved by that philosopher. For the valor he displayed on this occasion, he was rewarded with a crown and suit of armour by the Athenians; this was done at the instance of Socrates, to whom, however, the honour appears to have been more justly due. Subsequently, at Delium, he in turn saved the life of the philosopher. The friendship of these two distinguished persons may be regarded as one of the most extraordinary instances of mutual respect and affection which history has recorded as having existed between two celebrated men of entirely opposite natures. The virtuous teachings of the philosopher, however, were inadequate to subdue the violent passions of the statesman and soldier. In the Peloponnesian war, Alci-biades was appointed to command with Lysimachus, under Nicias, in an expedition against Syracuse; but while he was thus employed, a charge of impety was preferred against him at home. One morning all the Hermae, or half-statues of Mercury, which abounded at Athens, were found defaced; and on a reward being offered for the discovery of the offenders, some slaves gave information that it was done by Alcibiades and his drunken companions. For this he was ordered home; but, fearful of the consequences, he withdrew to Sparta, and stirred up the Lacedaemonians to declare war against Athens. Soon after this, however, his friendship for the Spartans declined, when he went over to the king of Persia. Subsequently, he was recalled by the Athenians, when he obliged the Lacedaemonians to sue for peace, made several conquests in Asia, and was received in triumph at Athens. His popularity was of short duration: the failure of an expedition against the island of Andros exposed him again to the resentment of the people, and he fled to Pharnabazus, whom he nearly induced to make war upon Lacedaemon. This was told to Lysander, the Spartan general, who prevailed upon Pharnabazus to murder Alcibiades. Two servants were sent for that purpose, and they set on fire the cottage where he was, and killed him with darts as he attempted to make his escape. b. in the 46th year of his age, 404 B.C., after a life of perpetual difficulties.—His character has been cleared from the aspersions of malevolence by the writings of Thucydides.

ALCIDAMAS, al-sid'-a-mas, a Greek rhetorician, who was the disciple of Gorgias, the orator and sophist. He wrote a discourse in praise of death. Flourished in the 5th century B.C.—There are two orations extant under his name; the first printed by Aldus in his edition of the Greek orators, 1518, and the second in the same printer's edition of Isocrates, 1518.

ALCIDAMIDAS, al'-se-dam'-e-das, a general of the Messenians, who retired to Rhegium, after the taking of Ithome by the Spartans, B.C. 723.

ALCIMUS, al'-se-mus, surnamed Jachim, a high-priest of the Jews, who obtained that office from Antiochus Eupator, king of Syria, but rendered himself odious to his countrymen by his avarice and cruelty. He died two years after his election. Lived in the 2nd century B.C.

ALCINOUS, al'-se-no'-us, a Platonic philosopher, who wrote an "Introduction to the Philosophy of Plato," which has been translated into English by Stanley. Supposed to have lived in the 2nd century A.D.

ALCIPTRON, al'-se-phon, a Grecian philosopher, who lived in the time of Alexander the Great. Some epistles in Greek which bear his name give a curious picture of Grecian manners. An English translation of them was published in 1791. Lucian is supposed to have imitated him.

ALCMÆON, alk-me'-on, a philosopher of Crotona, and the disciple of Pythagoras. He was the first writer on natural philosophy, and believed in the theory that the stars were animated beings. Lived about 550 B.C.

ALCMAN, alk-man, of Sardis, in Asia Minor, was one of the earliest Grecian writers, but of whose poems only some fragments remain in different authors. He is said to have been the first writer of amorous poetry. Flourished 672 B.C.—Müller, in his "Literature of Greece," says,

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Alcock

"that he is remarkable for simple and cheerful views of life, connected with an intense enthusiasm for the beautiful in whatever age or sex, especially for the grace of virgins."

ALCOCK, John, al'-kok, an English prelate, educated at Cambridge. He became dean of Westminster, and master of the Rolls, and in 1471 was preferred to the see of Rochester; whence he was translated to Worcester, and finally to Ely. Henry VII. made him lord president of Wales and chancellor of England. b. at Beverley, Yorkshire; d. 1500.—He endowed a school at Kingston-upon-Hull (now Hull), built the hall in Ely palace, and founded Jesus College, Cambridge. He was buried in the chapel which he built in Ely Cathedral.

ALCUN, or ALCUNUS, Albinus Flacens, äl'-ku-in, an English divine, was born in Yorkshire, educated first by the Venerable Bede, and then by Egbert, archbishop of York, who made him his librarian. He afterwards became abbot of Canterbury, and in 793 went to France, at the request of Charlemagne, who gave him several rich abbeys; he attended that prince to the council of Frankfurt. b. probably in York, about 735; d. at Tours, in France, 804.—Alcun was the most learned and accomplished man of his age, a great public teacher, and the principal instrument in restoring the extinguished study of literature and science. His works were published, in 1 vol. folio, at Paris, in 1617.

ALCORNUS, Peter, äl'-se-o'-ne-us, an Italian writer and corrector of the press to Aldus Manutius, and afterwards professor at Florence. He resigned that position, and went to Rome, where he was professor of eloquence; but perished during the troubles excited by the Colonas about 1537.—He wrote some ingenious pieces in Latin; and among the rest, a treatise on banishment, which he is said to have taken from a MS. on glory by Cicero, which he found in a monastery, and which, after copying as much as was sufficient for his purpose, he burnt. He was a man of rude manners, and of an arrogant, conceited, and quarrelsome disposition. By his contemporaries he was personally disliked, though his learning and talents were admitted even by his opponents.

ALDAY, John, al'-dai, a popular English writer, and translator of the work of Peter Boastuan, entitled "Theatrum Mundi," &c. Lived in the 16th century.

ALDEBERT, or ADALBERT, al'-de-bair, a French impostor, who pretended to be inspired, and exercised the episcopal function without authority; he was condemned by a council at Rome, and thrown into prison, where he died. Lived in the 8th century.

ALDEGREVER, Heinrich, hine-riah al-de-grav'-oir, a German painter and engraver, who was both a pupil and a successful imitator of the performances of Albert Dürer. b. at Soest, Westphalia, 1503; d. 1562.

ALDERETTES, Bernard and Joseph, al'-de-ret, two brothers, members of the Society of Jesus, who wrote two learned works on the origin of the Castilian languages and the antiquities of Spain. b. at Malaga, and flourished in the 17th century.—They were so perfectly alike as to be frequently mistaken for each other.

ALDELM, or ADELM, St. äld'-helm, bishop of Sherborne, and consecrated at Rome by Sergius I. He is said to be the first Englishman who wrote in Latin, and the first who introduced poetry into England. The people in his time being extremely illiterate, paid little regard to prosaic discourses, which suggested to Aldhelm the idea of entertaining them with ballads of his own composition, in which he blended religious subjects with those of a lighter kind, and thus induced numbers to listen to his addresses. b. at Malmesbury; d. in 709.

ALDHUN, ald'-hun, the founder of the see of Durham. In 990 he became bishop of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, which place he left on account of its being infested by the Danes. Taking with him the body of St. Cuthbert, he went to Dugham, where he built a church. d. 1018.

ALDINI, Giovanni, al'-de'-ne, a nephew of Galvani, the discoverer of galvanism. His great merit was in endeavouring to give publicity to such discoveries as he thought would be useful to mankind. He delighted in philosophical pursuits, and at his death bequeathed his scientific instruments and a large sum of money to found a public institution at Bologna, to instruct artisans in chemistry and physics. b. at Bologna, 1762; d. 1834.

ALDINI, Count Antonio, a brother of the above, who distinguished himself as an Italian statesman.

ALDOBRANDINI, Sylvester, al'-do-bran-de'-ne, a Florentine writer, who was appointed advocate of the treasury and apostolic chamber by Pope Paul III. b. at Florence, 1499; d. 1558.

ALDOBRANDINI, Ippolito, a son of the above, who became pope, as Clement VIII.

ALDRED, ald'-red, abbot of Twistock, and bishop of Worcester, who was appointed ambassador to the emperor of Germany, and was the first English bishop to visit Jerusalem, which he did about 1050. On his return he was made archbishop of York, with leave to hold his former see; but the pope refused him the pallium (archbishop's robe) unless he resigned the bishopric. On the death of Edward the Confessor, Aldred crowned Harold II., and afterwards assisted in the coronation of William the Conqueror. d. 1069.

ALDRIC, St., al'-drik, a bishop of Mans, who held a distinguished station in the court of Charlemagne and Louis le Debonair. He renounced it, however, for the ecclesiastical state, and in 832 was made bishop of Mans. He convoked an assembly of bishops for the reformation of abuses in the church, and compiled a body of canons. d. 856.

ALDRICH, Robert, ald'-rich, an English prelate, who was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. He was afterwards appointed provost of Eton, and in 1534 made canon of Windsor, and registrar of the order of the Garter. In 1537 he was consecrated bishop of Carlisle. b. at Burnham, in Buckinghamshire; d. 1558.—He was the writer of several works which evince considerable learning.

ALDRICH, Henry, a divine who from Westminster school went to Christchurch, Oxford, where he was elected student. In 1681 he was installed canon of Christchurch, and in the same year took the degree of D.D. He wrote, in the reign of James II., two able tracts, "On the Adoration of our Saviour in the Eucharist." After the Revolution of 1688, he was made dean of Christchurch, in which station he behaved in the most exemplary manner, and every year published a Greek classic, or a gift to the students of the college.

THE DICTIONARY

Aldringer

Alembert

Lord Clarendon's "History of the Rebellion." His knowledge of architecture and music was considerable, as appears by Peckwater Square, in Oxford, the chapel of Trinity College, and the church of All Saints, which were designed by him; and the numerous services and anthems which he composed. He was also the composer of two catches; viz., "Hark, the bony Christ-church Bells;" and the other, a Smoking Catch. He held the rectory of Weni, in Shropshire, and in the convent of 1702 sat as prolocutor. b. in Westminster; 1647; d. 1710. Besides the above works, he printed "Artis Logice Compendium," and the "Elements of Architecture," in Latin.

ALDRINGER, al'-drin'-ger, a general of the German empire. Though a servant to some young students at Paris, he acquired a knowledge of the languages and sciences, and then went to Italy, and had an appointment under Cardinal Madauro; of this, however, he was deprived, and going to Germany, he entered the army as a common soldier. His merits were soon recognised, and he was raised to the rank of captain. After passing through several gradations, he was made a field-marshal, and was also employed as ambassador. He distinguished himself on many occasions as a brave commander; but his avarice and cruelty were extreme. b. at Luxembourg; slain near Landshut, in 1634.

ALDROVANDINI, Tommaso, al'-dro-can'-de'-ne, an architectural and landscape painter of Bologna. His principal work is in the council chamber of Genoa. b. 1653; d. 1736.

ALDROVANDUS, Cyprian, al'-dro-can'-doos, an Italian, distinguished as a natural historian. After passing a life devoted to the most exalted pursuits, and bringing together, at vast labour and expense, a magnificent collection of minerals, plants, and animals, he died in an hospital, to which he was compelled to resort on account of his poverty. b. at Bologna, 1552; d. 1637.—In 1590 he published his first work on natural history, which was devoted to birds; in 1603 his work on insects appeared; and in 1626 that on the lower animals. The remainder of his works were published after his death, and are a monument of his industry and zeal.

ALDRUDE, al'-droo'-dal, Countess of Bertinoro, in Romagna, who was celebrated for her beauty and magnanimity, and who, in conjunction with William degli Adelfardi, a citizen of Ferrara, compelled the Venetians and Imperialists to raise the siege of Ancona. The growing opulence of that port having excited the jealousy of the Venetians and the emperor of Germany, they united their forces, and laid siege to it in 1172. On this occasion, the citizens distinguished themselves by the bravery of their resistance; but, being closely pressed, they were driven to the greatest necessities by the want of provisions. When their distress was at its height, they applied to William degli Adelfardi and the countess of Bertinoro, who assembled their vassals, and marched to the relief of the Anconians. Aldrude, by her presence and exhortations, inspired the troops with courage, and the besiegers fled in confusion. On her return homeward, she encountered several parties of the enemy, and in every action was victorious. William, having disbanded his troops, went to Constantinople, where he was received by the emperor with distinguished honours. Lived in the 12th century.

ALDUS. (See M)

ALEXANDER, Jerome, al'-e-an'-der, a cardinal, who taught the belles-lettres at Paris, and afterwards entered into the service of Pope Leo X., who, in 1515, sent him nuncio to Germany, and next year appointed him librarian of the Vatican. At the diet of Worms he displayed his eloquence against Luther, causing the works of the great reformer to be burned, and himself proscribed. Clement VII. made him archbishop of Brindisi, and appointed him his nuncio to France. In 1531 he was despatched to Germany in the same capacity, and vainly endeavoured to prevent Charles V. from making a truce with the Protestants. In 1536 he was made a cardinal by Paul III. b. 1480; d. 1542.

ALEXANDER, Jerome, nephew of the above, was distinguished for his abilities and learning. He first held the appointment of secretary to Cardinal Octavio Bandini, and lastly to Cardinal Barberini. b. at Friuli in 1574; d. of a surfeit, 1631.—In the republic of letters he is known by several works on antiquarian subjects.

ALEGAMBE, Philip, al'-e-gamb, a Jesuit, who took the religious habit in Sicily, and afterwards became professor of philosophy and divinity at Gratz, in Austria. In 1638 he went to Rome, and was retained there by the general of his order as secretary for Germany and president of spiritual affairs. b. at Brussels, 1592; d. 1652.—His works are but few, and relate to the history of his order.

ALEGRINUS, John, al'-e-gr'-nus, a cardinal and patriarch of Constantinople, who was appointed legate to Spain and Portugal. b. at Abbeville, in Picardy; d. 1340.

ALEXAN, Louis, al'-e-man, a Roman cardinal, who, in 1422, being archbishop of Arles, was sent legate to Siena by Pope Martin V. The object of his mission was to procure the removal of the council of Pavia to that city. Afterwards the pope made him a cardinal, and he was subsequently appointed president of the council of Basle, in which he opposed Eugenius IV., who excommunicated him. Nicholas V. restored him to his dignities, and sent him as legate into Germany. b. 1390; d. 1450; and was afterwards canonized.

ALEXAN, Louis Augustine, a lawyer of Grenoble, who, in 1690, published the posthumous remarks of Vaugelas, with a preface and notes of his own. b. 1653.—Besides the above work, he wrote the "Journal Historique de l'Europe," and some other works.

ALEXAN, Mateo, al'-ai-man, a Spanish writer, who satirized the manners of his countrymen in a work entitled "Guzman d'Alfarache," which was published at Madrid in 1599.—Lived in the 16th century.

ALEMBERT, d', John Le Rond, da-lan'-bair, a French philosopher, whom his foster-mother, the wife of a glazier, defined to be "a fool who plagues himself all his life, that he may be spoken of after his death." He was named John le Rond from the church near which he was exposed as a foundling, and where he was discovered by the overseer of the district, who gave him in charge of the glazier's wife. His father hearing of his abandonment by his mother, came forth and claimed him, charging himself with his maintenance and education. At 12 he was placed in the College de Quatre Nations, where he composed a commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, which the Jansenists read with astonishment. He then engaged in the study of mathematics, in which he made a surprising progress. On leaving the college, he went to live with his nurse, with whom he resided forty years, contented with an annual fortune of 1200 francs, which had been left him. His friends advised him to endeavour to better his condition by studying the law, in which he subsequently took his degrees, but soon quitted the profession, in order to apply himself to the more congenial study of physical sciences. Whatever progress he may have made in these, however, he abandoned them for mathematics, and in 1741 was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. Two years after this event, he produced his treatise on dynamics. In 1746 he obtained the prize medal from the Academy of Berlin for a discourse on the theory of winds. In 1749 he solved the problem of the precession of the equinoxes, ascertained its quantity, and explained the rotation of the terrestrial axis. In 1752 he published an essay on the resistance of fluids, and soon after obtained a pension from Louis XV. He next engaged with Diderot in compiling the celebrated "Encyclopédie," for which he wrote the preliminary discourse, which was so excellent, that it drew from Condorcet the compliment that in a century only two or three men appeared capable of writing such. While engaged on mathematical subjects, his name was not much known; but now he became celebrated by works of an historical and miscellaneous character; such as his "Philosophical, Historical, and Philological Miscellanies," "The Memoirs of Christina, Queen of Sweden," and his "Elements of Philosophy." Frederick, king of Prussia, offered him the office of president of his academy, and Catherine, the empress of Russia, invited him into her dominions as tutor to the grand duke; but Alembert refused both. In a letter of the latter, again pressing him to comply with her wishes, she says, "I know that your refusal springs from your desire to pursue your studies and to cultivate your friendships in peace. But this is of no consequence. Bring all your friends with you, and I promise you that both you and they shall have all the accommodation it is in my power to give." In 1765 he published his dissertation on the destruction of the Jesuits. He also published nine volumes of memoirs and miscellaneous pieces, and the "Elements of Music." In 1771 he was elected secretary to the French Academy, and wrote the history of seventy of its members, who died between 1700 and 1771. n. at Paris, 1717; p. 1783.—D'Alembert enriched the science and literature of his country by the composition of a great many more works, which, after his death, were collected by M. Bastien, and published in 18 vols. 8vo.—His religious opinions have always been conceived to be the same as those held by Voltaire, Diderot, and other professed infidels, who made the followers of Christianity a butt for their ridicule. But if this were the case, he was generous enough to praise Massillon, Fleury, Fénelon, Bossuet, and Flechier, not only as writers, but as priests. For ourselves, we do not think he comes quite under the category of the school of Voltaire, from whom a visit was refused by the same empress of Russia who pressed D'Alembert to come to her dominions. "There is no Parnassus in my dominions," said she of Voltaire on this occasion, "for those who speak disrespectfully of religion."

ALETINO, Benedetto, al'-ai-te'-no, the fictitious name of a professor of philosophy in the Jesuits' college at Naples. p. 1719.—In 1688, he printed a work which had for its object the overthrowing of the Cartesian philosophy, and the establishing in its stead that of Aristotle.

ALEXANDER I., al'-ex-an'-der, son of Amyntas I., is said to have been the tenth king of Macedonia, and to have lived at the time of the great Persian invasion of Greece, 480 B.C.

ALEXANDER II., son of Amyntas II., and the sixteenth king of Macedonia. Lived 370 B.C.

ALEXANDER III., surnamed the Great, was the son of Philip, king of Macedonia, and was born the same year in which the famed temple of Diana, at Ephesus, was destroyed; a circumstance which was afterwards considered to have been indicative of the greatness of his character. At an early age he was placed under the tuition of Lysimachus, and afterwards under Aristotle, who took great pains to form the mind of his illustrious pupil; and throughout Alexander's brief but active life the influence which his distinguished tutor had exercised over his mind frequently manifested itself amidst his most gigantic undertakings. When still young, the ambition of his character was indicated by several expressions which historians delight to record. "My father will leave me nothing to achieve," said he, on hearing of the victories of Philip. "Give me kings to encounter, and I will enter immediately," was another of his remarks when his father expressed surprise that he did not enter the lists at the Olympic games. At a very early age he succeeded in subduing Bucephalus, his famous war-horse, which no one had previously been able to manage. The "Iliad" of Homer was his favourite book, as the "Ossian" of MacPherson was that of Napoleon; and Achilles was the hero he chose for his model, and upon whose merits he endeavored to form himself. On the assassination of Philip, 336 B.C., he ascended the throne, in his twentieth year, and began that series of conquests by which his name has acquired a world-wide celebrity. At this period several of the Grecian states were struggling to shake off the Macedonian yoke, imposed on them by Philip, when Alexander went against them, compelled them to submit, and acknowledge him as the conqueror of all the Grecian armies, except those of Sparta,—an appointment which his father had enjoyed. He then marched into Thracia, and made several conquests. During his absence, Thebes revolted; on the intelligence of which Alexander returned into Greece, took that city by storm, and put many of the inhabitants to death. He also destroyed all the buildings except the residence of Pindar, the poet. This severe example had its effect on the other states; and even Athens, which was the most impatient under the domination of Macedonia, distinguished itself by a servile submission to the conqueror. He next turned his arms against Darius Codomannus, king of Persia, and in his 22nd year crossed the Hellespont, with an army of about 40,000 men. It was on this expedition that he, with his friend Hephaestion, visited the mound in which the remains of Achilles were supposed to lie. With the force at his command, he defeated the Persians at the Granicus, and afterwards made himself master of numerous places. At Gordium, where he assembled his army, he cut the famous knot on which the fate of Asia was said to depend. While he was in Cilicia he caught a dangerous fever, owing to his imprudently bathing in the river Cydnus when very hot. In this state he received a letter from Parmenio, intimating his suspicions that his physician Philip had been bribed to poison him. When Philip attended with a strong medicine, Alexander gave him the letter to read as he drank off the potion. On his recovery from this illness, he liberally rewarded the physician for his skill and integrity. Shortly after this, he defeated Darius near Issus, took a quantity of treasure and a number of prisoners; among whom were the mother, wife, and children of the king of Persia, who made his escape by flight. The generous conduct of Alexander to these fallen princesses forms the most brilliant episode in his distinguished career (333 B.C.). This victory was followed by the conquest of Phœnicia, Damascus, and other places. The siege of Tyre, however, occupied him seven months, and in revenge he perpetrated great barbarities on the inhabitants. He next marched to Jerusalem, where he was met by the high-priest, dressed in his sacerdotal vestments. On seeing this venerable personage, the hero bowed to the ground with such reverence as excited the astonishment of Parmenio, who attended him; when Alexander informed him that a personage of his description had appeared to him in a dream in Macedonia, and promised him success in his expedition. The high-priest then presented to the monarch the prophecy of Daniel, in which it was foretold that a Grecian prince should destroy the Persian empire. In consequence of this, Alexander bestowed liberal presents on the Jews, and passed into Egypt, which country he subdued. While there he founded the famous city of Alexandria, and consulted the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, the priest of which flattered his vanity by asserting that he was the son of that deity. Darius, having collected a considerable army, resolved to make another struggle for his dominions, but was defeated at Arbela, and the fate of Asia was decided, 331 B.C. This battle was followed by the taking of Susa and Persepolis. The latter city Alexander caused to be burnt, at the instigation of a favourite Athenian courtesan named Thais. While pursuing Darius, he received intelligence of that monarch having been slain in the deserts of Parthia by one of his own satraps, called Bessus. This individual Alexander caused to be put to death for his treachery, and when he came to the spot where the body of the unfortunate king lay, he covered it with his own cloak, and sent it to Persepolis to be buried in the tomb of his ancestors. The ambition for conquest had now become in Alexander an inordinate passion. He entirely subdued Persia, and then prepared to invade India. In the early part of the year 326 B.C. he crossed the Indus,—it is supposed at a place a little north of the modern Attock,—and entered the Punjab, or the country of the Five Rivers. On the banks of the Hydaspes,—the modern Behut, or Beduster,—he encountered Porus, an Indian prince, with a numerous army, in which were several elephants. The wondrous fortune of the Macedonians prevailed; but Alexander was so pleased with the gallantry of Porus, that he restored to him his kingdom, and entered into an alliance with him. Continuing the career of conquest, he advanced to the Acesines (the Chenab), traversed the barren plain between it and the Hydraotes (the Ravee), where he was met by the warlike Cathiæ, whom he defeated, giving their territory to his ally, Porus. Pursuing his march, he arrived at the river Hyphasis (the Gogra), which was the limit of his Indian expedition, and where he erected twelve colossal towers to mark this circumstance. All the country he had subdued between the Hydaspes and the Hyphasis he presented to his ally, Porus; and thus made him the most powerful prince in India. He now ordered a fleet to be built, and sailed down the Indus, and leaving the ships to Nearchus, whom he directed to the Persian Gulf, returned with his army through Persia to Babylon, where he was carried off by a fever, in the thirty-third year of his age, 323 B.C. At Pella, 336 B.C. The unsettled state of India at a recent period imparts a far deeper interest to the narrative of Alexander's conquests in the Punjab than they might otherwise deserve, when the remote period at which they occurred, and the objects for which they were made, are taken into consideration. He had four wives,—Barsina, the daughter of Artabazes; Roxana, a Persian princess, by whom he left a son of his own name, who was assassinated, with his mother, by Cassander; Parysatis, daughter of Artaxerxes

Ochus; and Statira, daughter of Darius Codomannus. By his own direction, his body was carried to Alexandria, where Ptolemy Lagus deposited it in a gold coffin, which one of his successors changed for a glass one. Having appointed no successor, his generals divided his conquests among themselves. The character of Alexander was made up of very great and very bad qualities. He committed many odious cruelties, and drank to a shameful excess. In one of his drunken fits, he, with his own hand, stabbed his most intimate friend, Clytus. Yet he often performed deeds that indicated a benevolent mind; and though he was pleased with the fulsome ascription of divinity, on other occasions he expressed his abhorrence of adulation and flattery. He possessed a taste for learning and the fine arts, and had always about him men of science, philosophers, and poets.

ALEXANDER BALAS, an impostor, who pretended to be a son of Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, and laid claim to the kingdom when Antiochus Eupator, the son and successor of Antiochus Epiphanes, was killed by Demetrius Soter in 162 B.C. Demetrius was defeated and slain by Alexander in 150, but the pretender was killed by Demetrius Nicator, son of Demetrius Soter, 146 B.C.—There are in the British Museum copper and silver coins with the head of Balas.

ALEXANDER II., king of part of Syria. He was called Zebinas, or the "bought one," as it was reported that he had been purchased from slavery. Reigned from 125 B.C. to 122.—The British Museum contains coins, both copper and silver, of this sovereign also.

ALEXANDER JANNÆUS, king of the Jews, the son of John Hyrcanus, succeeded his brother Aristobulus, 104 B.C. Aristobulus had cast him into prison; whence he was taken at his death and placed on the throne. He began his reign by murdering one of his brothers, and entered into hostilities, which lasted long, with Ptolemy Lathyrus, king of Egypt. His cruelties irritated his subjects, and produced a civil war, which endured six years. Alexander, however, proved successful, and in one day caused 800 captives to be crucified, after their wives and children had been murdered before their eyes. Having secured the throne, he carried his arms into foreign countries, and made several important conquests. D. of intemperance, 77 B.C.

ALEXANDER was the son of Aristobulus II., king of the Jews. He was sent prisoner to Rome by Pompey, with his father, his brother Antigonus, and two sisters. On being delivered from prison and going into Judæa, he raised an army, and opposed Hyrcanus, the brother of Aristobulus, but was defeated by Gabinius, the Roman general, B.C. 57, taken prisoner and sent to Rome. Cæsar afterwards restored him to liberty, in hope that he would be serviceable to him in Syria; but he again turned against the Romans, and with the same bad success. Scipio caused him to be beheaded at Antioch, by order of Pompey, 49 B.C.

ALEXANDER SEVERUS. (See SEVERUS.)

ALEXANDER I., king of Scotland, succeeded his brother Edgar in 1107. Before his accession he was remarkable for his seeming piety and humility, but afterwards he was so distinguished by his fiery disposition, that he was called "the Fierce." He was very rigorous in the administration of justice; on which account several insurrections took place, all of which he subdued. D. 1124.

Alexander

II., king of Scotland, succeeded his father, William the Lion, in 1214, at the age of 16. He engaged in a long and destructive war with John, king of England, who invaded his dominions; but he retaliated severely, by marching into England, where he committed great ravages. In 1221 he married the sister of Henry III. of England; in consequence of which, peace was restored between the two kingdoms. D. 1249.

ALEXANDER III., king of Scotland, was the son of the preceding by his second wife, and came to the crown at the age of eight years. Soon after he was married to Margaret, daughter of Henry III. of England, whom he assisted against the English barons. He defeated the king of Norway, who had invaded Scotland with a large army. He was killed while hunting, near Kinghorn, in Fife, in 1285, leaving the character of a great and good prince. The extinction of the direct Royal line by the death of Alexander's granddaughter, known as "The Maid of Norway," led to the disputes about the succession between Bruce, Balliol, and others, which afforded Edward I. of England a pretext to interfere. The consequence was that long period of war and English domination in Scotland, which was closed, and the independence of the country secured, by the victory of King Robert Bruce over the army of Edward II., on the field of Bannockburn, in 1314.

ALEXANDER, king of Poland, was chosen such on the death of his brother, John Albert, in 1501. D. 1506, aged 45.—He was a courageous, humane, and liberal prince.

ALEXANDER NEVSKOI, grand-duke of Russia, and a saint of the Greek church. His father, Jaroslaw, in 1237, removed his residence from Novgorod to Perjaslaw, leaving at the former place his second son, Alexander, as his representative and viceroy, his elder son Feodor having died when a youth in 1232. About 1239 he married a princess of Polotzk, and began to strengthen the kingdom against the incursions of his neighbours, Eric III., king of Sweden, the Danes, and the Teutonic knights, who were prompted to attack him by Pope Gregory IX. Alexander defeated this combination in two pitched battles, one fought July 15, 1240, at the confluence of the Ishora and the Neva, and the other on April 5, 1242, on the frozen surface of Lake Peipus. For his prowess in the first battle Alexander gained the name of Nevskoi, or Alexander of the Neva. D. at Vladimir, 1218 or 1219; D. at Kassimcow, 1263.—After his death, he was canonized; and in 1712, Peter the Great erected a monastery on the spot where he gained his fame, to which, in 1723, he caused the bones of the saint to be brought in great pomp. The empress Catherine built a superb church within the same monastery, with a magnificent mausoleum for herself and her descendants. The shrine of the saint is of massive silver. Peter the Great instituted the order of St. Alexander Nevskoi; but dying before he had named the knights, this was done by Catherine I. in 1725.

ALEXANDER I., emperor of Russia, was the son of the emperor Paul and of Maria, daughter of Prince Eugene of Wurtemberg. On the 24th of March, 1801, Paul was assassinated, not without some suspicions that Alexander was implicated in the conspiracy which had been formed against him, and which terminated so fatally to the son of the empress Catherine II. When he ascended the throne, Russia was engaged in a war with England; and as he was of the sovereigns of Europe, and on the 11th of April, 1805, Alexander concluded an alliance with England, which was joined by Austria on the 8th of August following, and by Sweden on the 3rd of October. The lightning rapidity with which Napoleon conducted his wars, however, rendered almost entirely nugatory the physical influence of Russia against him; for the succession of battles which were fought between the 8th and the 18th of October completely crushed the armies of Austria before the arrival of the Russian troops. On the 25th, Alexander made his appearance at Berlin, con-

Prussia, joined hands with him in the treaty of Frederick the Great, whose aid in the contest, and in the recovery of the partitioned, the two sovereigns pledged their eternal friendship with each other. Now hastened to join the emperor of Austria. On the 2nd of December the Russian and Austrian troops, commanded in person by their respective emperors, were met and beaten by the French at the battle of Austerlitz, which put an end to an immediate conference between them, and to the departure of Alexander with the remains of his shattered army. In order to gain time and recruit his strength, Alexander retired to but suddenly the negotiations, or failed to fulfil the intention which had been partially made, and recommenced hostilities. The battles of Eylau and Friedland, and won by Napoleon, and on the 15th of June, 1807, the united armies of Russia and Prussia were severely defeated at the destructive battle of Friedland, and compelled to fall back behind the Niemen. This decisive event ended the campaign. On the 21st an armistice was arranged, and five days later, the emperor of Russia and France met in a tent on a raft in the middle of the Niemen. It is affirmed that the two became friends, and on the 7th of July following, a treaty of peace was signed at Tilsit, Alexander, in a secret manner, agreeing to unite with Napoleon in a war against England. This treaty converted all the former friends of Alexander into enemies. In accordance with the plans of Napoleon, on the 21st of February, 1808, Alexander declared war against Sweden, and finally, after much hard fighting, obtained possession of Swedish Finland. On the 27th of September, the French and Russian emperors again met at Erfurt, where a congress was held for the purpose of bringing about a general peace; and although both Napoleon and Alexander united in proposing terms to England, the negotiations proved unsuccessful, and were broken off in a few weeks. The friendship between these two sovereigns lasted five years, and the treaty of Vienna, signed on the 14th of October, 1809, secured to Russia the province of Eastern Galicia, ceded by Austria. By the close of 1811 disputes had risen to such a height between the two emperors, that a rupture became inevitable, and on the following 19th of March, Alexander declared war against Napoleon.

Alexander

A peace was concluded with Turkey, with which Russia had been at war, and by the 25th of June, Napoleon, with an immense army under his command, was marching upon Russian ground. Alexander had an interview, in Finland, with Bernadotte, the crown-prince of Sweden. The French army had already entered

"I will go into Siberia. I will resume our ancient customs, and, like our long-bearded ancestors, will return anew to conquer the empire." "This resolution," cried Bernadotte, "will liberate Europe!" On the 7th of September, Borodino was fought, and on each side 25,000 men fell. On the 14th, Moscow was entered by the French, but only to find it a vast pile of smoking and flaming ruins. Napoleon commenced his retreat, and before the remnant of his immense army had crossed the Niemen, on the 16th of December, the bones of 300,000 Frenchmen were already bleaching on the plains of Russia. Alexander had joined his army in pursuit of Napoleon. He was present at the battle of Dresden, fought on the 26th and 27th of August; at that of Leipzig on the 18th of October; and on the 24th of February, 1814, met the king of Prussia at Chantmont. Here these two sovereigns bound themselves by a treaty to pursue the war against France until it was successfully closed, even at the sacrifice of all the resources of their dominions. On the 30th of March following, they victoriously entered the French capital, Napoleon was deposed, and on the 25th of July, Alexander returned to his own capital, St. Petersburg, where he was greeted with every public demonstration of joy by his admiring subjects. At the congress of Vienna, opened on the 3rd of November, 1814, Alexander was designated as king of Poland, which country had for some time been merged in his dominions. The escape of Napoleon from Elba, and the events which followed it, brought Alexander again to Paris, where, on the 26th of September, 1815, he, the emperor of Austria, and the king of Prussia, affixed their signatures to an instrument which had for its object the preservation of universal peace on Christian principles, and which was called the Holy Alliance. By the 13th of December following, he was once more in his own capital. With the banishment of Napoleon, the great events which had marked the political career of Alexander closed. In the beginning of 1825 he left St. Petersburg on a tour through his southern provinces. After visiting the principal towns in the Crimea, he arrived at Taganrog, on the Sea of Azof. Here he was taken ill of the common intermittent fever of the country, and gradually sank into insensibility, and then into death. B. 1777; D. at Taganrog, 1825.—Alexander and Frederick William, king of Prussia, visited England in 1814, and were received with the most tumultuous rejoicings, and entertained with truly magnificent hospitality. As a sovereign, he greatly increased the happiness of his people, promoted their literature, advanced their civilization, and improved their institutions. He founded upwards of 2000 schools for the benefit of the humbler classes, established 204 gymnasias, and remodelled seven universities. He abolished personal slavery, paved the way for the final emancipation of those serfs that are attached to the soil, and from a subordinate rank, raised his country to be one of the leading European powers. ALEXANDER II., present emperor of Russia, is surnamed Nicholaswiteh, as the eldest son of the late emperor Nicholas. His mother was a sister of Frederick William IV., the late king of Prussia. On the death of his father, which took place on March 2, 1855, he became autocrat of all the Russias, and immediately issued a proclamation intimating his resolution to pursue the plans of Nicholas, and, if possible, bring the war which was then raging in the Crimea, between the united forces of Turkey, England, France, and Sardinia, and those of his own dominions, to a successful termination. In this, however, he was doomed to disappointment; for on the 5th of September, 1855, the allies obtained possession of Sebastopol, the stronghold of the Crimea, which event was the immediate precursor to a suspension of hostilities. Peace was concluded in the same year; since which time Alexander has steadily devoted himself to the administration of the internal policy of his extensive dominions, to the development of arts and manufactures, and to the gradual abolition of serfdom, a task which even the energy of his father recoiled from undertaking. b. 1818.

The imperial party opposed his election, and in a council held at Basle procured Cadalous, bishop of Parma, to be elected by the name of Honorius II. After a fierce contest, the party of Alexander prevailed, and all Europe acknowledged him pope. He carried the papal power to a great height, and most of the sovereign princes yielded to his authority. d. 1073.

ALEXANDER VI., Pope. The original name of this pontiff was Roderic Borgia, and his mother was sister to Calixtus III., by whom he was made cardinal in 1455. On the death of Innocent VIII., he contrived by his intrigues to get himself elected by the cardinals, though he had then four sons and a daughter by a Roman lady. His son, Cæsar Borgia, was a monster of wickedness like himself. There is hardly a crime of which these prodigal wretches have not been accused, and seemingly with justice. At length Providence punished them by the same means which they had prepared for the ruin of others. In 1503 the pope and his son attempted to poison a rich cardinal on account of his wealth; when, by a mistake of the attendant, they drank the wine which they had destined for their victim. The pope died almost directly, but Cæsar recovered, and was killed some years after. b. at Valencia, Spain, 1481.

ALEXANDER VII., Pope, was originally called Fabio Chigi. After passing through a variety of offices with credit, he became a bishop and cardinal. In 1655, on the death of Innocent X., he was elected pope, owing to his attachment of ALEXANDER PONTIFFISTOR, an historian, who was the slave of Cornelius Lentulus, who became his pupil, and gave him his freedom. He was burnt to death in his house at Laurentum, which so affected his wife, that she hanged herself. Lived 50 years n.c.—He wrote five books concerning Rome; and various other works of his, in history and philosophy, are mentioned by Plutarch and others. Strabo says, that in his writings he mentions a Hebrew woman named Moso, who was the author of the Jewish laws. All his works are lost.

ALEXANDER of Ægea, a Peripatetic philosopher, was the tutor of Nero, whom it is said he corrupted by his instructions. Lived in the 1st century A.D.—He wrote a commentary on Aristotle's Meteorology.

ALEXANDER, a bishop of Jerusalem, celebrated alike for his piety and his sufferings, studied under Pantænus, and afterwards under St. Clement of Alexandria. Being made bishop of Cappadocia, he was imprisoned in the persecution begun by Severus, and remained in confinement nearly eight years. On his release he was associated in the government of Jerusalem with Narcissus, on whose death he became sole bishop; but in the reign of Decius he was again imprisoned and cruelly used. Lived in the 3rd century.—He wrote many letters, which are lost; but Eusebius has preserved extracts of four. He was the founder of a library at Jerusalem, spoken of by Jerome.

ALEXANDER, ST., a patriarch of Alexandria, and a staunch opponent of the heresies of Arius. He convened a council at Nicea, at which Arianism was formally condemned, in 325. He died in the following year.

Alfred

second, volume of his edition of the New Testament; from 1-53 to 18-7 he was minister of Quebec-street chapel, where he enjoyed a high reputation for eloquence. In 1857 he was appointed dean of Canterbury.

ALFRED THE GREAT was the youngest son of Ethelwolf, king of the West Saxons, and Osburga, daughter of Osiae the Goth, who inherited the blood of the sub-kings of the Isle of Wight. At the age of five he was sent to Rome, where Pope Leo IV. anointed him with the royal unction. Ethelwolf died in 857, leaving his dominions to Ethelbald and Ethelbert, and his personal estate to his younger sons, Ethelfred and Alfred. Ethelbald did not long survive his father, and was succeeded by Ethelbert; but he dying in 866, left the throne to Ethelfred, who made Alfred his prime-minister and general of his armies. Ethelfred dying in 871, from a wound which he received from the Danes at the battle of Mertone,—probably Morten, near Reading,—Alfred found himself, at the age of 22, the monarch of a distracted kingdom. After several unfortunate actions with the Danes, he disbanded his followers and wandered about the woods, and finally found shelter in the cottage of a herdsman named Deneulf, at Athelney, in Somersetshire. In this retreat he remained about five months, when he received information that Odun, earl of Devon, had obtained a victory over the Danes, in Devonshire, and had taken their magical standard. On this, Alfred is said to have disguised himself as a harper, and obtained admission to the Danish camp, where his skill was so much admired that he was retained a considerable time, and was admitted to play before King Gorm, or Guthrum, and his chiefs. Having gained a knowledge of the state of the camp, Alfred directed his nobles to collect their vassals, and to meet him at Selwood, in Wiltshire, which was done so secretly that the Danes were surprised at Edlington, and completely defeated. This was in May, 878. After the victory Alfred behaved with great magnanimity to his foes, giving up the kingdom of the East Angles to those of the Danes who embraced the Christian religion. His success now enabled him to put his kingdom into a state of defence, and to increase his navy. Having recovered London, which had been taken by the Danes, the whole country seemed to acquire a new life under his vigorous administration. After the repose of a few years, an immense number of Danish forces landed in Kent; on which those who were settled in Northumberland broke their treaty, and, fitting out two fleets, sailed round the coast, and committed great ravages. They were, however, soon defeated by Alfred, who caused several of their leaders to be executed at Winchester as an example. Thus by his energy, activity, bravery, and wisdom, did he secure the peace of his dominions, and strike terror into the hearts of his enemies, leaving the country in a very different condition, as to its internal safety and prosperity, from that in which he found it. a. at Wantage, in Berkshire, 849; n. 900.—There is, perhaps, no prince who has had the surname of "Great" given him with more universal consent than Alfred. He is said to have been engaged in 66 battles by sea and land, although his valour as a warrior has excited less admiration than his wisdom as a legislator. He composed a body of statutes, instituted trial by jury, and divided the kingdom into shires and tithings. He was so exact in his government that robbery was unheard of, and valuable goods might be left on the high-road without danger. He also formed a parliament, which met in London twice a year. There was so little learning in his time, that from the Thames to the Humber hardly a man could be found who understood Latin. To remedy this state of things, he invited learned men from all parts, and endowed schools throughout his kingdom; and if indeed he was not the founder of the University of Oxford, he raised it to a reputation which it had never before enjoyed. Among other acts of munificence to that seat of learning, he founded University College. He was himself a learned prince, composed several works, and translated others from the Latin. He divided the twenty-four hours into three equal parts; one he devoted to the service of God, another to public affairs, and the third to rest and refreshment. To Alfred, also, England is indebted for the foundation of her navy. In private life he was benevolent, pious, cheerful, and affable; and his deportment was both dignified and engaging. Several of the romantic incidents of his eventful life have suggested subjects for the historical painter: one of the best known of these is his allowing the cakes to burn whilst making his arrows in the cottage of the herdsman, during his obscurity at Athelney. "You can eat the cakes fast enough, though you will not take the trouble to look after them," was the rebuke which the herdsman's angry wife gave on this occasion to the disguised monarch for his want of vigilance. (See Pearson's "Early and Middle Ages of England," &c.)

ALFRED, the son of Ethelred the Unready, by Emma, daughter of Richard I., duke of Normandy. The ravages of the Danes induced his father to send him with his brother, afterwards Edward the Confessor, to Normandy, where they were educated. On the death of Canute, he landed in England with a chosen band of Normans, and would have succeeded in de-throning Harold, surnamed "Harefoot," if it had not been for the treachery of Earl Godwin. Alfred was taken prisoner, and his eyes were put out; after which he was confined in the monastery at Ely, where he died, or, as some say, was murdered, about 1037. B. 1003.

ALFRED ERNEST ALBERT, Duke of Edinburgh, second son of her Majesty Queen Victoria and the late Prince Consort, was born at Windsor Castle, April 6, 1844. Having decided to enter the navy, he passed his examination as a naval cadet in 1858, and was appointed to the Euryalus. In December 1862 the Greeks wished to place him on the throne of their country, which he declined. In 1866 he was created Duke of Edinburgh, and took his seat in the House of Lords: in the same year he was sworn in as Master of the Trinity House. In 1867 he left England in the Galatea on a voyage round the world, visiting the Cape of Good Hope, Australia, &c. On March 13, 1868, at the Sailors' Home picnic, near Sydney, a Fenian, named O'Farrell, shot him in the back, inflicting a severe wound. On his recovery the Duke returned to England, and was warmly welcomed.

ALGARDI, Alexander, al-gar-de, an Italian architect and sculptor, was the son of a silkmonger. He studied under Louis Carnacci, and executed many fine works; among which may be mentioned the Attila, which is the largest alto-relievo in the world, and is in St. Peter's church of the Vatican at Rome. b. at Bologna; n. at Rome, 1654.—As a sculptor, Algardi ranks among the first of the moderns. In infantile representation his excellence was great.

ALGAROTTI, Francis, al'-ga-rot'-e, an Italian author, who received a liberal education, and after visiting different countries, was made by Frederick, king of Prussia, chevalier of the Order of Merit, created a count, and appointed chamberlain. The king of Poland also highly esteemed him, and conferred upon him the title of privy counsellor of the affairs of war. b. at Venice, 1712; d. at Pisa, 1764.—His works were published in Italian at Lezhorn, 1765, and afterwards translated into French. Algarotti was a man of lively, but superficial genius; and though his writings show a taste for the fine arts, they convey little information.

ALGER, al'-jui, a learned French ecclesiastic, who lived in the 11th and 12th centuries, and wrote several books on religious subjects, some of which are lost. He was a native of Liège, where he was deacon of the church; but ultimately he retired to the monastery of Cluny, and died there in 1131.

ALGHALIB-BILLAH, al'-ga'-leeb-bil-la, called AL-AMMAR, first Moorish king of Granada, was born in 1195, and died 1273, after having reigned 42 years, and consolidated his kingdom, which he formed on the decay of the Almohadean empire in Spain. He was the patron of learning, arts, and manufactures, and adorned Granada in a style suited to the metropolis of a powerful and prosperous country. The celebrated palace of the Alhambra was begun by him; and the dynasty he founded reigned for two centuries, and was finally subverted by Ferdinand and Isabella in 1492.

ALGHAZZAL, commonly called Algazel, al'-gazi'-zel, a famous Arabian philosopher and divine, who was teacher of theology at Bagdad, and afterwards retired to Mecca, where for several years he led a monastic and studious life. He was a very voluminous writer, and attempted to form a system of Mahometan theology on a philosophical basis. In this he was unsuccessful, as he gave great offence to the orthodox Mussulmans, and also came into collision with the followers of Aristotle. His principal work was entitled "The Destruction of the Philosophers," in which he argued that there was no certainty in the doctrines of philosophy, and that men must always take refuge in religious faith. He was born at Tús, in Khorasan, in 1058; and d. at Bagdad in 1111 A.D.

ALGHISI, al'-gi-se, a name common to several Italians of note:—1. Francesco, a musician of Brescia, who composed two operas which had considerable success. b. 1668; d. 1733.—2. Galeazzo, an architect, who designed a palace for the duke of Ferrara, and wrote a work on military architecture, lived in the 18th century.—3. Tommaso, a distinguished surgeon, and particularly famous as a lithotomist. b. at Florence 1669; d. 1713.

ALHAZEN, al'-hai'-zen, an Arabian philosopher of the 11th century, was born at Bessora, which he forsook for Egypt, to which one of the Fatimite Caliphs invited him. Here he attempted to form a system by which the alternate overflows and decrease of the Nile might be regulated and controlled. In this, however, he failed, and 't is said feigned madness in order to avert the consequences of his failure. But his chief distinction is derived from his discoveries in the science of optics, and from his explanation of various natural phenomena which had previously puzzled the learned. He was an original thinker and bold experimenter, and his contributions to scientific knowledge are commemoated in glowing terms by M. Bailly in his history of astronomy. b. at Cairo, 1688.

ALI, a'-le, the cousin and son-in-law of Mahomet, whom he was to have succeeded; but being successfully opposed by Omar and Othman, he raised a sect of his own, and gained many followers. On the death of Othman he was declared caliph in 635, but was assassinated in a mosque, A.D. 669.—He had nine wives, by whom he had fourteen sons and eighteen daughters.

ALI BAK, al'-le-bek, a Pole, who became first dragoman or interpreter to the grand seignor of Turkey. He was taken prisoner by the Tartars when a child, and sold to the Turks, and was brought up in the Mahometan faith. b. 1675.—He understood English, and translated the Catechism of the Church of England, and all the Bible, into the Turkish language. His first work is a book on the liturgy of the Turks, their pilgrimages to Mecca, &c., translated into Latin by Dr. Smith.

ALI BEX, a'-le-bai, a Circassian adventurer, who was taken prisoner by robbers near to Cairo, and he was bought by the army, who entered him among the Mamelukes. For his gallantry against the Arabs he was created a bey.

In 1755 his patron was murdered by a party headed by a person also called Ibrahim, a Circassian. In 1763 Ali had attained not only high rank, but considerable power in the state, and soon after slew Ibrahim, to revenge the murder of his patron. This raised against him numerous enemies, who obliged him to fly to Acre, where he was protected by the sheik Daher. In 1766 he was recalled by the people, and, after revenging himself upon his enemies, he declared war against the Arabs, and by the success of his achievements endeared his name with renown. Having now risen to be the head of the government, Egypt under his rule began to revive; agriculture flourished, and the country seemed to bid fair to recover its former splendour. In 1768 war broke out between Russia and Turkey, and Ali sent 12,000 men to serve in the Ottoman army. His enemies reported at Constantinople that these troops were designed to assist the Russians; in consequence of which a caprice, and four attendants, were sent to take off his head. Ali being informed of this, seized these messengers of death and handed them over to the fate designed for himself. He then declared war against the Porte, and for a time preserved his independence, and obtained several advantages. At last his principal commanders revolted with their troops, and in a battle which took place between Ali and the forces of one of his chief Mamelukes, he was taken prisoner, and died on his wounds in 1773. b. in Circassia, 1723.—The object of Ali was to endeavour to re-establish the independence of Egypt; to resuscitate some of its long-gone grandeur; and had he been supported by a similar spirit of energy in his people, Egypt might once again have taken a prominent place among the nations of the modern world.

ALI, Hyder. (See HYDER ALI KHAN.)

ALI PACHA, a'-le-pa-shaw, or pa'-sha, an Albanian chief, who in his fourteenth year was secured in the inheritance of his father's estates by the cruelty of his mother, from whom he seems to have inherited the ferocity by which he was actuated in many of the deeds he perpetrated in winning his way to wealth and power. Born amongst a community of robbers, his early life was passed amid scenes of continual vicissitude and the most daring and dangerous adventure; but whilst he was distinguishing himself by his bravery, he was at the same time accumulating riches and gathering power. At length he was enabled, by intriguing at Constantinople, to obtain the secret commission which enabled him to execute the sentence of death against Selim, pasha of Delvina. He was then appointed lieutenant to the new dervend pasha of Romilli, in which his conduct was marked by great rapacity, even among the Delphians, or robbers, with whom he was leagued in spoiling all that came within his reach. The country now swarmed with marauders. His power grew with his increasing riches; but the Porte was dissatisfied, and the dervend pasha was recalled and decapitated. Ali, although summoned to the capital, was too wary to be caught. He bribed the divan, remained where he was, and avoided the loss of his head. Ali soon afterwards managed to make his peace with the Porte, and successively became pasha of Trikala, in Thessaly, then dervend pasha of Romilli, when he, from being a robber himself, raised a body of 4,000 Albanians, and gained additional favour with the Porte by clearing the country of the depredators by whom it was infested. He next took Jannina, the capital of southern Albania, or Epirus, usurped the pashalic, got himself confirmed in it, and began vigorously to extend his territories. These finally embraced all Epirus, and extended into Acamania and Etolia, or Western Greece. He attacked and defeated the Suliotas, and executed upon them the most dreadful vengeance for the bravery with which they had resisted his efforts to conquer them. He reduced many of the towns on the Gulf of Arta and the coast of the Adriatic; penetrated, on the north, Albania proper; intrigued for and obtained the pashalic of Berat; seized the government of Ochrida, in Upper Albania; attacked, by order of the Porte, the pasha of Scutari, or Skodra; defeated him, and then appropriated his territories. At all these daring acts the Porte was compelled to connive, and Ali was even appointed inspector of the principal division of the empire, with a residence at Monastir, and an army of 24,000 men. He subsequently became a vizier, or pasha with three tails, but by his intriguing and treacherous disposition he finally roused the ire of the sultan, who had him excommunicated, and commanded all the pashas of European Turkey to march against him. Ali was compelled to abandon his stronghold in Jannina, and on a promise of pardon surrendered himself to the Porte. The treachery by which so many of the deeds of his own life had been distinguished now fell upon himself. He was betrayed and murdered. His head was transported to Constantinople, where, upon the gate of the seraglio, it was stuck and exhibited to the gaze of the populace. n. at Tepelen, 1750; p. 1822. —Ali had three sons, who shared his fate; and whatever regret might be felt for them, there was none on his behalf. Lord Byron visited him in his fortress at Tepelen, and thus sings of him in the second canto of "Childe Harold:" "He pass'd bleak Pindus, Acherusia's lake, And left the primal city of the land,

Alison

And onwards did his further journey take,
To greet Albania's chief, whose dread command
Is lawless law."
The lineaments of Ali, however, did not, in the noble poet's opinion, indicate the ensanguined ferocity which characterized his disposition. Notwithstanding that he was a man of "war and woes," and that crimes had "marked him with a tiger's tooth,"—
"Yet in his lineaments ye cannot trace,—
While gentleness her milder radiance throws
Along that agéd, venerable face,—
The deeds that lurk beneath, and stain him with disgrace!"
ALIBRANDI, Girolamo, a-le-bran'-de, a Sicilian painter, who was a pupil of Leonardo da Vinci, whom he closely imitated. His works are mostly in the churches of Messina, his native town. b. 1470; d. 1524.
ALIBENTUS CÆCINUS, al-le-e'-nus se-si'-na, a quæstor in Bœotia, appointed by Galba to the command of a legion in Germany. The emperor disgraced him for his bad conduct, and he then raised commotions in the empire, about the middle of the 1st century.
ALIMENTUS, al'-men'-tus, an historian of the second Punic war, who wrote in Greek an account of Hannibal, besides a treatise on military matters.
ALISON, Archibald, al'-e-sun, a clergyman, whose father was a magistrate of the city of Edinburgh, and who educated his son for the church. After receiving several preferments, he finally became the senior clergyman of the episcopal chapel in the Cowgate, Edinburgh, the congregation of which subsequently removed to a new Gothic structure which they erected in York Place, where Mr. Alison continued to officiate, until increasing infirmity compelled him to relinquish his public duties. b. in Edinburgh, 1757; d. 1839.—Mr. Alison is best known by his "Essays on Taste," which attained no great degree of popularity till the appearance of a second edition, when an elegant and able critique by the late Lord Jeffrey, in the "Edinburgh Review," brought them prominently into notice. They then enjoyed a brief popularity, but are now little read.
ALISON, Sir Archibald, Bart., son of the above, was born in Shropshire, while his father officiated as vicar of Kenley, in that county. In 1800 his father removed to Edinburgh, whither he brought his son, who received his education in the schools and university of that city, and in 1814 was called to the Scottish bar as an advocate. His literary predilections stimulated him to become a contributor to periodical publications; and although his first appearance in the world of letters was as a writer on the criminal law of Scotland, he achieved little celebrity until the appearance of his "History of Europe from the Commencement of the French Revolution in 1789 to the Restoration of the Bourbons in 1815," the first volume of which was published in 1839. This work has been continued as the "History of Europe from the Fall of Napoleon in 1815, to the Accession of Louis Napoleon in 1852." Although it is very diffuse in some parts, still its comprehensive grasp, and the evident endeavour to give, as far as possible, an impartial narrative of events, coupled with the fervour and animation of style which pervade it, have procured for Sir Archibald's "History" a high degree of popular favour.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Alison

It has been translated into most of the European, and into some of the Eastern languages. In 1828, Mr. Alison was appointed sheriff of the county of Lanark, and on the formation of the Derby ministry in 1853, was created a baronet. In 1851 he was elected lord-rector of the University of Glasgow, and in 1853 had conferred upon him the honorary degree of D.C.L. by the University of Oxford. Besides his "History," Sir Archibald Alison has written a "Life of Marlborough," "Historical, Political, and Miscellaneous Essays," which originally appeared in "Blackwood's Magazine," two volumes on the "Principles of Population," and other works. B. 1793; D. 1863.

ALISON, William Pulteney, M.D., brother of Sir Archibald, a distinguished physician, and professor of medical jurisprudence and of the theory and practice of medicine in the University of Edinburgh. He was a voluminous writer on medical subjects, and contributed numerous articles to the medical periodicals of Edinburgh and London. He was likewise eminent for the benevolence of his disposition and his numerous charities; while in the enjoyment of a large practice, and perhaps the most popular consulting physician of his day in Edinburgh, he was ever more ready to attend the calls of the earl of Northumberland, and the earl of Leicester, Elizabeth's favourites, were great friends of Allan. His intimacy with the latter, together with the reputation he had acquired as a mathematician, made Allan suspected of necromancy, and he is gravely accused of using his skill in an unlawful way to promote Leicester's projects of ambition. He wrote on astronomy and other subjects, and had a fine collection of MSS., &c., many of which are in the Bodleian library, to which they were given by Sir Kenneth Digby. Allan lived to be 69 years of age, having died in 1632.

ALLAN, David, the son of a Scottish shore-master in Alloa, has been called the "Scottish Hogarth," although far inferior to the distinguished Englishman in the path of humorous and eccentric delineations of human characteristics. His genius was first displayed in some rude chalk drawings upon the floor, whilst confined to the house from a burnt foot. The immediate cause, however, of his being put to study for a painter, arose from a caricature which he made of his schoolmaster inflicting punishment upon a boy. Whilst the ludicrous turn given to this sketch brought upon him expulsion from school, it secured the countenance of a Mr. Stuart, the collector of the customs of love and veneration of his fellow-citizens. In 1855, declining health compelled Dr. Alison to resign his chair, after which time he ceased to appear much in public. B. about 1769; D. at Colinton, near Edinburgh, Sept. 22, 1859.

ALXMAR, Henry von, Jon alk-mar, a German poet, who translated the celebrated satire called the "Fable of Reynard," which has been popularized in several languages. Flourished in the 15th century.—The story of "Reynard the Fox" is entirely fictitious, although it has been endeavoured to be otherwise proved, and is founded upon the supposition of a court of animals in which the lion is the king, and which has been assembled for the purpose of putting "Reynard" upon his trial for the numerous tricks of rapacity and cruelty which he was in the constant habit of playing off upon others of the quadrupedal species less quick-witted than himself. Although he is sentenced to be hanged, he is released from punishment on account of his declaration that he knows of a great treasure, which he would discover to the king. This is found to be a falsehood, and he is condemned to punishment again; but he offers to fight in single combat with his principal accuser, the wolf, in which it is generally supposed he is certain to be killed. By a trick, however, he conquers the wolf; for which he is pardoned, and is finally received into the favour of the king. Notwithstanding the almost universal popularity of this effusion on the Continent, the moral which it conveys is of a low, if not of an absolutely bad kind; namely, that the successful practice of fraud and cunning constitutes the basis of true wisdom.

ALLAN, Thomas, al'-an, a distinguished English mathematician, was a native of Uttoxeter, Staffordshire, where he was born in 1542. He studied at Trinity College, Oxford, and took his degree in 1567, as Master of Arts. He retired to Gloucester Hall in 1580, where he studied closely, and soon became celebrated for knowledge of antiquities, mathematics, and philosophy. Henry, nine years at this academy, he was patronized by Lord Cathcart, who introduced him to Erskine of Mar, who generously sent him to Rome to prosecute his studies. Here a painting of a Corinthian Maid executing a profile of her lover's countenance round the shadow thrown by a lamp upon the wall, procured him a gold medal in the academy of St. Luke, and a proportionate amount of reputation. He subsequently painted those humorous subjects by which he obtained considerable fame, and which, although deficient in sensibility, are yet replete with broad rustic fun. B. at Alloa, 1741; D. at Edinburgh, 1796.—The most popular designs of Allan are his twelve illustrations of Ramsay's famous Scottish pastoral, "The Gentle Shepherd."

ALLAN, Sir William, a distinguished Scottish artist, who, after passing through the High School of Edinburgh, was put to be a coach-painter; but, evincing a great desire to improve in his art, he was entered as a pupil in the Trustees' Academy, where he had Wylie for a fellow-student and companion. After a certain period he became a student of the Royal Academy of London, but failing in attracting the notice to which he thought himself entitled, he set out for St. Petersburg, where he passed ten years, with the exception of the time necessary at various periods to visit Tartary, Turkey, the shores of the Black Sea, &c., where he enriched his portfolio with sketches of numerous objects and scenes of interest. On his return to Scotland in 1814, he publicly exhibited the fruits of his travels and labours; and for a large picture of "Circassian Captives" he received 1000 guineas, which was subscribed for by a hundred gentlemen, at ten guineas each, on the suggestion of Sir Walter Scott. This picture is now in the possession of the earl of Wemyss. Soon after this period, Allan turned his attention to painting native historical subjects, and the "Murder of Archbishop Sharpe," "Knox Admonishing Mary, Queen of Scots," the "Fate of Prince Charles Stuart and Flora!

and the "Murder of the Regent Murray," were the result. A disease having affected his eyes, he suspended his studies, and visited Asia Minor, Greece, and Italy. On returning, he produced his "Slave-market at Constantinople," which tended to enhance his reputation. Subsequently he painted the companion pictures of "Scott in his Study, Writing," and "Scott in his Study, Reading," both of which are well known from the naturalness with which he has succeeded in investing them. His most important pictures, however, are the "Battle of Waterloo," which Wellington approved of and bought, the "Battle of Prestopians," "Nelson Boarding the San Nicolas," and the "Battle of Lannockburn," a large picture upon which he was working when overtaken by death. b. in Edinburgh, 1782; d. 1850.—In 1825 Allan became an associate of the Royal Academy, and in 1848 was elected President of the Scottish Academy. On the death of Wilkie, he received the appointment of her successor for Scotland, and in 1842 was knighted. He is considered by his countrymen to stand at the head of Scottish art.

ALLATIUS, Al-lat'-she-us, a Greek, educated first in Calabria, and then at Rome, where he afterwards was made chancellor of Ireland. In some of his offices he was suspected of great corruption; and was murdered by a son of the earl of Kildare in 1534.

ALEX, Sir Thomas, an English admiral of high repute in the reign of Charles II., who was the first to enter upon hostilities against the Dutch in 1665, by attacking their Smyrna fleet. His squadron consisted only of eight ships, but he killed their commodore, Brackel, took four rich merchantmen, and drove the rest into the Bay of Cadiz. Several other successes were achieved by him, and in 1666 he defeated the van of the Dutch fleet, three of their admirals falling in the fight. Retired from active service in 1688.

ALEX, John, M.D., a metaphysical, historical, and physiological writer, and an extensive contributor to the "Edinburgh Review." He also took an active part in politics, on which subject he published several pamphlets, besides contributions to the "Edinburgh Review." In 1830, he published a valuable constitutional work on the "Rise and Growth of the Royal Prerogative in England." He was considered one of the best physiological lecturers collect in the island of Chios. b. in Chios, 1586; d. at Rome, 1669.

ALLIETUS, al-ek'-tus, the prime minister of Carausius, emperor of Britain, whom he murdered and then usurped the dignity; after maintaining his position for three years, he was defeated and slain in a battle with the troops of Constantine, commanded by Asclepiodotus. Britain was thus restored to the Roman empire, after a disjunction of ten years, in 297 A.D.

ALLEGRAIX, Christopher Gabriel, al'-e-gre-ang, an eminent French sculptor. His principal works are the figure of a young man, for which he was admitted into the Academy; also a Venus and a Diana. d. 1795.

ALLEGRI. (See CORREGGIO.)

ALLEGRI, Gregorio, al'-ai-gre, a celebrated musician, whose compositions are still retained in the pontifical chapel. The chief is the "Miserere," which is always sung on Good Friday. b. about 1537; d. 1696. Clement XIV. sent a magnificent copy of the "Miserere" to King George III. in 1773.

ALLI, Francesco, al'-ai-gre'-ne, also called Da Gubbio, an Italian historical painter, who taught art in Rome, and had two sons, Angelo and Flaminio, who distinguished themselves in the same branch of painting. b. 1587; d. 1663.

ALLEGRI, Francesco, an engraver of Florence, who was also a good designer. d. 1775.

ALEX, Joseph, al'-ain, a nonconformist minister, who, in 1655, became curate of Taunton. In 1682 he was ejected for nonconformity, but continued to preach privately, for which he was imprisoned. b. at Devizes, 1623; d. at Bath, 1698. His book entitled "An Alarm to Unconverted Sinners" has gone through numerous editions, and is still popular among certain classes.

ALLEN, John, al'-en, archbishop of Dublin in the reign of Henry VIII., was born in 1476, and educated at Oxford and Cambridge. After having visited Italy, he was appointed chaplain to Wolsey, whom he assisted in erecting his colleges at Oxford and at Ipswich. In 1528, he was consecrated to the see of Dublin, and shortly afterwards was made chancellor of Ireland. In some of his offices he was suspected of great corruption; and was murdered by a son of the earl of Kildare in 1534.

ALEX, Joseph W., an English painter who enjoyed considerable reputation for his landscape pieces. b. in Lambeth, Surrey, 1803; d. 1852.—He was for some time the principal scene-painter at the Olympic theatre, and his forte lay in pastoral scenery.

ALEX, William, an eminent chemical and experimental professor, who lectured at Guy's Hospital. In his chemical investigations he demonstrated that the diamond was of pure carbon, and in conjunction with Mr. Pepys proved the proportion of carbon in carbonic acid. b. in London, 1770; d. at Lindfield, Sussex, 1843.—Mr. Allen was one of the principal persons concerned in establishing the Pharmaceutical Society.

ALEX, Ethan, an American brigadier-general, who distinguished himself by his activity and bravery in the war of independence against Great Britain. d. 1789. He was somewhat of an eccentric writer also.—There are several American statesmen, divines, and warriors bearing the name, but none of them of any great celebrity.

ALLESTREE, or ALLESTREE, Richard, al'-es-tree, a divine, who, in 1641, took up arms, with many other young men of the university of Oxford, in favour of Charles I. After serving some time in a military capacity, he returned to his studies, but afterwards again entered the army, and followed the fortunes of the king. At the end of the civil war he took orders, and in 1659 visited Charles II. in Flanders, and on his return was seized at Dover, but found means to secure his dispatches. At the Restoration he was made canon of Christchurch, and served one of the lectureships of Oxford, the salary of which he gave to the poor. In 1680 he took the degree of D.D., became chaplain to the king, and regius professor of divinity. In 1695 he was appointed provost of Eton. b. at Uppington, Shropshire, 1619; d. at Eton, 1673. He was buried in the chapel of Eton College, where there is a monument to his memory.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Allestry

ALLESTRY, Jacob, an English poet of the 17th century, was the son of a London bookseller. He died young, in 1686. Some of his poems may be found in a collection called "Miscellany Poems," published in 1721.

ALLEYN, Edward, al'-ain, founder of Dulwich College, in Surrey, acquired great reputation as an actor, and became proprietor of a playhouse in Moorfields, and keeper of the royal bear-garden. Aubrey relates a ridiculous story of the devil appearing to Alleyn when personating the character of Satan, and so frightening him, that he grew serious and quitted the stage. He laid the foundation of his college in 1614, and completed it in 1617, at an expense of £10,000; he then endowed it with £300 per annum for the maintenance of one master and one warden (who must be unmarried, and always of the name of Alleyn or Allen), and four fellows, of whom three must be clergymen, and the fourth an organist; besides six poor men and six women, with twelve boys, who are to be educated till the age of fourteen or sixteen, when they are to be apprenticed to some trade. This building is called "The College of God's Gift." He was himself the first master. b. in London, 1566; d. 1626, and was buried in the chapel of the college which he founded. In 1838 measures were taken to secure a proper administration of the funds of this college; the first stone of the new school buildings was laid, June, 1866.

ALLINGHAM, John Till, al'-ing-ham, a successful dramatist, was the son of a wine-merchant, and brought up in the profession of the law. He subsequently became a stockbroker; but very little is known of his history. Flourished at the beginning of the 19th century.—Allingham's best-known productions are "Fortune's Foe" and "The Weathercock," in which there is more bustle than poetry, and sprightliness of dialogue than either wit or humour.

ALLIX, Pierre, al'-ui, a French Protestant minister, who, under the toleration secured by the Edict of Nantes, was a preacher in Rouen, and wrote several pamphlets in defence of Protestantism. On the revocation of that famous Edict, he went to England, where he was well received, and where he continued his labours among the French refugees. He wrote a "Defence of the Christian Religion," and also engaged in controversies with the Unitarians. He ultimately lost position by endeavouring to prove that the second advent of the Saviour would take place in 1720, or 1736 at latest. He was born at Alençon, in 1641, and died in London, in 1717.

ALLORI, Alexander, al'-or-e, a painter of Florence, who was instructed by his uncle Bronzino, also a painter of considerable celebrity. b. 1607.—This painter mostly introduced portraits of his friends into his historical works.

ALLORI, Cristofano, son of the above, a better painter, and most skilful copyist. Some of his copies of the "Magdalen" of Correggio are supposed to be duplicates of the original by Correggio himself. b. at Florence, 1577; d. 1621.

ALLOSI, Baldassare, called Galanino, al'-os-e, a famous portrait painter of Bologna. He studied under the Carracci, and was so eminent for the truthfulness and life-like character of his portraits, as to be ranked by his contemporaries with Vandyck. b. 1578; d. 1633.

ALLSTON, Washington, ael'-ston, an eminent American landscape and historical painter, who in 1801 visited England, and entered the Royal Academy of London, where he studied for three years during the presidency of West. He then visited Paris and Rome, where he remained for four years, studying the styles of the best masters. In the "Eternal city" he attracted considerable notice by a picture which he executed, called "Jacob's Vision." In 1809 he returned to America, and married the sister of the celebrated Dr. Channing. In 1811 he revisited England, and gained the two hundred guinea prize from the British Institution for his picture of the "Dead Man raised by Elisha's Bones." On returning to his native country, he continued to devote himself to his tileman. b. in South Carolina, 1779; d. at Cambridgeport, Massachusetts, 1843.

Almeida

ALMAGRO, Diego d', de-al-go del-ma'-gro, a Spanish commander, of mean descent, who, in 1525, accompanied Pizarro in his expedition against Peru. He is accused of having had a share in the murder of Atahualpa, the Inca. In 1535 he partially effected the conquest of Chili. Through jealousy of the power of Pizarro, he attacked Cuzco, the capital of Peru, captured Pizarro's two brothers and cast them into prison, when a civil war ensued. For some time Almagro's party had great success; but at length he was taken prisoner. After undergoing a long confinement, he was murdered by strangulation in 1538.—His son Diego endeavoured to revenge his father's death, but failed in the attempt, and was beheaded by De Castro in 1542.

AL-MANSUR, al'-mai-mun, or "The Trustworthy," caliph of Bagdad, was the son of Haroun-al-Raschid, and succeeded to the throne in 813. b. about 833.—He was a great encourager of learned men, founded an academy at Bagdad, calculated a set of astronomical tables, and caused the works of the most celebrated ancient authors to be translated into Arabic.

AL-MANSUR, al-man'-sur, regent of Cordova, in Spain, guardian of the son of Al-Hakem II., who died in 976. He was engaged in perpetual wars with the Christians, and from his victories, was called the "Victorious." b. about 1000.

AL-MANSUR was second caliph of the race of the Abbasides, and ascended the throne in 753. He was opposed by his uncle, Abdullah-ben-Ali, who was defeated by Al-Mansur's general, Abu Moslem. Fearing this general's abilities and popularity, Al-Mansur caused him to be assassinated. Several insurrections took place in his reign, which were all suppressed. b. 713; d. on a pilgrimage to Mecca, in the 63rd year of his age, 774.

ALMEIDA, Francis, al'-mai-e-da, a Portuguese gentleman, who in 1505 was appointed by King Emanuel the first viceroy of the Portuguese possessions in India. He took the city of Quiloa, and made many other important conquests. A fleet loaded with spices, and dispatched by him from the coast of Malabar, was the first to discover the island of Madagascar. While he was engaged in extending the conquests of the Portuguese, Albuquerque received orders from Portugal to supersede him; but Almeida, being about to proceed to Dabul with a fleet, refused to resign his command, and imprisoned the new viceroy. In his expedition against Dabul he sullied his reputation by cruelty, and afterwards falling in with the fleet of the enemy, he defeated it, and effected a peace. On his passage to Europe he was slain at the Cape of Good Hope with the natives, 1569.

ALMON, John, Al'mon, a p. writer, who was educated at Warrington, and served his apprenticeship to a bookseller, but became a traveller in foreign countries, and finally settled in London, where he pursued literature as a p.

On the death of George II. he wrote an account of his majesty's reign, which passed through two editions, and in which he also well received him the friendship of Lord Townshend. He was also the zealous friend of Mr. Wilkes, whom he and in 1765 began business as a bookseller in Fleet-street. He still, however, continued to exercise his pen on politics. Not long afterwards found guilty, for publishing Denon's letter to the king; for which he was fined, and obliged to give security for his good behaviour for three years. In 1771 he began the "Patriot Register," which was the first periodical journal of the kind. On the death of Lord Chatham, he published one of the life of that man; and, after a considerable interval, published biographical, literary, and political anecdotes of several of the most eminent persons of the age. In 1804 he gave to the world the genuine correspondence of Mr. Wilkes, which was succeeded by a collection of the poetical works of the author of the Letter to Sir William Chambers," and afterwards by a valuable edition of "Junius's Letters," illustrated by numerous biographical and panegyric notes, and preceded by a critical inquiry respecting their real author. D. at L., 1738; D. 1805.

al-'ad-din, a Mahometan shah, better known by the appellation of the Old Man of the Mountain, was prince of the Assassins, or Assassins. His residence was a castle between Antioch and Damascus, and he had a number of youthful followers, so devoted to his will as to engage in any of his attempts to assassinate the monarchs and princes with whom he was at enmity. Lived in the 13th century.

ALPHEA, al-lou'-pha, an inhuman chief, who, from being the head of a petty Asiatic village, became, by conquest and barbarity, the founder of the kingdom of Burnah. D. 1711; D. near Me, 1700.

ALP-ARSLAN, "a valiant lion," alp-ar'-slan, second sultan of Persia of the dynasty of Seljuk, a conqueror and able ruler, who reduced his empire from a state of anarchy to peace and order, added much territory to it by conquest, and ultimately, in 1068-70, engaged in a war with the Roman empire, then having its chief seat at Constantinople. After one or two reverses, Alp-Arslan totally defeated the Greeks under the emperor Romanus Diogenes, who was taken prisoner. On the emperor being brought before his conqueror, the latter asked what treatment he expected to receive, on which Romanus answered,—"If you are cruel, you will kill me; if you wish to gratify your pride, you will drag me at your chariot wheels; if you are wise, you will accept a ransom, and let me go back to my country." "But," said the conqueror, "what would you have done had you been in my position and I in yours?" "I would have given thee many stripes," replied the emperor, with coolness. The sultan, pleased with the bold spirit of his captive, declared that he would not do an act which he disapproved, and would not perpetrate cruelty even on an enemy.

He accordingly accepted ransom for the emperor, imposed on him a tribute of 3000 pieces of gold, required an inter-marriage between their families, and the liberation of all the captive Mussulmans in the hands of the Greeks. Alp-Arslan's power now extended over the fairest portions of Asia; he had around his throne 1200 princes or the sons of princes, and at his command an army of 200,000 men. But, still unsatisfied, he determined upon the conquest of Turkistan, from whence his race had originally come; and with that view proceeded to pass the Oxus. Here, however, his course was stayed; for Yussef Kothnal, a Turcoman, whom he had taken prisoner and was about to condemn to torture, stabbed him to the heart with a dagger, and the sultan almost immediately afterwards expired, in 1072 A.D., in the 42nd year of his age, having been born in 1030.

ALPHANT, Nicophorus, al'-fer'-e, a Russian prince, who, when that country was rent in pieces by civil dissensions, at the end of the 16th century, was sent, with two of his brothers, to England, to the care of a Russian merchant, by whom they were placed in the university of Oxford, where two of them died of the small-pox. Nicophorus entered into orders, and in 1618 obtained the rectory of Warley, in Huntingdonshire, whence he was ejected during the civil war, and cruelly treated by the republican party. At the Restoration he was reinstated in his living; but, being old and infirm, he committed the care of it to a curate, and retired to Hammersmith, where he died.

ALPHIVS, Avitus, al'-fe-us, a Roman poet, who wrote the lives of eminent persons, and the history of the Carthaginian war, in verse. Flourished in the 3rd century.

ALONZO, Alonzo, or Alonzo, al'-fon'-zo, the name of a great many sovereigns of the different states of the Iberian peninsula. We give particulars of the lives of the most distinguished:—

ALPHONSO I., surnamed the Catholic, chosen king of the Asturias, in 739, extended his dominions over nearly the fourth part of Spain, and took Lara and Salama, in Castile, from the Moors. D. 7

ALPHONSO II. of Leon, Castile, and Asturias, surnamed the Chaste, was but a child when, in 768, his father Fruela was assassinated. King Aurelio, in 774, invested him with regal power, and in 783, on Aurelio's death, he became sole monarch. His uncle Mauregato afterwards dethroned him, and retained the usurped authority for five years, during which time Alphonso lived in Biscey, where he had many friends. Mauregato was succeeded by Bermudo, who took Alphonso into partnership in the throne; he then engaged in a war with the Moors, whom he defeated in a great battle

Ledes, and subsequently captured Lisbon. Another rebellion of his subjects compelled him to fly to Galicia, but he soon regained his dominions. Charlemagne came into Spain on his invitation, and during this reign the great battle of Roncesvalles took place. Alphonso made Oviedo the capital of his kingdom, greatly adorned it, and died there in 842, aged 85. His surname of the Chaste was derived from his continence, which he is said to have rigidly preserved in accordance with a vow he had made. He was married, but left no offspring.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Alphonso

ALPHONSO III., called the Great, came to the throne of Asturias at the age of 18, on the death of his father Ordoño in 866. The early part of his reign was disturbed by a contention with Fruela, son of King Bermudo, who, however, being assassinated in consequence of his tyranny, Alphonso regained full possession of his kingdom, having put down a rebellion on the part of his two brothers, whom he blinded and cast into prison. He then engaged in wars with the Moors, from his success in which he acquired the title of Great. He gained many victories, built several cities, and greatly extended his dominions; but internal troubles interfered with his career. His son Garcia, supported by the queen and several princes of the blood-royal, raised an insurrection, on the pretence that the king's continual wars impoverished the people. Alphonso was at first successful—he defeated him, however, relinquish the sword with the sceptre; but, on the Moors invading the kingdom, took the command of the army as his son's lieutenant, and was so successful that he gained fresh laurels as a warrior. Alphonso was an author as well as a soldier, and wrote a book of Spanish annals. He was esteemed a liberal, affable, and remarkably handsome man. D. near Zamora, in 910.

ALPHONSO IV. of Leon and Castille, surnamed the Monk, ascended the throne in 924, but abdicated in favour of his brother Ramiro, and retired to the monastery of Sahagun. He afterwards became tired of seclusion, and made an attempt to resume the sceptre, but was defeated by his brother, who, having captured him, had his eyes put out, and threw him into prison. Alphonso abdicated in 930, and died in seclusion in 942.

ALPHONSO V. came to the crown of Leon in 999; but being only in his fifth year, the government was administered by a regent. During his reign Cordova was conquered and Leon rebuilt. Killed at the siege of Visen, in 1023.

ALPHONSO VI. of Leon and Castille, surnamed the Valiant, was crowned in 1068. During the reign of this sovereign, Asturias, Leon, Castille, and Galicia, were united under his authority. He was a successful warrior, and had Spain not been invaded by the Almoravides with a powerful army, he would have succeeded in driving the Moors from the peninsula. As it was, he wrested from them the city of Toledo, which they had held for 370 years, and where he himself had found a refuge from the resentment of his brother Sancho, together with a large portion of territory, and many other towns. Being now sovereign of nearly all Spain, he assumed the title of emperor. During this reign, in 1093, Peter the Hermit began to preach the first crusade, in which, however, it does not appear that Alphonso engaged. His illegitimate daughter Teresa was married to Henry of Beaumont, on whom Alphonso conferred the title of earl of Portugal, which that Henry held under the sovereignty of Castille. This was the beginning of the kingdom of Portugal, the regal title being afterwards assumed by its princes, in whose family it remained for more than 400 years. D. at Toledo, 1109.—It was in the reign of this monarch that Rodrigo Diaz de Vivar, surnamed the Cid, achieved the poetical celebrity with which his name has been surrounded by the Spanish romance-writers. Urraca, daughter of Alphonso VI., was married to Alphonso I. of Aragon and Navarre; and the latter succeeded to the united crowns; but on his repudiating his wife, the nobles of Leon, Castille, and Galicia threw off their allegiance, and elected Alphonso Raymond to the throne, who ascended it under the title of ALPHONSO VIII., who is usually called the Emperor, and who was crowned in vigorously-prosecuted wars against the Moors, and having gained considerable advantages over them, he, in his exultation, assembled the Cortes, and assumed the imperial title, although his sway did not extend over so great a territory as Alphonso VI. had ruled. In an expedition, undertaken in 1157, he gained a great victory over the Moors at Jaen, but died near Toledo on his return in the same year. The military order of the Toison d'Or was instituted by him. On the rival, Alphonso of Aragon, after the death of that monarch at Fraga. This prince was distinguished by his respect he paid to his subjects, and by his anxiety to govern according to law. He was married to a daughter of Henry II. of England; and by uniting one of his own daughters to Louis le Jeune of France, began those alliances between the French and Spanish crowns which have been so frequently repeated since.

ALPHONSO IX., like his immediate predecessor, and indeed nearly all the Spanish monarchs, was engaged in wars against the Moors. D. at Villanueva de Sarria, in 1230.

ALPHONSO X., surnamed the Learned, king of Leon and Castille, succeeded his father Ferdinand III. in 1252. His reign was unprosperous, but he acquired great reputation as a man of learning and science—and hence his title of "Learned." The "Alphonsoine Tables" were drawn up under his direction, and at his expense. B. 1203; D. 1254.—He wrote on the notions of the stars, and a History of Spain; and was the person who used the expression, so differently interpreted, that "If he had been consulted at the creation of the world, he could have saved the Deity from falling into many."

ALPHONSO XI., in 1312 succeeded his father Ferdinand IV. on the throne of Leon and Castille. During a long minority, his kingdom was rent by convulsions. He took Algeciras from the Moors, but died of the plague while besieging Gibraltar, in 1350. He was surnamed the Avenger, from the severity with which he put down and punished the badging to which his long minority had given rise.

ALPHONSO I. of Aragon and Navarre, and ordinarily reckoned the VII. of Leon and Castille, surnamed the Fighter, succeeded his brother Pedro I. in 1104. At his accession the kingdom of Aragon was exhausted by the continuous wars it had waged against the Moors, who, under the dynasty of the Almoravides, were making great head in Spain. The first care of Alphonso was to give rest to his kingdom, in order to gather strength for a renewal of the struggle. When this was accomplished, and after accommodating a difference with the nobles of Leon which his repudiation of his wife Urraca had occasioned, he entered upon the career of warfare which procured him the surname of the Fighter. He captured Tudela, invaded Saragoza, defeated the armies of the emperor of Morocco, took the city of Granada, defeated a large army of Almoravides at Darcos in 1120 A.D., leaving 20,000 of their dead on the field, and invaded the kingdom of Valencia. He took immense spoil from the Moors, who, however, did not revenge themselves upon Aragon, but upon Estremadura. He now determined to complete the conquest of Saragoza, and soon succeeded in subjugating the whole country. Two cities, however—Mequinenza and Fraga—still held out. The first he captured, putting the garrison to the sword; and then besieged Fraga, but during a sally from the town he received a wound which speedily proved mortal. His army was cut to pieces, the camp taken and pillaged, and it was only the aid given by Alphonso Raymond of Leon that saved a remnant of the host from the fate of their fellows. Alphonso had been successful in 20 battles, and had never sustained a check until the day on which he met his death. D. 1131.

ALPHONSO III. of Aragon came to the throne in 1255, and though his reign lasted but a few years, it was signalized by the establishment of the freest constitution known in those times. The Cortes was empowered to summon even the king before that body, and to depose him in the event of his being guilty of any infringement of the laws. The Cortes of Catalonia, Aragon, and Valencia were united in this reign, which the kings by their coronation oath were bound never again to disunite. D. 1291.

ALPHONSO V. of Aragon, surnamed the Magnanimous, succeeded his father Ferdinand the Just in 1416. Soon after his accession, a confederacy was formed against him, but he frustrated its object and pardoned the conspirators. His own dominions affording too limited a sphere for his aspirations, he almost totally abandoned them, returning only on urgent occasions, and made the shores of the Mediterranean the theatre of his exploits. He laid claim to the throne of Naples, upon an agreement with Joan, queen of that kingdom, that he should be her heir. This embroiled him in a war with several of the Italian states, and he and his fleet were taken by the Genoese under Visconti, duke of Milan. He was conveyed to Milan, where he made the duke his friend, and was thereby enabled to conquer Naples in 1442. D. 1384; D. at Naples, 1458.—He left his Neapolitan dominions to his natural son Ferdinand, and those of Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily, to his brother Juan, king of Navarre. Besides being a learned prince and a patron of men of letters, he was valiant and liberal, and greatly beloved by his subjects. A courtier remonstrating with him for walking about without a guard: "A father," said Alphonso, "has nothing to dread in the midst of his children." One of his vessels being in danger of perishing, he jumped into a boat, and hastened to her relief, saying, "I had rather partake, than behold, the calamity of my people."—This last is a particularly fine observation, and indicates the magnanimity of the man.

ALPHONSO I. of Portugal was the son of Henry earl of Portugal, by Teresa, daughter of Alphonso VI., king of Leon and Castille. He was but three years of age when his father died, and left him under the tutelage of his mother. On coming of age, his first task was to wrest from Teresa the power which she had disgraced by her vices and incapacity, but which she was unwilling to resign. Having succeeded in this, and in defeating the Castilians, who had come to the support of his enemies, he freed Portugal from the dependence in which it had hitherto been held by Leon and Castille. In 1139 his territories being invaded by the Moors, he attacked them with greatly inferior numbers, and obtained a signal victory on the plains of Ourique, and was proclaimed king on the field of battle. On being crowned by the archbishop of Braganza, before the assembled Cortes at Lamego, he said, holding his drawn sword in his hand—"With this sword I have conquered the Moors, delivered you from your enemies, and won independence for your country; you have made me king. Let us now frame laws to maintain peace, order, and justice in the realm." A constitution was accordingly drawn up and voted by the assembly, with the entire concurrence of all classes in the state. D. at Coimbra 1185. His memory is greatly venerated by the Portuguese, as that of the founder of their independence and of constitutional government among them.

ALPHONSO II. of Portugal passed his reign in comparative peace, excepting disputes with the Church in consequence of his endeavouring to exact military service from the clergy. D. 1223.

ALPHONSO III. of Portugal, was engaged in a war with the Mahometans, from whom he made a few conquests. D. 1279.

ALPHONSO IV. of Portugal, succeeded his father Denis in 1255, and though in the early part of his reign he so outraged the rights and interest of his subjects as to provoke a threat of deposition, yet he subsequently changed his policy, and instituted many good laws and regulations for the benefit of his subjects, disposing justice with impartiality, though sometimes with too great severity. D. 1290; D. 1357.

ALPHONSO V. of Portugal, was born in 1432, succeeding his father Edward when he was but six years old. He invaded Africa several times, took Alcazar, Segner, and Tangier, and acquired the surname of Africano. D. of the plague at Cintra, in 1491.—He was a beneficent prince, and an encourager of learning. In his reign Guinea was discovered by the Portuguese.

ALPHONSO II., king of Naples, succeeded his father Ferdinand in 1494. He was of so cruel and tyrannical a disposition, that his subjects invited Charles VIII. of France to invade the country. That prince took Naples; and Alphonso, after abdicating the throne, retired to a monastery in Sicily, where he died about 1496.

ALPHTEGHIN, alp-te'-jin, founder of the Ghuznerite dynasty, and grandfather of the famous Mahmoud of Ghuzni, was originally a slave, but, obtaining his freedom, gradually rose till he was appointed governor of Khorasan, when he revolted, and made himself independent at Ghuzni. D. 775 A.D.

ALPINI, Prosper, al-pe'-ne, a Venetian physician and botanist. He was at first a soldier, but quitted that profession and went to Padua, where he made so great progress in learning that he became deputy rector and syndic. In 1573 he took his degree of M.D., and in 1580 went to Egypt as physician to the Venetian consul. He resided there three years, in which time he greatly improved himself in botany. He was the first who discovered the sexes and generation of plants. On his return to Venice, in 1586, Andrea Doria, prince of Melfi, appointed him his physician; and in 1593 he was called to the botanical professorship at Padua.

which he held until his death. a. 1553; p. at Padua, 1617.—He has bequeathed to posterity several learned works upon botany and medicine.

AIsop, Anthony, al'-sop, a poet and divine, who lived in the beginning of the 18th century, published some editions of Æsop's fables, together with original poems, and took part with Mr. Boyle in the celebrated dispute with Dr. Bentley, for which he is mentioned with sneers by the latter as "Tony AIsop."

ALSTED, John Henry, al'-sted, a German protestant clergyman, a very voluminous writer, and professor at Herborn, in Nassau, and at Weissenberg, in Transylvania. In 1635, he published an Encyclopædia, one of the earliest works of that class, and which was in considerable repute for many years. Amongst other works, he composed a treatise to show that the principles of all sciences and arts are taught in the Bible. p. in 1633.

ALSTON, Charles, M.D., al'-stun, a Scottish writer on botany and medicine, and one of the founders of the Edinburgh school of medicine, was born in 1683. He lectured on botany and materia medica with much reputation for many years, and at his death in 1760, left the character of being one of the ablest teachers of the healing art of his time. He published papers in the "Edinburgh Medical, Physical, and Literary Essays;" but his most complete and important work is his "Materia Medica," printed in 1770.

ALSTRÖMER, Jonas, al'-stro-mer, an eminent patriotic Swede, who, after visiting England, returned to his own country, and became remarkable for the great improvements he there introduced into arts and manufactures. For his great efforts he was made a knight of the Polar Star, chancellor of Commerce, and a member of the Academy of Sciences. a. at Alingsås, 1685; p. 1761.

ALTDORFER, Albrecht, alt'-dor'-fer, a distinguished German engraver and painter, who employed himself on sacred, profane, historical, and mythological subjects. Holbein is supposed to have studied his cuts. a. at Altdorf, in Bavaria, 1488; p. 1538.

ALTHEN, Ehan, or Jean, alt'-hen, a Persian, who was the first to introduce madder (for dyeing) into France. He was the son of the governor of a Persian province, but, with the exception of himself, all his family were massacred when the Persian empire was overthrown by the usurper Thamas-Kouli-Khan. a. 1711; p. at Caumont, in France, 1774.—Althen, during his life, was treated ungratefully, but, by way of atonement, a tablet was after his death erected in the museum of Avignon, with the following inscription, which we transcribe, as it tells when and where madder was first introduced into France:—"To Jean Althen, a Persian, who was the first to introduce and cultivate madder in the territory of Avignon, under the patronage of the Marquis de Caumont, in 1765." This testimonial was erected in 1821.

ALTHORP, Lord. (See SPENCER, Earl.)

ALUNNO, Niccolo, a'-loo'-no, an Italian painter of considerable merit, who flourished in the 15th century. There are few of his works extant, but those which are entitle him to praise. a. at Foligno about 1430; p. about 1510.

ALURED, a-lu'-red, of Beverley, an ancient English historian. He was canon and treasurer of the church of St. John, in Beverley, and wrote a chronicle of the English kings, which was published by Hearne in 1716. p. 1129.

ALVA, Ferdinand Alvarez, duke of, al'-va, a distinguished soldier, and descended from one of the most ancient families in Spain. He made his first campaign at the age of 17, and was present at the battle of Pavia. He was a great favourite of the emperor Charles V., who made him a general; but though he distinguished himself by the high order of his military talents, he became equally noted for the cruelty of his disposition. At the siege of Metz he performed prodigies of valour; and although he commanded there, the place was so well defended that he was obliged to raise the siege. In the campaign against Pope Paul IV., in 1556, Alva was completely successful, and obliged the pontiff to sue for peace, after which he repaired to Rome, to ask pardon for having opposed his holiness in the war. In 1567, Philip II. sent him into the Low Countries, to reduce the Netherlands to the Spanish yoke, which they were attempting to throw off. Here he established a council composed of twelve judges, whom he denominated Judges of the Tumults; but this tribunal, from its cruelty, was called by the people the "Court of Blood." His tyranny was now as intolerable as his power was extraordinary. Thirty thousand persons fled their country and sought refuge in other parts. He filled the United Provinces with terror and scenes of carnage, for which his memory is held in detestation to this day. He hastily tried and beheaded counts Egmont and Horn, two patriots and friends of the prince of Orange, who had defeated a body of Spaniards at Groningen. He fortified Antwerp, and when the works were completed, he caused a statue of himself to be cast in brass and erected in the middle of the fortress. Under his feet was an allegorical representation of the nobility and the people, in the shape of a double-headed monster. Insult upon insult he heaped upon those he had subjected to his government, until even his friends became disgusted with him; and his inhumanity to the inhabitants of Haerlem brought his unpopularity to a climax. On the surrender of that city, he caused two thousand of its inhabitants to be executed. In 1573 he left the country he had ruled with a rod of iron, followed by the curses of the people. It is affirmed that during his administration in the Netherlands, he had caused to be executed eighteen thousand human beings, independent of those who fell in the various battles and sieges. He was afterwards employed against Portugal, where he greatly added to his military renown by driving Don Antonio from the throne in 1580. a. 1508; p. 1583.—Alva was an able general, and unquestionably a master of warlike strategy. He never fought if he could gain his object otherwise. The archbishop of Cologne, who was struck by his efforts to avoid a conflict, having on one occasion urged him to engage the Dutch, "The object of a general," replied Alva, "is not to fight, but to conquer: he fights enough who obtains the victory." He is said never to have lost a battle. The character of this willing servant of the despotism of Charles V. and Philip II. is ably drawn, and his deeds faithfully narrated, in Mr. Motley's History, "The Rise of the Dutch Republic."

Alvarez

guished companion of Hernando Cortes in the conquest of Mexico. He was engaged in every battle till the final reduction of that kingdom. B. at Balhioz; D. on the coast of Guatemala, 1541.—Alvarado was some time governor of Guatemala, to which was added the province of Honduras, which from being in a state of continual internal warfare, seems to have enjoyed some degree of repose under his administration.

ALVAREZ, Francis, al-va'-raiz, a Portuguese divine who accompanied Don Edward Galvam as secretary, when sent by Emanuel, king of Portugal, on an embassy to Ethiopia or Abyssinia. D. 1549. In the same year Alvarez published a narrative of the mission.

ALVAREZ DE LUNA, or ALVARO, was the favourite of John II., king of Castille. He was the natural son of Don Alvaro de Luna, and in 1405 was appointed gentleman of the bedchamber to the king; but the courtiers taking a dislike to him, forced him to retire from court. He was afterwards recalled by the king, who at this request banished his enemies. After enjoying the splendour of royal favour forty-five years, he fell into disgrace, and was beheaded for high treason in 1453. B. 1383.

ALVAREZ, Don José, an eminent Spanish sculptor and artist, whose statue of Ganymede, which he executed in 1804, whilst studying at Paris, placed him in the first rank of modern sculptors. His studio was twice visited by Napoleon I., who presented him with a gold medal valued at 500 francs. The conduct of Napoleon towards Spain, however, excited the disgust of Alvarez, who took such an aversion to the French emperor, that he would never model his bust. Subsequently he chiefly resided at Rome, and became court sculptor to Ferdinand VII. of Spain, for whom, in 1818, he executed his famous group of Antiochus and Memnon. He enjoyed a pension from the Spanish crown. B. at Priego, Cordova, 1763; D. at Madrid, 1828.

ALVAREZ, Manuel, also a Spanish sculptor of eminence, was director of the academy of San Fernando, and held the honorary office of king's sculptor. He was usually styled El Griego, or the Greek, in compliment to the purity of his style. B. at Salamanca, 1727; D. 1797.

ALVENSLEBEN, Philip Charles, Count d', al'-ven-slei'-ben, a distinguished Prussian statesman and diplomatist. B. 1745; D. 1802.—Also a Prussian general of great bravery, who distinguished himself at the battles of Lutzen, Dresden, and under the walls of Paris. B. at Schochurtz, 1778; D. 1831.

ALVENSLEBEN, Count Albert, an eminent Prussian diplomatist, was born in Halberstadt in 1794. He began life as a cavalry officer, but afterwards exchanged the military career for the political and diplomatic service of his country. He also studied law; and was one of the ministers appointed to represent Prussia in the German conference held at Vienna in 1834. He subsequently held the portfolio of finance, and in 1837 that of minister of commerce and public works, in which capacity he was prominent in promoting the German customs union. He subsequently officiated as Prussian minister at the conferences of Dresden, but, from want of adequate support at Berlin, failed in accomplishing all he could have desired in giving energy and decision to the proverbially wavering policy of the Berlin Cabinet in opposing the schemes of Austria.

Amadeus

ALVIANO, Bartholomew, al'-ve-a'-no, a Venetian general who obtained signal advantages over the emperor Maximilian, for which he received triumphal honours. D. at the siege of Brescia, in 1515.—The state of Venice gave him a magnificent burial, and pensioned his family.

ALVINZI, Joseph, Baron d', al'-veen'-ze, a general in the service of Austria, during the great French war. Being defeated by Napoleon at Rivoli, in 1796, and Arcola, in 1797, he was superseded in the command of the army of Italy. In 1798 he became governor of Hungary, and in 1808 he was made a field marshal of Austria. B. 1735; D. in Hungary, 1810.

ALYPIUS, à-lip'-e-us, a geographer, who was employed by the emperor Julian, first in Britain as deputy-governor, and next at Jerusalem in rebuilding the temple. At the close of life he was banished, but for what cause is not known. Lived in the 4th century. A geographical description of the world by him was printed in 470 at Geneva, in 1623.—There were two other persons of this name—one a Greek writer on music, whose era is uncertain; the other, a Christian divine of the 4th century, who assisted St. Augustine in the controversy with the Donatists, and also wrote an epistle against the Nestorians.

AMADDEULAT, a-ma-deul'-u-la, the founder of a Persian dynasty, was the son of a fisherman. He and his two brothers took Persia Proper, Persian Irak, and Caramania, which they divided among them. He settled at Schiraz, in Persia Proper, in 933. D. 949.

AMADEUS V., a-ma-de'-us, count of Savoy, called the Great, began his government in 1285. He was distinguished by great penetration, prudence, wisdom, and valour; and so highly were his qualities esteemed by his contemporaries, that the princes of Europe appointed him umpire to settle their differences. A relative of this prince resided in England for many years in the reign of Henry III., and built the Savoy Palace in the Strand, London, of which part of the chapel still remains. D. 1323.

AMADEUS VI., count of Savoy, was one of the most warlike princes of his age. He was surnamed the "Green Count." He succeeded his father in 1343. In 1354 he defeated the French at Arbrette, and took some territory from them, and subsequently became viceroy of the emperor Charles IV., over a considerable part of Northern Italy. B. 1219; D. 1353.

AMADEUS VIII., count of Savoy, entered upon the sovereignty in 1391. In 1416 Savoy was created a duchy, and not long after the duke retired from the throne and his family to a monastery, where he instituted an order of knighthood, by the name of the Annunziata. The knights, however, lived in a luxurious style, without any of the severities of monachism. In 1439 he caused himself to be elected pope by the council of Basle, on which he took the name of Felix V. This led to much disunion in the church, as the pontificate was also claimed by Eugenius, and a long controversy ensued. On the death of Eugenius, the cardinals elected Thomas de Sarzan, who took the name of Nicholas V., Amadeus was dispossessed of his title, and in 1449 made a formal abdication in favour of Nicholas, who gave him a cardinalship, and made him dean of the Sacred College. D. 1451.

AMADEUS IX., duke of Savoy, was a very charitable prince, and so beloved by his subjects, that they called him the "blessed Amadens." p. 1472.—There were nine rulers in Savoy of this name, but the above are the only remarkable Amafin-e-us, a Roman who first taught his countrymen the tenets of Epicurus, which they embraced with avidity.

AMAGE, Am'-i-je, a queen of Sarmatia, remarkable for her justice and fortitude.

AMAK, or ABULNAGIE AL BOKHARI, a'-mak, a Persian poet, entertained at the court of the sultan Khedar Khan, who instituted an academy of poets, of which he made Amak president. Flourished in the 5th century, and lived to a great age.—His chief poem is the "History of the Loves of Joseph and Zoleiskah."

AMALARIC, or AMAREX, Amall'-a-rik, king of the Visigoths, was the son of Alaric II. He succeeded his grandfather Theodoric in 526. He married Clotilda, the daughter of Clovis, king of France, whom he used barbarously to make her embrace Arianism. At length she complained to her brother Childbert, king of Paris, who, in 531, marched against Amalaric and defeated him in a battle fought in Catalonia. He took refuge in a church, where he was slain.

AMALASONTHA, Amal'-a-son'-tai, daughter of Theodoric the Great, king of the Ostrogoths, was appointed regent for her son Athalaric, and being a woman of great natural talents, which had been carefully cultivated, she governed with great wisdom and justice, encouraged learning, and restrained the rude and savage disposition of the Goths, whom, however, she could not succeed in weaning altogether from their wild habits. Being removed from power, and confined in an island in the lake Bolsena, she was strangled in the bath in the year 535. This cruel deed was perpetrated at the instance of the empress Theodora, who was jealous of the respect paid by the emperor Justinian to Amalasontha.

AMALEX, Amal'-ee, the son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau. Some have supposed him to be the father of the Amalekites, but they are mentioned as a powerful people long before his birth.

AMALIE, or AMELIA, a-ma'-le, princess of Prussia, daughter of Frederick William I., and sister of Frederick the Great, was greatly distinguished by her musical talents, to the cultivation of which she devoted nearly all her time. She was likewise distinguished for her piety and charity. p. Nov. 9, 1723; p. at Berlin, March 30, 1787.

AMALIE, the wife of the duke of Saxe-Weimar, who at an early age lost her husband, but managed to preserve her little state intact during some of the most troublous times of the continental wars. She resided in the city of Weimar, and invited the most distinguished men of letters to her capital. Wieland, Herder, Schiller, and Goethe settled here, and enjoyed her patronage as well as her company. p. 1807.

AMALRIC, or ARNAULD, a-mal'-reek, a Spanish military churchman, who distinguished himself by his cruelties against the Albigenses. In 1209 he laid siege to Beziers, and commanded 60,000 of the inhabitants to be slaughtered after the town had surrendered. "How are we to distinguish the Catholics from the heretics?" inquired one of his officers. "Kill them all—God knows his own," replied Amalric. p. 1225.

o. Pomponio, a-mal'-tai-o, an eminent painter of the Venetian school. p. at San Vitt, in Friul 1505. The year of his death is not known. His master-pieces are the Three Judgments, in the court of justice at Genoa. The subjects are—The Judgment of Minerva, the Judgment of Daniel, and a Judgment of Trajan. They were long considered the works of Perodoneo, under whom he studied, from the similarity of style between the master and pupil. His brother, Girolamo, had also considerable talent as a painter, but his pictures are small, though distinguished by great care and finish. He died young.

AMALTHA, Amall'-the'-a, the Cæcean Sibyl, who offered Tarquin nine books on the fate of Rome, for which she demanded 900 crowns. He refused to make the purchase, when she burnt three of them, and demanded the same sum for the remainder. Tarquin still refusing, she burnt three more, and required as much for those which were left. The king, astonished, consulted the priests, and by their advice made the purchase of the remaining three, which were committed to the care of two magistrates, who were to consult them on extraordinary occasions. They are known as the Sibylline oracles.

AMALI, Sixtinus, a-ma'-i-er, a learned Dutchman, who became eminent for his knowledge of the Oriental languages. He was at Oxford in 1613, and taught Hebrew in Exeter College. After residing there some years, he returned to Franeker, and became Hebrew professor 1629.—His greatest work is a censure of the Vulgate.

AMANN, Johann, a'-man, an eminent German architect, who was buildings by several princes of Germany, and by the emperor of Austria. p. 1765; p. 1812.

AMAND, Mark Anthony Gerard, sieur de Saint, a-man', a French poet, whose father was a commander in the English navy, and was three years confined in the Black Tower at Constantinople. p. at Rouen, 1594; p. 1691.—1 poems of Amand, which are chiefly comic, were published in 8 vols., 1644, Paris.

AMARA, Shihā, Amal'-ra, an eminent Sanscrit scholar and poet, who published a thesaurus of the language. Lived in the fifth century. His book has been several times reprinted.

AMARAL, Andrea, am'-a-ral, a Portuguese knight of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, beheld for secretly inviting the Turks to invade the island of Rhodes, 1522.—The result of this invasion was the surrender of Rhodes to Sultan Solymān, on the Christmas-day of 1522.

AMARI, Michele, am'-ar-e, an Italian historian of marked progressive tendencies in his political opinions, and devoted to literary pursuits. He translated the "Marmion" of Scott into Italian, and wrote a history of the Sicilian Vespers, which brought him into immediate notice. With a view to the production of a history of Sicily under the Mussulman rule, he is generally believed to have applied himself successfully to the study of Arabic. p. at Palermo, 1806.

AMASA, Amal'-sa, a son of Jether, who is elsewhere called Ithra. He was pardoned by David, though he fought against him in the army of Absalom.

AMASAI, Amal'-a-i, a Levite, and one of the sons of Elkanah, who assisted David against Saul.

AMASIS, Amal'-sis, a king of Egypt. He was prime minister to Apries, king of that country, on whose deposition he mounted the throne, b.c. 569, and immediately put Apries to death.

AMATT, Andrea and Antonio, a-mat-te, father and son, eminent as violin-makers. Their instruments are called Cremonas, from their having their residence and carrying on their business in that town. Andrea lived in the 16th century; Antonio was born in 1665.

AMATT, Pasquale, an antiquary of Italy, wrote several learned works, still held in esteem. B. 1716; D. 1796. He had two sons, Girolamo and Basilio, who were also distinguished, the first as an antiquary and the second as a poet.

AMATO, Giovanni Antonio d', one of the best of the Neapolitan painters. He possessed the venerative faculty in a high degree, and carried his sentiments of propriety so far as to consider it wrong to paint a woman in a state of even partial nudity. He was a man of great general acquirements, and wrote a commentary on some difficult passages of Scripture, which was much valued even by the clergy. B. at Naples, 1175; D. 1555. Amato trained numerous pupils, the most distinguished of whom was his nephew of the same name, usually called the Young, a beautiful colourist. B. 1535; D. 1593.

AMATO, or AMATTS, Joannes Rodericus, a-mat-to, a distinguished Jewish physician, who was born at Castel Branco, in the province of Beira, Portugal, in 1511. He is sometimes called Amatus Lusitanus. He was educated at Salamanca, and about 1548 he removed to Ancona, where he resided until 1555, being frequently summoned to Rome to attend Pope Julius III. Fearing the Inquisition, he went to Thessalonica, where he could openly profess the Jewish faith. He wrote numerous works on medicine, &c. Date of death unknown.

AMATHI, a-math-re, king of Jerusalem, succeeded his brother Baldwin III. in 1162. B. 1173. He was a courageous and enterprising prince; but these qualities were sullied by avarice and cruelty.

AMATHI II., king of Jerusalem, succeeded his brother, Guy de Lusignan, king of Jerusalem and Cyprus, at his death in 1192, as king of Cyprus. In 1197 he succeeded Henri de Champagne as titular king of Jerusalem, having married his widow Isabella. He held his court at Ptolemais, as Jerusalem was in the possession of Saladin and the Saracens. D. 1205.

AMATX DE CHARTRES, a-mat-re, a French visionary, who maintained the eternity of matter, and that religion has three epochs, agreeably to the three persons of the Trinity. His opinions were condemned by the Council of Paris in 1209, and some of his followers were burned. To avoid a similar fate, he renounced his errors, and retired to St. Martin des Champs, where he died of vexation. Lived in the 13th century.

A king of Judah, succeeded his father Joash at the age of 25. He blended idolatry with the worship of God. With the assistance of the Israelites, he defeated the Edomites in the Valley of Salt; but afterwards commenced war on his allies, by whom he was taken prisoner. Slain by his own subjects 610 B. C.

AMBERGER, Christoph, am-bair-ger, a distinguished German painter, some of whose copies pass for originals of Holbein. He also engraved on wood, from his own designs. B. at Nurnberg, 1490; D. 1568-9.

AMBRIORIX, am-bé-o-rix, a king of the Ebu-rones, in Gaul. He was a great enemy to Rome, and was killed in a battle with Cæsar, in which 60,000 of his countrymen were slain.

AMBOISE, Francis d', am-bo-aw, a French advocate distinguished for eloquence, knowledge of law, and poetical ability. He successively filled the offices of Advocate for the French nation, Counsellor in the Parliament of Bretagne, and Master of Requests and Counsellor of State. He was a great traveller, and published an account of his travels, together with some poetical pieces. Flourished in the 16th century.—His brothers Adrian and James also rose to some eminence—Adrian in the church, and James as a physician.

AMBOISE, George d', a cardinal, who became successively bishop of Montauban, archbishop of Narbonne, and lastly of Rouen. Louis XII. made him prime-minister, and he soon acquired great popularity, by taking off the taxes which had usually been levied on the people at the accession of every new monarch. Subsequently to this he was appointed the pope's legate in France, with the dignity of cardinal, and in that capacity effected a considerable reform among the religious orders. B. 1480; D. 1510.—D'Amboise was one of the wisest statesmen France ever had. He reformed the church, purified the courts of justice, remitted the burdens of the people, and conscientiously laboured to promote the public happiness.

AMBOISE, Frances d', the wife of Peter II., duke of Brittany, who treated her with great brutality, which she bore with meekness. She distinguished herself by effecting a reformation in the manners of the Bretons. On the death of the duke, in 1457, she was solicited in marriage by the prince of Savoy, but refused the offer, and retired into a monastery, where she died in 1495.

AMBROGI, Domenico, am-bró-je, a painter of Bologna, who excelled in design. He was particularly eminent for painting cabinet pieces. Lived about 1678.

AMBROSE, St., am-brose, the son of a prefect of Gaul, who became archbishop of Milan, and governor of Liguria and Emilia. On the death of Auxentius, archbishop of Milan, in 374, and after a contest between the Arians and Catholics, he was consecrated bishop. In 383 he was deputed by the emperor Valentinian to prevail upon the tyrant Maximus not to enter Italy, and was successful in his mission. Subsequently, however, Maximus entered Italy, made himself master of the Western empire, and entered Milan in triumph. Valentinian sought refuge with Theodosius, who defeated Maximus, and restored the fugitive monarch to his throne. While Theodosius was in Italy, in 390, an insurrection arose in Thessalonica, in which the emperor's lieutenant was slain. Theodosius in revenge put to death a vast number of persons in cold blood—no less, it is said, than 7000 without distinction of sex or criminality. Soon after this massacre, he came to Milan, and was about to enter the great church, when he was met on its threshold by Ambrose, who refused him admittance as a homicide; and it was not till a year afterwards, and on his showing tokens of repentance, that the prelate would admit him to Christian communion. B. at Milan, 340; D. 397.—The best edition of the works of St. Ambrose is that of Paris, in 2 vols. folio, 1691. He is said to have composed that noble hymn, "Te Deum laudamus," but this is doubtful.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Ambrose

AMBROSE of Alexandria, the friend of Origen, and to whom the latter dedicated many of his works, and at whose expense they were published. Lived in the 3rd century.

AMBROSE, Isaac, a nonconformist divine, who, on the breaking out of the civil wars, quitted the Church of England, took the Covenant, and became a Presbyterian preacher, first at Gars-tang, and afterwards at Preston. b. in Lancashire; d. 1664.—His works are much esteemed by the Calvinists, particularly one entitled "Looking unto Jesus."

AMBROSIOUS AURELIANUS, am'-bro-se-us au-re'-le-ai'-nus, king of the Britons. About A.D. 457 he came from Armorica, to assist in expelling the Saxons, who had been invited over by Vortigern. On the death of that monarch, the sovereignty was vested in him, and he maintained the dignity with credit. The famous king Arthur was brought up under him. d. at Winchester, 508.

AMELION, Hubert Pascal, a'-mail-hawng, a Frenchman who was the means of saving many valuable libraries, amounting in all to 800,000 volumes, during the revolutionary madness of the populace of Paris. He was also a considerable contributor to periodical literature, and wrote a work entitled "the History of the Commerce and Navigation of the Egyptians under the Ptolemies." b. 1730; d. 1811.

AMELOT DE LA HOUSSE, Abraham Nicholas, am'-ai-lo de la hoos'-ai, a French writer on morals and church history, and the translator of Father Paul's "History of the Council of Trent," Machiavelli's "Prince," and other Italian works, into French. He was for a time in great favour with the Court of France, but afterwards was sent to the Bastille in consequence of the influence exerted against him by the Venetians and the clergy, some of whom his writings had offended. He was born at Orleans in 1634; d. at Paris, 1708.

AMELOTTE, Denis, am'-ai-lot, an eminent French writer, who published a translation of the Bible, with commentary, in the years 1666, 1667, and 1668. He had a quarrel with the Port Royalists, who having satirized him, he revenged himself by frustrating their intention of publishing a translation of the Scriptures which they had prepared. He was a member of the congregation of priests called the Oratory. b. 1606; d. 1678.

AMES, William, aims, a Puritan divine, who went to Franeker, in Holland, and was chosen professor of divinity. He afterwards settled at Rotterdam as associate with Hugh Peters, who had gathered a congregation of Brownists in that city. b. in Norfolk, 1576; d. 1633.—The principal of his works is entitled "Medulla Theologica."

AMES, Joseph, a Secretary to the Society of Antiquaries, was originally a ship-chandler in Wapping. He devoted himself to the study of Antiquities, in which he acquired eminence. b. 1639; d. 1739.—He published a work, entitled "Typographical Antiquities; being an Historical Account of Printing in England, &c." 4to. 1749.

AMES, Fisher, an American legislator, distinguished as a speaker and supporter of Washington. b. at Dedham, Massachusetts, 1758; d. 1808.

AMHERST, Jeffrey, Lord, am'-herst, a distinguished British general, was descended from an ancient Kentish family. He entered the army in 1731, and in 1741 was aide-de-camp to General Ligonier, under whom he served at the battles of Dettingen, Fontenoy, and Rocoux. In 1756 he was appointed colonel of the 15th regiment of foot; and in 1758 was made major-general, and went to America, commanding at the siege of Louisburg. Forts Duquesne, Ticonderoga, Crown Point, and Niagara, were afterwards reduced, and the British prestige, which had suffered considerably in Canada, was entirely restored. In 1763 he returned to England, having been previously made a Knight of the Bath, received the thanks of Parliament, and was appointed governor of Virginia. He subsequently was appointed to the governorship of Guernsey, and in 1776 was created Baron Amherst of Holmsdale. In 1778 he was made commander-in-chief of the army in England, and was active, but humane, in suppressing the London riots of 1790. A change of the ministry occurring, he lost his military appointments, but received them again, to voluntarily resign them in 1795, when he was made a field-marshal. b. at Sevenoaks, 1717; d. 1797.

Amidano

AMHERST, William Amherst, Earl, nephew of the above, who, having no child, procured the reversion of his barony for this gentleman. In 1816, he was sent out to Pekin to effect a treaty of commerce with the emperor of China; but as he would not prostrate himself before that sovereign, nothing was effected. He was governor general of India from 1823 to 1828, when he was created Earl Amherst for his services, with a pension of £3,000 a year. b. 1773; d. at Knowle House, near Sevenoaks, 1837.

AMHERST, Nicholas, am'-herst, a political and satirical writer, first educated at Merchant Taylors' School, whence he was removed to St. John's College, Oxford, but thence expelled for irregularity, without taking a degree. In consequence of this disgrace, he wrote several satires against the university, under the title of "Terre Filius," 2 vols. 12mo, 1750, and settled in London as a writer by profession. b. at Marden, Kent, 1700; d. 1742.—His most celebrated undertaking was "The Craftsman," which was carried on for many years with great success. In this publication he was assisted by Lord Dolingbroke and Mr. Pulteney, by whom he was neglected when they got into place.

AMICO, Bernardino, am'-e-ko, a native of Gallipoli, in the kingdom of Naples, who entered into holy orders, and became prior of a convent at Jerusalem. Here he made drawings of the Holy City, which he had engraved by Callot, and published after his return to Italy. The work is now very rare and valuable. This book appeared at Rome in 1620; but the dates of Amico's birth and death are uncertain.

AMICONTI, Giacomo, am'-e-ko-ne, an historical and portrait painter of Venice, who, in 1729, came to England, and painted many fine pieces for the principal nobility. He afterwards went to Spain and was appointed portrait-painter to the king. d. 1752.

AMICIUS, Antonius, a'-m'-i-us, a Sicilian priest, who distinguished himself by some works on history and antiquities. Philip IV. of Spain conferred on him the title of Historiographer Royal. d. 1641. His principal work is entitled "Siciliæ Regum Annales ab Anno 1080 usque ad præsens Sæculum."

AMIDANO, Pomponio, am'-e-dal'-no, an historical painter of some excellence, particularly in his heads, which exhibit taste and dignity. B. at Parma; flourished about 1000.

AMILCAR, am-il-kar, a Carthaginian general surnamed Rhodanus. The Athenians, suspecting and fearing the projects of Alexander, Amilcar went to his camp, gained his confidence, and secretly transmitted an account of all his schemes to Athens.

AMILCAR. (See HAMILCAR.)

AMILCAR, a son of Hanno, defeated in Sicily by Gelon, the same day that Xerxes was defeated at Salamis by Themistocles. He burnt himself, that his body might not be found among the slain. Sacrifices were subsequently offered to him.

AMINTAS, am-in'-e-as, a famous pirate, whom Antigonus employed against Apollodorus, tyrant of Cassandrea.

AMLOT, Père, al-me-o, a learned French Jesuit, who went as a missionary to China in 1751, and having acquired the favour of the emperor, as well as a complete mastery of the Chinese and Manchou languages, he collected and sent to Europe much valuable information about the Chinese people and empire. B. 1713; D. at Pekin in 1794.

AMLETH, am'-let, a Jutland prince of about the second century B.C., whose adventures, as related by Saxo-Grannaticus, furnished Shakespeare with the groundwork of his tragedy of "Hamlet," in which the dramatist has pretty closely followed the legend, except as regards the catastrophe, for after triumphing over his enemies, Amleth was elected king, and had a happy termination to his career.

AMMAN, Jost, am'-an, a celebrated designer and engraver of Switzerland. Very little is known of his life; but Strutt mentions his style as "neat and decided," although perhaps wanting in "freedom and spirit." B. at Zurich, 1539; D. at Nurnberg, 1591.

AMMAN, Johann Conrad, a physician and writer on the instruction of the deaf and dumb, a subject which he was among the first to treat of. He was a native of Schaffhausen in Switzerland, and graduated at the University of Basle in 1687. He subsequently, it is said in consequence of his religious opinions, left his native country, and settled in Holland, where he applied himself with much success to curing defects of speech. He published several works on the subject, in which he explains with great minuteness the mechanism of the vocal organs. His system is generally admitted to be good, and his success in treating defects of speech unquestionable. B. 1689; D. 1724.

AMMAN, Paul, a German physician and botanist, was born at Breslau in 1634. He received his degree of doctor of physic from the University of Leipzig, where he afterwards successively filled the chairs of medicine, botany, and physiology. He was a learned man, but his irritable temper kept him much engaged in controversy, whereby he both dissipated his time and impaired his influence and usefulness. He published several works on medicine and botany, the latter being the most valuable. D. 1691.

AMMANATI, Bartolomeo, am'-a-na'-te, an eminent architect and sculptor of Florence, flourished in the 16th century, when Michael Angelo and his distinguished contemporaries had raised art in Italy to the highest pitch of fame. Ammanati built several palaces, &c., in various Italian cities, and was much employed by Popes Paul III., Julius III., and Gregory XIII. B. 1511; D. 1592.

AMMANATI, Laura Battiferri, wife of the above, was the daughter of John Antonio Battiferri, and a poetess of considerable reputation. B. at Urbino, 1513; D. at Florence, 1559. Her poems, which were published at Florence in 1560, and at Naples in 1594, are held in great esteem. She was elected a member of the academy of Intronati, at Siena.

AMMIANUS, Marcellinus, am-e-oi'-nus, a Latin historian, who served in the army of Julian. B. at Antioch; D. 390. He wrote the Roman history from the reign of Nerva to the death of Valens, in thirty-one books, of which only eighteen are extant. The best edition is that of Gronovius, in 1693. Gibbon says of him, "He is an accurate and faithful guide, who composed the history of his own times without indulging the prejudices and passions which usually affect the mind of a contemporary."

AMMIATO, Scipio, am-e'-rai-to, a distinguished Italian historian, who, at the request of the great duke of Tuscany, wrote the "History of Florence," for which he was made a canon of the cathedral of that city, in which position he composed a variety of other works. B. at Lecce, in Naples, 1531; D. 1600.

AMMON, am'-on, the son of Lot, and father of the Ammonites, who were generally at war with the Israelites. He lived about 1900 B.C.

AMMONIUS, am'-o-ne-us, a Peripatetic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria. He was the disciple of Proclus, and obtained great reputation as a preceptor. Lived in the 5th century. His commentaries on Aristotle and Porphyry are still extant.

AMMONIUS SACCAS, sak'-kas, a Christian philosopher, and the founder of the Eclectic sect. He studied under Athenagoras Panteus and Clemens Alexandrinus, which seems to refute the assertion that he took the surname of Saccas from being a porter. Porphyry says that he renounced the Christian religion, in which he had been educated, and embraced Paganism; but Eusebius and others deny it. He instituted an academy at Alexandria to reconcile the principles of Plato and Aristotle; and among other eminent disciples he had the celebrated Longinus. B. at Alexandria; D. about 243.

AMO, Antony William, al'-mo, a negro who, in 1705, was brought an infant to Europe, and subsequently was made councillor of state by the court of Berlin. He afterwards returned to Guinea, where he was born; little more is known of him.

AMCEBUS, am-le'-us, an Athenian player, of great reputation, who sang at the nuptials of Menetrius and Nigaea.

AMONTONS, William, a-mon'-tawng, a French philosopher, inventor of a system of telegraphing, who, on becoming deaf, applied himself to the study of mechanics and practical mathematics. In 1687 he presented to the Academy of Sciences a new hygroscope, which was approved, and originated a method of telegraphing by signals and ciphers. B. in Paris, 1663; D. 1705.—In 1695 Amontons published a book on the construction of barometers, thermometers, &c., which is the only production of his in print, except some papers in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences. In 1699, on account of the merit of his discoveries, he was admitted a member of that learned body.

AMOROS, Colonel Francis, a-mor'-os, a Spaniard, and the founder of gymnastic establishments in France. He rose rapidly in the military service of his country, until he attained the rank of colonel. Under Charles IV. of Spain and Joseph Bonaparte he successively became a councillor of state, governor of a province, minister of police, and commissary-royal of the army in Portugal. When the French were expelled from Spain, he went to France, where he was the first to establish a gymnasium for the development of the physical powers, and subsequently became director of the normal military gymnasium at Paris. B. at Valencia, 1769; D. at Paris, 1843.

AMORY, Thomas, am'-mor-e, a dissenting divine, who, in 1772, was chosen one of the committee appointed by the dissenters to procure an extension of the Act of Toleration. B. at Taunton, 1700; D. in London, 1774.

AMORY, Thomas, an extraordinary writer, and the son of Counsellor Amory, who was appointed by King William secretary for the forfeited estates in Ireland. He appears to have been intended for the medical profession, but never practised that or any other. He led a very secluded life in his house in Westminster, shunning society, and never stirring out till the evening. D. at the age of 97, in 1788. He wrote, "Memoirs, containing the Lives of several Ladies of Great Britain." This singular work is of the novel kind, and it is made the vehicle of his own Unitarianism, as also is his next publication, "The Life of John Bunce, Esq.," in 4 vols. 12mo. These productions have been considered by one writer as evidencing a high order of intellect, but Chalmers pronounces them to be the emanations of a diseased mind. He wrote likewise two letters in the "Theological Repository," on the natural proofs of a future state.

AMOS, am'-mos, the fourth of the minor prophets, a shepherd of Tekoa, and supposed to have been the father of Isaiah. He prophesied in the reigns of Jeroboam II., king of Israel, and Uzziah, king of Judah. Lived about 810 A.C.

AMOUR, Lewis de St., a'-moor, a doctor of the Sorbonne, and the rector of the university of Paris, who went to Rome as the advocate of the Jansenists. He was expelled the Sorbonne for not signing the condemnation of Arnauld. D. 1687.

AMOUR, William de St., a canon of Beauvais, who in the 13th century was eminent for the spirit with which he defended the university of Paris against the encroachments of the ultrachurch party in France.

AMPERE, André Marie, am'-pair, a scientific French annalist, and professor of physics in the central school of the department of Ain, and subsequently in the Polytechnic school of Paris. His life has little interest or variety, having been principally passed in scientific pursuits. B. at Lyons, 1775; D. in Paris, 1836.—He published several works on electricity, light, and magnetism.

AMPERE, Jean Jacques, son of the above, a distinguished French historian and philologist. B. at Lyons, 1800; D. 1864.

AMPHICTYON, am'-fik'-te-on, son of Helenus, was the first to establish the celebrated council of the Amphictyons, composed of the wisest and most virtuous citizens of Greece. This assembly consisted of twelve persons, originally sent by the following states: the Ionians, Dorians, Peræbiens, Boeotians, Magnesians, Phthians, and Ænians. Other cities in process of time were added to the number, and by the time of Antoninus Pius they had increased to thirty. The members generally met twice every year at Delphi, and sometimes sat at Thermopylae. They took into consideration all matters of disagreement which might exist between the different states of Greece. Before they proceeded to business, the Amphictyons sacrificed an ox to the god of Delphi, and cut his flesh into small pieces; intimating that union and unanimity prevailed in the several cities which they represented. Their decisions were held sacred and inviolable, and even armies were raised to enforce them.

Amurath

AMPHILOCHIOS, am'-fil'-o'-ke-us, bishop of Iconium, who was at the council of Constantinople in 381, under the presidency of Pope Damasius. He zealously opposed the Arians, and recovered Theodosius from that party. D. 391.

AMPHILETUS, am'-fil'-i-tus, a soothsayer of Acarnania, who encouraged Pisistratus to seize the sovereign power in Athens.

AMPHIS, am'-fis, a comic poet of Athens, son of Amphicrates, a contemporary of Plato. Besides his comedies, he wrote other pieces, which are now lost.

AMRIAL-CAIS, am'-re-al-kais, an eminent Arabian poet, who was contemporary with Mohammed, whom he severely satirized. His father having been murdered, he attempted to revenge his death, but was poisoned in the effort. A translation of his principal poem, by Sir W. Jones, was published in 1783.

AMRU-BEN-AL-AS, am'-roo-ben-a'-las, a famous Saracen general, at first a great enemy of Mohammed, but afterwards his zealous disciple. He conquered Syria and Egypt, whence he extended his victorious arms to Africa. He died governor of Egypt, which flourished greatly under his administration. A.D. 663.

AMULIUS, am'-u'-le-us, king of Alba, was son of Procas, the youngest brother to Numitor. The crown belonged to Numitor by right of birth, but Amulius dispossessed him of it, and even put to death his son Lausus, and consecrated his daughter Rhea Sylvia to the service of Vesta, to prevent her ever becoming a mother. In spite of all these precautions, however, Rhea brought forth the twins Romulus and Remus. Amulius being informed of this, ordered her to be buried alive for violating the laws of Vesta, which enjoined perpetual chastity, and the two children were thrown into the river as soon as born. Such, at least, is the story told in early Roman legends.

AMURATH I., a'-mu-rath, a sultan of the Turks, who succeeded his father Orchan in 1360. He completed the conquest of the Greek empire, instituted the corps of Janissaries, conquered Phrygia, and, on the plains of Cassova, defeated the Christians. In this battle he was wounded by an Albanian soldier, and died the next day, in 1389.

AMURATH II. succeeded his father, Mahomet I., in 1421. The beginning of his reign was disturbed by pretenders to his throne; but, after suppressing these, he abdicated in favour of his son Mahomet, and retired to a society of dervishes, whence he was soon recalled to command against the Hungarians, who had invaded the Turkish dominions. He gained a great victory over the Christians at Varna, and, in 1446, quelled a revolt of the Janissaries, and succeeded in resisting the famous Scanderbeg in making advances upon his territories. He then again turned his arms against the Hungarians with his wonted good fortune. Finding his son inadequate to the responsibilities of an imperial station, he sent him to govern Asia Minor, and resumed the throne. B. 1399; d. 1451.

AMURATH III. succeeded his father Selim II. in 1574. He added several of the best provinces of Persia to the Turkish empire. B. 1541; d. 1595.

AMURATH IV. succeeded his uncle Mustapha in 1623. In 1633 he recovered Bagdad from the Persians, after which he put 30,000 of the enemy, who had surrendered at discretion, to the sword. D. 1640.—The excessive cruelty and debauchery of this prince have stamped him with the character of being one of the worst sovereigns that ever reigned over the Ottomans.

AMCLAS, ā-mī'-elus, the master of a ship, with whom Cæsar embarked in disguise, and whom, in the midst of a storm, he bade pursue his voyage with this exclamation, Cæsarem cehis, Cæsarisque fortunam.

AMNTIANUS, ā-mīn'-she-a-nus, a Greek historian, who flourished in the reign of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, but of whose writings not a fragment remains, save the titles.

AMXOR, James, ā'-mæ-o, bishop of Auxerre, and great almoner of France. Though meanly born and educated on charity, he rose by merit and patronage to be professor of Greek and Latin in the university of Bourges. Here he translated into French the memoirs of Theagenes and Chariclea, which procured him an abbey. B. at Melun, 1513; d. at Auxerre, 1593. His translation of Plutarch is admired rather for its style than its correctness, and the French critics consider him to have done much towards determining and improving their language.

AMXOR, Thomas, am'-yot, a writer on history and antiquities, and some time private secretary to Mr. Windham while a member of the Granville Administration in 1806. B. about 1775; d. 1850.

AMYBALDS, or AMYBAUT, am-i-raw, Moise, a French Protestant divine, whose works were so eminent for learning as to be prized by Catholics as well as Protestants. He was consulted by Cardinal Richelieu on a scheme for reuniting the Protestants to Catholicism, which, however, came to nought. B. in Touraine in 1596; d. 1664.

ANACHARSIS, ān-ā-kar'-sis, a Scythian philosopher, who, in the time of Solon, visited Athens, where he was so much esteemed as to be the only barbarian ever admitted to the honour of citizenship. Lived in the 7th century B.C.—Many of his sayings are given in the writings of Diogenes Laertius, who, with Plutarch and others, has preserved many of his apophthegms.

ANACREON, ā-nāk-re-on, one of the most famous of the lyric poets, whose muse is supposed to have been greatly inspired by the juice of the grape. His odes are still extant, and their wonderful sweetness and elegance have been the admiration of every age and country. Plato says that he was descended from Codrus, the last king of Athens. He resided a long time at Samos, in the court of Polycrates. B. in Teos. Flourished in the 6th century B.C.—It is said that Anacreon, in his 80th year, was choked by the stone of a grape. His statue was placed in the citadel of Athens, representing him as an old drunken man, singing, with every mark of dissipation and intemperance. All that he wrote is not extant.

ANAFESTO, Paul, ān-ā-fais'-to, first doge of Venice, was elected in 697, and continued to reign till 717, when he was succeeded by Marcello Taglina.

ANAGNOSTA, John, ān-āg-nos'-ta, an historian of Byzantium, who flourished in the fifteenth century, and wrote an account of the siege of Thessalonica by Amurath in 1430, of which he was an eye-witness.

ANAK, an'-ak, the father of the Anakim, or giants, was the son of Arba, who gave his name to Kirjath-Arba, or Hebron.

ANANIAS, ān'-a-ni'-as, "the cloud of the Lord," a hypocrite in the primitive church at Jerusalem, who was struck dead, with his wife Sapphira, for lying.—An evangelist of Damascus.—A tyrannical high-priest of the Jews.

ANASTASIUS I., ān'-a-stā-she-us, emperor of the East, was an officer in the imperial palace for many years, and in 492 became emperor by marrying the empress Ariadne, widow of Zeno. His reign was disturbed by religious feuds. B. at Duras, in Illyricum, 430; d. 518.—There were several other emperors of this name, the most remarkable of whom was Anastasius II., who was raised from the position of a secretary to that of emperor by the voice of the Roman people in 718 A.D. He was an able man and wise ruler, and defended the empire, both by land and sea, against the attacks of the Saracens. He was, however, deposed by the sailors of the fleet, who had mutinied, and was ultimately slain by the emperor Leo, in 721, after making a vain attempt to regain the crown.

ANASTASIUS I., Pope, succeeded Siricicus about the year 398.—There are several other popes of this name, but with nothing remarkable in their history to record.

ANAXAGORAS, ān-ax-āg'-o-ras, an illustrious philosopher of antiquity, who held that the moon was inhabited, and that the sun was a mass of burning matter, from which the other heavenly bodies derived light and heat. For these opinions he was banished by the Athenians. B. at Clazomene; d. at Lampsacus, 428 B.C.—Euripides and Pericles were pupils of this philosopher, whose only dying wish was that the day of his death should be kept as a holiday yearly by the boys of Lampsacus, which was complied with.

ANAXANDRIDES, ān-ax-ān'-dri-des, king of Sparta and the father of Leonidas, who fell at Thermopylae. Reigned about 550 B.C. (See LEONIDAS.)

ANAXIMANDER, ān-āx'-e-man'-der, a philosopher of Miletus, and the first to observe the obliquity of the ecliptic; he taught that the moon was the recipient of the light of the sun, and that the earth is globular. To him is ascribed the invention of the sphere and geographical charts. B. 610 B.C.; d. about 545.

ANAXIMENES, ān-ax-im'-e-nees, a philosopher, who maintained that air was the first principle of all things. Pliny attributes to him the invention of the sundial. B. about 528 B.C.

ANAXIPPUS, ān-ax-ip'-us, a comic writer in the age of Demetrius. He used to say that philosophers were wise only in their speeches, but fools in their actions.

ANCOLLOX, Johann Peter Friedrich, an-tail-on, a Prussian statesman who, during the wars of Napoleon I., took an active part in directing the affairs of his country. At his death he held the appointment of minister of foreign affairs. B. at Berlin, 1766; d. 1837.

ANCONA, Andrew Lillio d', an-ko'-na, a Roman artist, who painted some pieces for Pope

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Ancus Martius

Sixtus V. in the Vatican and church of St John Lateran. His principal work is a fresco in the church of St. Maria Maggiore, the subject being our Saviour washing the disciples' feet.

ANCUS MARTIUS, an-cus mar'-she-us, fourth king of Rome, was the grandson of Numa Pompilius. He was elected 640 B.C. He obtained triumphs for victories gained over the Latins, Sabines, and Veientes, and extended his territories to the seacoast, where he built the port of Ostia. D. after a reign of 24 years.

ANDERSEN, Hans Christian, an'-der-sen, an ingenious Danish writer, who, though born in the humblest circumstances, has risen to considerable eminence among his contemporaries. Most of his works are of an imaginative, poetical, or light character, and have procured him not only the patronage of the crown of Denmark, but the approbation of a large portion of the literary circles of foreign countries; and the highest praise has been assigned to his juvenile tales. B. at Odense, 1805.—A collected edition of his works was published at Leipzig in 1847, but since that date he has written many others. They have also been translated into English by Mary Howitt, and others.

ANDERSON, Adam, an'-der-son, chief clerk in the South Sea House, and which concern he was connected with for many years. He was also a writer on political economy, and the laws of trade; but many of his opinions have been exploded by the later inquiries of Smith and others. B. in Scotland, 1692; D. 1766.

ANDERSON, Alexander, M.D., for many years filled the position of superintendent of the botanic garden in the Island of St. Vincent, and wrote several papers on the topography, geology, and vegetable productions of the West Indies. D. about 1813.

ANDERSON, Alexander, a native of Aberdeen, in Scotland, who settled in Paris early in the 17th century, as a teacher of mathematics, on which and kindred subjects he composed several works, which are now very scarce.

ANDERSON, Arthur, a merchant of eminence, who was born in the Shetland Isles, Scotland, in 1792, and represented his native county in Parliament, and was a prominent member of the Anti-Corn-Law League, which he assisted with his pen as well as with his purse and personal exertions. He was afterwards chairman of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, which he helped to make the largest commercial marine in the world.

ANDERSON, James, a Scottish antiquary, who vindicated the independence of the crown and kingdom of Scotland against the attacks of W. Atwood, in 1704, 1705. He lived during the exciting time of the Union, and was ordered by the Scotch Parliament to collect and publish all the documents he could find bearing upon the independence of the country; but this undertaking he was never able to complete. He published, however, various collections of papers bearing on Scottish history, especially the time of the unfortunate Mary. He was a lawyer by profession, and was born in Edinburgh in 1662; D. in 1728.

ANDERSON, William, LL.D. and D.D., a distinguished popular preacher of Glasgow, in connection with the United Presbyterian body. He was born at Kilsyth, Stirlingshire, where his father was a dissenting clergyman. He has a high position as a controversial divine; and his treatises on the Mass, Penance, Regeneration, &c. are held in great estimation in his own country and amongst his more immediate co-religionists. B. 1780.

ANDERSON, George, an English mathematician, who attained to considerable eminence, though born of peasants and himself a day-labourer. B. at Weston, Buckinghamshire, 1760; D. 1808.

ANDERSON, Sir Edmund, an English judge, who was in the commission for trying Mary Queen of Scots; and presided at the trial of secretary Davison, for issuing the warrant by which that unhappy princess was executed. B. in Lincolnshire; D. 1695.

ANDERSON, James, LL.D., a Scotch political, scientific, and agricultural writer, and one of the founders of the Scotch school of husbandry. He wrote about thirty different works, and was a large contributor to the "Encyclopædia Britannica." B. at Hermiston, near Edinburgh, 1739; D. in London, 1808.

ANDERSON, James, M.D., a physician-general in the service of the East India Company at Madras, who zealously laboured for the introduction of the cultivation of the coffee-plant, American cotton, sugar-cane, and the European apple, into those parts of Hindostan, but more especially in the presidency of Madras, where the climate and soil were favourable to their production. Lived in the last century; but the dates of his birth and death are not precisely known.

ANDERSON, John, one of the earliest promoters of scientific instruction among the working classes, and the founder of the Glasgow Andersonian Institution. B. at Rosneath, Dumbarton 1721; D. in Glasgow, 1796.—It was by Anderson that the plan was devised of sending, by gas-inflated paper balloons, newspapers and other communications from France into Germany, when all other means of conveyance were intercepted by a cordon of troops between the countries.

ANDERTON, Henry, an'-der-ton, an English historical and portrait painter, who was patronised by Charles II. He died young, about 1665.

ANDOCIDES, an-do'-ci-dees, son of Leogoras, an Athenian soldier, orator, and statesman, who was born about 488 B.C., and for many years figured in almost all the domestic broils and foreign wars in which the Athenians were involved, down to 403, after which little is known of him. He was of noble birth; and left several orations, four of which are still extant.

ANDRADE, Anthony d', an-dra'-da, a Portuguese Jesuit, who, about 1625, contrived to make two journeys into Thibet, of which he published an account. B. about 1580; D. at Goa, 1634.

ANDRAL, Gabriel, an'-dra', an eminent French physician and author, who, after studying at the college of Louis XIV., took his degree of M.D. in 1821, and made a position for himself as a scientific student of his art by the publication in 1824 of his "Clinique Médicale." He was appointed to the Hygienic chair of the French faculty in 1827; in 1830 was removed to that of Internal Pathology; in 1839 was appointed professor of General Pathology, and in 1842 was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. He published a variety of works on medical anatomy and surgery, with all which branches he was equally conversant, which have been translated into the leading European languages, and are held in high esteem by his countrymen.

fessional brethren of all countries. B. at Paris in 1797.

ANDREANI, Andrea, an-drai-à-ne, an engraver of Mantua, whose prints are numerous and valuable. B. about 1540; D. 1610.

ANDRÉ, John, an-drai, originally a merchant's clerk, but quitting the counting-house for the camp, so greatly distinguished himself in the American war as to be raised to the rank of major. General Clinton had such an opinion of his address, that when the American general Arnold made a secret offer of surrendering an important post to the British, he employed Major André to negotiate the conditions. Having been taken in the performance of his mission, General Washington caused him to be tried as a spy, when he was condemned to suffer death. On going to the place of execution, he asked, with a feeling of repugnance to the conceived ignominy of his end, "Must I die in this manner?" Being told that it was unavoidable, he replied, "I am reconciled to my fate, but not the mode; it will, however, be but a momentary pang." His fortitude excited the admiration and melted the hearts of the spectators. On being asked if he had anything to say: "Nothing," he replied, "but to request that you will witness to the world that I die like a brave man." The intelligence of his death was received in England with general indignation. A monument was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey, on which is an inscription describing his virtues and merits, and recording his age and the date of his execution. B. 1751; D. 1780.

ANDREAS, James, an-dre-as, an eminent German reformer, and secretary to the conference at Worms. B. at Wurtemberg, 1523; D. 1590.

ANDREAS, John, a canonist and professor of civil law at Padua and Bologna. Lived in the 14th century.—His daughter Novella, in his absence, read lectures to his pupils, and a curtain was drawn before her that the attention of the auditors might not be taken off by her beauty. His affection for her was so great, that he entitled his commentary on the decretals of Gregory X. the "Novella." She married John Calderinus, a famous canonist.

ANDREOSI, Count, an-dre-osi, a Frenchman of Italian descent, who took an active part in the great revolution, and subsequently served under Napoleon I., and distinguished himself at the siege of Mantua. He was with Napoleon in Egypt, and was one of the few officers chosen to return with him secretly to France. He gradually rose under the Bonaparte régime, and was successively appointed ambassador at the court of Vienna, governor of Vienna, and afterwards ambassador to the Sublime Porte, where he was much esteemed both by the Turks and the Franks. On the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, he was recalled from Constantinople by Louis XVIII., who nevertheless conferred upon him the cross of St. Louis. He now withdrew from public life, but on the escape of his old master from Elba, he once more joined him, and during the Hundred Days was created a peer of France. After Waterloo, he again retired from public life, and employed himself in writing memoirs and reminiscences of those scenes and events which had engaged his attention whilst following the destinies of Napoleon. Several of his works are much esteemed, especially his "Constantinople and the Thracian Bosphorus."

ANDREW I., an-droo, king of Hungary, was the eldest son of Ladislaus the Bald. On the accession of Peter, in 1044, he and his brother Bela were obliged to quit Hungary; but on promising to abolish Christianity and to restore paganism, they were recalled. When Andrew, however, obtained the throne, he broke his engagement, and compelled his subjects to turn Christians. He was deposed in 1061.

ANDREW, St., the first disciple of our Saviour, and one of his apostles. Supposed to have suffered martyrdom at Patra in Achaia, A.D. 70. He is the patron saint of Scotland and Russia.

ANDREWS, Lancelot, an-droos, an English prelate, who became chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, and who was employed by James I. to defend the sovereignty of kings against Bellarmine, who had attacked it under the name of Matthew Tortas. Dr. Andrews did this in a piece called "Tortura Torti," for which he was made almoner to the king, a privy councillor, dean of the chapel royal, and successively bishop of Chichester, Ely, and Winchester. Bishop Andrews was considered the best preacher and nearly the most learned divine of his time; but his style is marred to the taste of modern times, by the ornamentation and fanciful conceits which characterize it. B. in London, 1555; D. 1626.—It is of this bishop that the following anecdote is told, on the authority of Waller the poet. King James was at dinner one day, the bishop of Winchester, and Neale, bishop of Durham, being also present. His majesty said to the prelates, "My lords, cannot I take my subjects' money when I want it, without all this formality in parliament?" Bishop Neale quickly replied, "God forbid, sir, that you shouldn't; you are the breath of our nostrils." On which the king of parliamentary cases." The king answered, "No put-offs, my lord; answer me presently." "Then, sir," said Andrews, "I think it lawful for you to take brother Neale's money, for he offers it." He had a share in the translation of the authorized version of the Bible.

ANDREWS, James Petit, an English historical writer, was the son of Joseph Andrews, of Shaw House, Berks, where he was born in 1737. His first publication was a pamphlet on the ill-usage to which chimney-sweeps were subjected, and which is said to have induced the passing of the Act of 1783 for their protection. He subsequently devoted himself to historical study, and published various works, the most notable of which is his "History of Great Britain connected with Chronology; with Notes, containing Anecdotes, Lives of the Learned, &c.," which, however, is unfinished. His writings display much knowledge of English manners, literature, and legislation in early times. When, in 1792, the London police magistracy was established, Andrews was appointed to preside in the court for Queen Square and St. Margaret's, Westminster. He died in 1797.

ANDRIEUX, François-Guillaume-Jean-Stanislas, an-dre-u(r), a professor of belles-lettres in Paris, who distinguished himself by the independence of his views during the Revolution. He became professor of literature in the College of France, and exceedingly popular as a lecturer. B. at Strasburg, 1759; D. at Paris, 1833.—He wrote fifteen plays and several professional works.

ANDROMACHUS, an-drom'-a-kus, physician to the emperor Nero, and the inventor of a celebrated compound medicine called theriacle, described in Galen's works.—Lived in the 1st century A.D.

ANDRONICUS, Comnenus, an-dron'-i-kus, Greek emperor, grandson of Alexis Comnenus, who in his youth distinguished himself in the field while serving under the command of the Emperor Manuel, in the wars with the Armenians and Turks. He afterwards fell into disgrace, was confined in a tower twelve years on a charge of treason, from which having escaped, he went to Russia, became a great favourite with the grand duke Jaroslaus, whom he induced to conclude an alliance with the Emperor Manuel, for which service the latter pardoned him. On the death of Manuel, and in the midst of the disorders consequent on a disputed succession, Andronicus was called upon to assume the guidance of affairs as the guardian and associate of Alexis II.; but, after a time, he seized upon supreme power, murdered Alexis and his mother, and was ultimately himself tortured and killed in a tumult in Constantinople, excited by his cruelty. "His reign," says Gibbon, "exhibited a singular contrast between vice and virtue; when he listened to his passions, he was the scourge, when he consulted his reason, the father of his people." In the exercise of justice, he was equitable and rigorous; but in the gratification of his revenge, barbarous and cruel to the last degree. His death took place in 1185 A.D. There were other two emperors of this name, whose lives present nothing remarkable.

ANDRONICUS, Cyrrhestes, an Athenian, who applied himself to the study of the winds. He built the famous octagonal Temple of the Winds at Athens, and was the inventor of weathercocks.

ANDRONICUS, Livius, the oldest dramatic author in the Latin language. His first piece was performed about 240 years before Christ. His works are lost.

ANDRONICUS of Rhodes, a Peripatetic philosopher, to whom we are indebted for restoring and publishing the works of Aristotle, in the time of Sylla.—Lived 63 B.C.

ANDROUET DU CERREAU, James, an'-droo-ai doo-seer'-yo, a French architect, who designed the grand gallery of the Louvre, the Pont-neuf, and many other noble erections. Lived in the 16th century.

ANER, ai'-ner, 'answer,' 'song,' 'affliction,' or 'light'; a Canaanite chief, who confederated with Abraham.

ANESI, an-ai'-se, Paulo, an artist of Florence, who was eminent for the beauty of his landscapes. D. about 1750.

 Months," being all that is preserved of his works. D. 570 A.D.—It is supposed, with some plausibility, that Aneurin was the celebrated Gildas, the ecclesiastical historian.

ANGARANO, Ottavio, an-gar'-a-no, a Venetian artist of noble birth, who gained deserved reputation as an historical painter. There is a fine picture of the Nativity by him in one of the churches of Venice; of this subject he also executed an etching. Flourished in the 17th century.

ANGELO, Filippod', an'-shai'-le, a native of Rome, who, having been carried to Naples when very young, was hence called Napolitano. He attained to considerable fame as a painter, especially of battle scenes, landscapes, views of public buildings, &c., in which he was fond of introducing a great many figures, but which he grouped so judiciously as to avoid any appearance of crowding. B. 1600; D. 1640, at Rome.

ANGELICO DA FIESOLE, Giovanni, an'-shai'-e-co da-fe'-ai-sole, an Italian religio-historical painter, who became a monk, and was as much esteemed for his piety as he was admired as an artist for his talents. He was a very successful teacher of art, and had a considerable number of pupils. Refused the archbishopric of Florence; and died in 1455. B. at Vicchio, Tuscany, 1387.

ANGELLIS, Peter, an-jel'-is, an eminent artist, born at Dunkirk in 1655. His line was landscapes with figures, and conversation pieces. D. at Rennes, in 1734.

ANGELO. See MICHAEL ANGELO BUONAROTTI.

ANGELONI, Luigi, an'-shai'-lo'-ne, an Italian, who took an active part in the affairs of the Roman States during their occupation by the French army under Berthier and Massena. In 1799 he became an emigrant, and went to Paris, where he entered into some secret plans of conspiracy against the government of Napoleon I.; but as no proof could be brought against him, he was released. On the overthrow of Napoleon, he was the first to claim for his country the restitution of the paintings, sculptures, and manuscripts of which she had been despoiled by the French in 1797-8. In 1823 he was shipped to England on account of suspicions being excited against him in reference to the political movements in Naples and Piedmont. B. 1752, at Frosinone; D. in London, 1842.

ANGERSTEIN, Julius, an'-ger'-stine, a Russian, who, coming to London, became an eminent merchant, and a member of Lloyd's Coffee-house. He was remarkable for the practically benevolent tone of his public spirit, and was the first to propose a reward of £2000 from the fund at Lloyd's to the inventor of lifeboats. He was a great patron of the fine arts, and his collection of paintings was purchased by the British Government for £60,000, and formed the nucleus of the National Gallery. B. at St. Petersburg, 1735; D. at Blackheath, 1822.

ANGLESEY, Arthur Annesley, an-gle'-see, earl of, a native of Dublin, who, in the Civil War, joined the royalist party, and, in 1643, sat in the parliament at Oxford; but afterwards made his peace with the Parliamentarians, and was despatched as a commissioner to Ulster. He took an active part in the restoration of Charles II., for which he was created earl of Anglesey, and in 1667 was made treasurer of the navy. He subsequently became lord privy seal, and in 1680 was accused by Dangerfield, at the bar of the House of Commons, of endeavouring to stifle evidence concerning the popish plot. In 1682 he presented a spirited remonstrance to Charles II., relative to the state of the nation, and the danger to be apprehended from the duke of York being a papist. Soon after this he was dismissed from office, when he retired to his country seat, where he died, leaving several children. B. 1614; D. 1686.—He wrote a "History of the Troubles of Ireland," from 1614 to ANGLESEY, Henry William Paget, marquis of, was the eldest son of the first earl of Uxbridge, and at an early age entered Parliament as member for the Carnarvon boroughs. The bent of his inclination, however, was for a military life. On the breaking out of the French revolutionary war in 1793, he raised among his father's tenantry a regiment, which was at first called the Staffordshire militia, but was subsequently admitted into the regular army as the 56th foot. Of this regiment he became lieutenant-colonel, and in 1794 was with the Duke of York in Flanders, where he greatly distinguished himself. When he returned to England, he was appointed to the command of a cavalry regiment, and devoted himself so successfully to his military duties, as to be recognised as the first cavalry officer in the service. He continued to be actively engaged throughout the wars with Napoleon. On the death of his father, in 1812, he succeeded to the title of earl of Uxbridge. At Waterloo he led the final charge which destroyed the French Guards, and near the close of the battle received a shot in the knee, which caused him to lose his limb. It was for his services in this great conflict that he was created Marquis of Anglesey, and made a Knight Grand Cross of the Bath. In 1818 he was elected a Knight of the Garter, and in the following year was made a general in the army. In 1827, under Canning, he filled the office of Master-general of the Ordnance, which he again resumed, after an interval of 18 years, under Lord John Russell, in 1848. In 1822, he was appointed Lord-lieutenant of Ireland by the Duke of Wellington, and gained immense popularity by the zeal, energy, and good-heartedness which he displayed in the discharge of his duties. His conduct on the question of Catholic emancipation especially won the hearts of the Irish people; but as his letter declaring in favour of that measure was deemed premature and indiscreet by his political superiors, he was at once recalled. He was, however, restored to his office by Earl Grey in 1830; but his popularity was gone, and he never recovered it. His Irish government was distinguished by the institution of the Board of Education, which he originated and of which he was always a warm patron. On the resignation of Earl Grey in 1833, he abandoned politics entirely, for his appointment as Master-general of the Ordnance in 1848 can scarcely be regarded in a political light. In 1842 he was made colonel of the Horse Guards, and in 1846 was appointed field marshal. B. 1768; D. 1854.

A laim, was the illegitimate son of Charles IX. Catherine de Medici bequeathed to him her estates of Auvergne and Lauraguais, when he married the daughter of Henry Montmorency, constable of France. The will of Catherine, however, was set aside in favour of Margaret of Valois. Charles retained the title of Count d'Auvergne, and in 1619 was created Duke of Angoulême. He was actuated by a restless and an ambitious spirit, and, as a military commander, acquired considerable reputation. In 1628, the siege of Rochelle was commenced under him, and he was engaged in the wars of Germany, Languedoc, and Flanders. B. 1573; D. 1650.

ANGOULEME, Louis Antoine de Bourbon, duc d', was the son of the Comte d'Artois (afterwards Charles X. of France), and shared the exile of his family during the Revolutionary wars and the first Empire. His mother was a princess of Savoy, and at Turin the duc d'Angoulême spent the earlier period of his exile. He afterwards served in Germany, but with no distinction, and he returned to inaction until the restoration of the Bourbons in 1814. On the escape of Napoleon from Elba, the duke exerted himself to preserve Bordeaux for the Bourbons; and on the accession of his father to the throne in 1824, he assumed the title of Dauphin. But he was never destined to attain the royal dignity, for the revolution of 1830 again sent him into exile, a part of which he spent in England, and the remainder in Hungary, where he died in 1844. B. 1775.

ANGOULEME, Maria Thérèse Charlotte, duchess d', wife of the above, the daughter of Louis XVI., by Maria Antoinette of Austria, was born at Versailles in 1773. When only 14 years of age, the occurrences of August 10, 1792, upset the throne of France, and sent its occupant and his family to the prison of the Temple, which he and the queen only left for the scaffold. The princess, who from her cradle bore the title of Madame Royale, was the only child of her parents who survived those terrible times; and in 1793 was married to her cousin, the duc d'Angoulême. The duchess shared her husband's exile till 1814, and aided him with much firmness and energy in resisting Bonaparte after his return from Elba; in reference to which exertions, and her vigour of character generally, Napoleon remarked of her that "she was the only man of her family." D. at Goritz, in Hungary, where she had retired with her family after the revolution of 1830, in 1851.

ANGELICOLA, Sofonisba, an-ge'-se-o'-la, a celebrated female painter of Cremona. She was patronized by Philip II. of Spain, and Vandyck said that he was taught more by her conversation than he had learned from the study of the works of the great masters. She was twice married, and became blind in her old days. A portrait of her is said to be at Althorp, Northamptonshire, in which she is represented as playing on the harpsichord. B. 1533; D. at Genoa, about 1620.

ANICINI, Lewis, an'-e-ke'-ne, a native of Ferrara, in Italy, who made for Pope Paul III. a medal, on which was represented the interview between Alexander the Great and the high-priest at Jerusalem, so exquisitely engraved, that Michael Angelo, on examining it, exclaimed that the art had arrived at the height of perfection. Lived in the middle of the 16th century.

ANIELLO. (See MASANIELLO.)

ANJOU, counts and dukes of, an'-joo, one of the earliest noble families of France, some of whose members have greatly distinguished themselves. In the 13th century, Charles of Anjou, fourth son of Louis VIII., was selected by the pope for the crown of Naples, and took possession of the country in 1266. He endeavoured, by crushing the Ghibellins, to found an empire in Italy, but was unsuccessful. Whilst engaged in this work, the celebrated massacre historically known as the "Sicilian Vespers" took place, in which 4000 of his French soldiers were butchered by the Sicilians in Palermo, on the Easter Monday of 1283. He had laid siege to Messina, where his fleet was captured by the admiral of Peter of Aragon, who had assumed the title of king of Sicily. This event filled him with fury, and he sent a challenge to Peter to meet him in single combat. In order to gain time, the challenge was accepted, though subsequently declined; shortly after which Charles died, in his 75th year, 1285.—He was by far the most distinguished of his house.

ANJOU, François de France, duc d', youngest son of Henry II. and Catherine de Medici. He was first called duke of Alençon, and was of a treacherous, unstable disposition, although it is said that he was a friend of Admiral Coligny, and expressed his abhorrence of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. In 1575 he was at the head of the Huguenot army, and, peace being soon concluded, the duchies of Anjou, Touraine, and Berri were transferred to him. In 1581, such of the Netherland states as were under the control of William of Orange, elected him sovereign, in the hope of obtaining the assistance of the French against the Spaniards, and he was one of the numerous suitors of Queen Elizabeth. The virgin queen, however, dismissed him, and, becoming an object of suspicion in the Low Countries, he was finally expelled from the country. b. 1554; d. 1594.

ANKASTROM, John Jacob, an-ka'-strom, Swedish regicide, who conspired against Gustavus III., king of Sweden, whom he shot with a pistol at a masked ball. He confessed the crime, for which he stood in the pillory three times, was publicly scourged, had his right hand, cut off, and lastly, was beheaded, in 1792.

ANNA, án'-á, the wife of Tobit, and his support in his poverty.—The daughter of Phanuel, and a prophetess.—The mother of the Blessed Virgin, and wife of Joseph.

ANNA COMNENA, án'-a-kom-né-na, daughter of the emperor Alexis Comnenus I., a princess of extraordinary talents, who, for conspiring against her brother the emperor, was forced from court into retirement, where she employed herself in writing the history of her father's reign. This work has great merit, and is still extant. b. 1083; d. 1148. (See ALEXIS I.)

ANNA IVANOVNA, é'-an-ov'-na, empress of Russia, was the daughter of the czar Ivan Alexiovitch, who, on the death of her husband, Frederick William, duke of Courland, took into favour Ernest John Biren, a man of low origin, by whom she was ruled in an arbitrary manner during the remainder of her life. In 1730 she ascended the throne of Russia, but Biren managed all the affairs of government, and is said to have banished upwards of 20,000 persons to Siberia. b. 1693; d. 1740.—Anna left the crown to her grand-nephew Ivan.

of Cleves, án, wife of Henry VIII., king of England, was the daughter of John III., duke of Cleves. She was designated the "Flanders mare" by Henry VIII., and divorced by him. She had philosophy sufficient, however, not to take these circumstances much to heart, but quietly returned to her native country. d. 1557.

ANNE, queen of Great Britain, was the second daughter of James II., by Lady Anne Hyde, daughter of the great earl of Clarendon. In 1683 she married Prince George of Denmark, by whom she had several children, all of whom died young. In 1702, on the death of William III., she succeeded to the crown. Her reign was a continual scene of public glory; and the domineering power of the French nation was completely subdued by the vigour of the British troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough. b. 1664; d. 1714.—One of the greatest events of this important reign was the union of Scotland with England. On account of the number of eminent literary characters who flourished in her reign, it has been called the Augustan age of Britain. Queen Anne, though too much the dupe of her ministers and favourites, will ever stand distinguished for the general excellence of her private character.

ANQUETIL, Louis Pierre, án-ke'-til, an eminent French historian, was born in 1723, at Paris. He was the elder brother of the distinguished orientalist of the same name. He was an ecclesiastic, and in 1759 was appointed prior of the Abbaye de la Roë, in Anjou, and director of the College of Senlis. At the beginning of the revolution he held the cure of La Villette, near Paris, was imprisoned in the Lazare during the Reign of Terror, where he occupied himself with the composition of his Universal History. He became a member of the Institute on its formation, and was afterwards attached to the ministry of foreign affairs. His writings are numerous, extend over a wide range of historical subjects, and all exhibit marks of research and erudition. d. 1808.

ANQUETIL DU PERRON, Abraham Hyacinthe, doo-pé'-rong, brother of the above-named, eminent French Oriental scholar, was born at Paris in 1731, where he acquired an intimate knowledge of Hebrew. He was strongly urged to enter the church, but could not be induced to abandon the study of the Eastern tongues. In pursuit of his favourite study he travelled in the East, in the hope of discovering the works of Zoroaster, and of learning the Zend language, in which they were supposed to be written. His enthusiasm was so great, that he even entered himself as a private soldier in an expedition fitting out for Judea. He was, however, furnished with a free passage, and other facilities. The wars between England and France prevented him carrying out all his plans of investigating the languages of the East; he yet made himself master of several of them, and on his return to France, in 1762, was pensioned, with the title of oriental interpreter in the royal library. He published, in 1771, the "Zendavesta, or Sacred Books of the Parsees;" and between that time and his death, which happened in 1803, he gave to the world the results of his studies in the shape of treatises on language, commerce, &c.

ANRAAT, Peter Van, án-rá', an artist of whom little is known, save that he executed some very good pictures of religious scenes.

ANSALDI, Casto Innocente, án-sal'-de, an Italian divine and professor of theology at Brescia and Ferrara, and of philosophy at Turin and Milan. He was a Dominican, but a man of independence of character. His writings are very voluminous, and were published at each of the cities where Ansaldi was located. Some have been reprinted at Oxford and elsewhere. b. at Plaisance, 1710; d. 1779.

ANSALDI, Innocenzio Andrea, an Italian artist and author, was born in Tuscany in 1734. He occupied himself in decorating the churches of Pescia, his native town, and wrote a description of the works of art in them, together with some poetical pieces, translations, &c. d. 1816.

ANSALDO, Giovanni Andrea, ás-sal'-do, a native of Voltri, near Genoa, who imitated the style of Paul Veronese. The churches of Genoa possess his principal pieces. b. 1684; d. 1633.

ANSALONI, Giordano, ân-sai-lô-ne, a Dominican missionary, who was put to death in Japan in 1634. He was a native of Sicily, and had only been two years in Japan when he suffered martyrdom, for which he was, with others, canonized by Pope Pius IX. in 162.

ANSALONI, Vincenzio, a native of Bologna, and pupil of Ludovico Carracci, devoted himself especially to figure-painting, in which line he was very successful, and is spoken of in high praise for some pieces on religious subjects which he executed, especially one representing the martyrdom of St. Sebastian. The dates of his birth and death are uncertain.

ANSDELL, Richard, ans-dell, a painter of animals, elected an associate of the Royal Academy in 1861. His productions are inferior only to those of Sir Edwin Landseer: among the best may be named "The Hunted Hare," exhibited in 1863. b. at Liverpool, 1815.

ANSCARUS, ans-ka-re-us, called the apostle of the north, was a native of Picardy, where he was born in 801. He was educated by the Benedictines, and accompanied Harold of Denmark to the North, with the view of introducing Christianity into the Danish dominions. Internal troubles preventing the immediate realization of this intention, Anscarus applied himself to teaching the Gospel in Friesland. He afterwards went on a mission into Sweden, where he preached for six months. He was now appointed archbishop of Hamburg and bishop of Bremen; but his early love for missionary labour was still active within him, and he again visited Denmark and Sweden, in both of which he succeeded in establishing Christianity. He died at Bremen in 864, and was afterwards canonized.

ANSELM, ân-sel'm, a distinguished archbishop of Canterbury, who took an active part in all that related to the church. b. at Aosta, in Piedmont, 1033; d. at Canterbury, 1109.—He was the first archbishop who restrained the English clergy from marrying, in a synod held at Westminster in 1102.

ANSELM, St., was appointed bishop of Lucca in 1061, where he succeeded his uncle, and acted as legate of Leo X. in Lombardy. He was the author of an apology for Pope Gregory VII., and a Refutation of the Pretensions of the anti-Pope Guibert, both of which are contained in Canuiss's "Lection Antique," and in the Bibliothèque de Paris." d. at Milan 1086. He was canonized some time after his death.

ANSELM of Laon, called the scholastic, was born at Laon, about the middle of the eleventh century, of poor parents. He is supposed to have been a disciple of St. Anselm at Bec. He began to teach at Paris about 1076, and was one of the founders of the university of that city. He afterwards returned to Laon, where he and his brother Ralph lectured on theology and belles lettres, and soon these schools were famous all over Europe. He wrote several works, but his commentaries on the Scriptures are best known. d. 1117.

ANSELM, Antoine, a famous French preacher, was born in 1652. He had a wonderful memory, and at twelve years of age could repeat any sermon that he happened to hear. His first appearance in the pulpit was at Cimont, when very young, on which occasion he received the soubriquet of the "Little Prophet," which ever after adhered to him. By the time he was thirty years of age, he had attained such popularity, that his engagements to preach extended to four and five years in prospective. He finally retired to the abbey of St. Sever, in Gascony, where he busied himself with literature at home and benevolence abroad. Four volumes of sermons by him were published in 1731. d. 1737.—There are several other divines, lawyers, and littérateurs who bore this name, but none of prominent importance.

ANSELM, Jaques Bernard Modeste d', a general of division in the French Revolutionary army, who, after taking Nice, Villa Franca, and Montalban, was appointed to the command of the army in Italy; but having failed to maintain discipline, he was superseded by the Convention and imprisoned. The revolution of 9th Thermidor, 1794, gave him his liberty; but he did not again take a prominent part in the military events of his time. b. 1740; d. about 1812.

ANSELM, de Sainte-Marie, a French writer on genealogy, chronology, and heraldry, who flourished in the seventeenth century.

ANSELM, Michael Angelo, ân-sel-me, a native of Siena, and pupil of Vercelli, but best known for his close imitation of Correggio. d. 1491; d. 1554.

ANSON, George, General, ân-son, commander-in-chief of the British forces in India during the earlier period of the Sepoy mutiny of 1857. He was advancing with his troops from Umballa to Delhi, when he was seized with cholera at Kur-naul, where he died, 27th May. It has been said that he was interred without even an ordinary salute.

ANSON, George, Lord, an eminent naval commander, who went to sea at a very early age, and in 1724 was made post-captain. In 1739 he was chosen commander of an expedition against the Spanish settlements in South America, and sailed from Portsmouth with five men-of-war, a sloop, and two victualling vessels. In 1741 he doubled Cape Horn, after losing two of his ships. In June following he arrived off Juan Fernandez, with only two ships and two tenders; and having been successful in taking several rich prizes, and in causing much damage to the enemy, he returned to England in 1744, when for his distinguished services against the Spanish, he was made rear-admiral of the blue, and one of the lords of the Admiralty. He was also chosen member of parliament for the borough of Heydon. In 1747 he commanded the Channel fleet, and captured six French men-of-war and four East-Indiamen. For these services he was created Lord Anson, and on the death of Sir John Norris, was made vice-admiral of England. In 1751 he was appointed first lord of the Admiralty, which post he held, with a short interval, till his death. In 1758 he again commanded the Channel fleet, having under him the gallant Sir Edward Hawke. After this he was appointed admiral and commander-in-chief of the British fleet. b. in the parish of Coiwich, Staffordshire, 1697; d. at Moor Park, Hertfordshire, 1762.—He is the hero of the well-known book called "Anson's Voyage round the World," which was written by a Mr. Benjamin Robins, from information furnished by Lord Anson.

ANSPACH, Elizabeth, Margravine of, ans-pak, who is known as an authoress, was the daughter of the fourth earl of Berkeley, and was married, first to Mr. William Craven, afterwards earl of Craven, from whom she was separated after a union of several years. She travelled much on the continent for some years, and lived for a considerable time at Anspach, where she occupied a prominent place at Court, wrote plays, and established a theatre. On the death of the earl of Craven and of the margravine, she was married to his serene highness the margrave of Anspach and Baireuth, whom she accompanied to England when he sold his territorial rights to the king of Prussia. On the death of the margrave, she again went abroad, and died at Naples in 1823, leaving a certain reputation for literary talent, and a name in social aspects noways enviable.

ANSTER, John, LL.D., an'-ster, an eminent German scholar, and regius professor of civil law in the university of Dublin. His translations from German literature, especially that of Goethe's "Faust," have been received with great favour. Mr. Anster has also been a large contributor to periodical literature in the leading magazines. b. at Charleville, Cork, 1798.

ANSTET, Christopher, an'-ste, a fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and the author of the "New Bath Guide," which, according to the statement of Dodsley, its publisher, was the most profitable book he ever sold within a certain period of time, and on this account he afterwards restored the copyright to the author, although he had purchased it—an instance of generosity not very common among publishers. b. 1721; d. at Chippenham, 1805.

ANSTIS, John, an'-stie, an English antiquary, who obtained the appointment of Garter king-at-arms, and the post of genealogist and registrar of the Bath. a. at St. Neots, Cornwall, 1669; d. 1754.—He wrote several works illustrative of the orders of knighthood.

ANSTRUTHER, Sir John, an'-stru-ther, an eminent member of parliament, and chief justice of Bengal in 1798. b. 1753; d. 1811.

ANTAGORAS, an'-tag'-ur-as, of Rhodes, a Greek writer of epigrams and a great gourmand, so much so, that he never allowed any one but himself to prepare his favourite dish—conger eels. He was generally violent and intemperate in his conduct and language.

ANTALCIDAS, an'-tal'-id'-das, a Spartan, who is famous in history as the negotiator of the disadvantageous peace which the Lacedæmonians concluded with Persia, and by which the Greeks gave up their footing in Asia. He was afterwards employed on another mission to Artaxerxes, in which he failed, and became exposed to the contempt and derision of his countrymen. He is said to have starved himself to death. Lived about 387 B.C.

ANTAR, or ANTARAH, an'-tar, a famous poet and warrior of Arabia, who flourished about the end of the 6th century. His mother was a published in 1820. He was killed in battle by an enemy whose life he had spared, shortly subsequent to the birth of the prophet Mohammed.

ANTELME, Joseph, an'-tai-me, a French antiquary, and writer on church history, was born in 1648 at Frejus, of which place he was a canon. d. 1697.

ANTENOR, an'-el'-nor, a Trojan prince, who is said to have maintained a neutrality between the Greeks during the Trojan war, and to have betrayed Troy to the enemy.

ANTHEMIS, an'-thai'-me-os, the names of several persons of antiquity: 1. A eunuch under the emperor Arcadius, and who managed the affairs of the empire during the minority of Theodosius II. 2. An emperor of the West, who was killed by his son-in-law, Ricimer, on the sack of Rome in 472. 3. A mathematician and architect of Tralles, in Lydia, who flourished about 532 A.C.

ANTHON, Charles, LL.D., an'-thion, a well-known American classic scholar, rector of the College Grammar-school, New York. b. at New York 1797.

ANTHOINE, Antoine Ignace, an'-troin, an eminent merchant of Marseilles, who contributed largely to the establishment of the French trade in the Levant and Black Sea, for which he procured great facilities from the Russian and Turkish governments. In 1751, he was rewarded with letters of nobility by Louis XVI. a. at Ernbrun, 1749; d. at ?

ANTIGONUS I., an'-tig'-o-nus, a Macedonian captain, who, on the death of Alexander the Great, obtained the provinces of Pamphylia, Lydia, and Phrygia Major, after which his ambition led him to enlarge his territories. He finally conquered Asia. He was slain in a battle which he fought with Seleucus and Lyfmachus at Ipsus, in the 54th year of his age, 301 B.C.

ANTIGONUS GONATAS, son of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and grandson of the above, was a prince distinguished by his filial piety, and his extraordinary humanity. b. 243 or 250, B.C.

ANTIGONUS DOSON, king of Macedonia, succeeded his brother Demetrius II., defeated Cleomenes, and took the city of Sparta. He also repelled the Illyrians, who had invaded his territories. d. 221 B.C.

ANTIGONUS SOCHERS, the founder of the Jewish sect of the Sadducees, lived about 300 years B.C.

ANTINOUS, an'-tin'-o-us, a Bithynian youth, the favourite of the emperor Adrian, who erected a city to his memory, and named it Antinopolis.

ANTIOCHUS III., an'-ti'-o-kus, called the Great, king of Antioch, was the son of Seleucus Callinicus; and on the death of his brother Seleucus Ceraunus, 223 B.C., succeeded to the crown. He was defeated by Ptolemy

; but Antiar's heroism finally overcame all opposition. He is the hero of romances composed by others, and was thus not only a poet himself, but a source of inspiration to the muse of his brethren. His whole career, indeed, is represented as one continuous series of martial achievements, accomplished against various races and in very diverse circumstances, his sword and his steed participating in the fame of their owner. Sir William Jones translated one of his poems, and thus introduced the name of Antar to Europe, which has since been made familiar by the version of Mr. Terriek Hamilton,

To procure him the title of "great." On the death of Ptolemy Philopater, Antiochus recovered Palestine and Calesyria, and reduced a great part of upper Asia. At this the free cities of Greece became alarmed, and applied to the Romans for aid, while Hannibal sought the protection of Antiochus. After several embassies between the king and the republic, hostilities commenced, in which the armies of Rome under the two Scipios, were victorious, and Antiochus was forced to make an ignoble peace. b. 187 B.C.—There were several other so of Antioch of this name, who lived both before and after the above.

ANTIPATER, an-tip'-a-ter, a native of Macedon, pupil of Aristotle, and the faithful minister of Philip and Alexander. While Alexander was abroad, he left Antipater in the government of Macedon; and by his prudent management he preserved Greece tranquil. On the death of his master, Antipater obtained the European provinces. Not long after, the confederate states of Greece attacked him; but he subdued them, and subverted their democratic forms of government; on which he was called the father of Greece. His last advice to his successor was "never to allow a woman to meddle in state affairs." p. 319 b.c.—There were two other kings of this name.

ANTIPIILUS, an-ti'-fil'-us, a distinguished Greek painter, who flourished in the third century b.c. He lived in Egypt, and his works are mentioned with high praise by Quintilian and Pliny, the latter of whom enumerates many works by him which were in Rome at the time he wrote. Antiphihus was the inventor of a kind of caricatures called Grylli—grotesque monsters, part man and part animal or bird—which were in great request among the Greeks and Romans of the time.

ANTIPHON, an-ti'-fon, the Rhamnusian, an Athenian orator, and the first to lay down rules of oratory. He is said to have assisted in establishing the tyranny of the four hundred, for which he was put to death, 411 b.c.—There are sixteen orations under his name, in the collection of ancient orators. p. about b.c. 450.

ANTIQUUS, John, an-te-ku'-us, an historical painter of distinguished merit, who travelled over nearly all Europe, was everywhere received with respect, and never failed to leave monuments of his genius wherever he went. He painted with great facility in the historical branch of art, was excellent in design, and a good colourist. His principal patron was the grand duke of Tuscany, for whom he executed a fine picture of the Fall of the Giants. p. at Groningen, 1702; p. at Breda, 1750.—His brother Lambert, who generally travelled with him, was also a good painter of landscapes.

ANTISTHENES, an-tis'-the-nes, an Athenian philosopher, and founder of the sect of the Cynics. He procured Melitus to be put to death, and Anytus banished, for their persecution of Socrates. Lived 400 b.c. Of his works only a few apophthegms remain.

ANTOINETTE, Marie, mar'-e an'-toi-net, archduchess of Austria, and Queen of France, was one of the most beautiful persons of her time, as she was also one of the most unfortunate. She had a highly-cultivated mind, and in her fifteenth year was married to the son of Louis XV., afterwards Louis XVI. In 1793 she fell a victim to the fury of the French revolutionary mob. p. at Vienna, 1755; beheaded at Paris, 1793.

ANTONMARCHI, Francesco, an-tom-af'-ke, a distinguished French anatomist, and physician to Napoleon I. at St. Helena. p. at Corsica, 1780; p. at San Antonio, Cuba, 1838.

ANTONELLI, Cardinal Giacomo, an-to-nel'-e, prime minister of Pope Pius IX., in whose councils he has exercised great influence. He was raised to the dignity of a cardinal by Pius IX. in 1847. p. at Sonnino, April 2, 1806.

ANTONIA, an-to'-ne-a, the name of some eminent Roman ladies, the most remarkable of whom was the wife of Drusus, the son of Livia, and brother of Tiberius. She became mother of three children—Germanicus, Caligula's father; Claudius the emperor; and the disreputable Livia. p. about a.d. 38.

ANTONINUS, an-to-ni'-nus, surnamed Pius, on account of his great and good qualities, was adopted by the emperor Adrian, whom he succeeded. When told of conquering heroes, he said, with Scipio, "I prefer the life and preservation of one citizen to the death of a hundred enemies." His life was a scene of universal benevolence, and his last moments were easy, though preceded by a lingering illness. p. 161 a.d.—He extended the boundaries of the Roman province in Britain, and built a rampart between the friths of Clyde and Forth; but he waged no aggressive wars, and only repulsed the enemies of the empire who appeared in the field. He was succeeded by his adopted son M. Aurelius Antoninus, surnamed the Philosopher, a prince as virtuous as his predecessor. p. at Lanuvium, 36.

ANTONIO, or ANTONELLO, da Messina, an-to'-ne-o, the first Italian who painted in oil, which art he learned of John Van Eyck, in Flanders. After the death of Van Eyck he returned to Italy, and passed the remainder of his life in Venice, with the exception of eight years, from 1465 to 1473, spent in his native town. After his return to Venice he executed many paintings for the state and private persons, but his works are now very rare. p. at Messina, 1414; p. 1463.

ANTONIOZE, Cornelius, an-ton'-e-ose, a Dutch artist, who painted a large picture of his native city, Amsterdam. He also engraved on wood. p. 1500; p. 1536.

ANTONINUS, Marcus, an-to'-ne-us, a celebrated Roman orator, who was made consul, and was afterwards governor of Cilicia, where he distinguished himself by his military achievements, and obtained the honour of a triumph. After his return, he discharged the office of censor with great credit. Cicero says, that in him Rome might boast of a rival in eloquence to Greece itself. He fell in the commotions raised by Marius and Cinna, 87 b.c. p. 142.

ANTONIUS, Marcus (Mark Antony), the triumvir, was the son of M. Antonius Creticus, by Julia, a noble lady of great merit. On the death of his father, he led a very dissipated life. Afterwards he applied himself to the study of the art of war, and evinced great courage and address in restoring Ptolemy to the throne of Egypt. He next served in Gaul, under Cæsar, who enabled him to go to Rome, where he obtained the quaestorship, in which office he became very active in behalf of his patron. He assisted Cæsar in gaining the empire, for which service he was made governor of Italy, and commander of the legions, by whom he was greatly beloved on account of his liberality. Cæsar afterwards appointed him master of the horse, for his conduct at the battle of Pharsalia, and chose him as his colleague in the consulship, 44 b.c. After the death of Cæsar and the flight of his assassins, Antony began to exercise his authority in such a manner as to convince all parties that he aimed at assuming the sovereignty. To check his career, the patriots espoused the cause of Octavianus, the heir of Cæsar, when Antony retired to his government of Cisalpine Gaul, and began a civil war by laying siege to Mutina, now Modena. The consuls Hirtius and Pansa, with Octavianus, were sent against him, and though he was defeated, both consuls were slain, and Octavianus alone left at the head of a victorious army. Antony now crossed the Alps, and joined Lepidus, with whom and Octavianus he contrived to form a second triumvirate, to which Cicero fell a victim, through the personal revenge of Antony. After the defeat of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi, he went into Asia, and distinguished himself, above all other princes, by the splendour of his court. Here Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, captivated him, and he accompanied her to Alexandria, where he gave himself up to pleasure. In the mean time Octavianus, at the instigation of Fulvia, the wife of Antony, from the sea, which Augustus purchased of the people of Cos, and placed in the temple of Caesar. He was a man of wit, and much addicted to pleasure. Flourished in the beginning of the 1st century B.C.

APELLES, the founder of a sect of heretics, called by his name, who lived in the 2nd century A.D. He adopted the Manichean doctrine of the good and evil principles, and taught that the body of Christ was not composed of flesh and blood, but of air; and that as he had obtained it from the atmosphere in his descent to earth, so in his ascent it again melted into its original element.

A new division of the empire was the consequence of this alliance; the West being allotted to Octavianus, and the East to Antony, and Africa to Lepidus; but Antony, infatuated with the charms of Cleopatra, renewed his intercourse with her in a manner so shameless and undisguised, that he was deprived of his consular dignity, and war was declared against the Egyptian queen by the senate. Immense preparations were making on both sides, whilst Antony was immersed in dissipation, which destroyed his military spirit. Defeated in the battle of Actium, 31 B.C., he escaped to Alexandria, but when Octavianus appeared before that town the year following, he stabbed himself. B. about 86 B.C.

ANTONY, St., an'-to-ne, the founder of monachism, who, though born to a large estate, renounced the world, and assumed the habit of a recluse. He resided in a cell in the desert nearly twenty years, and the fame of his sanctity drew to him many followers, for whom he erected numerous monasteries. B. at Coma, Upper Egypt, 251; d. 356.—Roman Catholic writers relate many whimsical stories of the assaults which the saint encountered from evil spirits.

ANTOINE of Bourbon, king of Navarre, which title he obtained by his marriage with Jeanne d'Albret, in 1548. He was the son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendôme, and, renouncing the Protestant religion, in which he had been educated, united with the dukes of Guise and Montmorency in forming the famous Catholic league. On the breaking out of the civil war, he raised an army, and took Blois, Tours, and Rouen. At the siege of the last-mentioned place he received a wound in the shoulder, of which he died, in 1562. He left a son, who was afterwards Henry IV. (See ALBRET, JEANNE D.)

ANYTUS, an'-i-tus, a rhetorician of Athens, the enemy of Socrates. He prevailed on Aristophanes to ridicule the philosopher in a comedy, and, in conjunction with Melitus, procured his condemnation. After the death of the philosopher, the people discovered their error, when Anytus was banished, and stoned to death at Heraclea. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

APEL, Jacob, ap'-el, a Dutch artist of the 18th century. He was eminent alike in landscape, historical, and portrait painting. B. at Amsterdam 1690; d. 1761.

APELLEMAN, Barent, ap'-el-man, also a Dutch painter, was born at the Hague in 1640. He excelled in landscapes, his favourite subjects being scenes in Italy. D. 1686.

APELLES, a'-pel-es, a native of the isle of Cos, called the "Prince of Painters," much admired by Alexander the Great, who would permit no other person to paint his portrait. His most famous work was a painting of Venus rising from the sea, which Augustus purchased of the people of Cos, and placed in the temple of Caesar.

APELLICOX, a'-pel-i-con, a peripatetic philosopher, to whom the world is indebted for the works of Aristotle, which he bought at a vast price about ninety years B.C. They were afterwards seized by Sylla, and carried to Rome.

APICITS, a'-pish-e-us, the name of three celebrated Roman gluttons. The first lived under Sylla, the second under Augustus and Tiberius, and the third under Trajan. The second expended immense sums in gluttony, and was the inventor of several sorts of cakes. Finding his wealth reduced to a sum of £12,000, he, thinking he must starve, pois.

APPENDINI, Francesco, a'-pen-dee-ne, a native of Italy, who, after studying in Rome, was appointed to the chair of rhetoric in Padua, where he became a great proficient in the Slavonian language, and published a history of Ragusa, which gives an interesting account of that small republic, which existed for centuries till subverted by Napoleon I. B. 1768; d. 1837.

APPIANT, Andrea, ap'-ea-ne, by some considered the best fresco painter of the 18th century, was Napoleon's principal painter in Italy; executed frescoes in the royal palace at Milan, and in the church of Santa Maria Vergine in the same city, where they still are. He was a knight of the Iron Crown, and a member of the Legion of Honour. B. 1754; d. 1818.—There was another fresco painter of the same name, Francesco Appiani, who likewise flourished in the 18th century, whose works exhibit a vigor surpassed by few rivals. He also painted well in oils, and is said to have executed many pictures for England. B. 1702; d. 1792.

APPIANO, d', a'-pe-a'-no, an Italian family, which in the middle ages rose to sovereign rank, as princes of Pisa, and afterwards of Piombino and Elba. In the latter part of the 14th century, Jacopo d'Appiano, after killing the chief magistrate of Pisa, assumed the title of lord of that city, and was afterwards deposed in his usurpation by Gian Galeazzo Visconti, duke of Milan. Jacopo died in 1393, when his son Gherardo sold Pisa to the duke of Milan, and reserved for himself the sovereignty of Piombino and Elba. The family retained possession of these states for some generations, till they were dispossessed of them by the Spaniards in 1589. The fiefs ultimately passed to the family of Buoncompagni of Rome, which held them till the French revolutionary invasion. Napoleon, on making himself emperor, bestowed the principality of Piombino on his brother-in-law, Felix Baciocchi.

Danube, and other structures. B. at Damascus. Lived in the second century.

APOLLODORUS, a famous painter at Athens, who flourished B.C. 498. He was outshone by , which he greatly lamented in a poem.

APOLLONIO, Jacopo, ap'ol-on-e-o, an Italian, who painted some fine pictures for the churches of Bassano, his native city, where he was born in 1584; d. 1674.

AQUILA, Pompei del, ä-que'-la, so named from the place of his birth, who painted sacred pieces in a very grand manner. His principal work, a descent from the cross, has been engraved. Flourished about 1580.

AQUINAS, St. Thomas, ä äs, called the "Angel Doctor," was the son of a noble Italian Friar at Nepl society of Preaching inclination of his parents. After teaching divinity in various universities, he settled at Naples, and obtained a pension from the king. He refused the archbishopric of Naples, which was offered him by Pope Clement IV. B. in the style of Aquino, Italy, 1227; d. at the monastery of Fossanova, near Terracina, 1274.—The authority of Aquinas has always been very high in the Roman church, and he was canonized in 1323. His works made 17 vols. folio, and have been printed several times at different places.

ARAGO, François Jean Dominique, a-ra'-go, a distinguished French mathematician, astronomer, and man of science, who, in the "History of his Youth," has given a detailed narrative of his adventures up to his 22nd year. From 1812 to 1846 he lectured in Paris, on astronomy and kindred subjects, and was pronounced by the French emperor, Louis Napoleon, to be not only "the grand high-priest of science, but able to initiate the vulgar into its mysteries." In conjunction with Gay-Lussac, he established the "Annales de Chimie et de Physique," a valuable serial still continued; and throughout his life prosecuted scientific discovery with unwearied effort. Amongst his other discoveries may be here recorded that of a neutral point in the polarization of the atmosphere, and the suggestion of a positive proof of the theory of undulations, which has since been established by Foucault. B. near Perpignan, 1786; d. at Paris, 1853.—Arago was a determined republican, played a prominent part in the revolution of 1848, and refused to take the oath of allegiance after the coup-d'état of 1852, and gave his reasons in a spirited letter to the government. Louis Napoleon was then the prince-president, and he, to his honour, caused his minister to write, that "a special exception would be made in favour of a philosopher whose labours had rendered France illustrious, and whose existence the government would be loath to sadden."

ARALDI, Alexander, är-ä'-de, an artist of Italy, was born at Parma, and was a pupil of G. Bellini. There is at Parma a picture of the Annunciation by him, which has been greatly admired. He died in 1528.

ARAM, Eugene, är-am, a self-educated Yorkshireman, who, by persevering industry, obtained a knowledge of the mathematics, and an extensive acquaintance with the Latin and Greek languages, together with the Hebrew and Chaldee. In 1744 he taught Latin and writing at a school in London; and after passing many years in apparent innocence, in 1758 he was apprehended at Lynn, for the murder of Daniel Clark, a shoemaker of Knaresborough, perpetrated thirteen years before. He was brought to trial in 1759, and made an admirable defence, but was found guilty; and the next morning confessed his crime, alleging that he was prompted to it through a suspicion of Clarke's having a criminal intercourse with his wife. Executed at York, 1759.—The history of this person has suggested one of the most interesting of Sir Bulwer Lytton's novels. B. 1704.

ARANDA, Don Pedro Pablo Abarea de Bolea, count of, a-ran'-da, a distinguished Spanish statesman of the 18th century. He abolished the order of the Jesuits, and greatly diminished the power of the Inquisition. In 1773, to avoid ruin, he got himself appointed ambassador to Paris, where he remained till 1784. In 1792 he became the prime minister of Charles IV., but through the intrigues of a rival, the infamous Godoy, was soon afterwards dismissed. B. in Aragon about 1718; d. 1794 or 1799.

ARATJO D'AZEVEDO, Antonio, a-rau'-yo, a Portuguese statesman, who devoted more time to literature and science than to politics, and thereby incapacitated himself for conducting with success the affairs of his country. In 1806, when Napoleon I. declared that the house of Braganza had ceased to reign, he made his escape to Brazil, whither he took his mineralogical collection and a printing apparatus which he had imported from London. This was the first printing-press that had been seen in Rio Janeiro, where he began to busy himself with scientific pursuits. Whilst thus engaged, however, he felt severely the disgrace under which he lay on account of his political errors. Accordingly, he wrote to the prince regent, defending his conduct against some assertions of his calumniators. He received a gracious reply, and in 1815 was created Count da Barca. He finally became sole minister in Brazil. B. at Ponte de Lima, 1752; d. at Rio Janeiro, 1817.

ARANTICUS, Julius Cesar, a-ran'-she-us, a distinguished anatomist, was professor at Bologna for 32 years, and published several works, embodying the results of his investigations in physiology and kindred themes. B. 1530; d. 1589.

ARATUS, a-rai'-tus, a Greek poet, whose poem entitled "Phenomena," still extant, shows him to have been also an astronomer. B. in Cilicia, about 300 B.C.

ARATUS of Sicyon, son of Cleinias, who by his activity, established the Achaean league, and recovered Corinth from Antigonos of Macedon, but afterwards became the friend and counsellor of Antigonos and his successor, Philip, at whose instigation Aratus was ultimately poisoned. B. 271; d. 213 B.C. He wrote commentaries on his own transactions.

ARBACES, är'-ba-sees, the Mede, who revolted against Sardanapalus, and afterwards headed the confederation of kingdoms formed on the destruction of the Assyrian empire. His revolt occurred about 820 B.C.

ARBASTA, Cesare, är-bai'-se-a, an Italian, who visited Spain, and painted the ceiling of the cathedral at Cordova. He worked chiefly in fresco, and copied the style of Leonardo da Vinci. B. about 1620.

ARBLAX, Madame d'. (See BURNET.)

ARBOGAST, Louis François Antoine, är-bo-gast, a French mathematician, who in 1800 published his great work called the "Calcul des Derivations," a production which has been the means of throwing much light on the connexion of various parts of analysis. B. 1759; d. 1803.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Arborio

ARBORIO, Mercurino, ar-bor'-e-o, a faithful adviser and chancellor of Charles V. of Spain. Although a Catholic in his sentiments, he was the advocate of mild measures, and never lost the confidence of his great master. He became a cardinal, and throughout his career exercised considerable influence upon the affairs of Germany. b. at Vercelli, Piedmont, 1485; d. at Innsbruck, 1530.

ARBORIO, Æmilius Magnus, ar-bo'-re-us, a scholar who lived in the time of the emperor Constantine, who entrusted him with the task of educating one of his sons. He had the reputation of being one of the most eloquent men of his time; but of this we cannot judge, as his works have perished. d. at Constantinople 335 A.D.

ARBRISSSEL, Robert d', dar-bres'-sel, a famous French ecclesiastic who flourished in the eleventh century, was the founder of the Abbey of Fontevrault, and of the religious order so called, and celebrated as one of the most eloquent preachers the Catholic church has produced. Pope Urban II. gave him permission to preach "per universum mundum," a privilege of which he was not slow to avail himself, as he went about from one place to another preaching, and was everywhere followed by immense crowds. Scandalous imputations have been cast upon him and the community at Fontevrault in consequence of the mixture of the sexes which formed a feature of the order; but those imputations appear to be unfounded. Robert d'Arbrissel was born at the village of the same name, near Rennes, in 1047; founded Fontevrault Abbey in 1103; and d. about 1104 or 1105.

ARBUTHNOT, Alexander, ar-buth'-not, a distinguished Scottish divine, who was principal of the University of Aberdeen, and took an active part in the settlement of the church of Scotland after the Reformation. He was twice moderator of the General Assembly, and was prominent in all discussions connected with church matters. He edited Buchanan's History of Scotland in 1582, which gave great offence to James VI., who ordered him not to quit Aberdeen, lest he should too much sway the councils of the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh in that year. He was well versed in law, which he had studied in France, besides divinity, philosophy, and the mathematics. He was a son of Baron Arbuthnot. b. 1533; d. 1583.

ARBUTHNOT, John, a celebrated writer and physician, educated at Aberdeen, and, coming to London, supported himself by teaching the mathematics. Accidentally administering relief to Prince George of Denmark at Epsom, he became physician to his royal highness, and in 1709 was appointed physician in ordinary to Queen Anne. He engaged with Pope and Swift in a scheme to write a satire on the abuse of human learning, under the title of "Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus," but the death of the queen put an end to the project and deprived the world of some ingenious performances. b. at Arbuthnot, near Montrose, Scotland, 1675; d. in London, 1735.—Arbuthnot was the author of several other performances, partly of a satirical and political character, and others in connexion with natural history, the mathematics, &c.; but his principal work is one entitled "Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures." It is said he was one of the greatest wits of his time, that his humour was generally without any mixture of ill-nature, being a most humane and amiable man. He at one time attempted to settle as a physician at Doncaster, then celebrated for its salubrity, but met with small success; and on being seen galloping out of the town, replied to an inquiry as to whether he was going, "To leave this confounded place, where I can neither live nor die." He was intimate with all the prominent men of his time—wits, scholars, and politicians—and was esteemed by all.

ARBUTHNOT, Mariot, a British admiral, said to be a nephew of Dr. John Arbuthnot mentioned above, was born in 1711, and was principally engaged in connection with the American War of Independence, in which he commanded the British fleet on the station for some time, and in that capacity led the naval forces at the capture of Charleston, South Carolina, in 1781. In March of the same year, admiral Arbuthnot fought an action with the French fleet off Cape Virgiana, the indecisive result of which has caused his conduct to be much criticised, and his tactics severely condemned. He shortly afterwards returned to England, struck his flag, and was not again employed during the war. d. in London, 1794.

ARC. (See JOAN OF ARC.)

ARC, Philip Auguste de ste Foix, Chevalier d', dark, an illegitimate son of the Comte de Thoulouse, author of two works, both of which are incomplete—namely, "Histoire Générale des Guerres," and "Histoire du Commerce et de la Navigation des Anciens et des Modernes." d. 1779.

ARCADIO, Jean Francois, ar-ka'-de-o, a physician of the seventeenth century, who was a native of Piedmont, and wrote some works in which he recommended venesection in pleurisy and other diseases—a school of practice which still obtains among his countrymen of the chirological profession, although generally abandoned in other parts of Europe.

ARCADIUS, Emperor, ar-ka'-de-us, eldest son of Theodosius the Great and Flacilla, was born in 377 A.D., and began to reign in 395. He was a weak and vicious prince, who was equally ungainly in person as unamiable in disposition. But for his association with the dismemberment of the empire, and with the histories of Alaric, Chrysostom, Rufinus, and Stilicho, Arcadius would be utterly unworthy of notice. He was governed by successive favourites, under whose counsels jealousy and distrust were excited between the Western and Eastern portions of the empire. Such men as St. Chrysostom were persecuted, turmoil and bloodshed were common in the streets of Constantinople, morals were in a wretched condition, and the Goths obtained that power, importance, and discipline, which afterwards made them so dangerous to the state. Arcadius died in 408, aged 31, leaving behind him the reputation of a man who was only saved from being an utter fool by the fact that a large element of knavery had a place in his disposition.

ARCAÑO, Mauro d', dar-ka'-no, a celebrated Italian burlesque poet. b. about 1490; d. at Rome, through a fall while hunting, 1536.

ARCEBE, Louis Étienne, ar-sai'-rai, author of a history of Rochelle and the Pays d'Aunis, an Apology for the Revolution in Corsica in 1790, was born at Marseilles in 1698, and died at Rochelle in 1782.

deny every proposition, was the son of Sentes or Seythes, and was born at Pitene in Eolia. He was in the habit of disputing every side of a question, but was so agreeable a speaker, was so handsome in person and pleasing in manners, that he was liked by all sects, and it has been said of him, it was equally difficult to resist the fascinations of his eloquence and the attractions of his person. It was said of him that while he denied every good principle, he practised every good deed, and yet refused to admit that there was, or could be, anything either positively good or positively bad. He was a great admirer of Homer, from reading whose works he imbibed some taste for poetry, though it does not appear that he composed anything besides a few epigrams. He was born 316 B.C., and died 211, from immoderate indulgence in wine.—There were several others of the same name—writers, sculptors, painters, &c., but none of special prominence.

ARCEOT, Jean d', ar-sé-ot, a French natural philosopher, who was the first to prove, by experiment, the perfect combustibility of the diamond. He was also the inventor of a metallic alloy, of which stereotypes are sometimes made and to which his name is frequently given. He gave great attention to the study of minerals, and succeeded in producing a porcelain equal to the best of China and Japan. b. at Douzait, 1725; d. at Paris, 1801. He became inspector of the Gobelins tapestry manufacture, and also of the public mint; and in the manufacture of the former, as well as in that of porcelain, suggested several improvements.

ARCHIDAMIA, ark-e-da-me-a a Spartan woman, who, on the approach of Pyrrhus, and when the senate had decreed that the women should be sent to Crete, seized a sword, rushed to the senate house, and declaring that the women would not survive the ruin of their country, but would fight and die in its defence as well as the men, procured the repeal of the decree, and afterwards took an active part in defence of the city.

ARCHILOCHUS, ar-kil-o-kus, a Greek satirist, son of a slave named Epion. By some he is said to be the inventor of iambic verse. b. in the Isle of Paros, about 720 B.C. Most of his writings are lost.

ARCHIMIDES, ar-ki-me'-dees, the greatest of the Greek mathematicians, said to have been related to Hiero, king of Syracuse. He boasted, that if he had a place to fix his machines, he would move the earth, which may be regarded as a figure of speech, indicative of his faith in the power of levers, &c. The story of the manner in which he discovered the fraud of the jeweller who made the crown of Hiero is too well known to require repetition here. He is said amongst other ingenious mechanical contrivances to have made a glass machine, which represented the motions of the heavenly bodies. He is also said to have made burning-glasses, which destroyed ships at a great distance. When Marcellus besieged Syracuse, 212 B.C., Archimedes contrived a variety of machines for annoying the enemy; and when the place was taken, the Roman commander gave strict orders that the house and person of the philosopher should be respected. He was, however, slain by a soldier, while he was deeply engaged in solving a geometrical problem, and inattentive to the noise occasioned by the taking of the city. b. at Syracuse about 287 B.C.; slain 212 B.C.—Several of his works are extant; but some of the most valuable are lost. When Cicero was questor in Sicily, he discovered Archimedes' tomb, with an inscription upon it.

ARCHELAUS, ar-ke-la-us, an Athenian philosopher, was born at Miletus, and after studying under Anaxagoras, became, as some assert, the teacher of Socrates. He introduced into Athens what was called the physical philosophy of Ionia, according to the doctrines of which heat and cold, accompanied by, or proceeding from, moisture, were the principles of creation; he also maintained that animal life originally emanated from the earth in a mud-like substance; and in morals, his doctrine was that right and wrong were not essential in nature, but were the product of human laws.—There was also of this name a geographer, who was the author of a description of the regions visited by Alexander the Great; several kings of Macedon, Egypt, Cappadocia, &c.; a tetrarch of Judea, son of Herod the Great; a bishop of Casarea, Mesopotamia, of the third century; a sculptor of Priene in the time of Clandius; and an Egyptian of the third century B.C., who wrote, in Greek verse, a book or poem on the wonders of Natural History, and which he dedicated to Ptolemy.

ARCHDALL, Mervyn, arch'-dal, an Irish protestant divine and antiquary, was born in Dublin in 1723. In 1738, he published his "Monasticon Hibernicum," containing an epitome of the results of 40 years' study of records connected with ecclesiastical foundations in Ireland. He also edited an enlarged edition of Lodge's Peerage. d. 1791.

ARCHELIX, Richard, arch'-de-kin, a celebrated Irish Jesuit, was born at Kilkenny in 1619. He was the author of various works which were very popular, and some of which reached a 10th and 12th edition, and of which from 15,000 to 20,000 copies were circulated—which, for the time, may well be deemed wonderful. His Essay on Miracles, and a Treatise on Universal Theology, were in especial request. He died at Antwerp in 1690.

ARCHENHOLZ, Johann Wilhelm von, ark'-en-holtz, a voluminous German author and journalist, was born near Dantzic in 1745, and after serving some time in the Prussian army, from which he was dismissed for his immoderate passion for gambling, he travelled over the greater part of Europe, and ultimately settled in his native country, residing at Dresden, Leipsic, Berlin, and Hamburg, and devoting himself to literary labour. He was very successful and popular, both in various journals which he conducted and in the numerous books which he wrote. His "England and Italy" has been translated into almost every language of Europe; this was followed by the "Annals of British History" from 1788; by a History of the Seven Years' War; a History of Queen Elizabeth, the Conspiracy of Fiesco, the Life of Sixtus V., History of the Baccaniers, and a history of Gustavus Vasa of Sweden. Archenholz likewise translated Orme's History into German, but in this undertaking he was not very successful; and for twenty years before his death he was mainly engaged in political writing in his capacity of editor of the "Minerva," a journal which he commenced in 1792 and continued till 1812, and the pages of which are a most valuable record of the occurrences of the time. d. near Hamburg, in 1812, in his 67th year.

ARCHER, Sir Simon, arch'-er, an antiquary of the sixteenth century, who prepared a large collection of papers connected with the local history of Warwickshire, which were afterwards made use of by Sir William Dugdale, of whom Sir Simon Archer was the friend and patron when Sir William was first beginning his researches. Sir Simon was born in 1581; knighted by James I. in 1624. The date of his death is not known.

ARCHER, Thomas, an English architect of the eighteenth century, was a pupil of Sir John Vanbrugh, and erected several churches and other edifices which show considerable taste and skill, but the style of some of which—such as the church of St. John the Evangelist at Westminster—has been a good deal criticised unfavourably.

ARCHIAS, A. Licinius, ark'-e-as, a native of Antioch, where he was born in the latter part of the second century B.C., afterwards settled in Rome, where he had as pupils Lucius and Marcus Laeullus, Cicero, and the greater part of the most distinguished youth of the "Eternal city." He possessed considerable talents as a poet, and was eminent as a teacher of eloquence and rhetoric. When advanced in life, his right to the citizenship of Rome being questioned, Cicero delivered an oration in his behalf. The date of his death is not ascertained, but he was living in 61 B.C.

ARCHYTAS, ark'-i'-tas, of Tarentum, the eighth occupant of the chair of Pythagoras, was the master of Plato. He was a man of great and varied learning, and also of some mechanical genius; one invention attributed to him—namely, an automaton which was made to fly by means of air enclosed within it—would imply that Archytas was acquainted with gas, and that this device was the forerunner of the modern balloon.

ARCO, Alonzo del, ar'-ko, a deaf and dumb Spanish artist, who acquired considerable reputation as a painter of historical pieces and portraits. B. 1625; d. 1700.

ARCO, Nicolas, Count of, a Latin poet of the sixteenth century, the son of Count Oderic, privy councillor to the Emperor Maximilian, was a native of Arco in the Tyrol, where he was born in 1479. He was learned in all the ancient languages, and could speak most modern ones with fluency. He lived on terms of intimacy with all the eminent men of his time, and died about 1546, his Latin poems having been given to the world in the same year, and reprinted at Padua in 1739.

ARCOX, Jean Claude', dar'-kawng, a French military engineer, who planned the floating batteries with which Gibraltar was attacked, when commanded by General Elliot, on the 13th of September, 1782. He afterwards served in the French army at the time of the Revolution, and took a part in the conquest of Holland. B. in Franche Comté, 1733; d. near Auteuil, 1800.

ARCONS, Cæsar d', dar'-kawng, a French advocate who composed some works on the laws which govern the tides, on longitude, on the Apocalypse, apostolic traditions, &c. D. in 1681.

ARCY, Patrick d', darey, an author, and soldier of fortune, was descended from an ancient family of Galway, in Ireland, where he was born in 1725. He received his education in France, in the armies of which country he served during several campaigns in Flanders and Germany, besides being present in the expedition sent to the assistance of Prince Charles in 1746, when he was taken prisoner, but released by the English Government. His principal works are—"An Essay on Artillery;" "On the Theory and Practice of Artillery;" "On the Theory of the Moon;" "On a New Theory of Artillery," &c. He died in 1778, and Comberston pronounced his eulogy.

ARDEX, Edward, ar'-den, a scion of an old Warwickshire family, and the ward and son-in-law of Sir George Threlkington of Conington, who was concerned in a plot against Queen Elizabeth, for which he was executed in Smithfield in 1583. D. at Parkhall, Warwickshire, 1531.

ARDEX, Richard Pepper, first Lord Alvanley, was the second son of John Arden of Brocton, Stockport, at which place he was born in 1745. After receiving the basis of his education at the Manchester grammar-school, he in 1763 entered Trinity College, Cambridge, as a gentleman commoner. He here received the prize for declamation, was 12th wrangler in 1766, and was shortly afterwards elected a Fellow of his college. While resident at Cambridge, he revised the statutes of Trinity College; and having entered himself at the Middle Temple was called to the bar 1769; he practised in the Court of Chancery, went the northern circuit, and was appointed recorder of Macclesfield even before he had acquired any name at the bar. He gradually though slowly rose into notice, was appointed a Welsh judge, and in 1790 obtained his silk gown. Mr. Arden was appointed Solicitor-general under the Shelburne Ministry, in 1792; and, in February of the following year, was elected member of parliament for the borough of Newtown, Isle of Wight. In defending the Government from the attacks of Fox and Lord North, then acting in concert, Mr. Arden showed himself capable of doing good service, but had but a brief opportunity at that time of proving his capacity for official life, as, along with the Ministry, he resigned, after being in office little more than a month. He now took an active part in opposition, exerting himself to defeat Fox's India Bill; and when Pitt was called to power, Arden resumed his office of Solicitor-general. He was made Attorney-general in 1784; Master of the Rolls in 1788, on Lord Kenyon's removal to the King's Bench, which office he continued to hold till 1801, when he succeeded Lord Eldon as Chief-justice of the Common Pleas, and was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Alvanley of Alvanley, Cheshire. He married in 1784, Anne Dorothea, daughter of Richard Wilbraham Bootle, Esq., and sister of Lord Skelmersdale, by whom he had three sons and four daughters. He was not distinguished as an orator, though he was an effective and occasionally a vigorous speaker; he also acquitted himself creditably on the bench, and was very popular in society, being of an amiable disposition though of somewhat hasty temper. He was much esteemed by both Pitt and Byron, whose friendship he enjoyed for several years. D. 1804.

ARDEEN, John, ar'-dern, an eminent English surgeon of the 14th century, who was the means of superseding the use of the cautery in cases of fistula, as practised by Albucasis, and introduced incision in its stead. He wrote in Latin several works on surgery, that on fistula having been translated into English and published in 1588; he also invented a syringe for the administration of clysters, which were scarcely known in this country in his day; and is considered as the earliest to introduce into England a rational system of practice in surgery.

ARDICINI, Louis, ar-de-che'-ne, a native of

THE DICTIONARY

Arduinus

Padua, where he was born in 1739, is distinguished for his writings on agriculture, of which he was a professor, as colleague to his father, in his native city. When Napoleon offered a prize for a substitute for the sugar-cane, Ardicini pointed out that an abundant supply of sugar might be extracted from the holcus-capor. p. 1833. His principal works are—"Elements of Agriculture;" "On Bees;" "Cultivation of Dye Plants;" "On Technical Terms in Agriculture," &c.

ARDVINUS, ar-dob'-e-nus, Marquis of Ivrea, elected by the Italians king of Italy, on the death of Otto III., in 1002, at the same time that the Germans elected the duke of Bavaria, who under the title of Henry II., claimed all the rights enjoyed by the Ottos in Italy. Arduinus, finding himself unable to maintain his pretensions, took the monastic habit in the year 1015, and died within the year.

ARENDT, Martin Frederick, ar'-end, a Danish antiquary, as distinguished for his eccentricity as for his learning, which was immense; but as he kept no record of his acquisitions, all the vast stores he had accumulated perished with him. He was in the habit of travelling on foot all over the north, and of taking up his quarters wherever he happened to find it convenient, without consulting the wishes or circumstances of his hosts. This led to several awkward dilemmas—he having on one occasion been smoked out of a house, and on another forcibly ejected. In later years he came to Paris, and from thence journeyed in his old fashion into Spain, Germany, Italy, again to the north, and in 1824, when on a visit to Italy, he was arrested on suspicion of being an emissary of the German carbonari, a suspicion which the Italic and other inscriptions he had about him, together with the resemblance of his name to that of Arndt, author of the "Spirit of the Age," so far confirmed that he was detained in prison at Naples till his death. While in Paris, Arendt was taken care of by Malté-Bran, who wished him to settle down and arrange the stores of learning he had collected; but such was the restless and rambling disposition of the man, that he soon set off again, preferring to roam in search of knowledge and live on alms, to enjoying quiet and ease. p. at Altona, 1769; p. 1824.

ARE FRÖDI, or AREUS POLYHISTOR, as he is called in Latin, ar'-frod, a native of Iceland, was the first who reduced the history of his country to writing, making use of the traditionary materials which were handed down from generation to generation in Iceland with great care; he also wrote from personal observation of important events, for, having been born in 1068, within about 60 years of the introduction of Christianity, he was almost contemporary with occurrences of the greatest moment. He was a relative of Rollo, who led the Northmen into France; and Sæmund, the author of the older "Edda," was his schoolfellow, both in boyhood and in youth, they having studied together at Cologne for three years. Are was the author of a large and compendious history of the kings of Norway, England, and Denmark, which unfortunately is lost; but a shorter one, either an outline or an abridgment of the other, is in existence, and has been several times printed—once at the Sheldonian press, Oxford, with a paraphrase, notes, &c., by Wormius, afterwards bishop of Zealand. Are likewise wrote a grammar, and, in conjunction with Thorald, master of Runes, arranged and fixed the letters of the Danish alphabet. He is also said to have composed a work on Runic literature.

Aresas

ARETUS, ar-ai'-e-us, of Alexandria, a Stoic philosopher, and one of the preceptors of Octavius Cæsar, who treated him with great favour, called him his friend, and, on capturing the city of Alexandria, publicly declared that he spared it from pillage partly because it was the birthplace of Aretus.

ARELLIUS, ar-el'-e-us, a Roman painter of celebrity who flourished shortly before the reign of Augustus. His pictures were ordered by the senate to be removed from the temples, because the goddesses were portraits of the most beautiful courtezans of the day, and this circumstance, it was considered, desecrated the sacred places.

AREMBERG, Leopold Philippe Charles Joseph d', dar'-em-berg, governor of Hainault, and duke of Aershot and Croi, was born in 1690, at Mous. His father, who was killed at Peterwardein, was captain-general of the emperor's guards, and these circumstances opened a ready way to a military career for Leopold, who entered the army young, was wounded at Malplaquet, and by his services and courage raised himself to the highest honours. During the campaign of 1716-17, he was major-general of the emperor's armies in Hungary; was wounded at the siege of Temesvar; contributed materially to gaining the battle of Belgrade, where he commanded the right wing; was made governor of Rome in 1719; served in the campaign on the Rhine under prince Eugene in 1733; was made field-marshal and commander-in-chief in the Low Countries in 1743; and was wounded at Dettingen in 1747. He was distinguished for his patronage of letters as well as for his military achievements. p. 1754.

AREMBERG, Auguste Marie Raymond d', prince of long known as Count de la Marck, was grandson of the above, and was born in 1753. He commanded a German regiment in the French service, and did duty with it in India. On his return to France, he embraced the ideas of the Revolution, became the friend of Mirabeau, who appointed him one of his executors; he was a member of the States-general and of the National Assembly, but becoming disgusted with the revolutionary party, he went over to the Court, which he assisted in its negotiations with Mirabeau. He subsequently left France, and joined the Austrian army as major-general, but was never employed in military service, being transferred to the department of diplomacy. In 1814, on the establishment of the kingdom of Holland and Belgium, he became a lieutenant-general of the army of the new monarch, an office he continued to hold till the Belgian revolution of 1830, when he retired, and died in 1833.

ARENA, Joseph and Barthelmi, ar-ai'-na, natives of Corsica, who were accused of conspiring against Napoleon, for which Joseph and some others were condemned to death. Barthelmi always denied the charge made against him—that of attempting to stab Bonaparte while dissolving the Council of Five Hundred, of which he was a member, on the 18th Brumaire. p. in obscurity in 1829.

ARESAS, ar-re'-sas, a Pythagorean philosopher of Lucania, who wrote a Treatise on the Nature of Man, only one small fragment of which has been preserved.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Areskin

ARESKIN, or ERSKINE, Robert, er'-skin, a native of Scotland, who, after studying at Oxford, and taking the degree of M.D., went to Russia, and became the principal physician to Peter the Great, who held him in high estimation as well for his eminent professional abilities as the excellence of his disposition and the agreeableness of his manners. Russia was indebted to him for the introduction of many excellent measures for promoting the study of the various branches of the healing art, and rescuing its practice from the hands of ignorance and incompetence.

ARETÆUS, ar-ai'-te-us, of Cappadocia, a distinguished physician of antiquity, but of whose life so little is known that the period when he lived is uncertain, though supposed to be the first century A.D. He has left several works on medical subjects, which are of great excellence, and excite keen regret that others which he mentions as having been written by him are lost. Those of his writings which are extant have been reprinted in many parts of Europe, and translated into several languages, and have afforded a subject for notes, commentaries, and dissertations to not a few learned members of the profession—the edition by Boerhaave, published in 1735, being deemed the best.

ARETINO, Pietro, a'-rai-te'-no, an Italian man of letters, called by his literary admirers the "Divine," and by his political, the "Scourge of Princes." His fame rests upon nothing either great or worthy, he having led a most disreputable life, and written still more disreputable verses, although he was patronized by Francis I. of France, by some of the Medici family, and corresponded with Titian, Tasso, and Michael Angelo. b. at Arezzo, 1492; d. at Venice, 1557.

ARETINO, Spinello, a celebrated Italian painter, who executed several works in fresco and distemper for the monasteries of San Miniato and Monte Oliveto, near Florence, and San Bernardo, at Arezzo. b. at Arezzo, 1316; d. about 1400.—He has been esteemed equal to Giotto in design, and his superior in execution.

ARETUS, Benedict, ar-ai'-she-us, a distinguished divine and botanist, was born at Berne in the early part of the sixteenth century, became a teacher of theology, and preacher in connexion with the reformed religionists at Marburg, and died at Berne in 1574. As a botanist, his skill was held in high regard; he discovered and catalogued about forty new Alpine plants.

ARETUSI, Cesare, ar-ai-too'-se, an Italian artist who attained a good eminence as a portrait painter, but whose vanity cost him the friendship of his best patron, the Duke of Ferrara. The duke had employed him to execute the portrait of a lady who could not be induced to sit, but whose likeness he wished to possess. The artist successfully executed the portrait by stealth, but was so pleased with his work that he showed it to some friends, contrary to the express wish of the duke; and the secret getting wind, the lady and the patron were alike exasperated, and poor Aretusi was at first condemned to death, but ultimately banished from Ferrara. He so closely imitated Correggio that pictures by him have been mistaken for those of that master. Flourished in the beginning of the 17th century.

AREZZO, Cardinal, ar-aid'-jo, who after being sent on a mission to Russia with the view of effecting a reconciliation between the Roman and the Greek Churches, which project broke down in consequence of the death of the emperor Paul, was consulted by Napoleon as to certain designs which the latter entertained against the sovereignty of the Pope. Arezzo turned the information thus communicated to the advantage of the pope, and consequently fell under the displeasure of Napoleon, who had him arrested at Florence and confined for a time in Corsica. He was made a cardinal in 1815, vice-chancellor of the church in 1830, and died in 1833. He was a native of Tuscany, having been born at Orbitello, in 1758.

ARPE, ar'-fai, the name of two celebrated silversmiths of Spain, who designed and executed some of the most splendid tabernacles of the Spanish cathedrals. Lived in the 16th century.

ARGAND, Aimé, ar'-günd, a native of Switzerland, who invented the kind of lamp which bears his name. b. at Geneva, 1782; d. 1803.

ARGELANDER, Frederick William Augustus, ar-je-lan'-der, an eminent modern astronomer, who superintended, for five years, the observatory at Abo, Finland. On its being destroyed by fire in 1823, he undertook the erection of another at Helsingfors. In 1837 he was appointed professor of astronomy at Bonn University. b. 1799.—He has written on his peculiar science with great success.

ARGENSOLA, ar-jen'-so-la, two brothers of which name—Lupercio and Bartholomew—were distinguished in the literary history of Spain. Lupercio was a dramatist, poet, and historian; in the latter capacity he filled the office of historiographer of Aragon, in which he was succeeded by his brother Bartholomew, who was eminent as a writer in history, poetry, and theology. Lupercio was born 1565, and died 1613; Bartholomew lived from 1566 till 1631.

ARGENTÆ, Bertrand d', dar-jong-tré, a French historian, who wrote a history of Brittany, together with an account of the customs of that province, and other works. He was seneschal of Rennes, in which office he succeeded his father. His collected works were published at Paris between 1603 and 1612. b. 1519; d. 1590.

A, Charles Duplessis d', bishop of Tulle, and author of several theological and other works, was born near Vitry, in the year 1673, and died in 1740.

ARGHUN-KHAN, ar'-goon-kan, a Mogul Khan of Persia, who greatly favoured the Christians and Jews, his principal minister for many years having been a physician belonging to the latter people. Arghun at one time intended to have led an army into Arabia to overturn the Mohammedan religion and convert the Kaaba into a Christian church, but an attack of illness and the murder of his Jewish minister prevented the execution of the project. He was thanked by Pope Nicholas IV. for the favour he showed the Christians, but was detested as a tyrant by the Mohammedans. d. soon after the murder of his minister, Saad-ed-Daulah, 1290 A.D.

ARGENSON, Mark René le Voyer, marquis d', darzh-en-song, an Italian who in the reign of Louis XIV. was appointed lieutenant-general of the police in Paris, and was the first to introduce lettres-de-cachet in the police. In 1719 he was made chancellor, in the room of d'Aguesseau, but the year following he was deprived of all his places. b. at Venice, 1652; d. at Paris, 1721.

ARGOLLO Giovanni, ar-ol-lo an Italian remarkable for the prompt publication of a poem on the subversion was fifteen years of age, and within another entitled "Eudymion," in two which he wrote in seven months, and was very popular. He subsequently law, and was a teacher of literature at B. 1793; D. about 1800.

ARGYLE, CAMPBELLS, lords of, This family trace its descent from an of their name, who, in the 12th cent married with the daughter of a Highland chief and had for her dowry the lordship of Loe Awe, in Argyleshire. From that time the name has, more or less, taken a distinguished part in public affairs, and several of its members risen to historical celebrity. The most notable of these are the following:—

ARGYLE, Archibald Campbell, ma he was amongst the most zealous and bravest of the partisans of the cause of the C.

He took arms against King Charles I., and in 1611 commanded the army sent against Montrose, whom he proclaimed a traitor, and for whose head he offered a reward of £20,000. He subsequently took the leading part in the Scottish installation of Charles II., on whose head, on 1st January, 1651, he placed the crown at Scone, previous to the battle of Worcester. He afterwards submitted to Cromwell, and sat in the parliament of his son Richard as member for Aberdeenshire. For these acts he was, at the Restoration, indicted for high treason, convicted, and beheaded in Edinburgh, 1661. A. 1588.

ARGYLE, Archibald, earl of, son of the above, was a resolute and brave adherent of the royal cause, and so well known for the staunchness of his loyalty that he was excepted by Cromwell from the general pardon which he granted in 1651. In 1652 he was indicted for treason, and condemned to suffer death, on account of his opposition to the measures of the duke of York; but he made his escape from prison, disguised as a page, in the train of his Lady Sophia Lindsay, and fled to Rotterdam, however, in the April of 1655, he made a descent into Argyleshire at the head of a considerable force, but was made prisoner. On the 3rd of June of the same year, on a single day's notice, he was executed at Edinburgh on his former sentence.

ARGYLE, John, second duke of, was the grandson of the above, whose father was created a duke by William III. The subject of our notice distinguished himself equally as a statesman and a soldier. In 1705 he was created an English peer by the titles of Baron Chatham and Earl of Greenwich, for his efforts in furthering the union of Scotland and England. As a brigadier-general he fought at the famous battle of Ramillies, and greatly distinguished himself at Oudenarde and Malplaquet, as well as at the sieges of Ostend, Menen, Lisle, Ghent, and Tournay. On the accession of the Hanoverian family to the throne, he was appointed commander-in-chief of all the king's forces in Scotland, and in 1715 displayed great energy and decision in suppressing the rebellion in Scotland, popularly known in the north as "Mar's rising." He held several offices, of which he was deprived by Sir Robert Walpole, but to which he was again restored on the fall of that minister. B. 1678; D., without issue, 1743.

Arion

With his death his English titles became extinct.

ARVAT, George John Douglas Campbell, eighth duke of, early in life took an active part in the controversies raging between religious parties in Scotland, and in a pamphlet recommended the abolition of lay patronage in the church. Although going a great way with the views of Dr. Chalmers, in reference to "the spiritual independence of the church," he could not go so far as to leave the Establishment and became an absolute adherent to the Free Church movement. At this period he held the title of Marquis of Lorn, but in 1817 he succeeded to the dukedom, on the demise of his father. In 1852 he held the office of Lord Privy Seal under the government of the earl of Aberdeen, and under the premiership of Lord Palmerston he ed to hold it till November, 1855, when he was appointed to the office of Postmaster-general; but, however ardently he pursues certain political questions, he never forgets to bestow much of his time upon literary and scientific studies. In 1857 he went out of office, but in 1859 he again became Lord Privy Seal, and in 1860 Postmaster-general. In 1866 he published an ably written work, entitled "The History of Law." A. 1823.

ARISTOPOL, John, ar-jy-op-u-lo, a learned Greek, who was driven from Constantinople on its capture by Mahomet II. in 1453, and settling in Italy, contributed largely to the revival of Greek learning in the West. Cosmo de Medici appointed him professor of Greek at Florence, where he had for pupils Lorenzo and Pietro de Medici, together with Politiano and Acciajoli. He afterwards removed to Rome, where he died some time after 1478, though the date is uncertain.

ARIAS MONTANUS, Benedictus, ar-e-as mon-tan-us, a learned Spaniard, who first distinguished himself at the Council of Trent, and was afterwards employed by Philip II. to superintend the Polyglott Bible printed at Antwerp, which occupied him from 1569 to 1572. He had been educated at Alcalá, and to the languages printed there, he added a Chaldee or Syriac version of the Scriptures, with a Latin translation. He was afterwards prosecuted on a charge of having falsified the sacred text to please the Jews, but acquitted, and appointed by Philip to superintend the library of the Escorial. He was born in 1527; and died in Seville in 1593. He was also distinguished by his ardent desire to retire to the hermitage he had constructed on the top of a rock near Aracina, in which desire he was disappointed; and for the great Polyglott version of the Bible which he published at Antwerp.

ARION, a-rí-on, an ancient musician, who invented the dithyrambic measure, and became rich by his professional skill. There is a romantic story to the effect that when he was returning from Sicily and Italy to Corinth, he was plundered by the crew of the ship, who ordered him to jump overboard; and all that he could obtain by his prayers was permission to play a tune before death. This he did so divinely as to charm a dolphin from the deeps, on the back of which he was carried safe to Corinth, and the ship arriving there shortly after, the sailors were convicted, punished with death, and Arion's property restored to him. Flourished in the 7th century B.C.

ARGYLE, DUKE OF.

ARKWRIGHT, SIR RICHARD.

ARMSTRONG, SIR WILLIAM.

ARNOLD, THOMAS, D.D.

BIOGRAPHY.

Ariosti

ARIOSTI, ar-ee-oh'-le, an Italian dramatic composer, who wrote several operas, the most popular of which was "Coriolano," which is supposed to have been parodied by Gay in the "Beggar's Opera." He was one of the three composers whose services were engaged for the establishment of the Royal Academy of Music in London in 1730. The others were Bononcini and Handel; but the reputation of Ariosti seems to have been based upon a slight foundation, as in a few years he fell into neglect. B. at Bologna.—We can find no record as to what became of this composer, who gave lessons to Handel, and by whom, in conjunction with Bononcini and his pupil, the well-known opera of "Muzio Scaevola" was composed.

ARIOSTO, Ludovico, or Lewis, ar-ee-oh'-fo, an Italian poet, patronized by the cardinal d'Este, by whose interest he obtained several employments. He entered into the service of Alfonso, duke of Ferrara, who appointed him governor of Garfagnana. His most famous piece is entitled "Orlando Furioso." He also wrote some comedies, which were performed in the hall of Ferrara, before the duke and his court. B. at Reggio, in Lombardy, 1474. D. at Ferrara, 1533.—Ariosto is considered among the best of Italian satirists, and he was one of the first writers of regular comedy in Italy. His "Orlando Furioso" has been translated into most continental languages, and the best in English is that by Mr. S. Rose.

ARISTAGORAS, ar-is-tag'-or-as, who, appointed governor of Miletus by Darius, nevertheless induced the Ionians to revolt, and subsequently joined with the Athenians in a war against his old master, but was worsted and retired to Thrace, where he was destroyed with his whole army while besieging a place near Amphipolis.

ARISTANDER of Telmessus, ar-is-tan'-der, a celebrated soothsayer who was in the service of Philip of Macedon and Alexander the Great, over the latter of whom he exercised immense influence, and whom he prevented from killing himself in remorse for the murder of Clitus. He also turned his powers of divination to account politically by giving favourable interpretations of events so as to inspire the soldiers and adherents of Alexander.

ARISTARCHUS, ar-is-tar'-kus, a Grecian philosopher, reputed to have been the first who asserted the rotation of the earth upon its axis, and its motion round the sun. He is also said to have invented sun dials. B. at Samos. Lived 280 B.C.—Another, celebrated for his critical powers. He criticised Homer with such severity, that all severe critics since his time have been denominated "Aristarchi." He also criticised Pindar and other poets.

ARISTEAS, ar-is'-te-as, an officer under Ptolemy Philadelphus, who is said to have been a Jew by birth, and to have had a principal share in getting the Hebrew scriptures translated into Greek, which version is called the Septuagint.

ARISTEAS of Proconessus, a Greek poet, who is said by Herodotus to have lived more than once—indeed, to have had the power of dissolving and renewing the association of body and spirit at his will.

ARISTIDES, ar-is-tid'-ees, a celebrated Athenian, who rose to the first offices in the state, and discharged them with such integrity as to obtain the surname of "The Just." At Marathon he distinguished himself by his bravery, and though he had charge of the spoils, took nothing for himself. On one occasion he was sitting as one of a jury to try a cause, when the plaintiff, with the hope of biasing the court in his favour, recounted the wrongs the defendant had done to Aristides, on which the latter stopped him with the remark—"State what he has done to you. I am here to decide your cause, not my own." The party of Themistocles at length prevailed against him, and he was banished by ostracism. He was afterwards recalled, however, at the suggestion of Themistocles himself, and contributed largely to gaining the battle of Salamis. B., in poverty, about 497 B.C.—The Athenians bestowed a magnificent funeral on him, and gave his son Lysimachus an estate and pension, besides giving his daughters portions from the state funds.—There were several other Greeks of this name, who were more or less distinguished:—1. Aristides of Thebes, a painter, who was contemporary with Apelles, and lived about 340 B.C. 2. Aristides of Miletus, who appears to have been the first writer of fictitious tales, but of whose life and age we know nothing. 3. Aristides Quintilianus, author of a treatise on music, who is supposed to have lived anterior to Ptolemy, the author of the Harmonics, and subsequently to the time of Cicero. 4. Aristides the sophist, who flourished in the 2nd century B.C. There are fifty-four orations by him still extant, besides some others which are lost.

ARISTIPPUS, ar-is-tip'-us, of Cyrene, the disciple of Socrates, and founder of the Cyrenaic sect. His maxim was, that pleasure is the chief good of man; and thus differed widely from the doctrines of his master. He flourished about 400 B.C.—His daughter Arete was famous for her wisdom and beauty.

ARISTO, ar-is'-to, the name of several worthies of antiquity, some of whom were philosophers, some poets, some artists, some politicians; while one is only distinguished by the circumstance of being the father of Plato—in itself, perhaps, distinction enough.

ARISTOBULUS I. and II., ar-is-to'-u-lus, kings of the Jews, who reigned in the 1st century B.C.

ARISTOCLES, ar-is-to'-cles. There were several Grecian philosophers, poets, rhetoricians, and artists of this name; but none whom it is necessary to particularize.

ARISTODEMUS, ar-is-to'-e-mus, tyrant of Cumæ, was at first so effeminate in manner and appearance as to be called the "Soft," Malakos, but who in after-life gained a very different reputation. After having done good service to the state, he conceived a grudge against the patriots, the leaders amongst whom he destroyed, and assumed the sole power himself. After exercising power for fourteen years, he was killed in an insurrection of the sons of those whom he had murdered or banished. According to Plutarch, he compelled the youths of Cumæ to dress like maidens, and the maidens like youths; and it was a reproach of Xenocrite, a girl of whom Aristodemus was enamoured, but who did not return his affection, that there was only one man in Cumæ, which roused the youth to kill and free the city of the tyrant, about 490 B.C. There were many men who bore this name, the most noted of whom was elected king by the Messenians 731 B.C. In obedience to the Delphic oracle, he sacrificed his own daughter to the gods in order to obtain success for the arms of his country; but on being defeated, killed himself in remorse. Aristodemus of Miletus was the prince of courtly flatterers, for when commissioned to convey to Antigonus intelligence of a great victory gained by his lieutenant over Ptolemy, he fulfilled his mission in such a way as to make it appear that such events as defeating Ptolemy, taking Cyprus, and capturing 16,000 prisoners, the matters of every-day occurrence under the reigns of Antigonus.

ARISTOCRATES, ar-is-to-kr-a-teen, a king of Aradia, who was stoned to death by his subjects about 700 B.C., for having violated a priestess of Diana. His grandson of the same name took a bribe from the Lacedæmonians, and allowed the Messenians to be defeated, and on attempting to repeat the treachery on a subsequent occasion, was discovered and stoned to death like his grandfather, about 667 B.C.

ARISTOTRUS and ILAROTRUS, ar-is-tof-ou-ton, har-mo-de-us, two celebrated friends of Athens, who, by their joint efforts, delivered their country from the tyranny of the Pisistratids, 510 B.C.

ARISTOMENES, ar-is-ton-e-nees, a celebrated Greek, the hero of Messenia, descended from the kings of that country. He defeated the Stagira, his birthplace. On the accession of Alexander to the throne, Aristotle refused to accompany him in his expeditions, but recommended to him his kinsman Callisthenes, and he himself settled at Athens, where, in the Lyceum, he taught his philosophy to a great number of disciples. Here he composed his principal works. Being accused of impiety, he wrote an apology for himself, and addressed it to the magistrates. He soon, however, quitted this city, and spent the remainder of his days at Chalcis, a city in Eubœa. Some say that he poisoned himself; others, that he cast himself into the strait Euripus; and some assert that he died a natural death, 323 B.C. n. at Stagira, 384 B.C.—The works of Aristotle may be classed under the heads of rhetoric, poetry, politics, ethics, physics, mathematics, logic, and metaphysics; and they display an immense amount of genius.

ARIUS, air'-e-us, founder of the sect of the Arians, whose opinions in reference to the divinity of Jesus Christ occasioned such disputes that Constantine, in 325 A.D., called a council at the Nicene Creed drawn up. Arius was now banished by the emperor; but two years after he was recalled to Constantinople, and made a confession of his faith, which was received as orthodox. He next went to Alexandria, where Athanasius refused to receive him. When that prelate was banished, Arius returned to Alexandria, but the people obliged him to withdraw. He retired into Egypt, where he raised new disturbances by his opinions; on which the emperor sent for him to Constantinople, and demanded of him whether he adhered to the Nicene faith. Arius answered on oath that he did, and at the same time delivered his own confession, which appearing sound, Constantine ordered that he should be readmitted into the church. He was then conducted in triumph by his followers to the great church, but died on the way, in 336. n. in Libya.—His doctrines did not expire with him, but occasioned fierce contentions in Christendom for ages.

ARISTOPHANES, ar-is-tof-a-nees, a celebrated Greek play-writer, the son of Philip of Rhodes. He wrote fifty-four comedies, of which only eleven have come down to us. He lived in the time of Socrates, Demosthenes, Euripides, and lashed the vices of his age with a masterly hand. The wit and excellence of his comedies are well-known, but his attack upon Socrates is justly censured. Aristophanes has been called the prince of the ancient comedy, as Menander is of the new. The "Clouds" is the comedy in which Socrates is ridiculed. n. in the island of Egina. Flourished 400 B.C.—Also a celebrated grammarian who flourished at Byzantium in the time of Ptolemy, who placed him over the library at Alexandria, to which he contributed several works now lost. Flourished 200 B.C.

ARISTOTILE, Alberti, ar-is-tof-ile, a celebrated Italian architect and engineer, who, in order to make some alterations upon the Duomo of Bologna, removed the campanile, with its bells and all complete, to a distance of thirty-five feet by means of machinery. He was invited into Hungary by Mathias Corvinus, and there erected several edifices and bridges: he also visited Russia, where he built the cathedral of Moscow and designed several others. Mahomet II. likewise invited him to enter his service, though it is uncertain whether he did so or not, as the time and place of his death are wholly unknown. He is said to have taught the Russians to cast cannon. Flourished in the 15th century.

ARISTOTEL, ar-is-tof-el, the head of the Peripatetic sect, was the son of Nicomachus, physician to Amyntas, grandfather of Alexander the Great. Losing his parents when young, it is said Aristotle led such a dissipated life as to squander away his estate, although others assert that he became a pupil of Plato at the age of seventeen. On the death of that philosopher, under whom he studied with great diligence, but to whom some assert he was ungrateful, he went to Hermias, the prince of Atarneus, in Mysia, and married that prince's sister. He was afterwards sent for by Philip of Macedonia to instruct Alexander, and gave such satisfaction to the king, that the latter erected statues to him, and rebuilt the Nicene Creed drawn up. Arius was now banished by the emperor; but two years after he was recalled to Constantinople, and made a confession of his faith, which was received as orthodox. He next went to Alexandria, where Athanasius refused to receive him. When that prelate was banished, Arius returned to Alexandria, but the people obliged him to withdraw. He retired into Egypt, where he raised new disturbances by his opinions; on which the emperor sent for him to Constantinople, and demanded of him whether he adhered to the Nicene faith. Arius answered on oath that he did, and at the same time delivered his own confession, which appearing sound, Constantine ordered that he should be readmitted into the church. He was then conducted in triumph by his followers to the great church, but died on the way, in 336. n. in Libya.—His doctrines did not expire with him, but occasioned fierce contentions in Christendom for ages.

ARJONA, Mannel de, ar-jo'-na, a Spanish poet and man of letters; he was also in holy orders. b. 1761; d. 1820.

ARKWRIGHT, ark'-rite, Sir Richard, an English manufacturer, who, from being originally a barber at Bolton, in Lancashire, commenced travelling through the country buying hair, and subsequently became acquainted with one Kay, a clockmaker, who assisted him in making a machine for spinning cotton, in the perfecting of which he was aided by Mr. Need and Jedediah Strutt, the patentee of Lee's stocking-frame. He entered into partnership with Messrs. Need and Strutt, and in 1769 obtained a patent for spinning by rollers. The validity of the patent was contested in 1772, but a verdict was recorded in Arkwright's favour. In 1771 the partners erected large spinning mills at Cromford, in Derbyshire, in which the machines were worked by water power. Eventually Mr. Arkwright acquired a large fortune. He was knighted in 1786. b. 1732; d. 1792.

ARLAUD, James Antony, ar'-lo, an eminent Swiss painter, who went, at the age of 20, to Paris. Here he was patronized by the royal family, painted his Leda, a copy of which he sold in London for £600, but would never part with the original; and it is said that, in a fit of enthusiasm, he destroyed this exquisite production by cutting it to pieces. n. at Geneva, 1683; p. 1743.—His brother Benedict, a portrait painter, settled in London, where he died in 1719.

ARLOTTA, ar-lot'-a, the mother of William the Conqueror, was a tanner's daughter, at Falaise, where she attracted the notice of Robert, duke of Normandy. On his decease, she married a Norman gentleman, by whom she had three children, who were all provided for by William I.

ARLOTTO, usually called Piovano Arlotto, ar-lot'-o, an Italian wit and satirist, author at one, quoted a sentiment from him. He was a clergyman, and had a reputation for wit and jests little consonant with the clerical character. Several of his pieces have been published in England. p. at Florence, 1395; p. 1433.

ARMAGNAC, counts of, ar-man-yac, a family descended from the ancient dukes of Aquitaine and Gascony, and many of whose members were mixed up with public affairs which agitated Europe between the beginning of the 14th and the end of the 15th centuries. Bernard VII., constable of France, took part with Charles, duke of Orleans, against the duke of Burgundy, and was so prominent a leader in the long civil war which devastated France in the reign of Charles VI. as to give his name to one of the contending factions, which were respectively known as the "Burgundians" and "Armagnacs." After the defeat of the French by Henry V. at Agincourt, Armagnac was intrusted with the government of France by the queen, when he carried matters with a very high hand; he usurped the entire power in the state, levied new taxes, spread terror by his cruelty, imprisoned the queen, and was suspected of complicity in the murder of the dauphin. Paris was given up to the duke of Burgundy, who had approached with an army in 1418, the queen was released, and Armagnac, who had taken refuge in the house of a mason who betrayed him, was sent to prison, and finally massacred by the populace, who broke into his dungeon for the purpose. On the accession of Charles VII., eighteen years later, funeral honours were accorded to the remains of Bernard; but his character still bears the stigma which his excesses attached to it.—Jean V., count of Armagnac, grandson of the above, was alike remarkable for his daring, his infamous private life, his treachery, and his turbulence. After a long career of rebellion and treachery, he met his master in deceit in the person of Louis XI., who caused him to be stabbed while signing articles of reconciliation. This was in 1473, and the Armagnacs never again recovered their power, Count Jean's wife having been poisoned in prison, and his brother kept in confinement for fourteen years.

ARMFELT, Gustavus Maurice, arm-felt, a Finnish nobleman, who distinguished himself as a statesman in the service of Sweden. His life, however, was one of continual difficulty, danger, and vicissitude. He finally entered the Russian service, in which he was treated with the most distinguished honour. p. at Abo, 1787; p. at Tzarskoe-Selo, 1814.

ARMIN, Robert, ar'-min, a comic actor and small author, was a contemporary of Shakspeare, and a member of the same company of players.

Arnaud

Some of his works have been printed, but are of no great merit.

ARMINIUS, James, ar-min'-e-us, a Dutch divine, and the founder of Arminianism, was in 1553 ordained, and became a popular preacher. About this time, Lydius, theological professor at Franeker, desired him to refute a piece on predestination, which had been written against Beza by some divines at Delft. In studying this point, Arminius became a convert to the opinion which he was employed to confute. In 1603 he was appointed professor of divinity at Leyden, where his lectures were much admired. His great adversary was Gomarus, with whom he held several conferences. n. at Oudewater, 1591; p. 1609.—Arminius was a very learned, pious, and eloquent man, and remarkable for the evenness of his temper. His motto was, "A good conscience is a paradise."

ARMSTRONG, John, M.D., arm'-strong, a native of Ayres Quay, parish of Bishop-Wearmouth, Durham, where he was born in 1731, attained considerable eminence for his skill in the treatment of fevers, which he made his especial study, and on which he published a variety of treatises. After holding the position of physician to the Sunderland fever hospital for several years, during which his skill and writings had gained him a wide reputation, he removed to London in 1818, determined to try his fortune in the metropolis, though without other introduction or recommendation than his local fame gave him. This was, as it turned out, a rather hazardous experiment, for not being a licentiate of the London Faculty, and failing from some cause in obtaining a diploma from that body, he was precluded from practice. The managers of the St. Paneras fever hospital, however, soon after elected him superintendent of that establishment, suspending in his favour the bye-law which required that the holder of the office should possess a London diploma. Dr. Armstrong continued to superintend this establishment for many years, and from time to time gave the results of his experience to the world in a series of treatises on various forms of febrile disease. He was also one of the founders of the Soho medical school, in conjunction with Mr. Bennett and Dr. Boott. p. 1829.

ARMSTRONG, John, a Scotch poet and physician, who, in 1732, took his degree of M.D. at Edinburgh. In 1744 he published the "Art of Preserving Health," one of the best didactic poems in our language, and shortly afterwards received the appointment of physician to the military hospital. In 1760 he was appointed physician to the army in Germany, and the next year wrote a poem called "Day, an Epistle to John Wilkes, of Aylesbury, Esq." In this letter he threw out a reflection upon Churchill, which drew on him the resentment of that satirist. n. at Castleton, Roxburghshire, 1709; p. at London, 1778.

ARMSTRONG, Sir William George, C.B., LL.D., F.R.S., was originally a barrister, but relinquished the law through his fondness for scientific pursuits. He established the Elswick works for making machinery, where, in 1851, he constructed the rifled Armstrong gun, which from its strength and lightness is admirably adapted for field artillery. The gun was adopted by the government, and Mr. Armstrong was knighted, and commissioned to superintend the manufacture of his artillery, an appointment which he relinquished in 1863, p. 1810.

THE DICTIONARY

Arnaud

ARNAUD, Daniel, ar'-no, troubadour or poet of Provence, who flourished in the 12th century, and enjoyed a considerable reputation in his time. He visited the court of Richard I. of England, where his extraordinary power of memory enabled him to play an amusing trick upon a brother bard. The latter challenged him to a trial of skill, a wager was made, the king appointed them a theme, and allowed them ten days to prepare their respective compositions. Arnaud ascertained when his rival had completed his poem, concealed himself where he could overhear the jongleur committing the piece to memory, and then hastened to the king with the request that he might be allowed to recite his composition first. This being granted, he repeated his rival's poem word for word without hesitation or mistake, to the utter astonishment of the author. Arnaud then confessed the trick, with which Richard was so amused that he ordered the wager to be abandoned, and rewarded both bards liberally. Some of Arnaud's poems have been printed by Raynouard; they are of an amorous character. There were several other troubadours of the same name, but none of distinguished merit. b. about 1150.

ARNAUD de Ronsil, George, a distinguished French surgeon, who after attaining eminence as a practitioner and teacher of that science in his own country, where he was professor of osteology in the school of St. Come, removed to London, where he became a member of the corporation of surgeons, and distinguished himself greatly both in the teaching and the practice of his art, into which he introduced several valuable improvements. His works are voluminous, those on hernia and aneurisms having been held in especial esteem. b. 1697; d. 1774.

ARNAUD, Henri, ar'-no, first the pastor of the Vaudois, and then their military leader in endeavouring to recover possession of their valleys in Piedmont, from which they had been driven by the tyranny of a count of Savoy. He himself subsequently became the historian of this expedition, and says that in eighteen battles fought against his enemies he lost only thirty of his followers, whilst no fewer than 10,000 of his foes were slain. b. in La Tour, Piedmont, 1641; d. pastor of Schönberg, 1721.

ARNAUD, François Thomas Marie de Baenlard d', a French author of some eminence, was the friend and protégé of Voltaire, and was invited to Berlin by Frederick V., who called him his "Ovid," and thereby brought upon him no little ridicule. He returned to Paris, where he resided several years. His works are in two editions—one in twenty-four vols. 12mo, and another in twelve vols. 8vo—and consist of poems, novels, and plays. b. 1718; d. 1805.

ARNAULD, Antony, ar'-nauld, a French polemical writer of considerable reputation in his time, a determined opponent of the Jesuits, and an equally staunch supporter of the Jansenists. He was a professor at Port-Royal, and one of the authors of the logic known by that name. His dispute with the clergy and the doctors of the Sorbonne exposed him to much persecution, and ultimately compelled him to retire to Brussels, where he still continued to indulge his polemical propensities till his death. b. at Paris, 1612; d. 1694, when his heart, at his own request, was sent to be deposited in the Port-Royal cloisters. His works are exceedingly numerous.

; Antony Vincent, ar-nauld, a French author of eminence, who was one of the literary ornaments of the time of Napoleon I., by whom he was held in high esteem. His first piece was a tragedy entitled "Marius à Minturnes," which was followed at different periods by "Lucèce," "Les Vénitiens," "Germanicus," "Guillaume de Nassau," and a variety of other plays, essays, poems, &c. He was nominated a member of the Institute in 1790, and was one of the members commissioned to prepare the "Dictionnaire de l'Académie," and in 1803 was named secretary-general to the university of Paris. He also took part in politics, was in 1797 charged by Bonaparte with the organization of the Ionian Islands; was an actor in the events of the 18th Brumaire, and afterwards accompanied Lucien Bonaparte to Spain; was for eight years the colleague of Fourcroy as director-general of instruction, and was a member of the Representative Chamber after the affair of the Champ de Mai. There is a touching incident related which shows the estimation in which he was held even at an early period of his career. On the first outbreak of the revolution, he retired first to England and then to Brussels; but having ventured to return to France, he was imprisoned as an emigrant, on which the committees declared that the laws against emigrants and aristocrats were never meant to interfere with such a man as the author of "Marius," and ordered him to be set at liberty. At the first restoration, he endeavoured to make his peace with the Bourbons, but unsuccessfully, for he was deprived of his employments; but on the return of Napoleon from Elba, they were all restored to him and some new ones added. The emperor also left him a legacy of 100,000fr. After the second restoration, Arndt retired from Paris, and it is believed lived in exile. During this period he wrote a number of papers—on morals, literature, and philosophy—in the "Liberal," published at Brussels; and after obtaining permission to return to France in 1819, was one of the editors of the "Biographie des Contemporains." He published a complete edition of his works in eight vols. 8vo, between 1824 and 1827. He was a native of Paris, where he was born in 1766. The name of Arndt is held in deserved esteem in France, as well for his personal virtues and services as a public functionary as for his literary ability. b. 1834.

ARNDT, Ernst Moritz, arnt, a German political writer of ability, who, on completing his collegiate studies at the university of Jena, assumed the profession of the church, and travelled through Italy, France, Hungary, Austria, and Sweden. The observations made in these travels were reduced to writing, and Arndt now became professor extraordinary at Griefswald. Here he denounced, in a work, the serfdom which then existed in Pomerania, and subsequently, in a still more spirited production, fervently appealed to the patriotism of his countrymen to resist the bondage to which they were being reduced under the policy then pursued by Napoleon I. The boldness with which he spoke of the emperor, in subsequently expanding this work, forced him to flee his country, and he sought refuge in Stockholm. Returning to his country under an assumed name, he resumed his pen, and wrote a great many effusions both in poetry and prose, which had for their object the rousing of the whole spirit of Germany against the foreign yoke under which it groaned. These produced a great effect at the time, and after the peace (1815-16) Arndt became the editor of a journal called "The Watchman," at Cologne. In 1818 he was presented by the king of Prussia with the professorial chair of modern history in the university of Bonn. His liberal tendencies, however, soon caused his suspension from his duties, although he was still allowed to retain his salary. For twenty years he lived in retirement, when, in 1843, the revolution drew him once more into public life. He became a member of the National Assembly at Frankfurt; from this, however, he soon withdrew, and subsequently lived mostly in seclusion. b. at Schoritz, Isle of Rugen, 1769. d. at Bonn, 1865.

ARNE, Thomas Augustine, arn, a celebrated English composer, born in 1710, and died in 1778, was the son of an upholsterer who lived in King-street, Covent-garden, London, at whose house, as mentioned by Addison in the "Spectator," the Indian kings lodged in Queen Anne's time. Arne was articled to an attorney, but early developed a taste for music, and studied the art under considerable difficulties. In 1733, he set Milton's "Comus" to music; and in 1740, Mallet's Masque of "Alfred," in which the air of "Rule Britannia" is introduced, and which has made the composer's name famous all the world over. He was musical composer for Drury-lane theatre and some other places of amusement; was made doctor of music by the university of Oxford in 1759; and in 1762 produced an opera of "Artaxerxes," the most famous of his works, which, on its production on the stage, was eminently successful. He continued to improve his reputation, and deemed the first English female performer of her day. His sister, Mrs. Cibber, was likewise distinguished in the musical world; and his son, Michael, early showed so much genius for music as to be able at the age of ten or eleven to play on the harpsichord all the lessons of Scarlatti and Handel. In conjunction with Mr. Balgill, Arne, in 1764, produced the opera of "Alfred," which was performed at Drury-lane, but did not take very well. He subsequently produced his "Cymon" at the King's theatre, the success of which yielded him profit as well as fame. He afterwards devoted himself for some time to the pursuits of alchemy and the transmutation of metals, but having lost all his fortune, he abandoned that unprofitable study, resumed his profession of musical composer, and wrote a deal of music for Covent-garden, Ranelagh, Vauxhall, &c. b. 1710; d. 1778.

ARNIM, George Abraham von, ar'-nim, a field-marshal in the army of Prussia, which he entered at the age of 16, and took a prominent part in all the wars of his time, especially that of the Spanish Succession in 1709, when he commanded the army of 8000 Brandenburgers stationed in Italy. After capturing the island of Wallin, in 1715, he retired from the army, and died in 1734, having been engaged in twenty-five battles and seventeen sieges. b. 1651.

ARNIM, Ludwig Achim d', a German of great and varied power, who first devoted himself to physics and natural history, and afterwards to fiction, poetry, and the ballads and poetical traditions and superstitious legends of his country. He also composed some dramas and a series of historical tales. His writings are distinguished by a singular power of fancy and invention, feeling, imagination, and humour, though the latter is at times a little too forcible and unrestrained. He was a native of Berlin, where he was born in 1781, and died in 1831.

ARNOLD, John, a Cornish watchmaker, whose errors and corruptions which had crept into the church, and was thus one of the pioneers of the reformation which was afterwards accomplished by Luffler and his coadjutors. His efforts drew down upon him the censures of the clergy, and he was compelled to quit Brescia, and went to Zurich, where he was well received, and made many converts, continuing to preach without interruption till 1444, when, on the occurrence of some tumults in Rome, where an attempt was made to limit the power of the church, Arnold repaired thither, and took an active part in the transactions that succeeded the death of Pope Lucius II. and the election and flight of Eugenius III.; but distinguished himself more for the violence than the wisdom of his counsels. After the suppression by the emperor Frederick Barbarossa and Pope Adrian IV. of the republic which the Romans had inaugurated, Arnold was ordered to quit Rome: his followers resisted, a contest ensued, in which a cardinal was mortally wounded, the pope placed the city under interdict, Arnold was compelled to flee, but was captured, sent a prisoner to the castle of St. Angelo, was brought to what was little more than a form of trial, was condemned to be burnt, and conducted to the stake in front of the Porto del Popolo, where he underwent his sentence with perfect cheerfulness and even with triumph. His ashes were scattered in the Tiber, so that they might not be collected by the people and honoured as those of a martyr. Executed 1166.

ARNOLD, Christopher, ar'-nold, a peasant, born at Sommerfeld, in the vicinity of Leipzig, who made himself by self-culture a great proficient in astronomy, and was the first to discover the comets of 1683 and 1688. His eminence in his favourite science procured him the correspondence and friendship of the most distinguished men of his time; and, by special act, the senate of Leipzig released him from the payment of all taxes and presented him with a sum of money in acknowledgment of his services. b. 1651; d. 1697.

ARNOLD, George Daniel, was an eminent writer and professor of law at Coblenz and Strasburg. He also wrote some poems, and a drama in the Strasburg dialect, which was commended by Goethe. b. at Strasburg in 1750; d. 1828.

ARNOLD, John, a Cornish watchmaker, whose mechanical genius led him to effect great improvements in the marine chronometer. b. at Bodmin, 1744; d. 1799.

ARNOLD, Richard, the compiler of the list of names of the bailiffs, custodes, mayors, &c. of London, which is usually known as the Customs of London, or Arnold's Chronicle, and is full of curious and valuable information, and is not, as its original title would imply, a dry record of names. The earlier editions are very rare, and sell at high prices. The first edition was printed in 1502, the second in 1621, and a third, with an introduction, in 1811.

that he considered, in relation to duty and conduct, all mere professions to be the idealities of mankind, and performances only to be their realities. In 1814 he took a first-class degree, and became a fellow of Oriel College. In 1818 he became a deacon. In 1820 he married, ARNOLD, von Winkelried, a famous Swiss patriot, and one of the heroes of his country's independence, has by some been set down as a knight, and by others asserted to be only a peasant of the canton of Unterwalden, but who, whatever be his lineage, played a distinguished part in achieving the liberty of Switzerland. In 1386, when the Austrians under Duke Leopold, and in conjunction with certain nobles of Switzerland, assembled to the number of 4000 splendidly armed warriors under the walls of Sempach, the Swiss, numbering only 1400, prepared to resist the invasion, and advanced in the shape of a wedge against the serried ranks of their foes, who had dismounted and formed a seemingly impenetrable wall with their shields. The mountaineers, unable to find an opening, and finding their national weapons, the spear and two-handed sword, of no avail, were staggered and about to withdraw, when Arnold rushed to the front, and exclaiming, "I will find you a way! remember my wife and children," grasped as many of the enemy's lances as he could, received them in his body, and bearing down their owners in his fall, made an opening, into which the Swiss at once dashed, and succeeded in creating confusion in the Austrian ranks. The duke and the greater number of his nobles fell, and the Swiss peasants gathering from the neighbouring forests and valleys, completely destroyed the invading army. The cords which the Austrians had brought with them to bind the Swiss are still shown in the arsenal at Lucerne; and the result of the victory was the acknowledgment of the independence of the country. Arnold's devotion and heroism on this occasion have procured him the title of the Swiss Deus.

ARNOLD, Thomas, D.D. The father of Dr. Thomas Arnold was a collector of customs at Cowes, Isle of Wight, but the family was originally from Lowestoft, in Suffolk. The college education of Thomas began at Winchester, where his favourite studies were those of poetry and history, and where he received the cognomen of "Poet Arnold," because he had composed an effusion after the manner of Sir W. Scott. His being thus early impressed with the chivalrous song of the "Minstrel of the North," may be deemed predictive of the manly tone which his own future character was to assume in all that appertained to the moral and intellectual stature of man's nature. In his sixteenth year (1811) he was removed to Oxford, having in Corpus Christi College obtained a scholarship. Here his character took a new direction. He merged the ideal in the real, already giving an omen of that "intense earnestness" by which his future existence was to be governed and guided. In defining his convictions at this period, we should say over his and he had taken several young men under his tuition to prepare them for the universities. He was at the same time employing his leisure, if he allowed himself any, in collecting materials for his edition of Thucydides, whilst contributing articles on Roman history to the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana." His industry at this time appears before us as a picture of the moral and intellectual development of a physical Hercules. Hitherto his character had been more or less marked by indolence, succeeded by that kind of restless energy which, so far as we have seen, we take to indicate generally some undefined longing of a strong and unsatisfied mind. It springs from an intense desire for the attainment of something which only appears in shadow to itself, and to which time and circumstance alone will give light, form, and embodiment. At Laleham the mind of Arnold attained its desire. It was there that the indolence and restlessness were exchanged for the industry and the active purpose, or, in his own language, the "intense earnestness," by which he was henceforth actuated in following out his mission of life. In 1823 he was elected head master of Rugby school, and entered upon his career of a benevolent, ardent, and successful instructor. His pupils were not half his years; they were therefore to be treated with kindness. They were to be educated in the polite arts; therefore they were to be held in control by a respectful authority. They were to enter the world, and to be presumed to pursue their destinies in it as gentlemen; therefore were they to be treated with courtesy. These few simple rules seem to us to have greatly guided Arnold in his conduct at Rugby, and to have been great aids to his gaining the universal respect and deep affection of all intrusted to his care. In 1835 he accepted a fellowship in the new London University; but in 1838 retired, on account of some difference between the members upon the principle of voluntary examinations. In 1841 Lord Melbourne appointed him regius professor of modern history at Oxford, but he lived only to deliver his introductory course of lectures. b. at Cowes, 1795; d. 1842.

ARNOLD, Matthew, the eldest son of the above, won the Newdegate prize for English verse at Oxford in 1843, and became a fellow of Oriel College in 1845. He was elected Professor of Poetry at Oxford in 1857. He has taken an active part in the promotion of middle class education, and has contributed largely to the periodical literature of the day. b. at Laleham, 1822.

ARNOLD, Benedict, an American general, who, although bred a surgeon, was for many years master of a trading vessel; but on the breaking out of hostilities between Great Britain and the colonies, he entered into the service of the latter, and was chosen captain of a company of volunteers at Newhaven. He soon rose to the rank of colonel, and commanded an expedition to Canada, where he was joined by General Montgomery, and in an attempt on Quebec received a wound in the leg. He next commanded a flotilla on Lake Champlain, where he distinguished himself by his bravery. He continued in the American service till 1780, when he opened a correspondence with Sir Henry Clinton for betraying West Point to the British, in which negotiation Major André became a victim. (See ANDRÉ.) Arnold had a narrow escape, and got on board an English ship of war. He now served with equal ardour on the other side, and, at the peace, retired to England, where he was granted a pension. He afterwards went to Nova Scotia, whence he sailed to the West Indies, and on his passage was taken by the French, from whom he effected an escape. B. in Connecticut, 1745; D. in London, 1801.

ARNOLDI, Bartholomew, ar-nol'-de, a Catholic divine, at first the friend and afterwards the strenuous opponent of Luther and his adherents. His writings are more distinguished for abuse than for argument; and had the papal party not been singularly weak in talent at the time, Arnoldi could never have attained the conspicuous position which he did. D. 1532.

ARNOLDI, John, a distinguished Dutch diplomatist and statesman, who played a prominent part in the troubles in Holland which followed the first French revolution. He was a faithful adherent of the House of Orange. B. 1751; D. 1827.

ARNOLDUS DE VILLA NOVA, ar-nol'-dus, (so called from the place of his birth, a small village near Montpellier,) an eminent French physician of the 13th century, and also distinguished as a theologian, an astrologer, and an alchemist. He was the tutor of the celebrated Raymond Lully, whom he met during a journey he made into Spain. He declared that the services of a good and wise physician were more precious in the eyes of the Deity than all the works of the priest, and even than the sacrifice of the mass. For this he was persecuted by the clergy, and had to take refuge in Sicily, where he was protected by the kings of Naples and Aragon. He ultimately perished by shipwreck in 1313, when on his way to render medical aid to Pope Clement V. D. 1240. He rendered good service to chemical science, having made several valuable discoveries in the course of his attempts to accomplish the transmutation of metals.

ARNOLFO DI LARO, ar-nol'-fo, a distinguished Italian sculptor and architect of the 13th century, who has left several monuments of his genius in Florence and elsewhere, and gave a great impetus to architectural art, which he found in a very depreciated condition, and in which he effected great improvements. B. at Florence in 1232; D. 1300.

ARNOTT, Dr. Ne'l, ar'-not, a Scotch medical practitioner, greatly distinguished for his benevolence, and his labours in the cause of sanitary improvement. He invented the water-bed and floating mattress, which, in cases of patients enduring acute suffering, have been used with great success. He is also the inventor of "Arnott's stove" and "Arnott's ventilator," which are now in almost universal use. B. near Montrose, 1788.—Dr. Arnott, as an author, has obtained great celebrity for his work entitled "Elements of Physics; or, Natural Philosophy, General and Medical, explained in plain or non-technical language." In 1854 the Royal Society awarded him the Rumford medal, and in 1855 the jurors of the class of the Universal Exposition of Paris awarded him the great gold medal, and Napoleon III. presented him with the cross of the Legion of Honour.

ARNOULT, or ARNOULD, Sophie, ar'-nowl', a celebrated French actress, and nearly as much distinguished for her wit as for her histrionic powers. Dorat praises her in his poem, "La Dédication," and Garrick is said to have been much pleased with her acting when he saw her perform during a visit to Paris. She was born in that city, of respectable parentage, in 1744, and died in 1803. She also acquired an unenviable notoriety for the number of her amours and the high rank of her admirers.

ARNULF, ar'-nul, an archbishop of Rheims, and natural son of Lothaire, King of France, who was deposed from his bishopric for opposing the policy of Hugh Capet, but afterward restored by the Pope. He is believed to have written several works on theology and canon law, but they are all lost. D. 1021 or 1023.

ARNULF, bishop of Lisieux, the friend of Henry II., whom he supported with his advice and authority in his quarrel with Thomas à Becket. Arnulf was distinguished for his magnificence, and also for learning, though few of his works remain. He resigned his bishopric, and retired to a monastery in Paris, where he died in 1145.

ARPAZ, ar'-pad, a chief of the Magyars, and founder of the Hungarian monarchy. Having crossed the Carpathian mountains, he entered a country which was split up into petty principalities, consisting of numerous Slavonic tribes. These he won by presents or conquered by arms, and finally took up his abode on the island of Tsepel, in the Danube. From this place he governed Hungary, and bequeathed it to Zoltan, his son and successor. D. 907.

ARREDONDO, Isidore, ar-re-don'-do, a Spanish artist, who early attained to such excellence in historical subjects as to attract the notice of Charles II. of Spain, who appointed him his chief painter, and conferred nobility upon him. B. 1653; D. 1702.

ARRIA, ar'-ea, the wife of Cæcina Pætus, who perceiving the hesitation of her husband, the Roman consul, who was condemned by Claudius to fall upon his sword, plunged a dagger into her bosom, and drawing it out said, "My Pætus, it is not painful." The younger Pliny relates many other instances of the heroic sayings and doings of this lady, who appears to have been a model of Roman fortitude and devotion.

ARRIAN, ar'-e-an, a Greek historian, who united the character of a warrior and philosopher, and rose to the highest dignities in Rome. B. at Nicomedia. Lived in the 2nd century.

ARRIAZA, Juan Bautista, ar-e-ah'-a, a Spanish poet, who takes rank among the best contemporary writers of his country. Many of his effusions had a political leaning in favour of monarchy and legitimacy. B. at Madrid, 1770; D. 1837.—He enjoyed a pension from Ferdinand VII., and held a post in the ministry of Foreign Affairs.

ARRIEUX, Le Chevalier d', dar'-e-oo, a distinguished Frenchman, who travelled much in the East, where he held several important employments, and contributed information on the manners and customs of the people of Syria and the Holy Land, which has been of great value in the elucidation of Biblical subjects, and also in promoting commerce with that quarter of the world. He was born near Marseilles in 1635, and died in 1702.

ARTAUD, ar-é-jé, duke of Paona, a relative of the Bonapartes, who joined the French army and served with distinction under Napoleon, by whom he was made a general, a duke, and a peer of France. After the battle of Waterloo, he attempted to hold Calvi and establish the independence of Corsica, of which he was a native, in opposition to the army of Louis XVIII., but of course failed in the effort, was compelled to retire to Lombardy, where he died. b. 1773; d. 1853.

ARROWSMITH, Aaron, ar'-e-smith, an Englishman-maker who from a blacksmith's industry rose to be a baronet and thirty upwards of years of age, died in Winston, Durham, 1559; b. in London, 1523.

ARROWSMITH, John, D.D., an eminent Puritan minister and writer on theology, who held a prominent place and discharged many important functions during the ascendancy of the party to which he belonged. He was a native of Gateshead, was educated at Cambridge, in which he successively held the offices of Master of St. John's College, Chancellor of the University, and finally Master of Trinity College. He was also one of the divines appointed to advise the Long Parliament on religious matters, and bore the character of a learned, pious, zealous, and Christian. He was born in 1602, and died in 1659, just before the Restoration.

ARSAACES I., ar-sai'-ees, founder of the Parthian monarchy. He induced his countrymen to rise against the Syrian empire, 250 B.C., on which they raised him to the throne. Arsaces was slain in battle, after reigning 33 years.—His successors all took his name.

ARSAACES TRIPARTIS, ar-sai'-us, king of Armenia, who being taken prisoner by Sapor king of Persia, was cast into prison at Ecbatana, where he died, 342 A.D. His country then became a Persian province.

ARSENIVS, ar-sen'-e-us, a patriarch of Constantinople of the 13th century, who excommunicated the usurping emperor Palæologus for having put out the eyes of the heir to the throne, John Lascaris, and though the emperor exhibited every sign of repentance, refused to withdraw the sentence, and in his will repeated his condemnation of the usurper's cruel conduct. Some time before his death, in 1272, he was deposed from the patriarchate at the instance of Michael, and died in exile. He left several canons drawn from the laws of the emperors, with explanatory notes and commentaries.—There were several other Greek churchmen of the same name, the most eminent of whom was bishop of Malvasia (anciently Monembasia) in the Morea, who, having been driven into exile, contributed greatly to the revival of Greek literature in Italy, having prepared an edition of the Scholia on Euripides, which was printed in 1534 at Venice. He died in 1535, just when his friend, Pope Paul III., was about to create him a cardinal. Some others of his works were printed at Rome, Parma, and Venice.

ARTABANUS IV., ar'-ta-bai'-nus, the last of the Parthian monarchs, who, in 217 A.D., escaping with great difficulty from a perfidious massacre commenced by the Romans, with Caracalla at their head, mustered an army, and engaged his foes in a battle which lasted two days; but as the armies were preparing to renew the combat, Artabanus was informed of the death of Caracalla: peace was then made on honourable terms. Artaxerxes afterwards incited his subjects to revolt, and in a battle in 226, Artabanus was taken and put to death. Thus ended, in the 3rd century, the Parthian empire.

ARTAVASDES I., ar'-ta-vi'-des, a king of Armenia, who succeeded his father Tigranes. He joined the Roman forces under Crassus, but deserted to the enemy, and thus the Romans were defeated and Crassus slain. He similarly betrayed Mark Antony when engaged against the Medes; but afterwards, Artavasdes fell into Antony's power, and was taken, with his wife and children, to Alexandria, where they were dragged at the triumvir's chariot-wheels in chains of gold. After the battle of Actium, Cleopatra caused his head to be struck off, and sent to the king of Media. Reigned in the 1st century B.C.

ARTAXERXES I., ar'-ta-xer'-ees, surnamed Longimanus, was the third son of Xerxes, king of Persia, and having murdered his brother Darius, ascended the throne, 465 B.C. d. 425 B.C. and was succeeded by his only son, Xerxes.—This prince is generally supposed to have been the Ahasuerus of Scripture, who married Esther, and by whose permission Ezra restored the Jewish religion at Jerusalem. The seventy weeks of Daniel are also dated in his reign.

ARTAXERXES II., surnamed Mnemon, on account of his great memory, was the eldest son of Darius Nothus, and began his reign 405 B.C. His brother Cyrus formed a conspiracy against him, for which he was sentenced to death; but, at the intercession of his mother Parysatis, the sentence was commuted to banishment to Asia Minor. Cyrus repaid this act of clemency by mustering a large army of Asiatics, and some Greek troops under Clearchus, with whom he marched to Babylon; but, being encountered by Artaxerxes, he was defeated and slain. The Greeks, however, escaped, and reached their own country, under Xenophon. Artaxerxes died at the age of 94, 362 B.C.

ARTAXERXES III. (Ochus) succeeded his father, the preceding monarch, 362 B.C. To pave his way to the succession, he murdered two of his brothers, and afterwards put to death all the remaining branches of the family. He succeeded in suppressing several insurrections which were raised against him, and in Egypt slew the sacred bull Apis, and gave the flesh to his soldiers. For this his eunuch, Bagoas, an Egyptian, caused him to be poisoned, and after giving his carcass to cats, made knife-handles of his bones. d. 339 B.C.

ARTAXERXES BEBEGAN, or ARDISHIR, the first king of Persia of the race of the Sassanids, was a shepherd's son; but his grandfather by the mother's side being governor of a province, he was sent to the court of King Artaban. On the death of his grandfather, he, being refused an appointment, retired to Persia proper, where, exciting the people to revolt, he defeated and slew Artaban and his son; on which he assumed the title of "King of kings." He made vast conquests, and administered the affairs of his kingdom with wisdom. He married the daughter of Artaban, who, attempting to poison him, was sentenced to death. The officer, however, to whom the execution of this sentence was committed, concealed the queen, who was soon afterwards delivered of a son. The king discovering the secret, applauded the conduct of his officer, and acknowledged the child as his heir. d. 240 A.D.

ARTEMISIA I., ar-to-mis'-e-a, queen of Caria, who assisted Xerxes in person against the Greeks, and behaved with such valour that the Athenians offered a reward for her capture, and the Spartans erected a statue to her. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

ARTEMISIA II., queen of Caria, erected a monument to her husband Mausolus, which was so magnificent that every splendid structure of the kind has since been called a mausoleum. Lived in the 4th century B.C.

ARTEMIDORUS, ar-to-mid'-or-us, a writer on dreams, palmistry, and augury, was a native of Deldia, a small town in Lydia, and lived in the time of the Antonines. He was so enamoured of the subject of fortune-telling that he not only collected everything that had been written upon it, but spent years in the company of stirring prophets, and collected a large quantity of matter about dreams and their interpretation, which he arranged in five books; these were first printed by Aldus in 1618, and several other editions have appeared since. Boyle says that Artemidorus bestowed more pains on a foolish subject than most authors have devoted to the most important ones.—There were several others of this name, the only one of whom that deserves notice was a geographer of Ephesus; of whose works, originally extending to 11 books, only a few fragments remain.

ARTEVELDE, Jacob and Philip van, ar'-te-vel, two famous Flemings, a father and son, distinguished for their patriotism in the 14th century. Jacob, the father, was killed in a popular tumult at Ghent, where he carried on the trade of a brewer, in 1345; and his son Philip, after making himself master of Bruges in 1382, was killed in the same year, at the battle of Rosbeck, where 25,000 Flemings fell.

ARTEVELDT, Andrew van, a Dutch marine painter, who was very successful in depicting storms, rocky shores, &c. Vandyck was a great admirer of his works, and painted his portrait as a mark of his respect for the artist.

ARTHUR, ar'-thnr, a British prince, the son of Uther Pendragon, dictator of the Britons, by the wife of the duke of Cornwall. He succeeded Uther in 516, and instituted the military order of the Knights of the Round Table, and introduced Christianity at York in the room of paganism. Of this celebrated personage there are many fabulous circumstances related, and his life and career have furnished themes for numerous poems and romances. D. 542 A.D.

ARTHUR, duke of Brittany, the posthumous son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, son of Henry I., by Constantia, daughter of the duke of Brittany, and declared heir by his uncle Richard I., who afterwards devised his kingdoms to his brother John. A peace, however, taking place, Arthur did homage to his uncle for the dukedom of Brittany. In another rupture between England and France, Arthur was taken prisoner by John, who caused him to be confined in the castle of Rouen, where it is supposed he was murdered. B. 1187.—It is upon the supposed murder of this prince that the interest of Shakspeare's play of "King John" turns.

ARTHUR, Prince of Wales, eldest son of Henry VII. king of England, and of Elizabeth of York, gave early promise of talent and capacity, and was entrusted with at least the nominal government of the country in 1501, during his father's absence in the war with the French king, Charles VIII. His early promise, however, was not destined to be realized, he having died at the castle of Ludlow in 1502. He was buried in the cathedral church of Worcester, where a handsome monument to his memory still remains. His espousal to the Princess Catherine of Aragon, who was subsequently the wife of his brother, afterwards Henry VIII., furnished a pretext for that king to divorce her in order to marry Anne Boleyn.

serving for some years in the Spanish army, joined that of the new republic of Buenos Ayres, and ultimately rose to be general-in-chief. He was the principal instigator of the revolt of the Banda Oriental against the mother country, and contributed largely to the success of the people in securing their independence. He was also engaged in subsequent wars with Spain and Portugal, as well as in a civil strife with Pueyrredon and his party, whose ambitious projects he opposed and thwarted for some time, but was ultimately compelled to retire into Paraguay, where he was kindly received by his old opponent, Dr. Francia. He died in 1825 or 1826, after having played a conspicuous and honourable part in the affairs of the South American Republics for a period of fifteen years.

ARTOIS, Duc d'. (See Charles X.)

ARTOIS, Jacques d', ar'-tois, an eminent Flemish landscape painter, was born at Brussels, in 1613. He was a great student of nature, in rendering which he was very successful. He was, however, defective in figures, and it is said that Teniers used to paint or retouch those in Artois's pictures. He was an excellent colourist, and in this respect greatly resembled Titian, although the tone of his works is sometimes too sombre. D. 1665.

ARUNDAL, Sir Thomas, ar'-un-del, first Lord Arundel of Wardour, to which dignity he was raised by James I., was sprung from a family which is distinguished in English history from a remote period, and which had contracted many honourable alliances. His grandfather was married to Margaret Howard, sister of queen Catherine Howard, and was beheaded in 1552 for having, as alleged, conspired against the life of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland. The subject of this memoir at an early age joined the army of the emperor in Hungary, where he greatly distinguished himself in the war against the Turks, having taken with his own hand the standard of the enemy at an engagement at Gran. For this and other services the emperor Rodolph made him a count of the holy Roman empire in 1595; but queen Elizabeth refused to allow him to assume any precedence or position in virtue of his foreign honours, saying that she "did not care that her sheep should wear a stranger's marks nor dance after the whistle of any foreigner." Sir Thomas returned to England, where he lived in comparative retirement for several years, and died in 1639. The wife of his son, the second Lord Arundel, gallantly defended Worcester castle during the civil ASAPH, as'-suf, a Hebrew musician of the tribe of Levi, contemporary with David, and the composer of several of the psalms.

ASCH, Peter Van, ash, an artist of Delft, in Holland, who excelled in small landscapes; his works of this description being much esteemed. He was remarkable for his filial piety, and greatly neglected his profession in order to give attention to his aged and sick parents. b. 1603. —His father, John Van Asch, was a portrait painter, and lived in the 16th century.

ASCHAM, Roger, as'-kam, a learned English writer, on whom, in 1517, Henry VIII. settled a pension of £10 a year. About the same time he was appointed classical tutor to Lady, afterwards Queen, Elizabeth, and after being thus honourably employed two years, he returned to Cambridge, where he had been before teacher of Greek, and had a pension settled upon him by King Edward VI., at the same time filling the office of public orator with great reputation. In 1550 he attended Sir Richard Morysine in his embassy to the emperor Charles V., and remained in Germany three years. He was now appointed Latin secretary to King Edward, but on the death of that prince he lost his place and pension. Afterwards he was made Latin secretary to Queen Mary, and was employed by Cardinal Pole. On the accession of Queen Elizabeth, he continued in his office of secretary, and became her private tutor in the learned languages. The only preferment he obtained was a prebendal stall in the cathedral of York. b. at Kirby-Wiske, near Northallerton, 1515; d. in London, 1568. —His most esteemed work is entitled "The Schoolmaster," of which an excellent edition by Mr. Upton appeared in 1711; his Latin epistles have been frequently printed, and are admired as elegant compositions. His works were printed entire, in 1 vol. 4to, in 1761.

ASCHAM, Anthony, an author and diplomatist of the period of the Commonwealth, was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he took the degree of M. A. He at first attached himself to the Presbyterian party on the breaking out of the war between Charles and the Parliament, but subsequently joined the Independents. He was appointed tutor of James, duke of York, afterwards James II., but does not appear to have imbued that prince with his own principles. The Rump Parliament sent Ascham as English resident to Madrid, where he was assassinated by some English royalists on the 6th of June, 1650, in his own house, for which crime one of the perpetrators, named Sparks, was executed.

ASCHDOD, ash'-dod, the name of several princes of Armenia, of the family or tribe of the Bagratides, who were of Jewish extraction, and whose descendants still exist in Russia. The first of the name obtained the government of Armenia in 635, and it continued in the family till about 1043, when they finally lost it in the time of Aschdod IV.

ASCLEPIADES, as'-kle-pe-a'-dees, the name borne by a number of Greek physicians, the famous of whom was called Prusiensis, after his birthplace, Prusia, in Bithynia, and who enjoyed a great reputation and extensive practice. His skill was held in high esteem, and it is stated that such was his own confidence in it, that he laid a wager with fortune that he would forfeit all his fame if ever he was attacked by disease: it is added that he won the wager, for, after living to a great age, he was killed accidentally, never having suffered from sickness of any sort. —There were also some poets, philosophers, &c., of the name, but of whom very little is known.

ASCLEPIODORUS, as'-kle'-pe-o-dor'-us, an Athenian artist, who was the contemporary, and as some thought the equal, of Apelles, by whom his works were much admired.

ASCLEPIODOTUS, as'-kle'-pe-o-dot'-tus, a Greek of Alexandria, who was distinguished as a philosopher of the New Platonic School, and was also eminent as a physician, chemist, and botanist. He was a disciple of Proclus, and deservedly celebrated for his learning and skill in physic. Lived 450 A.D.

ASCONIUS, Quintus Pedianus, as'-kon'-e-us, an eminent grammarian, born at Padua, who taught eloquence in Rome in the time of Tiberius, had both Livy and Quintilian as pupils, and was the friend of Virgil. He is believed to have died in the reign of Nero, at the age of 75.

ASDRUBAL, as'-dru-bul, a brother of Hannibal, defeated and killed by the Romans, 207 B.C.

ASELLI, Caspar, as-el'-le, an eminent Italian surgeon, who discovered the system of the lacteal vessels, by means of which the nourishment taken into the system is, after digestion, distributed to the various portions of the body. He taught anatomy and surgery at Pavia, and was chief surgeon of the Italian army. b. at Cremona about 1581; d. at Milan in his 45th year, and, though so young, already famous over Europe.

ASELD, BIDAL D', das'-feld, the name of three brothers—Alexis, Benoît, and Claude François—the sons of the Swedish minister at the court of Louis XIV. of France, who all rose to high rank in the French army and were ennobled for their services. The defence of Bonn, under the command of Alexis, is one of the most obstinate and skilful on record. The youngest brother, Claude François, succeeded the Duke of Berwick, on the latter's death, and had the honour of measuring his strength, not unsuccessfully, with the great Prince Eugene.

ASGILL, John, as'-gil, a miscellaneous and political writer who lived at the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th century, and acquired an odd sort of notoriety. He was bred a lawyer, attained considerable reputation in his profession, and acquired a large fortune, which he invested in an estate in Ireland; having taken to politics and become a member of the Irish Parliament, he got into trouble by his writings, was imprisoned in the Fleet prison, and, though ordered by Parliament to be released, one of his books, an absurd essay on the possibility of man passing into eternal life without tasting of death, having been declared blasphemous and profane, he was expelled the House of Commons in 1707, and the book ordered to be burnt by the common hangman. In the meantime, he got into pecuniary embarrassments, and was again committed to prison, where he died in 1738. He continued to transact professional business and to write pamphlets during the whole period of his imprisonment, which lasted for nearly 30 years.

Asgill

ASGILL, Sir Charles, the son of a wealthy citizen of London, entered the army when young, and after serving through a considerable portion of the first American War, was taken with the rest of Cornwallis's army at York Town, in Virginia. A party of American royalists having, without authority, hanged a Captain Huddy of the American army, and the English having refused to give up the leader of the party, Washington determined to retaliate upon one of the officers in his hands, and ordered lots to be cast among the unconditional prisoners. The lot fell on Asgill, then only 19, although not an unconditional prisoner, and he was sent to head-quarters at Philadelphia to suffer for an offence with which he had nothing to do. Washington was disinclined to make a sacrifice of Asgill, and a delay occurred which gave time for his mother to make an appeal to Marie Antoinette, the Queen of France, who interceded with the American government, and obtained the young officer's release, who then returned to Europe, and personally thanked her Majesty for saving his life. He subsequently served in the Duke of York's expedition into Flanders in 1793; was raised to the rank of colonel in 1795; and in 1814 was made a general, having in the interval seen service in various quarters, and always acquitted himself with credit. He succeeded to the baronetcy in 1783, about which time he married, but, having no children, the title became extinct at his death in 1823.

ASKE, John, LL.D., ask, author of a grammar and dictionary of the English language, was born in the county of Dorset, was a minister of the Baptist denomination, and was ordained to the congregation of that body at Pershore, where he continued till his death in 1779. b. 1724.

ASKE, John, M.D., an eminent physician of the 18th century, who, having been educated at Trinity College, Oxford, commenced practice in Birmingham, where he soon attained a prominent position in his profession. He afterwards removed to London, and devoted much attention to the analysis of the various mineral waters of Europe, the results of his investigations into which were published. He delivered the Harveian oration in 1790, and was on terms of intimacy with Reynolds, Boswell, Windham, Dr. Burney, and other eminent men of the time a club of whom, under Dr. Ash's presidency, met at the Blenheim Tavern, Bond Street. b. 1723. d. 1798.

ASHBURNHAM, John, ash-burn'-am, a staunch supporter of Charles I., and the only attendant, with the exception of Doctor Hudson, of that unfortunate monarch on his journey, in April 1646, from Oxford to Newark, where the Scotch army was lying. b. 1603; d. 1671.—This individual passed through many vicissitudes, yet was so fortunate as to be able to repurchase the family estates, which his father had squandered in dissipation. His grandson was made a peer in the time of William and Mary, and the earls of Ashburnham are now in the enjoyment of the estates which were recovered by him.

ASHBURNTON, Alexander Baring, Baron, ask-bur'-ton, the second son of Sir Francis Baring Bart., a London merchant of considerable wealth. In 1810, on the death of his father, he became the head of the firm of Baring Brothers and Co., and in 1812 was elected a member of Parliament for Taunton. In 1834 he became a member of Sir Robert Peel's cabinet, as president of the Board of Trade and master of the Mint, and was created Baron Ashburnton. In 1811 he proceeded to America, and amicably settled the Oregon boundary question with the United States, and which settlement is known by the name of the "Ashburton Treaty." He continued to support Sir Robert Peel in the House of Lords until that statesman brought forward his measure for re-vealing the corn laws. To this measure Ashburnton gave a decided opposition, and after it had passed into law, he intermeddled very little with politics. b. 1774; d. 1843.

ASHBY, Sir John, ask'-by, a British admiral of the time of William III., who, in the Defiance, led the van of Admiral Herbert's squadron in the battle of Bantry Bay in 1689, for his conduct in which action he was knighted and presented by the king with a gold watch set with diamonds. He subsequently took part in the engagement fought by the combined fleets of England and Holland, under Lord Torrington, and that of France, between Cherbourg and the Isle of Wight, on the 3th of June, 1690, but was acquitted of all blame as to the unfortunate result of the affair. After aiding Marlborough in capturing Cork and Kinsale from the adherents of King James, Ashby commanded a division in the great battle of La Hogue on the 19th of May, 1692, but being unable to get into action till near the close of the engagement, the pursuit of the defeated fleet mainly fell to his share. As several of the French ships escaped to St. Malo by running through the "Race of Alderney," where it was deemed inexpedient to follow them, a Parliamentary inquiry took place; Ashby, however, was again exonerated—indeed, was complimented by the speaker of the House of Commons, and continued in commission till his death in July, 1693, at which moment his flag was flying on board the Portsmouth. b. 1642.

ASHE, Andrew, ask, a celebrated flute-player, was born at Lisburn, Antrim, in 1759, and attained to high proficiency on his favourite instrument. He was engaged at the leading theatres and musical entertainments of the day, was director of the Bath concerts for several years, and finally retired to Dublin, where he died in 1833. His wife was a favourite vocalist, and all their family were distinguished for their musical talent.

ASHFIELD, Edmund, ask'-field, excelled as a painter of portraits in crayon. He was the pupil of Michael Wright in the reign of Charles II.; and the instructor of Luttrell, who ultimately became superior to his master.

ASHLEY, Robert, ask'-lai, a poet and general writer who lived in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., was born at Damerham, on the confines of Wells, Dorset, and Hants, was educated at Oxford, and was called to the bar by the members of the Middle Temple, but did not long follow the legal profession, preferring to devote himself to literary pursuits. His principal works, however, are translations from the French, Italian, and Spanish. Towards the close of his life he lived in the Middle Temple, and is buried in the Temple Church. His family was of knightly rank, and from his elder brother, Sir Anthony Ashley, the Earls of Shaftesbury are descended on the female side. b. 1641.

ASHMUN, Jehudi, ask'-man, a native of Champlain, New York, where he was born in 1794, and after being professor of theology at Bangor, Maine, was appointed agent of the A Colonisation Society, and in that capacity greatly contributed to the success of the negro colony of Liberia. His health having greatly suffered by his prolonged residence in Africa, he returned to America to recruit it, but died shortly after his arrival, August 28th, 1828.

ASHMOLE, Elias, Æsh-mò-le, an eminent antiquary, who, on the breaking out of the Civil War, went to Oxford and entered Brasenose College. He was for some time in the royal army, but when the king's affairs were ruined, he settled in London, and applied himself to the study of astrology. On the restoration of Charles II. he was appointed Windsor herald, and became one of the first members of the Roy. Society in the year 1661, a short time after he had been called to the bar. In 1672 he presented his "History of the Order of the Garter" to the king, who rewarded him with £400. In 1683 he presented the university of Oxford with his collection of curiosities, which gift was augmented at his death by the bequest of his MSS. and library. b. at Lichfield, 1617; d. in London, 1692.—He left a number of MSS., some of which were published; viz., "The Antiquities of Berkshire;" "Miscellanies on several Curious Subjects;" and "Memoirs of his own Life."

ASHWORTH, Caleb, D.D., æsh-wor-th, was the son of Richard Ashworth, pastor of a congregation of Baptists at Cloughfield, Rosendale, Lancashire, where the subject of this notice was born in 1775. He was educated for the ministry under Dr. Doddridge at Northampton, and succeeded that celebrated divine in the direction of the institution established by the Baptists for training ministers of their denomination, an office which he held for twenty-three years, and brought up several men who were afterwards eminent as preachers and writers on theology. Dr. Ashworth was likewise minister of a congregation at Daventry, published several sermons, one of which was on the death of Dr. Isaac Watts, and was the author of a Hebrew grammar and an introduction to the knowledge of Plane Trigonometry. b. 1775.

ASINUS, ä-së-ne-us, Pollio, a Roman who took an active part in the dissensions and wars which preceded the fall of the republic, both in the field and in the forum. He was sprung from a provincial family of equestrian rank, received an excellent education, and became noted for his oratorical powers at an early age; having, before he had numbered the years which entitled him to sue for public offices, delivered many orations on national questions of importance. When 22, he impeached Cato for having, when tribune, used undue influence to procure the re-election of Pompey and Crassus to the consulship. In the subsequent wars between Pompey and Cæsar, he took the part of the latter, was present at the passage of the Rubicon, and was by Cæsar intrusted with numerous commands and public offices. After the memorable "Ides of March," at which time he was propætor in further Spain, where he was defeated by Sextus Pompey, and the rise of the Triumvirs into power, he hesitated as to his course of action, but ultimately gave in his adhesion to the Triumvirate, especially attaching himself to Antony. On being appointed consul in 40 b.c. he gave up Quinilius, his father-in-law, to proscription. Along with Marcenas, Pollio was a principal arbiter of peace in the conference at Brundisium, and accompanied the reconciled

Askew

Triumvirs to Rome, where he was installed in the consulship. In the year 39 b.c., after the meeting between young Pompey and the Triumvirs at Misenum, Asinius went into Illyria and Dalmatia as Antony's lieutenant, and for his victories over the Parthians obtained a triumph, though the subjugation of those tribes was not effected till the lieutenants of Augustus completed what Pollio had begun. When the final breach between Octavianus and Antony became inevitable, he separated himself from the party of the latter, whose conduct had rendered desperate the fortunes both of himself and his adherents. Pollio did not, however, join the opposite faction; and when asked by Octavianus to accompany him to Actium, he made the honourable reply: "My services to Antony have been too great, and his favours to me too many, for me to take part against him. I withdraw from the contest, and submit to the will of the conqueror." After the triumph of Octavianus, Pollio ceased to take part in public affairs, except in discharge of his forensic duties as an advocate; and died at his Tusculan villa in the year 4 a.d. His character, which is unimpeached, and his talents, which were great, procured him at least outward respect from Octavianus, who, under the title of Augustus, was supreme after Antony's death; but they were never friends. Asinius wrote a variety of works, consisting of tragedies, poems, epigrams, orations, and declamations, besides a history of the civil wars of Cæsar and Pompey in sixteen books, all of which have perished. He left an enduring monument, however, in the Aventine library, which he built on the site of the hall near the Temple of Liberty with a part of the wealth he had acquired in Dalmatia. Asinius was the severe critic of Cicero, Sallust, Livy, and even of Cæsar, whom he charges with carelessness in the composition of the Commentaries, though his own style was thought by his contemporaries to be open to still graver charges than those of the authors he condemned. It is a good feature in his character, that he was generally the friend and protector of the oppressed; and that he had patronised and encouraged both Virgil and Horace before either Augustus or Mæcenæ had noticed them.—His son, A. Gallus Salomonius, after filling a variety of offices under Augustus, was arrested in 30 a.d. by order of Tiberius while dining with that emperor at Caprea, sent to a solitary cell, and confined there till death from starvation released him three years afterwards. Gallus was the husband of Vipsania Agrippina, and by her he had several sons, three of whom attained to consular rank. He was the author of some epigrams, and of a treatise in which he compared his father and Cicero, giving the palm of excellence to the former, which, in a son, was not unnatural.

ASKEW, Anne, äsk-ew, an accomplished English lady, daughter of Sir William Askew, of Kelsey, in Lincolnshire. She was married, when young, to one Mr. Kyme, much against her inclination, and on account of harsh treatment received from him, went to the court of Henry VIII. to sue for a separation, where much attention was paid her by those ladies who were attached to the Reformation. In consequence of this she was arrested, and having confessed her religious principles, was committed to Newgate. She was first racked with savage cruelty in the Tower, and then burnt in Smithfield. b. 1520;

p. 1546. From her letters and other pieces published by Foxe and Strype, it appears that she was an accomplished as well as a pious woman.

ASKEW, James, was the author of a heroic poem in blank verse, commemorative of the defeat of the Spanish armada, and entitled "Elizabetha Triumphans," which was published in ito in the year 1580. Of his personal history nothing is known.

ASKEW, Anthony, son of Dr. Adam Askew, a physician of repute at Newcastle, was educated for his father's profession, which he practised for some years in Queen's-square, London, but never attained to any reputation in it. His distinction arises from his learning and the fine library which he collected, the catalogue of which, the Bibliotheca Askewiana, is well known to book collectors. He was, if not the founder, a great promoter of the bibliomania which took its rise about his time; and his library, which was rich in rare and fine-paper copies of valuable books and manuscripts, some of which he kept in glass cases and never allowed to be touched, was sold by auction after his death, the sale continuing for twenty-one days, and producing upwards of £5000, exclusive of a large collection of MSS., which were subsequently sold separately. Books from Dr. Askew's collection are to be found in most important libraries in the kingdom, and are held in high estimation. p. at Kendal, Westmoreland, in 1723; p. in London, 1774.

ASMAI, as'-mai, a celebrated Arabian scholar and author who flourished in the golden age of Mohammedan literature under the Abbasside dynasty at Bagdad. Al-Asmai composed a great variety of works, but the one by which he is best known is the famous "Romance of Antar," of which he was the author or compiler, which has still a high reputation in the East, and of which Sir W. Jones says that "it contains everything; is lofty, varied, and eloquent in composition, and deserves to be ranked among the most finished epics." The period of the poem is the time anterior to Mohammed, and the manners, customs, and usages of the Arab tribes—their wars, forays, feasting, single combats, courtesy, chivalry, and generosity—are its themes, which are all described with a fine loftiness of language, and minuteness of detail thoroughly Homeric, and entitle its author (or authors) to take rank with the marvellous old blind Grecian. Lived about 790.

ASMONÆUS, or ASAMONÆUS, a L'-vite, who was the founder of the Asmonean family, or family of the Maccabees, which ruled over Judea from 166 B.C. to 37. He is supposed to have lived just after the time of Alexander the Great. The name means a "rich man" or "prince."

ASPASIA, as'-pai-se-a, a Grecian courtesan, celebrated for her beauty and her talents. She was so eminent for her skill in philosophy and rhetoric, that the greatest men of the age, including even Socrates, did not scruple to visit her house. Pericles having divorced his wife, married Aspasia. p. at Miletus. Lived in the 5th century B.C.

ASPER, John (or Hans), as'-pair, a Swiss artist, who was so good at painting portraits as to be deemed little inferior to Holbein. p. at Zurich in 1499; died poor in 1571.

ASPERTINI, Amico, as'-pair-te'-ne, an eminent historical painter of Bologna, who painted many fine pictures for the cathedral of San Martino, in his native city, as well as many paintings in his success in inocu which he adopted and advocated vaccination, and for the many small-pox hospitals which he established in America. p. at Brookline, Mass., in 1743; p. 1523.

ASSAROTTI, Ottavio Giovanni Battista, as'-sar-ot-te, an ecclesiastic, who first instituted schools for the deaf and dumb in Italy. p. at Genoa, 1753; p. 1520.

ASSELYN, John, as-sel'-in, a Flemish landscape painter, who made Claude Lorraine his model in landscape, and Bamboccio in other pects. He was nicknamed Crabapple from a crook in his hand and fingers, which gave him hold of the pallet an awkward air. He is bright and clear in his colouring, firm in his touch, and his figures are well drawn and judiciously grouped. His pictures have always been held in high esteem, which they merit. p. at Diepen 1610; p. at Amsterdam 1680.

ASSER, or ASSENIUS MENESTES, as'-er, bishop of Sherborne, was a native of Wales, and a monk of St. David's. It is said that it was in accordance with his advice that Alfred contributed so greatly to the foundation of the university of Oxford. (See ALFRED). In gratitude to that prince, by whom he was created a bishop, Asser wrote his life, which was published by Wise, at Oxford, in 1722. p. about 910.

ASSESTO, Gioacchino, as-si-ras'-to, a Genoese artist, the pupil of Andrea Ansaldo, under whom he made so much progress that when only 16 years of age, he executed a picture of St. Anthony's Temptation for the monks of the order; and subsequently painted many altar-pieces for religious houses in Genoa. p. 1600; p. 1610.—His son Giuseppe painted in the same style and line of art as his father, but died young.

ASSUR, as'-shur, a "step" or "pace," the second son of Shem, and the founder of the Assyrian empire.

AST, Georg Anton Friedrich, aust, a distinguished German scholar, and professor of ancient literature at Landshut and Munich. He wrote numerous works on philosophy and philology, and edited an edition of the Dialogues of Plato. p. 1773; p. 1841.

ASTA, Andrea dell', as'-ta, a Neapolitan who, after studying the best masters at Rome, especially Raphael, returned to his native city, where he acquired great fame as a painter of religious subjects. p. 1633; p. 1721.

ASTBURY, J., as'-bur-e. The early history of this individual is quite unknown; but, by feigning weakness of intellect, he got himself introduced to the potteries of the Messrs. Elers, at Bradwell, near Hurslem, and thus obtained many of their secrets in the art of making pottery. He subsequently established himself at Shelton, where he was the first to make use of Bideford pipe-clay for lining culinary vessels. He made many other improvements in his art, and realized a fortune. p. about 1680; p. 1743.

THE DICTIONARY

Astell

Mary, as'-tel, the daughter of a merchant at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, became distinguished for the efforts she made to improve the social and intellectual condition of the female sex. With this view, she published several works, the first of which was entitled "A Serious Proposal to the Ladies for the Advancement of their great Interests," which was issued in two parts, but printed as a whole in 1697. She subsequently published "Letters concerning the Love of God;" a "Defence of the Female Sex;" "Reflections on Marriage," and some others. She was a firm, but not bigoted, adherent of the Church of England, and was held in high regard by many divines and other eminent persons of her time; one biographer saying that she had "a piercing wit, a solid judgment, a tenacious memory," and that she was "a great ornament to her sex and country." She was born at Newcastle in 1663, whence she removed, when 20 years of age, to London, where and in the vicinity she subsequently lived. Her death took place in May, 1731; she was buried in Chelsea churchyard.

ASTER, as'-ter, a dexterous archer of Amphipolis, who offered his services to Philip, king of Macedonia. Upon being slighted, he retired into the city which Philip was besieging, and aimed an arrow, on which was written, "For Philip's right eye." It struck the king's eye, and put it out; and Philip, to return the pleasantry, threw back the same arrow, with these words, "If Philip takes the town, Aster shall be hanged." The conqueror kept his word.

ASTLE, Thomas, as'-tel, an English antiquary, the son of a farmer in Staffordshire, who in 1770 was appointed to manage the printing of the ancient records of parliament. In 1775 he became chief clerk in the Record Office in the Tower, and on the decease of Sir John Shelley, succeeded to the office of keeper of the records. D. 1843.—Many papers by him are in the volumes of the "Archæologia;" besides which he wrote "The Origin and Progress of Writing, as well Hieroglyphic as Elementary," first printed in 1784, 4to, and again in 1803.

ASTLEY, John, ast'-lai, a portrait painter, who was born at Wem, Shropshire, early in the 18th century. He was not distinguished for his works, but was eminently so for his good fortune. In early life he was extremely poor, so much so, that he once, while a fellow student of Sir J. Reynolds at Rome, had to make a lack to his waistcoat out of one of his own sketches. After returning to England, however, he tried his fortunes in Dublin, and was so successful that in three years he saved 3000*l.* He then returned to London, and on his way captivated a wealthy widow named Daniel, who married him, and not only left him her own personal property, but the reversion of an estate worth 5000*l.* a year in the event of her daughter's death. This occurred shortly afterwards, and Astley obtained possession of the property. He now lived a life of pleasure for several years, but ultimately married a second time, and died in 1787, leaving a son and daughter by his second wife.

ASTLEY, Philip, the founder of Astley's amphitheatre, in Lambeth, London, was bred a cabinet-maker, became a soldier in the 15th regiment, known as Elliot's Light Horse, and after his discharge began his career as an equestrian performer. B. at Newcastle-under-Lyne,

Athanasio

1742; D. in Paris, 1814.—His name is here introduced more on account of the well-known character of the place which he founded and to which he gave his name, than from any idea of his personal merits.

ASTON, Sir Arthur, as'-lon, a commander in the service of Charles I., who led the dragons at the battle of Edgehill, and thrice defeated the Earl of Essex. He was successively governor of Reading and Oxford. Having the misfortune to break his leg, he was obliged to have it amputated. After the execution of the king, he served in Ireland, and was appointed governor of Drogheda, on the taking of which by Cromwell, he had his brains beaten out with his wooden leg. D. in Fulham. Lived in the 17th century.

ASTON, Anthony, a person who gained considerable notoriety, besides some reputation, as an actor about the opening of the 18th century, and who described himself as having played (not on the stage, but in actual life), the parts of "gentleman, lawyer, poet, actor, soldier, sailor, exciseman, and publican," not merely in Great Britain and Ireland, but also in the West Indies and America. He was the author of a burlesque imitation of the "Beggars' Opera," called the "Fools' Opera," and a supplement to Colley Cibber's "Lives of Famous Actresses."

ASTON, John Jacob, a German merchant, who contrived to amass one of the largest fortunes that have been realised in America. He was born at Wallendorf in 1763, and in 1784 emigrated to the United States, settling at New York, where he carried on an active trade in furs. In 1809 he set on foot the "American Peltry Company," establishing a factory or trading depot on the left bank of the river Colombia, which was called Astoria, after its founder. He left the greater part of his colossal fortune to establish the Astor Library, in New York, which is said to contain 100,000 vols. D. in New York, 1843.

ATAHUALPA, or ATAHUALPA, a'-ta-hoo'-al-pa', the last of the Incas of Peru. His father dying in 1523, he became king of Quito, and his brother Huascar obtained the throne of Peru; on which a war broke out between them, in which Huascar was defeated. About this time the Spaniards, headed by Pizarro, invaded Peru, where they were hospitably entertained by the king and his people, in return for which they treacherously held Atahualpa in captivity. The inca offered, as a ransom, to fill a room full of gold; but after the Spaniards had received the treasure they caused the unhappy monarch to be strangled, after a mock trial, in 1533.

ATAULPHUS, at-aet'-fus, a kinsman of Alaric, king of the Goths, whom he succeeded in 411 A.D., and established his capital at Narbonne. He had taken captive Placidia, the sister of the emperor Honorius, and married her in spite of her brother's opposition. He made war on the Alans, Vandals, and other tribes, and entered into alliance with the Romans, but the cowardice of the degenerate sons of the founders of the seven-hilled city, and the ascendancy which Placidia had acquired over Ataulphus, so disgusted his followers that they revolted and killed him at Barcelona in 415 A.D.

ATHANASIO, Pedro, at-a-na'-she-o, a Spanish historical painter, who was born at Granada in 1633, where he died in 1688. His pencil was very prolific, and his pictures not devoid of merit, his Conception of the Virgin being generally considered his masterpiece.

Athanasius

ATHANASIUS, ä-tha-nä'-she-us, a native of Alexandria, who distinguished himself so much at the council of Nice, that, on the death of Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, he was chosen to succeed him. He had been greatly opposed by the Arians before his consecration, and now their efforts against him were redoubled, as he refused to admit their leader into the church. (See ARIUS.) They raised against him various accusations, and at length procured his banishment. On the death of the emperor he returned to Alexandria, where he was received with great joy. When Constantine came to the throne, his enemies again prevailed; on which he fled to Rome, where Pope Julius espoused his cause, and caused him to be reinstated in his bishopric. At the end of the emperor Julian's reign, he was driven into exile again; but on the accession of Jovian, he was restored, and the Nicene creed with him. p. 373.—The creed of St. Athanasius is supposed to have been compiled by an African bishop in the 5th century.

ATA, Hakin-Ben, ä'-tä, a famous impostor who lived in the reign of the caliph Mehed, and who is the original of Moore's veiled prophet of Khorassan. Atha had lost an eye, and, to conceal the defect, wore a veil, or mask of gold, and hence was named Mokanna, the veil or helmet wearer. He promulgated the doctrine of a succession of incarnations of the Deity in human form, and asserted that the last and greatest of these had occurred in his own person. He soon gained many followers, who distinguished themselves by wearing white garments, and established himself in a castle in Transoxiana. Here he lived some time, deceiving his adherents into the belief of his power to work miracles by producing phenomena which they could not understand, but which his skill in chemistry and other sciences easily enabled him to do. At length the caliph sent an army against him, and finding that he could no longer resist, Mokanna poisoned all his attendants, and then threw himself into a caldron of corrosive liquid, in order that, by the total destruction of his body, it might be believed that he had been supernaturally removed from the earth. A lock of his hair, however, and the statements of women who had escaped destruction with the rest of his attendants, frustrated his object, though many of his followers long believed that he had ascended to heaven and would revisit the earth.

ATA-MELIK, Ala-Eddin Al Jowaini, a famous Persian statesman and historian, who flourished in the 13th century, and was the author of a "History of the Conquest of the World," giving an account of the foundation of the Mogul empire by Genghis Khan, and of the wars of the successors of that conqueror, together with the history of Persia, Khorassan, and Mezerenderan. He lived at the court of the governor of Khorassan, who entrusted the government to him during his own absence in Persia, and accompanied the sultan Hulaku in an expedition against the Ishmalians or Assassins, the library of whose princes was given up to Ata-Melik, and by him destroyed. He was subsequently governor of Bagdad, and did much to improve the condition of the country, especially by cutting a canal from the Euphrates to the Mosque of Kufa, thereby rendering fertile a tract of country which had previously been waste and barren. After administering the government with success for some years, he was accused of peculation, condemned to pay an enormous fine, scourged naked round the walls of Bagdad, and thrown into prison, where he died of a disorder of the brain about 1252, A.D.

ATHELING, Edgar, äth'-e-ling, son of Edward, and grandson of Edmund Ironside, king of England, was educated by Edward the Confessor, his great-uncle, who intended him for his successor. On his death, however, he was supplanted by Harold, son of Earl Godwin; and the success of William, duke of Normandy, at Hastings finally debarred him from the throne. He subsequently went with Baldwin II. to the crusade, and on his return was honoured by several of the European sovereigns for his valour. p. at Malmesbury.

ATHELSTAN, äth'-el-stan, king of England, was the natural son of Edward the Elder, whom he succeeded in 925. He obtained a great victory over the Danes in Northumberland, after which he reigned in tranquillity. He greatly encouraged commerce by conferring the title ofthane on every merchant who had made three voyages. p. 941.

ATHENÆUS, ä-the-né-us, a Greek grammarian, who wrote a work entitled the "Table-talk of the Sophists," published by Casaubon in 1657. s. at Naucratis, Egypt. Lived in the 3rd century.

ATHENION, äth'-ai-ne-on, the leader, in concert with Salvois, a flute player, of a servile insurrection in Sicily, about 104 B.C. After various vicissitudes of fortune, having several times defeated the Roman armies sent against him, he was slain in single combat by the consul Manlius Aquilius, on which his followers were dispersed and the insurrection was quelled.

ATKYNs, Sir Robert, at'-kins, the son of Sir Edward Atkyns, a baron of the Exchequer, and sprung from a family which for nearly two hundred years had always a member filling a high judicial position, was born in 1621. He received the rudiments of his education at his father's house, then went to Balliol College, Oxford, and then devoted himself to the study of the law, and became a member of Lincoln's Inn in 1638; was created a Knight of the Bath at the coronation of Charles II. in 1661, and at the same time received the degree of M.A. from the University of Oxford. In April, 1672, he was admitted a serjeant-at-law, and was next day sworn a judge of the Common Pleas, in which position he showed great zeal in the punishment of persons charged with complicity in the so-called Popish Plot, in which he appears to have been a believer. He resigned his seat on the bench in 1683, in order to avoid being made an instrument for the subversion of the law by James II. He afterwards wrote an opinion against the conduct of the government in the trial of Lord William Russell, and another in condemnation of the prosecution of Speaker William for authorizing the publication of Dangerfield's account of the Popish Plot, in which he vindicated the privilege of parliament; a third subject which he treated ably was the right claimed by James II. of dispensing with statutes—a claim which Sir Robert utterly denied, maintaining the constitutional principle that no one estate or parliament can set aside the acts of all three. After the Revolution of 1689, Atkyns was made Chief Baron of the Exchequer, and on the 19th of October in that year, was raised to the dignity of Speaker of the House of Lords, which he continued to hold till 1692. He resigned his seat in the exchequer in October, 1694, and retired to his country seat in Gloucestershire, where he died in 1709. His writings on legal subjects are numerous and valuable.

ATKINS, Sir Robert, F.R.S., the son of the preceding, born at Hadley, Barnet, on August 26, 1646, distinguished himself as a writer on topography and kindred subjects, having composed a work illustrative of the history and antiquities of Gloucestershire, which was published after his death, and is now very scarce. b. November 29, 1711.

ATTAR, Feridoddin, at-ar, a Persian poet and historian of the 13th century, was the son of a spice merchant of Nishapur, from which circumstance he obtained his surname. Feridoddin followed his father's occupation for some time, but afterwards abandoning it, devoted himself to consequence to spare his life. Accepting such a sum," said the poet; "there are those who will buy me at a higher price." Some time afterwards, the soldier was offered a sack of straw for his captive, who advised him to accept the offer, as it was as much as he was worth; whereupon the Tartar slew him in a fit of disappointment. He was born in 1119, and was, it is said, 114 years of age at his death.

ATTERBURY, Francis, at-ar-bur-e, an English prelate, who, after studying at Westminster school, was in 1681 elected to Christchurch, Oxford. In 1687 he took his degree of M.A., and, in the same year, vindicated the character of Luther against Obadiah Walker. He had for a pupil the Hon. Charles Boyle, afterwards earl of Orrery, whom he assisted in his controversy with Bentley. In 1691 he came to London, where his eloquence brought him into notice. He became chaplain to William and Mary, lecturer of St. Bride's, and preacher at the Bride-well chapel. In 1700 he engaged in a dispute with Dr. Wake on the rights of Convocation, and was presented with his doctor's degree by the university of Oxford; the same year he was installed archdeacon of Totnes. In 1704 he was promoted to the deanery of Carlisle, and in 1707, Bishop Trevelyan appointed him canon residentiary of Exeter. In 1709 he had a dispute with Hoadly on passive obedience. In 1710 he assisted Dr. Sacheverel in drawing up his defence, for which the doctor left him a legacy. The same year he was chosen prolocutor of the lower house of Convocation. In 1712 he was made dean of Christchurch, and in the year following promoted to the bishopric of Rochester and the deanery of Westminster. The death of Queen Anne put a stop to further advancement. On the breaking out of the rebellion in Scotland, he and Bishop Smalridge refused to sign the declaration of the bishops; besides which, Atterbury drew up some violent protests in the House of Lords. In 1722 he was apprehended on suspicion of being engaged in a plot to bring in the Pretender, for which he was committed to the Tower. Before his trial, he raised a difficulty as to whether he should appear in person or by counsel. This point produced a warm debate in the upper house. It was, however, ultimately decided that a bishop is not a peer of the realm, but only a lord of parliament, and that, therefore, the honour of the peerage could not be touched by his being tried before the Commons. He was then banished for life, and left the kingdom in June, 1723. b. at Milton, in Buckinghamshire, 1662; d. at Paris, 1732. His remains were brought to England, and interred in Westminster Abbey. Bishop Atterbury was a man of great learning and brilliant talents, and as a speaker, a preacher, and a writer, has had few equals.

ATTICUS, at-i-kus, Titus Pomponius, a Roman knight, who was descended from an ancient great-sisting Marius the younger in his schemes of ambition, he preserved the friendship of his adversary Sylla. In the contest between Cesar and Pompey, he maintained the friendship of both these generals, as well as that of Brutus and of Antony. Notwithstanding, likewise, the contentions between Antony and Augustus, he attempted to aggrandise himself, and to his moderation may be attributed the tranquillity and influence he enjoyed. His daughter was married to Agrippa. b. 109 B.C.; starved himself to death at the age of 77, 32 B.C.

ATTILA, at-il-la, king of the Huns, who ascended the throne with his brother Bleda in 430, and afterwards caused his associate to be assassinated. He obliged Theodosius II. to sue for peace, and laid him under tribute. In the reign of Valentinian, he invaded the Roman empire with an army of 600,000 men, laying waste many of its provinces. He entered Gaul at the head of a numerous army, and committed great ravages. The imperialists, however, attacked him at Châlons, and after a bloody contest forced him to retreat. Having devastated the greater part of Italy, he retired, on condition that Valentinian should pay him a large sum of money. Soon after his return home he married a beautiful maiden, and died the same night by the bursting of a blood-vessel (453), and with him expired the empire of the Huns.—Attila rejoiced in the name of the "Scourge of God," and, expressing a wish to extend his conquests over the whole world, often gratified his barbarous pride by dragging captive kings in his train. His body, deposited in a golden coffin, cased in another of silver and a third of iron, was buried in the midst of a large plain; and, like that of Alaric, his grave was filled with the most magnificent spoils obtained by conquest and war. After the ceremony, the barbarous Huns, desirous of concealing the tomb of their monarch, slaughtered all those captives who had dug the grave.

ATTINGHAUSEN, Werner Freyherr von, at-ing-hoo-sen, one of the founders of Swiss freedom, and whose name Schiller has rendered immortal by making him one of the prominent figures in his play of "William Tell." Attinghausen, like his ancestors before, and his descendants since, was landamman of the men of Uri, and was sent as ambassador to endeavour to conciliate Albert of Austria, but failed, and took a foremost part in the league organised by Tell, and which resulted in the overthrow of Austrian domination and the establishment of the independence of Switzerland.

ATTIRET, Jean Denys, at-e-rai, a French painter, attached to the Jesuit mission at Pekin, who, after completing his studies at Rome, went to China, and obtained the favour of the emperor Kien-Lung, to whom he had presented a picture of the Adoration of the Kings. The "celestial" monarch, however, disliking oil-colours, chiefly employed him in water-colour painting. He made drawings of many Chinese processions, festivals, and other Amongst others of his works was a portrait of the emperor, surrounding whom were introduced many of his distinguished officers, some of whom had to travel 2400 miles merely to get their likenesses taken. n. at Dole, in Franche-Comté, 1702; n. at Pekin, 1763.

ATWELL, Hugh, at-wel, an actor of some eminence, and a contemporary of Shakespear, but it does not appear that he played in any of that great dramatist's works, though it is certain that he sustained prominent parts in some of those of Ben Jonson. He died of consumption, Sept. 25, 1631, and had an "elegy" composed upon him by William Rowley, a fellow-actor and dramatic poet, the original MS. of which is in the possession of the Society of Antiquarians.

ATTWOOD, George, at-wood, an eminent lecturer on mathematics and philosophy, who took a distinguished degree at Cambridge, where he completed his education. He invented an apparatus for showing the uniform action of the force of gravity at the earth's surface, and was the author of a work on rectilinear and rotatory motion, and numerous papers in the Philosophical Transactions and other learned publications. He enjoyed the friendship and esteem of Pitt, who made him his private financial secretary, and bestowed upon him a pension of £500 a year. It is believed that many of Pitt's financial schemes were suggested, and the details elaborated, by Attwood. n. 1745; n. 1807.

ATTWOOD, Thomas, an eminent musical composer, who, for the coronation of George IV., produced "The King shall rejoice," and for that of William IV., "O Lord, grant the King a long life," both of which are deservedly esteemed. He also composed a number of glees and songs of great merit. n. 1787; n. in London, 1838.—At the time of his death Attwood was composer to the Chapels Royal, and organist of St. Paul's, and was buried in the vaults of the cathedral, under the organ which he was in the habit of playing.

AUBER, Daniel Francis Esprit, o'-bair, a modern French musical composer, the son of a printseller, in which trade he was initiated, but did not long pursue. His abilities were originally displayed in the composition of small pieces; but he soon became known by more important productions, although his first operas, "Le Séjour Militaire" and "Le Testament et les Billets-doux," were not at all successful. "La Bergère Châtelaine," however, produced in Paris in 1820, was a complete success; and after that he rose gradually in public favour, discovering a marvellous facility of composition, and writing about forty operas in the same number of years. n. at Caen, 1782.—Auber's style is light and graceful, and amongst his best-known works are—"Fra Diavolo," known as "Masaniello." He composed a march for the inauguration of the International Exhiing day.

AUBIGNÉ, Theodore Agrippa d', do-been-yai, a celebrated French soldier and historian, greatly esteemed by Henry IV., who was desirous of advancing his fortunes. Having, however, lost the royal favour by his frankness and bluntness, he retired to Geneva, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. n. 1550; n. 1630.—His chief work is the "Universal History," 1550—1601, which was condemned by the parliament of Paris. His son, Constant d'Aubigné, was father of the celebrated Madame de Maintenon.

AUBIGNÉ, MELLE D'. (See D'AUBIGNÉ.)
AUBIN, Gabriel Jacques de St., o'-lâ, a French painter and engraver, who excelled in historical subjects. n. 1721; n. 1770.—His two brothers, Augustus and Charles Garnain, were also good artists—especially the first. They too were engravers.

AUBREY, John, au'-brey, an English antiquary, who, in 1649, was entered of the Middle Temple, but did not continue the study of the law; and his means, which had been ample, began gradually to decline. He was one of the first members of the Royal Society; but, being reduced to poverty, was supported at the close of his life by Lady Long, of Draycot, in Wiltshire. n. at Easton Piers, Wiltshire, 1626; n. at Draycot, 1700.—His works are:—1. "Miscellanies, on Apparitions, Magic, Charms, &c.," 1696, and 1721 8vo. 2. "A Perambulation of the County of Surrey," 1719, 5 vols. 8vo. Besides which he left several curious MSS. to the museum at Oxford, some of which were subsequently printed.

AUBREY, Dr. William, an eminent civilian of the time of Queen Elizabeth, who employed him in many public affairs, held him in great respect, called him her "little doctor," and made him a master in Chancery and master of Requests, &c. He was one of the commissioners for the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, whose life he endeavoured earnestly to save, a circumstance which was remembered by her son when he came to the crown of England, and James would have made him lord-keeper had not death, in 1593, prevented it. The King, however, knighted two of his sons. n. 1529. He was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

AUBRIOT, Hugh, o'-bre-o, mayor of Paris, who built the Bastille, in 1369, it being intended as a fortification against the English. Being accused of heresy, he was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment within the very building he had raised. In 1381 he was released by the Muillotins, a mob of insurgents who had risen against taxation, and named him as their chief; but, quitting them, he retired into Burgundy, where he died in 1382. Besides building the Bastille, Aubriot designed and improved many public edifices, bridges, and canals in Paris.

AUBRY, Céleste, o'-bre, a French opera-dancer who, in the revolutionary times of 1793, was from the rare beauty of her form, chosen to personify the Goddess of Reason in those ceremonies by which it was thought to supersede Christian worship.

AUBRY DE MONTDIDIER, o-bre dai-mong-did'-e-ai, a French soldier, supposed to have been assassinated by his comrade, Richard de Macaire, in 1371. He is the hero of many dramatic compositions, founded on the details of the discovery of his murderer. Aubry's faithful dog persisted in pursuing and harassing Macaire; and this coming to the ears of King Charles V., he ordered a combat to be tried between them. In this singular battle the dog was the victor; and he has been celebrated ever since in the plays as the "Dog of Montargis," and the "Dog of Aubry, or the Forest of Bondy."

AUBRY DE LA BOUTCHAERIE, Claude Charles, Count, loo-shar'-dai-re, an able French artillery officer, who, entering the army at an early age, was present at all the great battles on the Rhine from 1792 to 1796. He afterwards joined Napoleon's army of Italy, and had the charge of artillery during the perilous crossing of the Alps. Subsequently he served in St. Domingo; and, returning to France, performed great engineering feats with the army, and was present at the battle of Essling, where he was severely wounded. He accompanied Napoleon in the expedition to Russia, having the command of the artillery of the second division of the army, and greatly distinguished himself at Smolensko, Polotsk, and Bérésina. At Lutzen and Bautzen, also, in 1813, he displayed much skill and bravery; and finally at Leipsic received his death-wound. b. 1773; d. 1813.

ARBUSSON, Peter d', do-boos'-avng, grand master of the Knights of St. John, who, in 1480, vigorously repulsed the attack made upon the island of Rhodes by the Turks, and which was called the first siege of Rhodes, and lasted eighty-nine days. This was in the time of Mahomet II., who on this occasion is said to have had 9000 slain and 15,000 wounded. Prince Zizim, brother of Bajazet, and son of Mahomet II., having escaped to Rhodes to avoid the vengeance of the sultan, d'Arbusson was, with much difficulty, prevailed on to deliver him to the pope; and for this and his other great services, both in the defence of Rhodes and in aid of the Christian religion against the Turks, he received a cardinal's hat. b. at La Marche, 1423; d. 1503.

AUCHMUTY, General Sir Samuel, awk-mu'-te, an American, who, in 1776, entered the British army as a volunteer under Sir William Howe, and was present at several actions during the first American war. In 1801, 1802, and 1803 he served in Egypt, and on his return to England, had the grand cross of the Bath conferred upon him. He subsequently commanded in South America, and on the 3rd of October, 1807, attacked and took Monte Video, the Gibraltar of America, for which he received the thanks of both houses of Parliament. In 1810 he sailed for India as commander-in-chief in the presidency of Fort St. George, and in 1811 commanded at the reduction of the island of Java. For this service he also received the thanks of both houses of Parliament. On his return he was made a lieutenant-general, and subsequently commander of the forces in Ireland. b. in New York, 1756; d. in Dublin, 1822.

AUDEBERT, Jean Baptiste, o'-de-bair, a talented French naturalist, draughtsman, and engraver, who excelled in elegant representations of animals. His productions in this respect are esteemed the most valuable of their kind. b. at Rochefort, 1759; d. 1800.—His first performance was "L'Hist. Nat. des Singes, des Makis, et des Galéopithèques," 1 vol. folio, 1800; a work which, from its general excellence, created a great sensation among naturalists. He was engaged upon other works of equal magnificence when he died.

AUDENAERD, or OUDENAERD, Robert van, oo'-den-aird, eminent as a painter and engraver, was born in Ghent in 1663. He visited Rome, and while studying under Carlo Maratti, executed some engravings which so pleased that artist, that he advised his pupil to abandon the pencil for the graver, and gave him some of his own pictures to work upon. Audenaer generally adhered to Maratti's advice, though he occasionally painted pictures for the churches of Ghent, to which city he returned. b. 1743.

AUDIUS, or AUDEUS, oo'-de-us, a native of Mesopotamia, who founded a sect of heretics who were named after him. He lived in the 4th century. He is said to have taught the doctrine of the eternity of fire, water, and darkness; and the resemblance of the Deity to the human form. This last heresy spread extensively among the clergy, especially in the eastern world. Audius is admitted to have been a man of learning and talent, and to have done much to spread Christianity among the barbarian nations of his time.

AUDLEY, Sir James, aud'-le, a chivalrous English knight who distinguished himself under Edward III. in France, and was one of the first knights of the Garter. He was present at the battle of Poitiers, where he was so badly wounded, that his esquires were obliged to bear him from the field. For his services a pension was assigned him, and he was appointed constable of Gloucester castle, governor of Aquitaine, and seneschal of Poitou. b. in Staffordshire, 1314; d. at Fontenay-le-Comte, Poitou, 1360.

AUDLEY OF WALDEN, Thomas Audley, Lord a man of whose early life little is known. In 1529 he was chosen speaker of the Parliament, in which capacity he was very subservient to Henry VIII., who, on the resignation of Sir Thomas More, gave him the seals, and the priory of Christchurch, with all its church-plate and lands. He sat in judgment on his predecessor, Sir Thomas More, and on Bishop Fisher. b. at Earl's Colne, Essex; d. in London, 1544.—Audley appears to have been a mere tool of King Henry, and to have been rapacious in the seizure of church property. He was a great benefactor to Magdalen College, Cambridge.

AUDOUIN, François Xavier, o'-do-ä, usually called Xavier Audouin, a native of Limoges, took an active part in the great French Revolution: was a member of the Jacobins' club, in which he made frequent speeches; was sent to inquire into the causes of the revolt in La Vendée; was colleague of Pache, whose daughter he married, in the ministry of war; was ordered by the Directory to write the history of the revolutionary war, and held the office of secretary-general of the prefecture of Moulins under Bonaparte. He published several works on administrative subjects, one, particularly, on the Commercial Marine, and another on the necessity of placing the French navy on a more efficient and extended basis. b. 1766; d. 1837.

AUDOUIN, Jean Victor, a French entomologist and comparative anatomist, who added many important facts to the sciences of which he was an ardent investigator. b. at Paris, 1797; d. 1841.

AUDOUIN, Pierre, an eminent French engraver, whose works are held in high estimation, particularly his portraits of the Bourbon royal family of France, which he executed shortly after the restoration. b. 1763; d. 1822.

AUDRAN, o'-drawing, the name of a family of French artists. Charles, the elder, produced a great many excellent works, known from being marked with the letter K. b. at Paris, 1594; d. 1674.—Claude, nephew of the preceding, studied under his uncle. He was employed by Le Brun in painting part of the pictures of Alexander's battles, at Versailles, and became professor of painting in the Royal Academy of Paris. b. at Lyons, 1639; d. at Paris, 1684.—Gérard, the brother of the last-mentioned, and the most celebrated of the family, studied under Le Brun at Paris, and engraved that artist's pictures of Alexander's battles in a masterly manner. b. at Lyons, 1640; d. at Paris, 1703.—Claude, nephew of Gérard, became famous for painting ornaments. He was appointed king's painter. b. at Lyons, 1668; d. 1734.

AUDUBON, John James, aw'-doo-bon, a distinguished American naturalist, whose father was the first to inspire him with that love of natural objects with which his pursuits were to be afterwards so prominently associated. The study of birds especially became a passion with him; and, in order that he might become a good draughtsman, his father sent him to Paris, at the age of 14, and placed him in the studio of the celebrated David. He applied himself so diligently to study, that when he returned to his native country, in his 17th year, he had become a skilful artist; and his father gave him a farm on the banks of the Schuylkill. Here, ornithological studies employed a great deal more of his time than farming employments. He married, and continued to explore the American forests in search of new specimens of the feathered tribes to enlarge his collections; these excursions were prolonged to nearly 15 consecutive years. Having removed to Louisville, he met Wilson, the celebrated Scotch ornithologist, whose conversation added still more to Audubon's ardour in his favourite pursuits. In 1810, with his wife and child, he set out on an expedition down the Ohio; next went through Florida: and so continued, as long as he lived, to extend his knowledge of American birds. He visited England twice, and was everywhere received with the attention and distinction due to so truthful a naturalist. He became a fellow of the Zoological and Linnean societies of London; of the Natural History Society of Paris, and of numerous other societies of smaller note. His book on American ornithology is the largest and grandest that has ever been published. b. in Louisiana, 1780; d. at Minniesland, near New York, 1851.

AUENBRUGGER, or AVENBRUGGER, Leopold, ou-en-broog'-er, an eminent German physician, the inventor of percussion as a means of discovering diseases of the chest. b. at Gratz, in Styria, 1722; d. at Vienna, 1809.—Percussion was little practised in England till 1824, when the work of Auenbrugger, with Corvisart's commentaries, was translated by Dr. John Forbes, after which it came more into practice.

AUGER, Edmund, ozh'-ai, a French Jesuit, who is said to have converted 40,000 Protestants to the Roman communion by the force of his arguments. b. 1515; d. 1591.

AUGER, Louis Simon, a French journalist, man of letters, and critic, was made a member of the Institute on its reconstitution in 1816, was appointed perpetual secretary of the Académie Française on the dismissal of Raynouard; and amongst many other works, wrote a very excellent commentary on Molière; but his numerous public appointments having made him many enemies, he was constantly engaged in literary warfare. Without any apparent reason, he, on the 2nd of January, 1829, committed suicide by throwing himself into the Seine. b. 1772.

AUGEREAU, Pierre François Charles, ozh'-ero, duke of Castiglione, and marshal of France, entered the French carabiniers at 17, but subsequently became a soldier in the Neapolitan service. Having obtained his discharge in 1792, he volunteered into the revolutionary army of his country, and so rapidly distinguished himself, that when Napoleon invaded Italy, he considered Augereau one of his most daring and successful officers. At the bridge of Lodi he headed his brigade, and carried it in the face of the batteries of the enemy; he captured Bologna, and gave Lugo up to pillage and massacre, on account of the stout resistance which its inhabitants made to his arms. At Castiglione, Augereau covered himself with glory, and had the title of duke conferred on him. At Arcola he particularly distinguished himself, and had his bravery rewarded and acknowledged by the Directory. The coup d'état of the 18th Fructidor, planned by Barras, was intrusted to his execution, and carried out with perfect success. For this service he had the command of the army on the German frontier given him; but on account of the violence of his revolutionary principles, he was deprived of it and removed to Perpignan. When Napoleon returned from Egypt he was in Paris, but was slighted by that great general. In the campaign of Marengo he had the command of a division, and in 1805 was created a marshal. In 1806 he fought at Jena, and at Eylau commanded the left of the French. In this great battle he was suffering from a wound and from fever; but he had himself tied upon his horse, and remained to the last on the field. In 1809 and 1810 he commanded in Spain. In 1812, when Napoleon set out for Russia, he was left behind to form a corps of reserve at Berlin. In 1814 he was appointed to defend the south-east of France against the Austrians, but gave way before superior numbers. This irritated Napoleon, who viewed his conduct as approaching to treachery. On the fall of Napoleon, Augereau made his peace with the Bourbons, and was created a peer. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, Augereau offered him his services, but they were not accepted, and after Waterloo he sat on the council which condemned Marshal Ney. Soon after this his own life terminated. b. in Paris, 1757; d. 1818.

AUGUSTI, Christian J. W., aw-gus'-te, a distinguished German theologian, who rose to the highest academical honours. b. at Eschenberg 1771; d. 1841.

AUGUSTINE, St., aw-gus'-tin, one of the fathers of the Christian church, who, although he had all the advantages of a good education squandered much of his time in debauchery. In 371 his father sent him to Carthage, where he became a convert to the Manichæans, and taught rhetoric with great reputation, but still continued his licentious course of life, notwithstanding the great efforts his mother made to reclaim him. Wearied with his African life, Augustine removed to Rome, where he taught rhetoric with great applause, and was appointed its professor at Milan. Here the sermons of St. Ambrose effected his conversion; and, renouncing his heretical opinions, he was baptized in 357. The next year he returned to Africa, and was ordained a priest. He was at first the coadjutor of Valerius, bishop of Hippo, and afterwards his successor. n. at Tagaste, in Africa, 354; p. 430.—His writings have always been held in veneration by the Roman Catholic Church; and from them was constructed that system commonly designated scholastic divinity.

AUGUSTINE, or AUSTIN, ST., the first archbishop of Canterbury, was a Roman monk, sent, about 597, by Gregory I., with forty others, to preach the gospel in England. On landing in Thanet, they informed King Ethelbert of their purpose, when the king assigned them Canterbury for their residence, with permission to exercise their function. The monarch himself embraced Christianity, but never attempted to bring over his subjects by force. Augustine was consecrated, at Arles, archbishop and metropolitan of the church, and fixed his seat at Canterbury. He now endeavoured to convert the Welsh bishops to his tenets, but met with great opposition from them, and died without accomplishing his object about the year 605.

AUGUSTINUS VON OLMUTZ, av-gus-té-noos fon ol'-mootz, a scholar and author of Moravia, who largely contributed to the revival of learning in that country. His works are very numerous, and embrace a great variety of topics. His family name was Kaseimbrot, but he was always known as Olmutz, from the place of his birth. p. about 1470; p. suddenly 11th May, 1513. The early reformer, Van Henten, was one of his numerous literary and personal friends.

AUGUSTULUS, or ROMULUS AUGUSTUS, av-gus-tu-lus rom'-u-lus, the last of the Roman emperors in the West, was the son of Orestes, who, having deposed Julius Nepos, refused the throne for himself, but in 476 placed his son upon it. Shortly after, Odoacer, king of the Heruli, invaded Italy, slew Orestes, and deprived the young emperor of his dignity. He was, however, suffered to live a private life in Campania, and had a pension of 6000 pieces of gold annually allowed him. With him ended the Roman empire in the West.

AUGUSTUS, OCTAVIANUS CÆSAR, av-gus-tus ok-tú'-se-áv'-nus sê'-sar, second emperor of Rome, was son of Octavius, a senator, and Accia, or Atia, who was the sister of Julius Cæsar. He was born during the consulship of Cicero, and was adopted by his uncle, Julius Cæsar, the greatest part of whose fortune he inherited. At the age of twenty he was made consul, and though his youth and inexperience were ridiculed by his enemies, yet he rose by his prudence and valour, and made war against them on pretence of avenging the death of his uncle. He fought, with success, at the sieges of Mutina and Perugia, the battle of Philippi, in Sicily, and at the battle of Actium. The first and last were against M. Antony, the second against L. Antony, the brother of the triumvir; the third was against Brutus and Cassius, and the fourth against Sextus Pompey, the son of Pompey the Great. He united his forces with those of Antony at the battle of Philippi; but had he not been supported by the activity of his colleague, he would have been totally defeated in that engagement. In his triumvirate with Antony and Lepidus, he obtained the western parts of the Roman empire, and, like his two colleagues, he more firmly to establish his power, proscribed his enemies and cut them off. The triumvirate lasted ten years. He had given his sister Octavia in marriage to Antony, to cement their alliance; but Antony deserted her for the fascinations of Cleopatra. Augustus immediately took up arms, ostensibly to avenge the wrongs of his sister, but, perhaps, rather from a desire to remove a man whose existence and power kept him in continual alarm. Both parties met at Actium, 31 p.c., to decide the question of empire. Antony was supported by all the strength of the East, and Augustus by Italy. Cleopatra fled from the battle with sixty ships; an event which ruined the interest of Antony, who followed her into Egypt. The conqueror soon after pursued them, besieged Alexandria, and honoured with a magnificent funeral the unfortunate Antony and the celebrated queen, whom the fear of being led in the victor's triumph at Rome had driven to commit suicide. (See ANTOXY.) Augustus having established peace all over the world, closed the gates of the temple of Janus, in the same year which saw the birth of our Saviour. He was twice resolved to lay down the supreme power, immediately after the victory obtained over Antony, on account of his failing health; but his two faithful friends, Meenas and Agrippa, dissuaded him, and observed that he would leave the empire the prey of the most powerful, and expose himself to the greatest dangers. n. at Rome, 63 p.c.; p. at Nola, 14 a.d. after reigning 41 years.—He was an active ruler, and consulted the good of the Romans with the most anxious care. He visited all the provinces except Africa and Sardinia, and his consummate prudence and experience gave rise to many salutary laws. He is, however, accused of licentiousness; but the goodness of his heart, the fidelity of his friendship, and the many excellent qualities which the poets whom he patronized have, perhaps truly, celebrated, made some amends for his natural infirmities. He was ambitious of being thought handsome, and, as he was publicly reported to be the son of Apollo, he wished his flatterers to represent him with the figure and attributes of that god. He distinguished himself by his learning, was a master of the Greek language, and wrote some tragedies, besides memoirs of his life and other works, none of which are extant. He married four times, but he was unhappy in his matrimonial connexions, and his only daughter, Julia, disgraced herself and her father by the debauchery and licentiousness of her manners. He recommended at his death his adopted son, Tiberius, as his successor. Virgil wrote his scarcely-surpassed epic poem, the Æneid, at the desire of Augustus, whom he represented under the character of Æneas. The name of Augustus was afterwards given to succeeding Roman emperors.

AUGUSTUS, elector of Saxony, reigned in general peace, and was, by some, esteemed a prince so wise as to be called the Justinian of Saxony. He greatly embellished Dresden, and built the splendid palace of Augustenburg. n. 1536; p. 1536.

AUGUSTUS FREDERICK I., king of Poland and elector of Saxony. To the former dignity he was elected in 1697, out of many competitors. He formed a strict alliance with Peter the Great against Sweden and Turkey; and from this time may be dated the origin of Russian influence in Poland. In his wars with Sweden he may be said to have been unsuccessful, although his troops gained some victories; and at length, completely defeated at Clissow, 1703, he was forced by Charles XII. to abandon his claim to the Polish throne. The Swedish monarch, however, being beaten by Peter at Pultowa, Augustus was reinstated, and continued in possession of his kingdom, which, however, had fallen into a state of great disorganization, from which it never recovered. n. at Dresden, 1670; p. 1733.—His habits were luxurious and licentious, and one of his many natural children was the famous Marshal Saxe.

AUGUSTUS FREDERICK II., elector of Saxony and king of Poland, was the son of Augustus I. He was an indolent, idle, and pleasure seeking prince, and his politics were entirely dependent on Russia. His daughter Maria Josepha was married to the Dauphin of France, from which alliance sprung Louis XVI., Louis XVIII., and Charles X. n. at Dresden, 1696; p. 1763.

AUGUSTUS FREDERICK, prince of Great Britain and Ireland, and duke of Sussex, was the sixth son and the ninth child of George III. He was a benevolent, unostentatious prince, taking a deep interest in those questions which had for their object the amelioration of the social condition of the people, promoting political reform, and giving his hearty support to the abolition of the slave-trade. He was twice married; first to Lady Augusta Murray, second daughter of the earl of Dunmore, Scotland, which marriage was subsequently set aside; and secondly, to Lady Cecilia Letitia Buggin (widow of Sir George Buggin), who was created Duchess of Inverness. n. at Buckingham Palace, 1773; p. at Kensington Palace, 1843.

AULUS GELLIUS, au-lus jell-e-us, a Greek grammarian, whose "Noctes Atticæ," or Attic Nights, has gone through a variety of editions, and been translated into English by Mr. Beloe. Lived in the 2nd century, from the time of Trajan to that of Marcus Aurelius.

AUMALE, Charles de Lorraine, duc d', do'-male, one of the leaders of the Catholic party in Paris, after the assassination of the Duke of Guise, in 1588. He was sentenced to be broken on the wheel for high treason by the parliament of Paris, which sentence was carried out in effigy in July, 1595. p. at Brussels, 1631.

AUMALE, Henri Eugène Philippe Louis, duc d', fourth son of Louis Philippe, king of the French, early entered the army, and served in Africa under the duke of Orleans and Generals Bugeaud and Baragney d'Hilliers. Weakened by fever, he returned to Paris in 1841; and here an unsuccessful attempt was made to shoot him. Re-joining the forces in Algeria, he gained some considerable successes, and in 1847 was appointed governor-general, and in that capacity received the submission of Abd-el-Kader. The news of the revolution in Paris, of February, 1848, reached him in Algeria, and in the following month, embarking with his brother, he sailed for England to join there the other members of his family. n. 1822.

ATMONT JOHN d', do'-mawng, count of Châteauroux, a French general, who displayed great abilities, and was made by Henry III. marshal of France. Henry IV. appointed him governor of Champagne, and afterwards of Brittany. He was shot at the siege of Camper, near Rennes, 1595. n. 1522.—He had served six monarchs,—Francis I., Henry II., Francis II., Charles IX., Henry III., and Henry IV.

AUVON, or AULVON, Marie Catharine, countess of, ô'-noi, a French authoress, who, at the close of the 17th century, was a distinguished ornament of the French Court, and contributed largely to the light literature of her day. She is principally known through the success of her "Fairy Tales," which were imitations of a style of composition introduced in France by Charles Perrault, and which achieved an amount of popularity equal to those of her master. The titles of her stories will, to some extent, indicate their character. Some of these are, "The White Cat," "The Yellow Dwarf," "The Fair One with the Golden Locks," "Cherry and Fair Star," several of which have formed the basis of successful spectacles and pantomimes, and other extravaganzas. n. 1650; p. 1705.—This lady left four daughters behind her, one of whom, Madame de Hère, inherited talents similar to those by which her parent was distinguished.

AURELIAN, Lucius Domitius, au-re'-le-an, a Roman emperor, was the son of a peasant in Pannonia. He displayed such skill and valour as a soldier, that Valerian, having raised him to very high rank in the army, at last invested him with the consulate. On the death of Claudius II., in 270, who recommended him as his successor, he ascended the imperial throne. He delivered Italy from the barbarians, defeated Tetricus, who had assumed the title of emperor in Gaul, and conquered Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, a.d. 273. After these victories, he entered Rome in triumph, and next turned his attention to the improvement of the city, and to the reformation of public manners. On his march against Persia, he was assassinated by his mutinous troops, a.d. 275. n. : p. 212 a.d.

AURELIUS VICTOR, Sextus, a Roman historian, who, though born of mean parents, in Africa, raised himself by his talents to distinction. In 361 Julian made him prefect of Pannonia Secunda, and in 373 he was chosen consul with Valentinian. Lived in the 4th century.—His Roman history has been several times printed, and is considered both faithful and minute.

AURUNGZEBE, au-rung-zeel, emperor of Hindostan, known as the Great Mogul, was the youngest son of Shah Jehan, of the dynasty of Timur, and early in his youth affected religious sanctity; but, in 1658, he and his brother Murad seized Agra, and made their father prisoner. Soon afterwards he put Murad and another brother, Dara, to death, and, ultimately, in 1658, he dethroned his aged father, who died in 1665. Aurungzebe greatly enlarged his dominions, and became so formidable that all the eastern princes sent him ambassadors. His latter days were embittered by jealousy of the ambitious views of his sons, and he constantly resided in his camp, which was prodigiously large, and resembled a populous city. n. 1618; p. at Ahmednuggur, 1707. By his will, Aurungzebe divided his possessions among his sons. He was the 12th of the energetic sovereigns who sat on the Mogul throne during the 17th century.

AUSONIUS, Decimus Magnus, aw-so'-ne-us, son of a physician at Bordeaux, who became a teacher of grammar and rhetoric, and also a writer of Latin poems, at that place. His fame reached Rome, and Valentinian, the emperor, appointed him tutor to his son Gratian. In 379 he was raised to the consular dignity. He died about the year 395. His poems, though unequal, have great merit.

AUSTEN, William, aws'-ten, an English metal-founder of considerable celebrity, who had a share in constructing the tomb of Richard de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, to be seen in St. Mary's church, Warwick. Lived in the 15th century.

AUSTEN, Jane, the authoress of several popular novels, which have appeared in different editions. All her portraits delineate characters of every-day English life, and are marked by no very strong traits either morally or intellectually. The chief of her productions are "Sense and Sensibility;" "Pride and Prejudice;" "Mansfield Park;" "Emma;" and "Persuasion." b. at Steventon, Hampshire, 1775; d. at Winchester, 1817.

AUVERGNE, Theophilus de La Tour d', do'-vern, a distinguished French soldier and scholar, who, entering the service early, distinguished himself by his military bearing and by his devotion to study. He was present in many actions during the American war, and was offered a pension by the king of Spain, which, however, he refused. The French revolution found him a captain, and he was one of the first who volunteered to defend the territory of France against its enemies, without any wish for promotion; and it was only as captain of the longest standing that he accepted the command of all the grenadier companies, called the Infernal Column. In every conflict he was ever foremost, and he introduced more generally the bayonet into the French army. He was taken prisoner by the English, and after regaining his liberty, resumed his career by replacing a simple conscript, the son of an old and feeble friend. He served in many battles under Bonaparte, who offered him higher rank, but which he refused, and was declared by Napoleon "the first grenadier of the French republic." b. 1743; d. at the battle of Oberhausen, 1800. — He is the author of a French-Celtic dictionary, a Glossary of forty-five languages, and other philological works of merit. The following anecdote is told of him:—A person connected with the government was boasting of his influence, and desired to know what he could do for Auvergne, whose clothes were in a deplorable condition. "What do you wish to have, the command of a battalion, or a regiment? You have only to speak." "Oh no!" said La Tour, "I only want a pair of shoes."

AUZOUT, Adrien, o'-zoo, a French mathematician, who is said to have invented the micrometer, which is still in use amongst astronomers to measure the apparent diameter of celestial bodies, and his treatise on which was printed in 1667. b. at Rouen; d. 1691.—He was the first who thought of applying the telescope to the astronomical quadrant.

AVAILOS, Ferdinand Francis d', da'-va-los, marquis of Pescara, a Neapolitan who served with great distinction in the army of Charles V., and in 1512 was taken prisoner at the battle of Ravenna. He beguiled the hours of captivity by writing a "Dialogue on Love," which he dedicated to his wife, the beautiful and accomplished Vittoria Colonna. On being released, he again entered into active service, and contributed greatly to the gaining of the battle of Vicenza over Aliviano and the Venetian forces. Subsequently he took Milan, gave up Como to pillage, and in 1523, in the campaign against the French, assisted in relieving Padua, and was present at Lodi and Pizzighettone, as well as at the reduction of Cremona. In 1524 he played a foremost part in the battle of Pavia, which was so disastrous to Francis I., and his conduct to the captive king showed much magnanimity. He revealed to Charles V. a plot of the Italians to drive out the Spaniards, and soon after died. b. about 1493; d. at Milan, 1552.

AVANZI, Jacopo, av-an'-jo, an eminent Italian painter of the 14th century, who was held in high esteem in his time. He was called "Dalle Madonne," because he seldom painted any other subject but the Virgin Mary.

AVANZI, Simon, called "Simone dai Crocifissi," or Simon of the Crucifixions, because the death of our Saviour was his favourite subject. He was contemporary with and a friend of the preceding.—There was also a Giuseppe Avanzi who painted historical subjects, and was a native of Ferrara. b. about 1645; d. 1663.

AVELLINO, Giulio, av-el'-no, a native of Messina, where he was born about 1645, and in his landscapes somewhat resembles Salvator Rosa, of whom he is supposed to have been a pupil. He passed most of his life in Ferrara, where his talents were held in high estimation. d. 1700.

AVENIZ, Clement Charles de l', la-vair-de', a French statesman and finance minister under Louis XV. He was counsellor of Parliament; but through his propositions for reform lost position, and in 1764 received his dismissal. He retired to his estate, where he employed himself in agricultural pursuits, but was guillotined in 1793 on an absurd charge. b. at Paris, 1723.

AVERRONES, or IAN ROSCH, a-ver'-o'-es, an Arabian philosopher and physician, who succeeded his father in the chief magistracy of Cordova, the capital of the Moorish possessions in Spain. He was afterwards made chief judge in Morocco, and having appointed deputies there, he returned to Spain. The freedom of his opinions, however, gave offence to the more zealous Mussulmans, and he was degraded from his office and thrown into prison; but on doing penance, and making a recantation, he was released. b. at Morocco, 1198. The admiration of Averroes for Aristotle was almost enthusiastic, and his commentaries on that philosopher's works procured him the name of the "Commentator." He also wrote a treatise on the art of physic, an epitome of Ptolemy's "Almagest," and a treatise on astrology.

AVESBURY, Robert of, avis-bur'-e, an English historian who wrote the history of the reign of Edward III. as far as 1356. b. 1360.—This personage styles himself registrar of the archbishop of Canterbury's court. The principal excellence of his work consists in the accuracy of its dates, and the simplicity with which he works his facts into a plain narrative.

AVILA, Louis d', dav'-e-la, a Spanish historian and commander of the order of Alcantara. He wrote the history of the war carried on by Charles V. against the German Protestants, and "Memoirs of the War in Africa." Lived in the 16th century.—Charles deemed himself fortunate in having such an able chronicler of the remarkable events by which his reign was characterized.—There are others of this name mentioned in Spanish history.

AVILA, Sancho d', a Spanish commander who served under the duke of Alva and Requesens in the Netherlands, and equalled the ferocious Alva in his atrocities. He defeated Louis of Nassau, and gave up Antwerp to what is called the "Spanish fury." He was killed at the siege of Maestricht, 1579.

AVISON, Charles, av'-i-son, a celebrated musical composer, a pupil of Geminiani, author of an "Essay on Musical Expression," and several sets of concertos. b. about 1710; d. at Newcastle-on-Tyne, 1770.

AXTEL, Daniel, aks'-tel, a colonel in the parliamentary army during the civil war, who was originally a grocer, but becoming a follower of the Puritans, was persuaded to engage against the king. He had the principal charge of Charles I. on his trial, and behaved with singular brutality. He accompanied Cromwell to Ireland, where his courage procured him the governorship of Kilkenny. In 1659 he returned to England, to prevent, if possible, the restoration of Charles II. In 1660 he was seized by the royalists, tried for high treason, and executed.

AYALA, Pedro Lopez d', a-ya'-la, the most popular of Spanish chroniclers, and a great favourite of Peter the Cruel, king of Castile, as well as of his three successors, Don Henry of Trastamara, Don John I., and Henry III. He was made prisoner at the battle of Najera, in 1367, brought to England, where he was cast into a dark dungeon, and fettered with chains. His sorrows and sufferings in this state of "durance vile" are described in his poems. He was set at liberty after the payment of a large ransom; and returning to Castile, was again actively engaged in the service of the crown. b. 1332; d. at Calahorra, 1407.—He was the contemporary of Froissart, and his chronicle embraces that period of history when Spain was most nearly connected with the political action of France and England. It is wanting in the picturesque chivalric painting of Froissart, but is deemed honest and trustworthy.

AYESHA, ai-e'-sha, wife of Mohammed, and daughter of Abu-Beker, one of the first and warmest supporters of the Prophet. Though she bore her husband no children, yet he loved her better than his other wives; and in his last illness had himself conveyed to her house, where he died in her arms. She opposed the succession of Ali, and loved an army against him. After a severe contest she was taken prisoner, but was treated by the conqueror with great lenity. d. 677.

AYLIFFE, John, ail'-if, an English jurist who left many works on civil and canon law, but of whose personal history little is known. Flourished in the first half of the 18th century.

AYLMER, John, ail'-mer, an English prelate, who was tutor to Lady Jane Grey. In 1553 he was made archdeacon of Stow, in Lincolnshire, and devoted himself to study.

throned, he returned to his native country; and in 1576 was made bishop of London. He was a very diligent prelate, and active against the Puritans, for which he has been severely censured by their writers; but it is said that he was learned in the languages, a deep divine, and a ready disputant. b. in Norfolk, 1521; d. at Fulham, 1594.—An instance of the humour with which this prelate roused an inattentive audience whilst preaching, is given by Wood. "When his auditory grew dull and inattentive, he would, with some pretty and unexpected conceit, move them to attention. Among the rest was—He read a long text in Hebrew; whereupon all seemed to listen what would come after such strange words, as if they had taken it for some conjuration; but he showed them folly that, when he spake English, whereby they might be instructed and edified, they neglected and hearkened not to it; and now when he read Hebrew, which they understood no word of, they seemed careful and attentive." Something of this sort might be advantageously practised by some of our modern divines when they find their audiences becoming inappreciative of their discourses.

AYLOFFE, Sir Joseph, Bart., ai'-lof, of Framfield, in Sussex, an eminent antiquary, and fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies. In 1736 he was appointed secretary to the commissioners for building Westminster bridge, and became one of the keepers of the documents in the State Paper-office. b. at Framfield, Sussex, 1703; d. 1781.—Sir Joseph was called the Montfaucon of England, and his wide and accurate knowledge of our municipal rights and national antiquities, and the agreeable manner in which he communicated what he knew to his friends and the public, made his death be sincerely regretted by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. He printed in 1772 calendars of the ancient charters, &c. in the Tower of London. He also edited editions of "Leland's Collectanea," in 9 vols., Hearne's "Liber Niger," and "Curious Discourses," besides other works. There are many curious papers of his in the "Archæologia."

AYMAR, or AIMAR, James, ai'-mar, a French impostor, who gained considerable wealth at the close of the 17th century by pretending to have a divining-rod, whereby he could discover hidden treasure. The fraud being detected, he returned to his former obscurity; but it gave occasion for DeVallemont's learned book on the powers of the divining-rod. b. at St. Veran, Dauphiné, 1662.

AYSCOUGH, Samuel, ais'-ko(r)sh, an industrious compiler, who from being the servant of a miller, obtained a situation in the British Museum, where his abilities began to be respected and his salary increased, till he was appointed assistant-librarian. Entering into orders, he obtained the curacy of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and in 1790 was appointed to preach the Fairchild lecture on Whit-Tuesday, at Shoreditch church, before the Royal Society, which he continued to do till 1804. b. at Nottingham, 1745; d. at the British Museum, 1804. This person seems to have been gifted with the power of labouring at the driest of all occupations—that of index-making. He assisted in the regulation of the records in the Tower, and compiled a catalogue of the MSS. in the British Museum; an index to 56 vols. of the "Gentleman's Magazine," to the "Monthly the "British Critic," to Shakespeare, and other works. He was also the author of "Remarks on the Letters of an American Farmer." Not long before his death, the Lord Chancellor gave him the living of Cudham, in Kent. In reference to the "American Farmer" Charles Lamb, in 1805, thus writes in a letter:—"Oh, tell Hazlitt not to forget to send me the 'American Farmer.' I dare say it is not so good a book as he fancies; but a book's a book."

ARSCUN, Sir George, ais'-k-, a brave admiral, descended from an ancient family, in Lincolnshire, and knighted by Charles I. He early declared for the Commonwealth, and distinguished himself greatly in the wars against the Dutch. In 1651 he and Admiral Blake reduced the Scilly Isles, and afterwards, proceeding to the West Indies, Sir George effected the conquest of Barbadoes and other Islands. After the Restoration, he was appointed rear-admiral of the Blue, and in 1696 he hoisted his flag on board the Royal Prince, the finest ship then in the world. He was engaged in the great fight with the Dutch, in 1695, which lasted four days; but, on the third day, striking on the Galloper Shoal, his crew forced him to yield to the enemy. After remaining in Holland a prisoner for some time, he was permitted to return to England, where he spent the remainder of his days in so complete retirement that the period of his death is unrecorded.

ARTOX, or ARTOX, ai'-ten, Sir Robert, a native of Fifehire, in Scotland, and the author of poems in the Latin, Greek, French, and English languages. He was employed, both at home and abroad, by James I. and Charles I.; and Aubrey says that "he was acquainted with all the wits of his time in England." He was very intimate with Hobbes, as well as with rare Ben Jonson; both of whom were employed as critics by the philosopher, while drawing up his dedicatory epistle to his translation of Thucydides. It is affirmed that the poems attributed to him in his own vernacular were greatly admired by Burns, who founded his "Auld Lang Syne" upon one of them. b. 1570; d. at Whitehall, 1638.

ARTOUN, William Edmonstone, professor of literature and belles-lettres in the University of Edinburgh, and editor of "Blackwood's Magazine." To this celebrated periodical he was a contributor for a long time, under the nom de plume of Augustus Dunshunner; and married the daughter of John Wilson, "Christopher North," the former editor of Blackwood. Mr. Aytoun was a poet of the finest feather, with a strength of wing that knows no flutering in its flight. His "Execution of Montrose" and his "Burial-march of Dundee" are two noble historical ballads. His "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers" are chiefly illustrations of the stirring scenes of the mediæval history of Scotland, and place before us, in vivid representation, some of the most striking incidents and events that form the narrative of the best historical pens. Besides his stirring "Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers," Professor Aytoun has written "Fermilian, a Spasmodic Tragedy," designed to ridicule a false and extravagant taste in some of the modern followers of the muses; "Poland, and other poems;" "Bothwell," a long poem; "The Life and Times of Richard Cœur de Lion;" "Ballads of Scotland," &c. b. 1813; d. 1866.

AZARA, Don Felix d', da-tha'-ra, a Spanish

soldier, who being sent to Paraguay to define the limits of the Spanish possessions there, undertook to make a map of the country, on which he laboured for thirteen years. In accomplishing this object he had to encounter many difficulties; but succeeded in executing his task with credit. In 1801 he was recalled to Spain. He subsequently became a member of the Council for Indian Affairs under Charles IV. of Spain. b. at Barbunales, in Aragon, 1746; d. at Aragon, 1811.

AZARA, Don Jose Nicolas d', agent for the ecclesiastical affairs of Spain at the court of Rome, from 1760 to 1795, afterwards Spanish ambassador at Paris. b. at Barbunales, 1731; d. 1804.—He wrote a life of Mengs the painter.

AZEGLIO, Massimo Taparelli, Marquis d', azay-le-o, an eminent Italian statesman and political writer, and the author of some well-written novels. After the revolution of 1848, he became President of the Council for the new kingdom of Italy; and laboured earnestly for the consolidation of the states of which it was composed. b. at Turin, 1800; d. January 11, 1866.

B.

BAADER, Ferdinand Marie, law'-der, a distinguished physician, professor and writer on medicine, of Bavaria, was born in Ingoldstadt in 1747, and died at Munich in 1797.

BAAN, John de, baun, a Dutch portrait-painter who came to England and enjoyed for a time the patronage of Charles II. Returning to Holland, he painted the De Witts; and when the populace murdered those statesmen, they sought to destroy their portraits likewise, but Baan saved them. d. at the Hague, 1702.—His son James was a good artist, and accompanied William prince of Orange to England. b. at Vienna, 1700, at the age of 27.

BABA ALI, ba'-ba a-le, the founder of the independence of Algiers, and the first dey who governed on his own authority and not as the subordinate of the Porte and its pasha viceroys. The office of dey was originally instituted to collect the imposts and provide the means of defence, and at first the deys acted under the direction of a pasha; but in 1710, Baba Ali, on his election, destroyed 1700 persons who were opposed to his pretensions, shipped the pasha off to Constantinople, and intimated to the Porte that no more pashas were required at Algiers, and would not be received. After this, Algiers was an independent state, though in alliance with Turkey, till the invasion of the French. Baba Ali was an enlightened and able ruler, promoting commerce and adding much to the prosperity of his country. Died in 1718.

BABBAGE, Charles, bab'-age, an eminent mathematician, the inventor of the calculating machine, the originator of the Statistical Society, and one of the founders of the Astronomical Society. The writings of this mathematician embrace a wide field of scientific knowledge. b. 1792.

BABEK, ba'-bek, surnamed Khoremi, from his native town, or Horemi, a robber, was a Persian sectary, who taught the liberty and equality of all men, the intility of government and religion, and the community of women and goods. Having collected a large number of followers, he proceeded to enforce his doctrines with the most relentless cruelty, ravishing women and pillaging and murdering wherever he went. One of his executioners, named Nood, boasted that he had destroyed 20,000 men with his own hand. Babek continued this career for some years, till at length he was defeated and taken prisoner, and was made to undergo the fate he had inflicted on many others, having been cut limb from limb while yet alive. His career extended from A.D. 816 to A.D. 837.

BABER, Zahir-ed-deen Mohammed, ba'-ber, the first of the Tartar or Great Mogul dynasty of India, was descended in the fifth degree from the mighty founder of the race, and, except Timour himself, was perhaps the most distinguished member of it. Baber's father, ruler of the small state of Kokan, died from injuries sustained in a fall while his son was only 12 years of age, who was almost immediately involved in difficulties in consequence of the attempts of neighbouring princes to seize his patrimony. He at once took the field, however, and, young as he was, not only succeeding in saving his own states, but also conquered Samarkand, though he was not strong enough to retain possession of it. After maintaining a gallant struggle with the Uzbeks for several years, with varying fortune, and being several times reduced to the condition of a solitary fugitive, he was at last compelled to quit his native country, and, with only 200 followers, reached Cabul, where he was at once declared king. Here he maintained himself against both the attacks of his old enemies the Uzbeks and internal seditious, till, on the death of Sheibani, the Uzbek leader, Baber made an attempt to recover his original possessions, but was totally defeated and again compelled to flee to Cabul. He now turned his ambition in another direction, and commenced the conquests which ultimately led to the subjugation of India, and the establishment of the Mogul dynasty with Delhi for their capital, which make so prominent a figure in Indian history. On Baber's appearance in India, the Rajpoot emperor, Ibrahim Lodi, led the whole power of those warlike tribes against the invader, who, however, though with a vastly inferior force, totally defeated him on the field of Paniput on April 21, 1526. The fruits of this victory were the possession of Delhi and Agra, the submission of nearly the whole country, and the establishment of Baber's dynasty in India. An effort was soon after made by the rajah of Oodipoor, at the head of a new muster of the Rajpoots, to wrest Baber's conquests from him; but his usual fortune attended him: he defeated his enemies in a great battle at Biana, in March, 1527, and thereby earned the title of Champion of Islam. During the next two years he reduced the princes of Bengal and Malwa; but his health now gave way, and he expired in the palace at Agra, Dec. 26, 1530, A. February 14, 1483. His body was carried to Cabul for interment, and even till this day the garden where his tomb exists is the great holiday resort of the people, who regard his memory with the most profound respect and veneration. The career of Baber is one of the most marvelous and most chequered on record. From a petty prince he became one of the most powerful rulers of Asia, was more than once hurled from this high eminence to almost abject beggary, again to raise himself to a still higher pinnacle of power and glory than ever, and finally died the conqueror and ruler of the largest portion of that country which has always been an object of interest and a subject of covetousness to mankind since the earliest dawns of history.

He has been pronounced to be "one of the most illustrious men of his age, and one of the most eminent and accomplished princes that ever adorned a throne," and his history seems to warrant the eulogium. Personally strong, brave, and enduring, he was ever foremost in danger, but his prowess as a soldier was even surpassed by his skill as a general and his wisdom as a ruler. He never stained victory with cruelty, and never disgraced defeat with despondency. He was generous to his enemies, faithful and liberal to his friends, the protector of the oppressed and the implacable foe of the oppressor. His great fault was an over-fondness of wine, which he took in immoderate quantities—a habit which in his memoirs he constantly laments, constantly resolves to renounce, but as constantly falls back into the practice of again. Baber, besides being a warrior and a ruler, was also a poet, a philosopher, and an historian. His autobiography, which was translated into English by Leyden and Erskine, and published in 1826, is one of the most interesting and remarkable books in existence. Until very recently, almost all the knowledge we possessed of Samarkand and other regions, was derived from Baber's description of them.

BABEUR, Francis Noel, ba'-yef, a French iter, who, at the commencement of the French revolution, ardently supported its principles in a journal at Amiens; and, on account of the violence of his writing, was twice tried, but acquitted. He afterwards assumed the revolutionary name of Græchus, and conducted an incendiary journal called the "Tribune of the People;" and joining a secret society whose plans were divulged by one of the members, he was condemned for conspiracy to be gallotted. On hearing the sentence he stabbed himself, but was nevertheless borne bleeding and dying to the scaffold in May, 1797, A. at St. Quentin, 1744.

BABILLUS, ba'-i-lus, an astrologer in Nero's age, who told the emperor that he would avert the danger which seemed to hang over his head from the appearance of a hairy comet, by putting all the leading men of Rome to death. His advice was faithfully followed.

BABINGTON, Anthony, ba'-ing-tun, a gentleman of Derbyshire, who associated with other zealous Roman Catholics to assassinate Queen Elizabeth, and to liberate Mary Queen of Scots. Babington, some say, was stimulated to this enterprise by the hope that Mary, out of gratitude, would take him for her husband. The plot was discovered by Walsingham, and Babington, with thirteen other conspirators, was executed in 1586.

BABINGTON, Gervase, Bishop of Worcester, was a contemporary and relative of Anthony, and, after being educated at Cambridge, became private chaplain to Henry Herbert, Earl of Pembroke. He is believed to have assisted Lady Pembroke—"Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother"—in executing the translation of the Psalms in English verse which bears her name. Babington was made Bishop of Llandaff in 1591, was removed to Exeter in 1595, and finally to Worcester three years later. "Yet," says Fuller, "in the midst of all these preferences he was neither tainted with idleness, or pride, or covetousness, but was not only diligent in preaching, but in writing books for the understanding of God's Word; so that he was a true pattern of piety to the people, of learning to the ministry, and of wisdom to all rulers." He died in 1670, leaving several treatises, which were repeatedly reprinted towards the close of the century in which he lived.

BABINGTON, William, an eminent mineralogist, physician, and chemical lecturer at Guy's Hospital, London. He was one of the founders, if not the founder, of the Geological Society, and was the personal friend of most of the scientific men of his day. b. at Portglenone, in the north of Ireland, 1756; d. in London, 1833.

BABINI, Matteo, ba-be'-ne, an eminent vocalist of the last century, who, left an orphan at an early age, received instruction in singing, and music generally, from his uncle, Archangelo Cortoni di Cortona, and attained such proficiency as to become the most celebrated vocalist of his age. He visited most of the courts of Europe, in all of which he was highly honoured. He introduced many improvements on the lyric stage, such as suitably dressing the actors for their parts, and singing the recitatives in operas, which had previously been declaimed, the airs only being vocalized. He amassed a considerable fortune and retired to Bologna, his native town, where he died September 12, 1816. b. February 10, 1754. Babini was as noted for the purity of his life and the gentleness of his manners and disposition, as for his excellence in music.

BABO, Joseph Maria, ba'-bo, a German professor and dramatist of some reputation, was born at Ehrenbreitstein in 1750, and after filling several chairs in Munich, died in 1822, leaving several plays and other works.

BABON, ba'-bon, a burgrave of the city of Ratisbon, a man distinguished for his numerous family, he having had by his three wives no less than thirty-two sons and eight daughters, in commemoration of which the walls of Ratisbon have thirty-two round, and eight square towers, with three doors, the latter being in allusion to the three wives of Babon. b. about 1180.

BACCALAR Y SANNA, Vincent, bak-a-lar'-e, marquis of St. Philip, in Sardinia, and an eminent commander under Charles II. and Philip V. of Spain. d. 1724.—He wrote the "Alomirch of the Hebrews," and "Memoirs of Philip V."

BACCHIS, or BALUS, bak'-is, ba'-lus, king of Corinth, who succeeded his father Prumnides. His successors were always called Baechidae, in remembrance of the wisdom of his reign. The Baechidae increased so much that they chose one of their number to preside among them with regal authority. Cypselus overthrew this institution by making himself absolute.

BACCHINI, Benedetto, batch'-e-ne, a learned Benedictine monk, was born in the Duchy of Parma in 1651, and attained to great eminence as a scholar, being perfectly master not only of Latin and Greek, but of Hebrew and several other oriental languages. He established an academy of literature, and edited the "Giornale dei Letterati," perhaps the earliest attempt at literary journalism. After many vicissitudes, having excited the umbrage both of the Pope and the Duke of Modena, he died at Bologna in 1721. Bacchini was one of the most learned men of his time, for besides his knowledge of languages, he was master of ancient and modern philosophy, mathematics, theology, history, chronology, music, and poetry, and was, moreover, very expert in deciphering ancient MSS.

BACCIO, Della Porta, batch'-e-o, better known as Fra Bartolomeo, a name he assumed, an eminent Italian painter, who distinguished himself chiefly by the strength of his colouring and the excellence of his representations of the human figure. b. in the district of Savignano, 1460; d. at Florence, 1517.—The works of this painter are numerous, and are held in high estimation, and may be seen in the public galleries of Florence, Rome, the Louvre of Paris, Munich, &c.

BACCIO DA MONTE Lupo, a skilful Florentine wood-carver, who raised himself to be one of the leading architects of his day, and to enjoy the friendship and esteem of Raphael, Sansovino, San Gallo, Buonarroti, and other distinguished men. From the deficiencies of his early education he was often faulty in details, and was severely criticised for features in his works which, oddly enough, were the very points which were most extensively imitated. He was born in 1445, and died in 1533.

BACCIOCHI, Maria Anne Eliza Bonaparte, batch'-e-o-che, sister of Napoleon I., and wife of Felix Bacciochi, was born in Ajaccio, Corsica, Jan. 8, 1777. On the rise of her imperial brother she became a person of some importance, and in 1804 had the principality of Piombino conferred upon her, and soon after that of Lucca. Although her husband was crowned along with her, she allowed him no share in the government, even keeping him in the position of aide-de-camp when she reviewed the troops; hence she was nicknamed the "Italian Semiramis." On her brother's fall, she was forced to retire from her States, but with the loss of power did not lose the esteem which her generous disposition and patronage of letters and art had secured for her; and died at Bologna, on August 7, 1820, more respected, perhaps, than any other member of her family.

BACCHYLIDES, bak'-il-i-dees, a Greek lyric poet, nephew of the elder Simonides. His compositions were hymns, dithyrambic poems, odes in celebration of the Pythian victors, amatory poems, &c., all of which are now lost, except about twenty pieces. b. in the island of Cos; flourished 425 B.C. This was the last of the nine lyric poets, and Horace is said to have imitated him in several of his poems, particularly in the fifteenth ode of the first book.

BACH, John Sebastian, bak, an eminent German composer, who, in 1703, became musician to the duke of Saxe-Weimar, and obtained in 1718 a victory at Dresden, over Marchand, a famous French organist, who fled, rather than endure the certainty of a defeat. He is said to have been equal to Handel in performing on the organ. His compositions display the highest excellence; and his strains may be heard in all the religious edifices in the world. b. at Eisenach, 1685; d. at Leipzig, 1750. His sons Charles and John were also celebrated as performers and composers; and so fertile in musical talent were the Bach family, that fifty-nine members of it have been mentioned as eminent musicians.

BACHELIER, Nicholas, ba-she'-e-ai, a French sculptor and architect, was a pupil of Michael Angelo. He ornamented the churches of his native city, Toulouse, with his productions. b. 1554.—There were others of this name.

BACHMAN, John, bak'-man, a distinguished American naturalist, and the assistant of Audubon in the preparation of his great work on ornithology. b. near New York, 1790.

BACCICCO, John Baptist Gaudi, ba-chitch'-e-o, a celebrated Italian painter, who excelled in portraits and scriptural subjects. n. at Genoa, 1639; p. 1709.

BACK, Sir George, băk, a distinguished voyager and explorer in the Arctic regions. In 1818 he accompanied Sir John Franklin in his northern voyage, and in 1819 and in 1825 he was with the same navigator in the Arctic Seas. In 1833 he undertook an overland journey in search of Captain Ross. On this occasion he descended Back River till he reached the Polar Sea, and then traced the coasts as far as Bathurst Inlet. In 1835 he was made a captain, and in 1836 examined the coasts between Cape Turnagain and Regent Inlet. In 1837 he received the gold medal of the Geographical Society for his exertions to promote geographical science, while, about two years after, he was knighted, and presented with the gold medal of the Geographical Society of Paris, and a service of plate from the promoters of the Arctic Land Expedition. He attained rear-admiral's rank in 1857, but has not of late been in active service. n. at Stockport, 1708.—He has written two interesting works on the subject of his explorations.

BACKER, James, bă-ker, a Dutch historical painter of great merit. n. at Antwerp in 1530; p. 1560.—Of this family there were others who were painters, among whom may be mentioned—

BACKER, Jacob, a Dutch portrait and historical painter, whose works are held in great esteem. n. at Harlingen, 1603; p. 1651.

BACKHOUSE, William, băk-house, an astrologer and alchemist, who was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, but left it without a degree, and settled on his estate in Berkshire, where he devoted himself to his favourite studies. n. in Berkshire; p. in 1662.—He published "The Pleasant Fountain of Knowledge," a translation from the French; "The Complaint of Nature;" "The Golden Fleece," &c. He was also the inventor of an instrument called the way-wiser. Elias Ashmole was his pupil, and used to call him father.

BACKHUYSEN, or BAKHUYSEN, Ludolph, băk-hoi-sen, an eminent Dutch painter, whose favourite subjects were shipping and sea-pieces. n. at Embden, 1631; p. at Amsterdam, 1709.—He was accustomed, when a storm arose, to embark in a small boat, and going out to sea, would watch, with the greatest interest, the play of the waves and breakers as they lashed the sides of the rolling vessels. This study of nature enabled him to give to his productions the admirable truthfulness which distinguishes them.

BACON, Roger, băi-kon, an eminent English monk, scholar, and philosopher, was educated at Oxford, under the auspices of Robert Grosstete, bishop of Lincoln, who, throughout his life, continued his greatest patron. Bacon was also encouraged and instructed in learning by Edmund Rich, archbishop of Canterbury, William Sherwood, chancellor of Lincoln and an excellent mathematician, and Richard Fishacre, an able professor at Oxford and Paris. The last-mentioned university being at that time greatly frequented by students, Bacon went thither, and studied with so much diligence and success as to obtain the degree of D.D. On quitting France he returned to Oxford, and about the same time entered into the order of St. Francis. He now devoted himself principally to chemistry, natural philosophy, and mathematics; and so ardent was he in their pursuit, that he spent in the course of twenty years £2000 entirely upon them; which, taking into consideration the time in which he lived, was no contemptible sum. The discoveries he made, and the fame he obtained, excited the envy and malice of the monks. It was reported, and believed, that he had recourse to the agency of evil spirits, and that all his knowledge consisted in his profound skill as a magician. In consequence of this, he was forbidden to read lectures in the university, and was even confined to his cell, without being allowed to see his friends, or to have a proper supply of food. The bigoted conduct of the monks seems only to have extended his reputation; for, while he was suffering from their persecution, he received a letter from the cardinal bishop of Sabina, the pope's legate in England, requesting a copy of his works, which Bacon at first declined; but when that prelate was raised to the papal chair by the name of Clement IV., he collected his writings into a volume, entitled "Opus Majus," or the "Greater Work," and sent it to his holiness, who promised him his protection. On the death, however, of that pope, he was exposed to new and more severe persecutions. His works were prohibited, and he was sentenced to close imprisonment, in which he remained above ten years. On being released, he retired to Oxford, where he died. n. at Ilchester, 1214; p. 1292.—Hallam says that the mind of Roger Bacon was strangely compounded of almost prophetic gleams of the future course of science, and the best principles of the inductive philosophy, with a more than usual credulity in the superstition of his own times. However this may be, he was certainly possessed of one of the most comprehensive minds of any man of his time. Bishop Bale mentions above eighty treatises written by him, of which he had himself seen nearly forty; and Dr. Jebb, the learned editor of his "Opus Majus," classes his writings under the heads of grammar, mathematics, physics, optics, geography, astronomy, chronology, chemistry, magic, medicine, logic, metaphysics, ethics, theology, philology, and miscellanies. His chemical tracts are in the "Thesaurus Chemicus," printed at Frankfort, in 8vo, 1620. His treatise on the "Means of avoiding the Infirmities of Old Age" was first printed at Oxford in 1590; and an English translation of it, by Dr. Browne, appeared in 1683. Several pieces of his yet remain in MS. Bacon was a deep mathematician, and from some of his MSS. it appears that he had a knowledge of the nature of convex and concave glasses; and some consider him as the inventor of the telescope. He has, besides, the credit of having been the inventor of the air-pump, the diving-bell, the camera obscura, and of gunpowder, the composition of which is expressly mentioned in his treatise "De Nullitate Magie." Dr. Friend thinks that since the days of Archimedes, the world has not seen a greater genius. His acquaintance with astronomy and geography was very extensive and accurate. He detected the errors in the calendar, and suggested the reformation in it which was, long afterwards, adopted by Gregory XIII., and was, on the whole, according to Gerard Joannes, a man of such vast learning, that England, nay, the world beside, had not, in this respect, his equal or his second; yet either through the envy or the ignorance of the age in which he lived, he was stigmatized as a magician.

THE DICTIONARY

Bacon

BACON, Robert, an Englishman, born about 1193, has been supposed, though on but slight grounds, to have been a brother of Roger Bacon. He studied at Oxford, and afterwards at Paris, was an assiduous and acceptable preacher, and left many works in theology, which were held in high esteem at the time. d. 1248.

BACON, Sir Nicholas, lord keeper of the great seal, studied at Bene't (now Corpus Christi) College, Cambridge, whence he removed to Gray's Inn, where he became so eminent in the law, that he was appointed attorney in the Court of Wards. After this, on the dissolution of the monastery of St. Edmund's Bury, he obtained from Henry VIII. possession of various manors in Suffolk. Having become a Protestant, he was on that account excluded from all employment during the reign of Mary; but, on the accession of Elizabeth, he was made a privy councillor and keeper of the great seal. In every political change his prudence seems to have preserved him from danger, whilst he made it his study never to entangle himself with any party. When the queen came to visit him at his new house at Redgrave, she observed, alluding to his complacency, that he had built his house too little for him. "Not so, madam," answered he; "but your majesty has made me too big for my house." d. at Chislehurst, 1510; d. 1579.—He was twice married: by his first wife he had three sons and three daughters; and by his second he had two sons, Anthony and Francis, the future Lord Chancellor of England. He was a learned and wise rather than a great man. "I have come to the lord keeper," says Puttenham, "and found him sitting in his gallery alone, with the works of Quintilian before him. Indeed, he was a most eloquent man, of rare learning and wisdom, as ever I knew England to breed." His great son has, as it seems to us, thus correctly drawn his character:—"He was a plain man, direct and constant, without all fluence and doubleness, and one that was of a mind that a man in his private proceedings and estate, and in the proceedings of state, should rest upon the soundness and strength of his own courses, and not upon practice to circumvent others."

BACON, Anne, the second daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, the wife of Sir Nicholas Bacon, and the mother of the great Sir Francis Bacon, Baron Verulam. She had considerable literary talents and was well skilled in both the Latin and Italian languages, from both of which she translated some works. She also corresponded in Greek, and Deza dedicated his "Meditations" to her; but it is on account of her having been the mother of the illustrious Chancellor of England, rather than on account of any distinguished talents of her own, that she is here noticed. d. 1528; d. 1600.

BACON, Francis, Lord, the illustrious philosopher and eminent statesman, was the son of Sir Nicholas Bacon by his second wife; and, whilst yet a mere boy, gave such indications of future eminence, that Queen Elizabeth used to call him her "young lord keeper." He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he discovered the futility of the Peripatetic or Aristotelian philosophy, which then prevailed. At the age of sixteen he went to France in the suite of Sir Amias Paulet, ambassador to that court. During his residence there he wrote his work on the state of Europe, which displayed great observation, though he was then but nineteen years of age. On his return to England he entered Gray's Inn; and at the age of twenty-eight was appointed one of the queen's counsellors; but, from his attachment to the earl of Essex, who was at enmity with Cecil, Bacon lost those advantages at court which he might otherwise have reaped. That generous but unfortunate earl, however, feeling the value of his attachment, presented him with an estate, and showed him many acts of kindness, all of which, we grieve to say, were repaid with ingratitude, which, however, has been endeavoured to be palliated from considerations of the position in which he was placed. It was his conduct towards the fallen earl, considered in connexion with his wisdom, learning, and other great qualities, which evoked his portrait by a great poet in the following line:—

"The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind."

In 1592 he was chosen member of parliament for Middlesex, and had the courage to oppose several arbitrary measures of the court; for which he incurred the Queen's displeasure. At this period he was, as through life, in possession of the friendship of rare Ben Jonson, who has bequeathed to us a graphic sketch of his oratorical powers. "No man ever spoke more neatly, more pressly, more weightily, or suffered less emptiness, less idleness, in what he uttered. No member of his speech but consisted of his own graces. His hearers could not cough or look aside from him without loss. . . . The fear of every man that heard him was lest he should make an end." Ben, however, had a noble admiration of the intellectual qualities of the chancellor. On the accession of James I. he obtained the honour of knighthood, and in 1604 was appointed one of the king's counsel, with a pension. The next year he published a great work, entitled "The Advancement and Proficiency of Learning," for which he was made solicitor-general. About this time he married a daughter of Mr. Barnham, a rich alderman of London. In 1611 he was appointed judge of the Marshalsea court, and obtained the place of registrar of the Star Chamber, the reversion of which had been granted him twenty years before. In 1613 he was made attorney-general, and in 1616 sworn a privy councillor. At this time he contracted a close intimacy with the king's favourite, George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, to whom he wrote an admirable letter of advice. In 1617 he was made lord keeper of the great seal; and in January, 1618, was invested with the high chancellorship of Great Britain, and created a peer by the title of Baron Verulam. He was next made viscount of St. Albans. In 1620 he gave to the world the greatest of all his works, entitled the "Novum Organum," which was immediately hailed with the warmest expressions of admiration by the greatest minds of Europe, and which is "the central pile of that edifice of philosophy on which the world has bestowed his name." He had now reached the zenith of his glory, when he was accused in parliament of bribery and corruption in his high office. This heavy charge was admitted by himself. "I do plainly and ingenuously confess that I am guilty of cor-

The confession of guilt, though made by himself, could hardly be believed. A committee, therefore, was sent by the Lords to inquire if he really had made such a confession, and if it had been signed by him. "My lords, it is my act, my hand, my heart: I beseech your lordships to be merciful to a broken reed." He was sentenced to pay a fine of £10,000, to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, and for ever rendered incapable of holding any public office. In a short time, however, he was restored to liberty, had his fine remitted, and was summoned to the first parliament of Charles I. It must not be omitted that the greatest part of the blame attaches to his servants; and of this he was sensible; for, during his trial, as he passed through the room where his domestics were sitting, they all rose up at his entrance, on which he said—"Sit down, my masters; your rise hath been my fall." After this disgrace he went into retirement, where he devoted himself to his studies. B. in London, 1601; D. 1626.—His remains were interred in St. Michael's church, at St. Albans, where his secretary erected a monument to his memory. His writings are an inestimable treasure of sound wisdom, and he has justly been called the father of experimental philosophy. In closing this sketch, we cannot help quoting the few pathetic lines written of him by rare Ben Jonson, his faithful friend in adversity as well as in prosperity. "My conceit of his person was never increased towards him by his place or honours; but I have and do reverence him for the greatness that was only proper to himself, in that he seemed to me ever by his worth one of the greatest men and most worthy of admiration that had been in many ages. In his adversity I ever prayed that God would give him strength, for greatness he could not want." (See Life, by W. Hepworth Dixon; and "Letters and Life of Francis Bacon," by James Spedding.)

Bacon, Nathaniel, half-brother to the chancellor, had a taste for landscape-painting, in which he attained considerable excellence. B. 1615.

Bacon, Anthony, fourth son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, and eldest full brother of Lord Bacon, was born in 1558, and educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, along with his brother Francis. He was throughout life of infirm health, but was endowed with a considerable share of the intellectual power which distinguished this remarkable family. He attained to considerable property in Herefordshire and Middlesex, on the death of his father; but he appears to have been of extravagant habits, for we find his mother writing in very severe terms as to the continual demands for money which he made upon her. In 1579 he went upon the continent, where he remained for several years, and was very useful to the Cecil by the important information he transmitted to them. He also corresponded with Walsingham, and was the friend of the celebrated Deza, in whose house he lodged at Bourges, in Berry. His attachment to the reformed faith exposed him to considerable annoyance, so much so as to induce the Parliament of Bordeaux to decree that he was worthy of the rack as a shelterer and favourer of the Huguenots. Returning to England in 1591, he took up his residence in Gray's Inn along with his brother Francis, but subsequently attached himself to the Earl of Essex, in whose house he had apartments assigned him, and resided there for some time; indeed, it is believed he did so till the fall and subsequent execution of the earl. When Anthony Bacon died has not been ascertained; but a compilation of his papers was published by

Birch, under the title of "Memoirs of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth."

Bacon, Nathaniel, third son of Edward Bacon, of Shrubland, Suffolk, and grandson of Lord-Keeper Bacon, was educated for the bar, and in 1643 was chosen recorder of Ipswich; in 1637 he became a master of requests; was elected member for Cambridge in the Long Parliament; was an admiralty judge; and represented Ipswich in the Parliaments of 1651, 1653, and 1659. He was also recorder of St. Edmund's Bury, and a bencher of Gray's Inn. Bacon was a sturdy republican, and took an active part in the stirring events of his time; he likewise devoted a part of his attention to antiquarian pursuits, and wrote an account of Ipswich, from the time of the heptarchy to the reign of Charles I., which, although never published, is said to show much research and learning. He is believed to have been the author of a treatise entitled "An Historical Discourse of the Uniformity of the Government of England," which was published in two parts, the first in 1617, and the second in 1632. Selden is said to have also been concerned in the composition of this work, with which the name of the Virginian rebel, Bacon, has likewise been associated, but with little probability of truth. Bacon was twice married—first, to Elizabeth Middleton; and second, to Susan Holloway. After his death, which occurred in 1630, the corporation of Ipswich voted a gratuity to his widow, in consideration of his antiquarian and other labours in connexion with the borough.

Bacon, General Nathaniel, a native of England, who, after becoming a member of one of the inns of court in London, emigrated to Virginia, where he made himself so conspicuous by his opposition to the governor, Berkeley, that he acquired the cognomen of "The Rebel." A quarrel having occurred between the settlers and the natives, the former chose Bacon their general, and, disregarding the orders of the governor, who refused him a commission, he put himself at the head of a party of colonists, and marched against the Indians, whom he defeated, and destroyed their magazine. He was shortly after, in May, 1676, proclaimed a rebel, was surprised at Jamestown, put in irons, and tried before the governor and council, but acquitted. He was now promised a commission for the Indian war, but as the governor refused to sign it, Bacon raised a force of 500 men, and compelled the governor to grant the commission. He then entered vigorously on the war with the Indians, and was prosecuting it with success when he was again proclaimed a rebel, on which he turned his arms against the governor, whom he once more defeated, subsequently burnt Jamestown, and was preparing to follow up the advantage, when he was seized with a sickness which terminated his life, Oct. 1, 1676. Bacon was very popular in the colony of Virginia, and had he lived, and success continued to crown his conduct, might possibly have proved the deliverer of the country, and anticipated the great revolution ultimately accomplished by Washington a hundred years later.

Bacon, John, an English sculptor, at first was bound apprentice to a manufacturer of china at Lambeth, where he was employed in painting on porcelain. Here he became so expert in modelling shepherds, shepherdesses, and other ornamental figures, that in less than two years he formed all the models for the manufactory. While here, he had an opportunity of observing the models of different sculptors, which were sent to the pottery to be burnt; and by them he was inspired with a strong inclination for his future profession. He immediately began to apply himself with unremitting diligence, and his progress was so rapid that he obtained nine of the first premiums from the Society for the Encouragement of the Arts. The earliest of these was in 1753, for a figure of Peace, when he was only eighteen years of age. During his apprenticeship he formed a design of making statues in artificial stone or cement, which has since been brought to great perfection. About 1763 he began to work in marble; and having invented an instrument for transferring the form of the model to the marble, he saved a great deal of time, and brought his instrument to be adopted by other sculptors. In 1769 he obtained from the Royal Academy the first gold medal given by that society, and the year following he was chosen an associate. The reputation acquired by the exhibition of his statue of Mars induced Dr. Markham, archbishop of York, to employ him in making a bust of George III. for the hall of Christ Church, Oxford. While modelling this bust, the king asked him "if he had ever been out of the kingdom;" and on being answered in the negative, "I am glad of it," said his majesty; "you will be the greater honour to it." Bacon's execution of this bust gained him the royal patronage, and he was employed in forming another for the university of Göttingen. In 1777 he was engaged to prepare a model of a monument to be erected in Guy's Hospital to the memory of the founder, which occasioned him to be employed in the execution of Lord Chatham's monument in Guildhall. The year following he became a Royal Academician, and completed a beautiful monument to the memory of Mrs. Draper, in Bristol Cathedral. His other works are too numerous to be specified; suffice it to mention the monument of Lord Chatham in Westminster Abbey, and Howard's and Dr. Johnson's in St. Paul's Cathedral. B. in Southwark, 1740; D. 1799.—He was of an estimable private character, and ordered the following inscription, which he wrote himself, to be placed on his tombstone: "What I was as an artist seemed to me of some importance while I lived; but what I really was as a believer in Christ Jesus, is the only thing of importance to me now." He wrote the article "Sculpture" in Rees's Cyclopædia.

BADAJOZ, Juan de, bad'-a-joh, a native of the Spanish city of the same name, attained to considerable eminence as an architect. He flourished in the 16th century, and was distinguished for the profusion of carving and sculpture which he introduced into the works executed by him, several of which still remain in Leon and Castile. In 1512 he was one of a committee of nine architects appointed to consult as to the erection of a new cathedral at Salamanca. The dates of his birth and death are unknown, but from an inscription on the church and monastery of Exlonga, near Leon, he appears to have been living in 1545.

BADALOCCHIO, Sisto Rosa, ba'-da-lotch'-e-o, an Italian painter and engraver, held in considerable estimation, especially as a draughtsman. His works are to be found in Bologna, Modena, and Parma. B. 1581; D. 1647.

BADDOCK, Samuel, bád'-kók, an English divine, best known by his critiques, in the "Monthly Review," on Madan's "Thelyphthora," Dr. Priestley's "History of the Corruptions of Christianity," &c.; and by the considerable share which he had in Dr. White's Dampton Lectures. He was a man of great liveliness, taste, and learning. B. at South Moulton, 1747; D. 1793.

BADBY, John, bad'-be, an artificer, and among the first victims of the persecution of the Lollards under Henry IV. Although unlettered, he had a dispute with Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, as to the Real Presence in the consecrated wafer, and, refusing to be convinced, was condemned to be burnt at Smithfield, in 1400. The Prince of Wales, afterwards the celebrated Henry V., was present, and urged Badby to recant, offering him both a pardon and a pension, but the martyr was firm, and the sentence was carried into execution.

BADDELEY, Robert, bad'-lee, a low comedian of considerable repute, who was long connected with the Drury Lane company. He died in 1794, and bequeathed his cottage at Hampton to the managers of the Theatrical Fund, on condition that four of the pensioners of the fund should be elected to occupy it, who "did not object to live sociably together"—a proviso which would seem to imply that harmony was not a special characteristic of the histrionic profession in his time.

BADDELEY, Sophia, wife of the preceding, an actress of much celebrity in genteel comedy, was the daughter of the sergeant-trumpeter to George II. She appeared at Drury Lane in 1704; and so pleased the king in the part of Fanny, in the "Clandestine Marriage," that he ordered her portrait to be painted by Zoffany. She likewise sung at Ranelagh and Vauxhall, where she was paid the then handsome salary of twelve guineas a week. She eloped with Baddeley before their marriage, soon separated from him, lived a very dissipated and disreputable life, and ultimately died in great destitution at Edinburgh. B. 1745; D. 1801.

BADEN, dukes of, bad'-den, a very old German family, which still enjoys the grand-ducal titles and dignity, took its rise from Gottfried, duke of the Allemans, about A.D. 700, and members of which have from time to time taken part in the wars and politics of Germany and Italy ever since. The most prominent individuals of this family were—1. Herman II., who in 1130 first took the title of Margrave of Baden, and was thus the immediate founder of the race. 2. Frederic I., son of Herman VI. and Gertrude, daughter of Leopold the Glorious, duke of Austria and Styria, by whom he was left an infant, and having been deprived of his mother's inheritance, he took refuge at the court of Louis the Severe of Bavaria, from which he went to take part in the war between Naples and Charles of Anjou. He was present in the battle of Tagliacozzo, August 23, 1268, in which Charles was victorious, and Frederic was shortly afterwards taken prisoner and beheaded—a circumstance which opened the way to the house of Hapsburg attaining to the imperial dignity. 3. Philip I., who took an active part in the Reformation in Germany, having assisted in the Diet of Worms in 1521, and in that of Spire in 1526. He died in 1533. 4. Louis-William I., who was regarded as one of the greatest generals of his age, was born at Paris, 1655, and commenced his military career in the armies of the empire in 1674, under Montécuculli. He succeeded to the Margravate of Baden in 1677; and in 1683 took part in the war against the Turks, in which he had as compatriots John Sobieski of Poland, Charles of Lorraine, and Eugene of Savoy; he helped to deliver Vienna from the Moslems, and took a prominent part in the numerous battles and sieges which have made the war memorable in history. He, on the death of Sobieski, competed unsuccessfully for the crown of Poland, and held a high command in the German army at the commencement of the war of the Spanish succession, and was opposed, not without credit, to the great Marshal Villars. On the junction of the armies of Prince Eugene and Marlborough with his own in 1704, he was virtually set aside from command, his tactics and skill being in every respect inferior to those of the two great warriors named. He died on the 4th of January, 1707; and as he had totally neglected his own territory to engage in the quarrels of others, he left his lands in a miserable condition, from which it was many years ere they recovered. As a warrior, however, he was a man of much mark and great experience, having passed through 26 campaigns, 25 sieges, and commanded in 13 battles.

BADEN, Dr. Richard, ba'-den, the founder of Clare Hall, Cambridge, who, in 1326, was chancellor of Cambridge. In the same year he laid the foundation of a building to which he gave the name of University Hall; which, being burnt down, was rebuilt about the year 1342 by Elizabeth, countess of Clare, who named it Clare Hall. Lived in the 14th century.

BADENS, Francis, ba'-dens, a skilful Dutch historical and portrait painter. b. at Antwerp, 1571; d. 1603.—His warm colouring procured him the surname of the "Italian."

BADIA Y LEBLICH, Domingo, bad'-e-a e leblík, better known as Ali Bey, was born in Biscay, in 1766. Conceiving the project of founding an European colony between Morocco and Algiers, he first obtained the sanction of the Spanish court, and resided for some time in Paris and London, collecting information and funds. He then assumed the Mussulman garb, proceeded to Tangier, where he proclaimed himself the son of a Syrian prince, and so completely deceived the Mohammedans that he was everywhere received with much distinction as a true son of Islam. So far did he carry this deception, that he was fêted by the emperor of Morocco, and on making the pilgrimage to Mecca, was allowed to sweep and perfume the Kaaba after the schérif. After travelling over a good deal of Africa, and all Syria, Egypt, &c., in the latter of which he met Chateaubriand, who pronounced him "the most polished Turk in existence, and a worthy descendant of Saladin," he returned to Europe, where he found the king of Spain in the hands of Bonaparte, in whose service he embarked, and held the prefectship in several Spanish provinces subject to king Joseph. On the fall of Bonaparte, he managed to recommend himself to Louis XVIII., who encouraged him to pursue his plan of the African settlement, and funds were provided for a new journey. He was still to keep up his character of Mussulman, and to revisit Mecca, and then proceed to Africa to carry out his original scheme. But he was never destined to do either, having been cut off by dysentery, in August, 1818, while accompanying the great caravan from Syria to Mecca. Whether his plan of a colony of Europeans in Africa, which, as he represented, would have been the centre of commerce and civilization on that continent, and also a check upon Mohammedanism there, was practical or not, it is certain that his travels have thrown immense light on the condition and habits of the numerous peoples he visited; and his whole career entitles him to be regarded as one of the most extraordinary men who ever existed.

BADIA, Tommaso, ba'-de-a, a cardinal, who figured in the Reformation controversy begun by Luther, taking part against the reformer, but with more moderation than many others. Paul III. appointed him one of the members who formed the congregation of Worms, held preparatory to the Council of Trent, and he had the largest share in drawing up the memorial there agreed to, urging the reform of abuses which had crept into the church, but which, although printed by order of the Pope, was not then allowed to be circulated. For his services on this occasion he was, in June, 1542, created a cardinal, but died a few years after, on the 6th of September, 1547. Badia left several works behind him, which have never been printed, although constantly referred to by his biographers. b. at Modena, about 1483, and educated by the Dominicans, whose habit he took on becoming of age.

BADILE, ba'-de-lai, Antony, an Italian painter, whose portraits were far more natural and life-like in appearance than those of the earlier masters. He was the uncle and first instructor of Paul Veronese. b. at Verona, 1480; d. 1560.

BADILY, bad'-e-le, an eminent naval commander in the time of Cromwell, who, with a much inferior fleet, fought a desperate action with the Dutch under Van Galen, off the Isle of Elba, in 1652, and although nominally defeated, he did so much damage to the Hollanders, as to leave them only a barren victory. He subsequently took part, along with Commodore Appleton, in another action with the same Dutch fleet, after both parties had quietly repaired damages in the same neutral port; but of what finally became of him nothing is known. His early career is also involved in obscurity; but his gallantry in the battle referred to entitles his name to preservation.

BADIUS, Josse, bad'-e-os, a distinguished scholar and printer, was a native of a village called Asche or Assen, in the vicinity of Brussels, and was hence called Ascensius. He was a complete master of Greek and Roman literature, which he taught for some time at Lyons, and then became corrector of the press to John Trechsel, whose daughter he married. He subsequently established a printing press in Paris, from which were issued some good editions of the Latin classics, and many excellent works, some of which were of Badius's own composition. He had three daughters, all of whom were married to printers. One of these was the wife of Robert Estienne, one of the family of famous French printers of that name. b. 1462; d. 1535.

BADIUS, Conrad, son of the above, was still more eminent both as a scholar and a printer. The earliest editions printed by him that are known bear date 1546. Having embraced the reformed doctrines, he removed from Paris to Geneva in about 1549, and there, in conjunction with his brother-in-law Estienne, he printed a great variety of works, which are alike valuable for their accuracy, beauty, and the pre-and introductions which Badius wrote to them. He enjoyed the friendship of both Calvin and Beza. n. 1510; d. about 1560, but the date of his death is uncertain.

BADUARO, bawd-o'-a-ro, a distinguished noble family of Venice, which produced in the 16th century several eminent poets, senators, and orators, the most remarkable of whom were—1. Lauro, poet, n. 1546; d. 1593. 2. Daniele, senator, n. 1534. 3. Pietro, a famous advocate, and natural son of Daniele, n. 1591. 4. Federico, statesman, and founder of the Academy Della Farina, at Venice, n. 1614; d. 1593. 5. Giacomo, dramatic poet, whose plays were represented at the San Giovanni theatre, and several of which have been published, and are still popular. Lived in the 17th century.

BALLI, Francesco, barr-ai-le, a distinguished Sicilian poet and mathematician, who, to improve himself in knowledge, travelled all over Europe, and finally settled in Sicily; he contributed a variety of works to the "Biblioteca Siciliana" of Montignone. n. at Melazzo, in 1639; the date of his death is uncertain, but he lived into the 18th century.

BAERSTADT, bar-strat, a Dutch painter, who excelled in sea-pieces and fish. His works are highly estimated. Lived in the 17th century.

BAERT, Baron Alexander Balthazar Francis de Paul de, baire, a French senator and author, was born at Dunkirk, in 1750. In 1791, he was a member of the Legislative Assembly; but quitted France after the events of Aug. 10, 1792, and retired, first, to the United States, and then to England, where he resided for several years. He subsequently returned to France, and, among other works, wrote an account of Great Britain and her possessions, which is considered by the French as an excellent account of England, although in reality but an abridgment of previous works on the geography, constitution, &c., of Great Britain. On the faith of this work, he was regarded as a great authority on English affairs, and was often consulted by Napoleon I. upon them. d. in 1825.

BAFFIN, William, baff-in, an English navigator, of whose early life little or nothing is known. In 1612 he made a voyage to the north-west, of which he wrote an account, and which was the first in which a method was adopted by Baffin of determining the longitude at sea by observations made upon the heavenly bodies. In 1613 he made a voyage to Greenland, and in 1615 made another with Bylot, and in the following year acted as pilot to the same commander, and discovered the large sea which bears his name. In 1621 he joined the British expedition which, acting in concert with the Persians, was to eject the Portuguese from the Persian Gulf, where, at the siege of Kismis, a small fort near Ormuz, he was killed. n. 1581; d. 1622.

BAGE, Robert, baie, a writer of novels which were popular in their day, was brought up as a paper maker at Darley, near Derby; but, being unsuccessful in business, took to novel-writing to divert his mind from brooding on his difficulties. His works are—"Barham Downs," "The Fair Syrian," "Mount Heneth," and "James Wallace." He died at Tamworth, on Sept. 1, 1801. His life was written by Sir Walter Scott, which shows that his reputation was not insignificant.

BAGFORD, John, bag-ford, an antiquary and collector of rare books, prints, &c., was a native of London, and devoted much of his time to collecting materials for the elucidation of points in its history. He was an uneducated man, wrote little—indeed, could not have done so, from want of education; but his collections have been of great service to others. He intended to have written a history of printing, but the prospectus was all that ever appeared of it. His collections are in the British Museum, and are both curious and valuable. He was bred a shoemaker, but afterwards obtained employment in buying rare books, &c., for booksellers and other collectors, one of whom was the earl of Oxford. n. about 1657. d. 1716.

BIGGENSEN, Emmanuel or Jens, bag-e'-sen, a clever writer, both in Danish and German, was a native of Corsor, in the island of Zealand, where he was born on February 15, 1764. He was educated at Copenhagen, and when 20 years of age produced his first work, called "Comic Tales," which display much liveliness of imagination, together with satiric humour, which last quality, however, he said was not natural to him, though it marks nearly all his works. He was of a very restless disposition, and spent a large part of his life in wandering from place to place. In one of his journeys he became acquainted with the daughter of the poet Haller, and married her. He was afterwards appointed professor, first at Copenhagen, and afterwards at Kiel; but neither of these positions did he long retain. His first wife died in 1797, and in the following year he married a second time, the name of the lady being Fanny Reibaz. His restless disposition involved him in debts and difficulty, and even conducted him to prison in France. He became an enthusiastic admirer of the first revolution, and remained in France from 1793 till 1810, when he again set off on his journeyings, and finally died at Hamburg, Oct. 3, 1826. His works are, besides the "Comic Tales," already mentioned—"Danish Ballads and Poems," an opera called "Holger Danske," "Labyrinth, or Wanderings of a Poet," being an account of one of his journeys; an epic idyll, entitled "Parthenais, oder Alpenreise;" "Adam and Eve," a comic poem, notwithstanding the nature of its subject; and a volume of correspondence. Some of these works were published by his sons after his death. He was considered equally successful in writing German as his native language, Danish.

BAGLIONE, Giovanni, bag-le-o'-nai, a Roman artist, who enjoyed considerable reputation and patronage as a painter in oil and fresco, but is now better known for his "Lives" of his contemporaries than for his pictures. He was patronized by popes Sixtus V. and Paul V., and was elected principal of the Academy of St. Luke, in 1618. His works are to be seen in Rome, Naples, and Mantua; he was especially excellent in colour and light and shade. The date of his death is not known, but must have been subsequent to 1642. His book of "Lives," which contains 81 memoirs, and is written in an easy, simple, and pleasing style, was published at Rome, in 1642, again in 1649; and at Naples, in 1733, with some additions by G. B. Passari. n. at Rome, about 1573.

BAGLIVI, George, bag-le'-ne, a distinguished physician, born at Ragusa, 1669, who, after studying at Salerno and Padua, became a professor at Sapienza, and was mainly instrumental in restoring the ancient principles of medicine—those of experience and observation of nature. He died at the early age of 33, in March, 1707, his zeal for science having induced him to overwork himself, and so shorten his career. Had he lived, he would probably have rendered still greater services to medicine. The works he left are consulted even to this time.

BAGRATIOW, Peter Ivanovitch, Prince, Bá-grai-she-on, a celebrated Russian general, who commenced his military career under Potemkin, and in 1791 served under Sawarow in Poland, where he greatly distinguished himself. In 1799, in Italy, under the same leader, he proved himself so able a soldier, that Sawarow called him his "right arm." He took Brescia and Tortona, and defeated a French division under Moreau near Marengo. At the taking of Turin, in the actions of Trebbia and the Adda, at the taking of Alessandria and of Serebasso, and at the battle of Novi, he added to his former reputation. In 1805 he commanded the vanguard of the allied Austrian and Russian army, under Kutusoff, and in that capacity displayed great abilities. He was present at the battles of Austerlitz, Eylau, and Friedland, and at each showed his skill and courage. In 1807 he served in the campaign in Finland; and, gaining considerable successes, was mainly instrumental in detaching from Sweden a large portion of Finland. He afterwards had the command of the Russian army in Turkey; and in 1812, when Napoleon invaded Russia, was appointed to the western army, and made a masterly retreat on Smolensko, where he joined his forces with those of Barclay de Tolly. After the battle there, he commanded the left wing at Borodino, where he was struck by a shell, of which wound he shortly after died. b. in Georgia, 1763; d. 1812.

BALILEY, or Baley, Walter, bat'-le, a native of Portsmouth, Dorset, where he was born in 1529, an eminent physician, who was successively Fellow, Proctor, and Regius Professor at New College, Oxford. He was also physician to Queen Elizabeth, by whom, as well as by the courtiers generally, he was highly esteemed. He left several works on medicine, particularly on the treatment of diseases of the eye. d. 1592.

BALILEY, Peter, author of several humorous poems, and editor of a periodical entitled "The Museum," was the son of a solicitor at Nantwich, Cheshire, and after being educated at Rugby and Merton College, Oxford, entered himself at the Temple with the view of studying for the bar. He gave more attention, however, to literature than to law. He wrote "Sketches from St. George's-in-the-Fields," "Idwal," a poem founded on occurrences connected with the conquest of Wales; a Greek poem, published in the "Classical Journal;" and a poem, in the Spenserian stanza, published anonymously, called "A Queen's Appeal." He died suddenly, January 25, 1823.

BALILEY, Philip James, is a member of the bar, and the son of the proprietor of the Nottingham Mercury. He is known in the literary world as the author of "Festus," the "Angel World," the "Mystic," the "Age," &c. "Festus" is his greatest work; and although it was finished when the author was little more than twenty years of age, it contains some beautiful passages, notwithstanding the peculiarity of many of the sentiments with which it is distinguished. b. 1816.

BAILLI, Roche, bai(?)-ye, better known as "La Rivière," was first physician to Henry IV., and pretended to great skill in astrology. He was a great admirer of Paracelsus, and wrote a summary of his doctrine. b. 1605.

BAILLIE, Robert, bai'-le, a Scotch divine, who after taking his degree of M.A. in the Glasgow University, received episcopal orders, and became regent of philosophy. During the civil war he joined the Covenanters, and went to London to exhibit charges against Archbishop Laud. He was one of the commissioners sent by the General Assembly of Scotland to Charles II. at the Hague. At the Restoration he was made principal of his college, and might have had a bishopric if he would have conformed. b. April 30, 1642; d. 1692. His letters, and journal of his transactions in England, were published at Edinburgh, in 2 vols. 8vo, 1775.

BAILLIE, Edward, a distinguished officer of marines, was, in almost all parts of the world, present with his corps, both in land and sea service, during the wars with Napoleon from 1796 up to 1814. He rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and was much esteemed as a brave, skillful, and able officer, as well as an amiable gentleman. b. 1778, of Irish parents; died near Pembroke, in Oct. 1833.

BAILLIE, John, a distinguished British officer, Persian scholar, professor of Mohammedan law, director of the East India Company, and administrator of Indian affairs, who served for many years in India in almost all capacities, civil and military, and was especially useful to the settlement of Bundelcund, the Governor-General declaring that the British authority there "was alone preserved by his fortitude, ability, and influence." He rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and after his return to England was member of Parliament for Heydon from 1820 to 1831, and for the Liverpool burghs from 1830 till his death in 1833. b. 1772.

BAILLIE, Joanna, a distinguished writer in an age when good authors were not scarce. Her mother was Dorothea Hunter, a sister of the celebrated anatomists John and Wm. Hunter. The greater part of her life was passed at Hampstead, where she always lived in retirement, and, for some years before her death, in strict seclusion. Though not in the habit of receiving company, nearly all the great authors of her age had, at one time or another, been her guests. Sir Walter Scott passed many delightful hours with her, and in 1806 she spent some weeks in his house at Edinburgh. She is best known by her plays, which were written with a view of delineating the strongest passions of the mind, and to each of which she devoted a whole tragedy or comedy. The canon by which she was regulated in the production of these effusions is thus set forth in the preparatory discourse to her dramas in 1793:—"Let one single trait of the human heart, one expression of passion, genuine and true to nature, be introduced, and it will stand forth alone, in the boldness of reality; whilst the false and unnatural around it fades away on every side, like the rising exhalation of the morning." b. at Bothwell, 1763; d. at Hampstead, 1851, in her 89th year.—Joanna Baillie was esteemed "the Lady Bountiful" among the poor of the neighbourhood in which she lived, and up to the last retained the full possession of her faculties.

BAILLIE, Matthew, M.D., the brother of Joanna, became eminent in the pursuit of medical science. He enjoyed the advantage of studying under his uncle, William Hunter, and became one of the most distinguished anatomists. B. at Leyden about 1544; d. 1633. He was officer of the hospital and wrote several works in connexion with his profession. B. at Bothwell, 1761; d. on his estate in Gloucestershire, 1823.—A monument has been erected to Dr. Baillie in Westminster Abbey. When Sir W. Scott heard of his death, he wrote to his sister Joanna, "We have, indeed, to mourn such a man as, since medicine was first esteemed a useful and honoured science, has rarely occurred to grace its annals, and who will be lamented as long as any one lives who has experienced the advantage of his professional skill and the affectionate kindness by which it was accompanied."

BAILLY, John Sylvain, ba-i(y)-ye, an eminent French astronomer, who at an early age evinced a strong inclination for scientific pursuits, which was encouraged by his friends. When young, he communicated some valuable papers to the Royal Academy, and in 1766 published a work on the satellites of Jupiter. In 1768 he published an éloge of Leibnitz, for which he received a gold medal from the Academy of Berlin. This was followed by the éloges of Charles V., Laccaille, and Cornéille, which, with the former, were printed together. In 1775 appeared the first portion of his "History of Astronomy," the concluding volume of which was published in 1787. Besides these works, he published several historical disquisitions and astronomical observations. In 1764 he was elected a member of the French Academy, and entering eagerly into the political discussions of his native country, was chosen president of the first National Assembly. In June, 1789, he presided at that meeting of the deputies at the Tennis-court when all took oath not to dissolve until they had prepared a new constitution for France. In the following month he was made mayor of Paris, but soon lost his popularity, owing to the kindly sentiments which he expressed towards the royal family, and his enforcing obedience to the laws. In consequence of this, he resigned his office in 1791, and sought that philosophical retirement for which he was so much more suited. In the sanguinary period which followed, he was apprehended, and after a summary process, condemned to be guillotined. B. at Paris, 1736; suffered, 1793.—When on the scaffold, the demeanour of this philosopher is said to have been perfectly tranquil. "You tremble, Bailly," said one of his enemies to him. "My friend, it is with cold," was the calm reply. Although there is much eloquent writing in Bailly's astronomical works, yet they are not always to be received as essentially correct, as he appears sometimes to deal in surmises and speculations, rather than in ascertained and calculated facts.

BAILLY, Edmond Louis Barthelemy, a professor at the college of Jutilly, who afterwards became a member of the National Convention, took an active share in its proceedings on the moderate side, and mainly contributed to the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, which gave the chief power to Napoleon, by whom Bailly was appointed prefect of the Lot. He was subsequently deprived of his office, and lived in retirement till his death in 1819. B. 1760.

BAILLY, David, a Dutch painter, studied in Flanders and Italy, and attained considerable eminence in portraits. In 1613 he settled at Leyden, where he died. B. at Leyden about 1544; d. 1633.

BAILY, Edward Hodges, R.A., bai'-le, an eminent sculptor, who began his career as an artist by producing small portrait busts in wax. Obtaining an introduction to Flaxman, he was admitted into the studio of that distinguished man. At the same time he entered as a student at the Royal Academy, where, in 1809, he obtained a silver medal, and in 1811 a gold medal, with an income of 50*l*. The first work which fixed his popularity and placed him amongst the best sculptors of England, was his "Eye at the Fountain," which is now in the Bristol Library Institution. Many of the statues of late years erected in London and the provinces are by him; and there is scarcely an exhibition of the Royal Academy that is not adorned by some of his embodied poetical conceptions. Some of his happiest efforts have appeared in these; amongst which may be named his "Hercules casting Hylas into the Sea," "the Sleeping Nymph," "Eye listening to the Voice," "Helena," "Psyche," "Maternal Love," and "The Girl preparing for the Bath." Amongst his latest productions is "The Graces Seated," which is considered one of his best performances. B. at Bristol, 1788.—Although he made large sums of money during the earlier portion of his life, yet in 1850 the public discovered with astonishment that he was but indifferently provided for.

BAILY, Francis, the son of a banker, and himself a stockbroker up to his 51st year, when he began with ardour to cultivate the science of astronomy, which he unremittingly pursued throughout the rest of his life. He was one of the founders of the Astronomical Society, and not only distinguished himself by his industry, but by the many works which he produced upon his favourite science. B. at Newbury, 1774; d. 1844. "Baily's beads," a peculiar appearance sometimes visible during the period of an eclipse, take their name from this astronomer.

BAINBRIDGE, John, bain'-bridj, a physician and astronomer, who, after taking his degrees at Cambridge, and keeping a school at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, settled in London, where he gained so great a reputation for his mathematical knowledge, that Sir Henry Saville appointed him his first astronomical professor at Oxford. B. at Ashby-de-la-Zouch, 1682; d. at Oxford, 1643.—He published several astronomical works, and also left some mathematical MSS.

BAIRD, Sir David, baird, an intrepid general, who, in 1799, led the storming party which took Seringapatam. For his bravery on this occasion he received the thanks of the Parliament and of the East India Company. This was the great exploit of his life, although he shared in the glory of Corunna under Sir John Moore. On the death of that distinguished officer he became commander-in-chief, but could not take full advantage of the position, from his arm being so dreadfully shattered that it had to be amputated at the shoulder. For his gallant conduct, however, he again received the thanks of Parliament, and was created a baronet. His military career was both long and active, having served in various parts of the globe. B. at Newbyth, in Scotland, 1757; d. 1829.

BAIUS, Michael, bai'-us, a divine, who became professor of divinity in the university of Louvain, which appointed him its deputy at the Council of Trent. His partiality for Augustine, however, brought upon him the charge of siding too much with Calvin; and several of his opinions were condemned by his college and the pope. b. at Melun, 1513; d. 1539.

BAJAZET I., bâ-jû-zet, sultan of the Turks, succeeded his father, Amurath I., in 1389, and soon after put his younger brother to death. He pushed his conquests far into Asia and Europe, and in 1396 gained a great victory over the Christian army under Sigismund, king of Hungary. In 1402, however, he experienced a terrible defeat from the famous Timur, or Tamerlane, on the plains of Angora. Bajazet was taken prisoner. Different accounts are given of his treatment by the Persian and Turkish historians. The former assert that he was entertained in a liberal manner; while the latter maintain that Timur shut him in an iron cage, and exposed him to the derision of the populace. d. 1403.

BAJAZET II., sultan of the Turks, succeeded his father, Mahomet II., in 1481. He was opposed by his brother Zizim, whom he defeated. Zizim escaped to Rhodes, whence the grand master (see AVRUSSEON) sent him to Italy, where Bajazet caused him to be assassinated. He obtained several advantages over the Venetians and other Christian powers. His son Selim rebelled against him; but Bajazet, instead of punishing him, abdicated in his favour, an act which, it is said, Selim repaid by causing him to be poisoned in 1512.

BAKER, Sir Richard, bât-ker, an historical writer, who, in 1603, was knighted by James I., and, in 1620, was high-sheriff of Oxfordshire. An unfortunate marriage reduced him to poverty, and he was thrown into the Fleet prison, where he wrote several books, the chief of which is a "Chronicle of the Kings of England," which went through several editions, and was long popular with the people. b. at Sissinghurst, Kent, 1563; d. 1645.—Baker's is the chronicle from which Addison, in his "Spectator," makes Sir Roger de Coverley say he drew "many observations." It brings the history of England down to the death of James I.; but it is, notwithstanding the praise of the simple knight of Addison, a dry and jejune performance.

BAKER, Thomas, a mathematician and divine, who published the "Geometrical Key; or, the Gate of Equations unlocked," 1684. The Royal Society sent him some questions, which he solved so satisfactorily that they presented him with a medal. b. at Ilton, in Somersetshire, 1625; d. 1690.

BAKER, Henry, an eminent naturalist, who was brought up a bookseller, but which pursuit he relinquished, and undertook the tuition of deaf and dumb persons, by which he acquired a handsome fortune. He married a daughter of Daniel Defoe, by whom he had two sons. He was chosen fellow of the Antiquarian and Royal Societies, and in 1740 obtained from the latter the gold medal for his microscopical experiments on saline particles. b. in London, 1698; d. 1774. He published the "Microscope made Easy," 8vo, 1742; and "Employment for the Microscope," 8vo, 1764. He also wrote original poems, serious and humorous, published in 8vo, 1725. He left 100*l.* to the Royal Society for an anatomical or chemical lecture, which is called the Bakerian lecture.

BAKER, David Erskine, eldest son of the above, was adopted by an uncle who was a silk-throwster in Spitalfields, and whom he succeeded in the business. Being fond of theatrical entertainments, however, he squandered his property and joined some strolling companies. Little is known of his history, but he is supposed to have died about 1770. He was the author of "A Companion to the Playhouse," 1764; since considerably improved and enlarged under the title of "Biographia Dramatica."

BAKER, Thomas, an antiquary and divine of the beginning of the 18th century, who, for refusing to take the oaths to the new government after the revolution of 1688, was deprived of the rectory of Long Newton, in the diocese of Durham. He then retired to Cambridge, where he had a scholarship, of which, however, he was subsequently deprived; and devoted himself to study. He does not appear to have published any work of consequence, except one entitled "Reflections on Learning," which was often reprinted; but he kept up an extensive correspondence with the most eminent scholars and authors of his time, many of whom he aided by his learning and researches in the prosecution of their labours. Acknowledgments of these obligations are to be found in the works of Dr. Walker, Burnet, Dr. John Smith (editor of Bede), Dr. Knight (Life of Erasmus), Dr. Richardson (Lives of the English Bishops), Ames (History of English Translations of the Bible), and others. Baker also left large collections of valuable MSS., transcriptions, &c., which have been of great service to students of ecclesiastical antiquities and cognate subjects ever since. The Harleian manuscripts in the British Museum contain many volumes of his collections, which he gave to the Earl of Oxford, from whose heirs the MSS. were purchased by the government. Baker was born in the parish of Lanchester, Durham, 1656; d. July 2, 1740, aged 83.

BAKER, John, a distinguished British admiral of the end of the 17th and early part of the 18th century, served under Admiral Hopson in the attack on Vigo, and subsequently acted under Sir Cloudesley Shovel and Sir George Rooke. With the latter officer he was present at the capture of Gibraltar, and in the battle off Malaga with the French fleet, where he was wounded. b. at Port Mahon, 1716.

BAKER, Sir Samuel White, an African traveller of the present century, who discovered the lake Albert Nyanza, in 1864, one of the great equatorial reservoirs that supply the river Nile. In the journey that resulted in this discovery he was accompanied by his wife. He has written various interesting accounts of his travels. He was knighted in 1868. b. June 8, 1821.

BAKEWELL, Robert, bake-well, a celebrated agriculturist, who turned his attention to the improvement of the breed of cattle, for which purpose he travelled over England, and into Ireland and Holland. His endeavours were so successful that the Dishley sheep were so much distinguished above all others, that he let one of his rams for 40*l.* guineas, and another for 800 guineas, for a single season. The race of Dishley sheep were known by the fineness of their bone and flesh, the lightness of the offal, disposition to quietness, and consequently to mature and fatten with less food than other sheep of equal weight. He also greatly improved the breed of black cattle, the descendants of his stock being still distinguished as the new Leices-

BAKI (properly Abd-ul-Baki), bal'-e, the most eminent of Ottoman lyric poets, flourished in the reign of Soliman the Magnificent, which is usually reckoned the Augustan age of Mohammedan literature. At an early age Baki was not only patronized by the Sultan Soliman, but on presenting to that monarch his first work, was hailed by him in an ode of his own composition as the first of his country's poets. Baki has been pronounced the prince of Turkish lyrical versifiers, and by the critics of his country is ranked with Hafiz in the Persian and Moleu-abbi in the Arabic languages. His elegy on the death of Soliman is esteemed the most perfect gem of Turkish poetry. He adopted his native language for his compositions in preference to the Persian and Arabic, which were the

in the year 1600, of mortification at being a second time disappointed of being made grand mufti.

BALASSI, Mario, ba-las'-se, an Italian historical and portrait painter, whose best works are his picture of "St. Francis," and "The Miracle of St. Nicholas of Tolentino." B. at Florence, 1601; D. 1667.

BALBE, balv'-bai, a distinguished Italian family of Quisers, in the little state of Piedmont, many members of which played prominent parts in the affairs of the Italian Republics in the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries. The army which defeated the Emperor Barbarossa at Lignano, in 1176, was commanded by members of this family. The family became reduced in the middle of the 15th century, and its head removed to Avignon, and founded a house distinguished in French annals. His name was Gilles du Barton; and from him the celebrated Crillon was descended.

BALBI, Gaspar, bal'-be, who, as a dealer in precious stones, left Aleppo, in 1579, on a journey to the Indies, and did not return till 1588. On his return he published an account of his journey. He visited Ormuz, Goa, Cochlin, and Pegu, and describes what he saw with considerable spirit, and, it is believed, with accuracy. Lived in the 16th century.

BALBI, Adrien, a Venetian, who at an early period of his life was appointed professor of geography and natural philosophy in his native town, but, in 1820, went to Portugal. Here, in 1822, he published his "Statistical Essay on the Kingdom of Portugal." This publication having procured him considerable fame, he settled in Paris, where in 1826, he published his celebrated "Ethnographical Atlas," which was the first work to make the French acquainted with the researches of Adelung and other German philologists. This work raised him high in the estimation of the learned and the public generally, and under the administration of Martignac he was placed in easy circumstances by the French government. He subsequently gave to the world an "Abridgment of Geography," on a new plan, which has been translated into most of the European languages. In 1833 he quitted Paris for Padua, where he resided until his death. B. at Venice, 1782; D. 1848.

BALDIS, Giovanni Battista, balv'-be, a distinguished botanist, was born in Piedmont, in 1705, and educated at Turin. He filled the post of professor of botany and keeper of the Botanical Gardens at Turin, but was obliged to quit it in 1814, and retired to Pavia. He subsequently occupied a similar position in Lyons, which, in 1830, he resigned, and returned to his native country, and died there in 1831. His writings are very voluminous, and are highly esteemed.

BALBINUS, Decimus Caelius, bal-bi'-nus, a Roman senator, who was elected emperor in conjunction with Maximus in 237, after the death of M. Antonius Gordianus and his son in Africa. Assassinated 238.

BALBOA, Vasco Nufiez de, vas'-ko noon'-yuis bal-bo'-a, a Castilian, was one of the first who visited the West Indies, where he gained immense riches. He settled on the coast of Darien, and built a town. In 1513 he crossed the isthmus, and returned next year with a prodigious quantity of wealth. He sent an account of his discovery to Spain, and the king appointed Pedraro d'Avila governor of Darien, who on his arrival was astonished to see Balboa in a cotton jacket, with sandals made of hemp on his feet, and dwelling in a thatched hut. The governor, notwithstanding that he had given Balboa his daughter in marriage, was jealous of his abilities, and caused him to be beheaded in 1517.

BALBO, Count Cesare, balv'-bo, an Italian politician, author, journalist, and advocate of Romanism, was born in Piedmont, in 1789; was in early life employed by Napoleon I.; and after Waterloo was secretary of the Sardinian Legation in London. For the last thirty years of his life he devoted himself to authorship, and published various works, including a "History of Italy," "The Hopes of Italy," &c. A spirit of rigid and exclusive Romanism pervades all his writings. D. 1853.

BALCANQUAL, Walter, bal'-kan-quil, a learned Scotch divine, who attended James I. to England, and became chaplain to the king, master of the Savoy, and representative of the Church of Scotland at the Synod of Dordt. In 1624 he was made dean of Rochester; and in 1639 dean of Durham. He suffered severely in the rebellion. D. at Chirk Castle, in Denbighshire, in 1645. —He wrote the "Declaration of King Charles I. concerning the late Tumults in Scotland," folio, 1630; "Epistles concerning the Synod of Dordt," in John Hales's "Golden Remains," and some sermons.

BALCHEN, John, bal'-chen, an English admiral, who, entering early into the navy, rose to the command of a ship, and distinguished himself by his bravery in the Mediterranean, under Sir George Byng. In 1731 he was made an admiral; and in 1743 was appointed governor of Greenwich Hospital. He soon after went with a squadron to relieve Sir Charles Hardy, who, with a large fleet of transports, was blockaded in the Tagus. Having accomplished this service, he sailed for England; but encountering a violent storm, his ship, the Victory, was lost on the Caskets, near Jersey, and every one on board perished, October 3, 1744. A monument in Westminster Abbey commemorates this melancholy event. B. 1669.

BALDERIC, or BAUDRY, bal'-de-rik, a French historian, who became bishop of Dol, in Brittany, and was at the council of Clermont. He wrote a history of the crusade to the year 1099. D. 1130. —There was another bishop, a contemporary, of the same name, who wrote a chronicle of the towns of Arras and Cambray. b. 1697.

BALDI, Bernard, bawld'-de, a learned Italian, who studied at Padua, and afterwards became mathematician to the duke of Guastalla. b. at Urbino, 1553; d. 1617.—He translated into Italian several works of the ancient mathematicians, and wrote some good poems in that language. He was also the author of several philosophical works, and commenced a "Universal Historical Geography." His "Lives of Mathematicians" was printed in 1707.

BALDI, Lazaro, an historical painter, a native of Tuscany, and the disciple of Pietro da Cortona. He was employed by Alexander VII. to paint for the palace of the Quirinal a "David killing Goliath." Many of his pictures are to be seen in the churches at Rome. b. 1623 or 1624; d. 1708.

BALDINI, Baccio, bawld'-de-ne, a Florentine engraver, who is said to have been taught the art by Finiguerra, who, according to the Italians, was its inventor, but whose instructions were ill carried out by his pupil. His works, therefore, have no value further than such as arises from their being specimens of the first efforts of one of the earliest Italian engravers. b. at Florence, 1436; d. 1515.

BALDINI, John Anthony, a learned Italian nobleman, who was employed as ambassador at various courts in Europe, and attended the congress at Utrecht. b. at Piacenza, 1634; d. 1725.

BALDUCCI, Philip, bawld'-de-noot-cke, an Italian artist and biographer, who passed an industrious life, working both with the pencil and the pen. b. at Florence, 1624; d. 1696.—He wrote, 1. "The General History of Painters," 6 vols. 2. "A Vocabulary of Designs." 3. "An Account of the Progress of Engraving on Copper."

BALDUCCI, Francis, bawld'-dooteh'-e, an Italian poet of the 17th century, who was very successful in the Anacreontic style of composition, but whose improvidence, debauchery, and folly kept him in continual trouble. He at one time served as a common soldier, at another lived a sort of semi-beggar's life in Rome, and became notorious for the impudence with which he intruded himself into the houses and at the tables of the great. So reckless and ill-tempered did he become, that he was thrust out of doors by every one, and had to obtain a living by many shifts, not always very reputable. He finally took orders, became attached to the household of Pompeo Colonna, prince of Galliciano, but died in the hospital of S. Giovanni Laterano, in 1643. His poems were numerous, have often been reprinted, and are esteemed the best Italian specimens of the Anacreontic style.

BALDUCCI, Giovanni, bawld'-dooteh'-e-o, an eminent sculptor of the Pisan school. He was born at the close of the 13th century, and attained a high reputation, though his statues have a hard, stiff, and exaggerated air about them. His works are to be seen in Lucca, and especially in Milan. b. about 1348.

BALDOCK, bal'-dok, Ralph de, Bishop of London, whom, in 1307, King Edward I. appointed lord high chancellor. b. 1313. He wrote a history of British affairs, which Leland had seen, though it is now lost.—There was at the same time one Robert de Baldock, a divine, who was in great favour with Edward II., whose misfortunes he shared, and died in Newgate.

BALDUNE, Hans, bal'-doong, called also Hans Grun, a distinguished old German painter and wood-engraver. He was intimate with Albert Dürer, and as a painter was considered little inferior to his great friend. His heads are the best points in his works. b. in Suabia, about 1470; d. 1545.

BALDWIN I., king of Jerusalem, bal'd'-win, was the son of Eustace, count of Bouillon, and accompanied his brother Godfrey of Bouillon into Palestine, where he gained the sovereignty of the state of Edessa. He succeeded his brother on the throne of Jerusalem in 1100, and for eighteen years waged war against the Turks, the Arabs, the Persians, and the Saracens. He took many towns, and secured for the Christians the coast of Syria, from the Gulf of Issus to the confines of Egypt. b. at Laris, in the desert, 1118, and was buried on Mount Calvary. In the first canto of the "Gerusalemme" of Tasso, the poet has depicted the character of this monarch, as well as that of his brother Godfrey.

BALDWIN II., king of Jerusalem, the cousin of the above, was crowned in 1118, after Eustace, brother of Baldwin I., had renounced all claim to the vacant throne. In 1120 he gained a great victory over the Saracens, but in 1124 he was taken prisoner by them, and was ransomed only by giving up the city of Tyre. In 1131 he abdicated in favour of his son-in-law, Foulques of Anjou, and retired to a monastery, where he died in the same year. The military and religious order of the Templars, for the defence of the Holy Land, was instituted in the reign of this monarch.

BALDWIN III. was the son of Foulques of Anjou, whom he succeeded in 1142, under the guardianship of his mother. He took Ascalon and other places; but under his reign the Christians lost Edessa. b. 1130; d. at Antioch, 1162. He was succeeded by his brother, Amauri I. (See AMAURI.)

BALDWIN IV., the son of Amauri, succeeded to the throne of Jerusalem on the death of his father, in 1173; but being a leper, Raymond, count of Tripoli, governed the kingdom for him. He afterwards resigned the crown to his nephew, Baldwin V. b. 1155. In the year following, his successor died of poison, supposed to have been administered by his mother in order that her second husband, Guy de Lusignan, might enjoy the throne.—Soon after this event the Christians lost Jerusalem, which, in 1187, was taken by Saladin.

BALDWIN I., emperor of Constantinople, to which position he was chosen in preference to Boniface of Monferrat, who competed with him for the dignity on the capture of the city by the Latins during the 4th crusade, and was crowned in St. Sophia on the 16th of May, 1204. He was previously count of Flanders and Hainault. He was successful in his wars with the Mohammedans, but having offended the king of the Bulgarians, that prince, aided by a revolt of the Greeks, made war upon the empire, and in a skirmish, where he imprudently attacked a superior force with a mere handful of knights, Baldwin was defeated and taken prisoner. His subsequent history is unknown, but he is believed to have died shortly after his captivity, aged 32. He was a brave warrior, and just and moderate as a ruler. Taken prisoner 1205.

BALDWIN II., emperor of Constantinople, was the son of Peter de Courtenay, count of Auxerre, by the sister of the above emperor. He succeeded his brother Robert in the empire of the East, in 1228, being only eleven years of age. In 1261 Constantinople was taken by Michael Palæologus, and Baldwin escaped by sea to Italy, where he died in 1273.—With him terminated the dynasty of the Latin emperors of Constantinople.

BALDWIN I., count of Flanders, called Bras-de-fer, on account, as some writers say, of his immense strength, and, according to others, because of his being always in armour, was the son of Odoacer, whom he succeeded as Grand Forester in 837. On the death of Louis le Debonnaire, king of France, Baldwin espoused the cause of Lothaire, in opposition to Charles the Bald and Louis of Bavaria, his brothers, and took part in the battle of Fontenai, and the other events of the war which ensued. In 857 he waylaid and abducted Judith, daughter of Charles the Bald, and widow of Ethelwolf, king of England, on her way home to her father. Charles sent his son, Louis the Stammerer, with an army to punish this outrage, but Baldwin defeated him in the battle of Arras, and having hanged several barons who were prisoners, he was excommunicated by the pope. In order to get the ban removed, he went to Rome, submitted to the censures of the holy father, who received him into favour, and arranged his reconciliation with Charles, who consented to his marriage with Judith, raised Flanders into a county with enlarged limits, and confirmed Baldwin in the government on condition of paying homage to the crown of France. Baldwin, with the aid of Charles, afterwards built the castles of Bruges and Ghent, as a defence against the Normans under Hastings. He died at Arras, in 877 or 879. He is celebrated by Longfellow in his poem of the "Belfry of Bruges," as "mighty Baldwin Bras-de-fer." He left two sons, one of whom succeeded him as Baldwin II.; the other, Raoul, was count of Cambrai.—Baldwin II. was married to a daughter of Alfred the Great, king of England.—There were six other counts of Flanders of the same name, whose history, however, exhibits only a succession of wars and quarrels with neighbouring princes.

BALDWIN, Thomas, a distinguished English prelate, who, although sprung from obscure parentage, rose to be abbot of Ford, Devonshire, bishop of Worcester, and finally archbishop of Canterbury. He was of a mild disposition, sober, and modest. Some of these characteristics so greatly swayed him as he rose to power, that the pope is said to have described him as a fervent monk, a cold abbot, a lazy bishop, and a remiss archbishop. He founded the archiepiscopal parish of Lambeth, and subsequently preached the crusade with great success, and even accompanied Richard I. to the Holy Land, where he died during the siege of Ptolemais in 1191, having been of essential service to the army from the influence his powerful exhortations had upon the soldiers. Some of his theological writings have been printed in the Bibliotheca Cisterciensis, and show him to have had a good knowledge of the subject.

BALDWIN, or BALDWIN, William, a schoolmaster and divine, who pursued the occupation of printing in order to promote the Reformation. He is said to have written some comedies; at all events, he was "engaged in the reigns of Edward VI. and Phillip and Mary, if not earlier, in preparing theatrical entertainments for the court." His name, however, is most endeared to the lovers of literature by his having been one of the authors and editors of "The Mirror for Magistrates," which "occupies the annals of English poetry from Surrey to Spenser." b. about 1664.

BALFE, John, bail, an English divine, who, from a Carmelite monk, became a zealous Protestant and writer against popery. On the death of his patron, Lord Cromwell, he went to Holland, but returned to England on the accession of Edward VI., and obtained a living in Hampshire. In 1552 he was appointed to the bishopric of Ossory, in Ireland, where he laboured in reforming his diocese with such zeal that his life was threatened by the priests. On the accession of Mary, he retired to Bâle, in Switzerland, where he remained till Elizabeth ascended the throne, when he returned to England, and became a prebend of Canterbury, b. at Cove, in Suffolk, 1495; d. 1563, and was buried in Canterbury Cathedral.—He wrote several works, the best of which is entitled "An Account of the Lives of Eminent Writers of Britain."

BALECHOU, Jean Jaques, bail-shoo, a French engraver, who was expelled from the Academy of Painters for surreptitiously selling first-proof impressions of his print of Frederick Augustus, elector of Saxony and king of Poland, contrary to the orders of the dauphiness. b. at Arles, 1715; d. 1765. His engravings are held in high estimation.

BALEN, Henry Van, ba'-len, an historical and portrait painter, whose best works are "St. John Preaching in the Desert," and the "Judgment of Paris." b. at Antwerp, 1560; d. 1632.—His son, John Van Balen, distinguished himself as a painter of history and landscapes.

BALES, Peter, bails, a celebrated penman, who excelled not only in elegant writing, but in miniature penmanship, and was employed by Walsingham in imitating the handwriting of conspirators whose letters he had intercepted. b. 1547; d. 1610. He published, in 1590, the "Writing Master," in three parts; the first teaching swift writing; the second, true writing; the third, fair writing; and as a proof of his attainments in penmanship, we are told that he wrote out the Bible in shorthand so small that it could be inclosed in the shell of an English walnut.

BALESTRA, Antony, law-lais'-tra, an eminent historical painter, who, in 1694, gained the prize of merit given by the Academy of St. Luke. b. at Verona, 1666; d. 1740. His productions were numerous, and many of his works are to be seen in the Venetian states.

BALFE, Michael William, balf, a pleasing and popular composer, was born in Dublin in 1803, and early exhibited the love of music which was an inherent element in his nature. His first public performance of note was as a violin player in the oratorios at Drury-lane in 1823 or 1824. In 1824 he appeared upon the stage, but an unfortunate accident at the Theatre Royal, Norwich, had an unfavourable influence on his career. He afterwards went to Italy; and appeared with success, in 1827, at Paris, in the "Barber of Seville." He continued a career of general good fortune on the continent till 1835, when he returned to London, and appeared in several of his own compositions. In 1839 he became lessee of the English Opera House, but the speculation did not succeed, and Mr. Balfe relinquished the managerial chair, and resumed the composer's pen. His career since has been a uniform success. His principal compositions are: "The Siege of Rochelle," "The Jewess," "The Maid of Artois," in which Malibran appeared with great éclat, and which in six nights realized £5600 lls., being an average of £355 per night; "Catherine Grey;" "Falstaff;" "Joan of Arc;" "Kiolanthe;" "The Bohemian Girl;" "The Daughter of St.

BALFOUR, Sir James, bât'-foor, lord president of the Court of Session in Scotland, and the reputed author of "Practicks of the Law," rose to eminence as a privy councillor and judge, and was with Mary queen of Scots at Holyrood on the night of the assassination of Rizzio. He was shortly afterwards knighted by the queen, and subsequently attached himself to the fortunes of Bothwell, joining in the conspiracy against Darnley. He prepared the house in the Kirk of Field for the atrocious murder of that unfortunate nobleman, and was, in the despatch of the earl of Lennox, charged with being an accomplice in that crime. He seems to have changed sides with every party in power. After being concerned in nearly all the stormy intrigues of the times, now fleeing from his country to save his head, and now returning to become an accuser, a prosecutor, and condemner of others, he died in 1583.

BALFOUR, Sir James, a Scottish antiquarian and poet, was born towards the end of the 16th century, being sprung from an ancient family of Fifeshire. He wrote poetry both in Latin and in the native Scottish dialect; was the friend and assistant of Dugdale and Segar in their researches into ecclesiastical antiquities, on which subject he published some papers having reference to Scotland; was the friend of Sir Robert Aytoun and the Earl of Stirling, both poets; and, through the influence of the Earl of Kinnoul, chancellor of Scotland, was appointed Lyon king-at-arms. In 1633 he was created a baronet, and had the lands of Kinnaird, in Fife, conferred upon him. He joined in opposing the introduction of the liturgy into the Scottish church, and wrote an account of the riots which took place in connexion with the attempt to do so. Being, however, strongly attached to monarchical principles, he was deprived of his office by Cromwell, and retired to the country, where he pursued his studies. He died in 1657, having been four times married, and leaving issue. He wrote the Annals of Scotland, from Fergus I. to Charles, which were published in 1825 from the original MSS. in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, in which a great many other MSS. by him remain.

BALFOUR, James, an advocate of the Scottish bar, who wrote two philosophical dissertations against the speculations of David Hume. These performances exhibited so much candour and good-feeling, that the philosopher whose opinions he had attacked, wrote to him sentiments expressive of his esteem, and, at the same time, requested the pleasure of his friendship. In 1754 he became professor of moral philosophy in Edinburgh; and in 1764 was appointed to the chair of public law. b. 1703; d. at Pirig, 1795.—His life was a comment on the amiable philosophy which he laboured to teach.

BALFOUR, John Hutton, M.D., F.R.S.E., professor of botany in the university of Edinburgh, having previously occupied the same chair in the university of Glasgow, in which he succeeded Sir William Jackson Hooker. He has written much on botanical science, and deservedly stands high in public estimation. b. at Edinburgh, 1803.

BALFOUR, Francis, a native of Edinburgh, where he was educated for the medical profession, and afterwards went to India, where he attained a distinguished reputation. He published several works intended to show the influence the moon exercises in diseases, especially fevers, the crises in which, he conceived, could be explained by the revolutions of that orb, and that the treatment should be regulated accordingly. Lived about 1750—1800.

BALFOUR, Alexander, a Scottish author, was born at Monkie, Forfarshire, in March, 1767, of poor parents. Commencing life as a handloom weaver, he raised himself to a good position as a manufacturer; but being ruined by the panic of 1815, took to literature as a means of helping to obtain a living, and published novels, tales, poetry, and contributions to the periodical literature of the day. In 1827, Mr. Canning gave him a donation of £100 from the treasury, in acknowledgment of his literary merits and his necessities, he having long suffered from paralysis. He died in September, 1829.

BALGUY, Thomas, bât'-gi, an eminent divine, who became prebendary of Winchester, and archdeacon of that diocese, and refused the bishopric of Gloucester. b. 1716; d. 1795.—A collection of his sermons and charges has been printed in one volume, 8vo.

BALLOL, or BALLIOL, Sir John de, bât'-le-ol, founder of a college called by his name at Oxford, and governor of Carlisle in 1243. On the marriage of Margaret, daughter of Henry III., to Alexander III., king of Scotland, the guardianship of the royal pair, as well as of the kingdom, was committed to Baliol and Ros of Werke; but in about three years they were charged with abusing their trust, and Henry III. marched towards Scotland to punish them. However, by paying a large sum into the royal treasury, Baliol made his peace. In 1263 he laid the foundation of Baliol College, Oxford, which was completed by his widow. In the contest between Henry III. and the barons under Simon de Montfort, Baliol sided with the king; for which the barons seized his lands. b. at Barnard Castle, Durham; d. 1269.

BALLOL, John de, son of the above, who, being at the head of the English interest in Scotland, laid claim, on the death of Queen Margaret (known as the Maiden of Norway), to the vacant throne, by virtue of his descent from David, earl of Huntingdon, brother to William the Lion, king of Scotland. His principal competitor for the crown was Robert Bruce, who was also descended from that nobleman, being the son of Isabella, his second daughter, while Baliol was the grandson of Margaret, his eldest daughter. Edward I. being appointed arbitrator, declared in favour of Baliol, who did homage to him for the kingdom, November 20, 1292. But he did not hold the sceptre long; for, remonstrating against the power assumed by Edward over Scotland, he was summoned to his tribunal as a vassal. Baliol, provoked at this, concluded a treaty with France, the consequence of which was a war with England. The battle of Dunbar decided the fate of Baliol, who surrendered his crown into the hands of Edward, who sent him and his son to England, where they were committed to the Tower. At the intercession of the pope they were released, and delivered to his legate in 1299, when Balloi retired to his estates in Normandy, where he lived in retirement throughout the remainder of his life. p. 1314.—His son Edward afterwards set up a claim to the kingdom of Scotland, invaded and recovered it; but kept it only a short time, and dying not long afterwards without issue, the family became extinct. p. 1363.

BALL, John, ball, a Kentish preacher, who, in 1381, took part in the insurrection of Wat Tyler. To 100,000 of the insurgents on Blackheath he preached a sermon from these lines, which he took for his text:—

When Adam delved and Eve span,
Where was then the gentleman?

He, with Jack Straw and 1500 others, was hanged, July 2, 1381.

BALL, John, an English divine of the 17th century, who, after being educated at Oxford, where he took his degree of B.A. in 1603, associated himself with the Puritans, ultimately settled as curate of Whitmore, in Staffordshire, where he kept a school to eke out his miserable pittance of £20 a-year, and there he died, leaving behind him a high reputation for simplicity, purity, guilelessness, piety, and learning. Several treatises which he wrote were long used as family text-books among the sect to which he belonged, one of which, called a "Short Treatise containing all the Principal Grounds of the Christian Religion," was fourteen times printed before 1632; his "Treatise on Faith" passed through many editions, and other works of his were equally popular. Baxter, Fuller, and others speak of him in highly eulogistic terms. p. Oct. 20, 1640.

BALL, Thomas, another Puritan divine of the same period, was educated at Cambridge, and settled as a minister in Northampton, where he died, June, 1659, leaving, like the above a reputation for learning, piety, and sincerity. It has been supposed that John and Thomas Ball were related; but this is uncertain.

BALL, Sir Alexander John, a British naval officer who served with great distinction in the first American war, and afterwards in the Mediterranean under Nelson. At the battle of the Nile he commanded the Alexander, and it is said that to a peculiar combustible thrown from this ship, the explosion of the French man-of-war L'Orient is to be attributed. He subsequently was engaged in besieging the French garrison at Malta, but with the most inadequate means, both in men and supplies. The French, however, were at last compelled to surrender, and in 1800 Malta was occupied by the British, who have ever since retained it. Sir Alexander was made governor of the island, where he died in 1809, on the very day he was appointed rear-admiral of the Red. He was buried close to the remains of Sir Ralph Abercromby, and a splendid monument was erected to his memory.—He entered the naval service at an early age, choosing a sailor's life, it is said, in consequence of the impression he received from reading "Robinson Crusoe."

BALLANTYNE, James, ball'-an-tine, a printer of Edinburgh, at whose press the novels of Sir Walter Scott were printed. He at one time edited a newspaper called the "Kelso Mail," and for many years conducted the "Edinburgh Weekly Journal." p. at Kelso; p. 1833.—His younger brother, John, was established as a publisher in Edinburgh by Sir Walter Scott, in 1805; but the concern did not flourish, and is alleged by Lockhart to have been the main cause of the difficulties which weighed on Sir Walter's latter days. Both brothers had much to do with the affairs of the great novelist. p. 1776; p. 1821.

Ballesteros

BALLARD, George, ball'-ard, a learned antiquarian and Sacon scholar, who, born in humble circumstances, was assisted to an education at Oxford, where he became one of the beadles, and made extensive collections of MSS., extracts, &c., which have often been used by historical and biographical students. They are in the Bodleian Library. He published "Memoirs of English Ladies who have been distinguished in Literature, Science, and Art," and asserts that England can claim more such females than any other country of Europe. He died comparatively young, in 1755.

BALLARD, Admiral Samuel James, a distinguished officer, who, entering the navy in 1776, took part in most of the prominent actions fought by the fleets under Keppel, Rodney, Howe, and other commanders. He also performed eminent service while in command of small squadrons and single vessels. While in command of the Pearl, from 1796 till 1802, he captured, retook, or destroyed nearly eighty ships, and on all occasions was prominent for daring and intrepidity, which were almost always successful. He does not appear ever to have been associated with Nelson. He was made rear-admiral in 1814, and died at Exmouth, on Oct. 9, 1829. p. at Portsmouth, of a family originally Dutch.

BALLARD, Volant Vashon, another eminent naval officer, who greatly distinguished himself in the service of his country, especially in the East and West Indies, in the latter of which he, while in command of the Blonde, under the orders of the above officer, was one of two captains who succeeded in destroying two French frigates at Ance la Barque, together with a powerful battery under which they had taken shelter. For this and other services he was warmly thanked by both the naval and military commanders engaged in the blockade of Guadeloupe in 1809. He was promoted to rear-admiral's rank in 1825, and when he died, in 1833, was a commander of the Bath. p. 1774.

BALLENDEN, or BELLENDEN, Dr. John, ball'-en-den, a clever Scottish poet and historian, who translated Boethius's "History of Scotland," and was highly commended for his poetical talents by Sir David Lyndesay. Opposing the Reformation, he was under the necessity of retiring to Rome, where he died in the year 1560. He held several high positions in the church before the introduction of the reformed doctrines, and was a doctor of the Sorbonne and member of other learned societies. Several of his poems are still extant.

BALLESTEROS, Don Francisco, ba'-lais-tair'-os, a Spanish commander during the Peninsular war. On the invasion of the French, he, with his regiment and the troops of Castaños and Blake, had frequent sanguinary encounters with the enemy in the south of Spain. The regency of Cadiz afterwards made him lieutenant-general, and gave him the command of the army of Andalusia, where he was opposed to the most famous of Napoleon's marshals, Soult, Mortier, &c.; and when defeated, always adroitly made his escape. On the landing of the British, the chief command of the combined armies was given to the duke of Wellington. This measure Ballesteros resolutely opposed, and was, in consequence, banished to Ceuta, but was afterwards permitted to return to the army. When Ferdinand was restored, he was made minister of war, but soon after lost his office, and was sent to Valladolid. In 1820 we find him again commander of the Spanish forces, and compelled to yield to the superior strength of the French, when a convention was signed at Granada. Subsequently Ferdinand annulled the constitution, and dismissed all the civil and military functionaries, when Ballesteros retired to Paris, where he died, 1832. B. at Brea, Aragon, 1770.

BALLEXERD, James, bal-ex-erd, a citizen of Geneva, who wrote a book on the physical education of children, which obtained the prize given by a society in Holland. He was also the author of a dissertation on this question, What are the principal causes of the deaths of so many children? B. 1726; D. 1774.

BALLIN, Claude, bal-in, a French artist, who, at the age of nineteen, made four silver basins, on which were represented the four ages of the world, which were purchased by Cardinal Richelieu, who employed Ballin to make four vases after the antique, to match them. He also executed several handsome pieces for Louis XIV. On the death of Varin, he was made director of the mint for casts and medals. 1615; D. 1678.

BALLOIS, Louis Joseph Philippe, made himself eminent by his cultivation of the study of statistics at a time when little attention was given to the subject. He, in 1802, commenced the "Annales de Statistique," and was one of the founders of the Société de Statistique. He died in 1803, having scarcely reached his 25th year.

BALNAVES, Henry, bal'-naves, of Hailhill, a poet, and a prominent member of the Reformed party in Scotland in the 16th century. He suffered along with his condutors in the early part of the struggle, and on the triumph of his party, was, in 1663, made a lord of session. He left some theological works, such as a "Treatise of Justification," "The Confessions of Faith," &c., in which extreme Calvinistic notions are inculcated. He died at Edinburgh, in 1679, leaving a reputation as a "godly, wise, and long-experienced counsellor," as Sidney Melville phrases it. B. 1520.

BALSHAM, Hugh de, bal-sham, bishop of Ely, who founded Peter-house, Cambridge, in 1257. D. 1286.

B. —, Mohammed Pasha, bal'-la'-je, grand vizier of Turkey, who, while in command of the army on the Pruth, with which he had surrounded and had in his power that of Peter the Great of Russia, allowed himself to be bribed or duped by the Empress Catherine, and permitted the Russians to escape—thus throwing away the only opportunity the Turks ever had of thoroughly worsting their northern antagonists. On Charles XII., of Sweden, in aid of whom the Turks were acting, reproaching the vizier with his treachery, the latter retorted—"If I had taken the czar, who would have governed his states? It is not good for monarchs to quit their kingdoms"—a sneer at which Charles was so enraged that he resented it by tearing the vizier's robe with his spur. Baltadji was disgraced and banished for his conduct in this affair. B. at Lemnos, 1712.

French writer, who renounced his profession as an advocate, and embraced the Protestant religion. In 1659 the national synod at Loudun settled upon him a pension for his services as the champion of the Reformers. He combated Baronius, the librarian of the Vatican in the time of Clement VIII., with great ability. B. at Villeneuve-le-Roi, 1538; D. 1679.

BALTRAZARINI, bal'-la'-san-re-ne, an Italian musician, who was much admired at the court of Henry III. of France. In 1531 he composed a ballet for the nuptials of the duke de Joyeuse with Mademoiselle de Vandemont, sister to the queen, called "Ceres and her Nymphs," and supposed to be the origin of the ballet in France.

BALTIMORE, Lord. (See CALVERT, Sir George.)

BALVE, John de la, bal'-vo, a Frenchman, who, by his servility, obtained the see of Angers, after he had procured the deposition of his patron and benefactor, the bishop of that diocese. By his intrigues, he induced Paul II. to give him a cardinal's hat. He engaged in a secret correspondence with the dukes of Burgundy and Berri, disclosing all the secrets of the state, which, being discovered by Louis XI., he was imprisoned eleven years in an iron cage, which he himself, it is said, had invented. On regaining his liberty, he went to Rome, and working on the weakness of the pope, was sent to France as legate by Sixtus IV. B. in Poitou, 1421; D. at Ancona, 1491.

BALUZE, Etienne, bal'-oze, an eminent French historian and annotator, especially on subjects connected with ecclesiastical history and canon law, was born at Tulle, Guienne, Dec. 21, 1630. Having, in 1652, when barely 22 years of age, published a work which attracted the attention of Montchal, archbishop of Toulouse, he obtained the friendship of that prelate, and of De Marea, his successor, the latter of whom brought him to Paris, introduced him into learned circles, and on his death, in 1662, left him his MSS. He next became attached to De Tellier, afterwards chancellor of France; then to La Mothe de Houdancourt, archbishop of Auch; on leaving whom he was appointed librarian to the minister Colbert, after whose death, Louis XIV. instituted for Baluze the professorship of canon law in the royal college, of which, in 1707, he became director, with a pension. These advantages he did not long enjoy, however, for he lost both next year, in consequence of incurring the king's displeasure by publishing a history of the house of Auvergne in which he showed that the family of Cardinal Bouillon, then in disgrace, were the regular descendants of the dukes of Guienne and counts of Auvergne. In consequence of this, Baluze was deprived of his emoluments, and banished from Paris; and though the sentence of exile was recalled, he never was reinstated in his offices. He now settled near Paris, where he pursued his favourite studies till his death, in 1718, at the age of 88. At the time of his death, he was engaged in editing an edition of the works of St. Cyprian, afterwards finished by Maram, in 1727. Baluze's publications, original or editorial, are very voluminous, at least 45 different works, some of which embrace several volumes, having passed through the press under his own supervision. He had collected an immense library, which he ordered to be sold separately, so that each purchaser might bid for work he wished; he had 1500 MSS. on all of subjects, together with 115 works of diffi-authors, full of notes, which he had intended to publish. He did immense service to literature by the unwearied energy with which he collected the MSS. of good writers, which he compared with their published works, annotating, correcting, and extending wherever required. Indeed, his labours as editor alone have deserved the lasting gratitude of historians and lawyers, and have supplied a mine of wealth from which subsequent writers have drawn largely ever since, without, however, exhausting the riches it contains. He was buried in the church of St. Sulpice, Paris.

BALZAC, Honoré de, bal-zak, a French novelist, who, on quitting school, was placed with a notary in Paris, and commenced his literary career by writing for the journals. Under the name of Horace de St. Aubin, between the years 1821 and 1827, he published many tales; but they attracted little attention. The first work which brought him prominently into notice was his "Peau de Chagrin," after which he continued to supply the public appetite for his productions with indefatigable industry. For twenty years he laboured at a series of compositions which, under the title of "Comédie Humaine," were to embrace every phase of human society; some of these were very successful. b. at Tours, 1799; d. at Paris, 1850.

BALZAC, Jean Louis Guez de, a noble French writer, to whom Cardinal Richelieu granted a pension, and gave him the places of councillor of state and historiographer royal. He gained great popularity by his "Letters," which were first published in 1624. At the close of life, Balzac, who had indulged in all the elegancies of a dissipated court, became very devout, had apartments fitted up for himself in a convent, and bestowed considerable sums on the poor. b. at Angoulême, 1594; d. 1654. Besides his "Letters," he wrote—1. "Le Prince;" 2. "Le Suicidé Chrétien;" 3. "L'Aristippe;" 4. "Entretiens;" 5. "Christ Victorieux."

BAMBOCIO, Antonio, bam-bot-cho, a good Neapolitan painter, architect, and sculptor, who especially excelled in designing and executing sepulchral monuments, several of which still exist. He also restored sculpture and architecture to more simple and natural principles; and in his school several eminent artists in each of these branches were produced. It also appears, from an inscription on his monument to Lodovico Aldemareschi, erected in 1421, that he practised brass founding. b. at Naples about 1308; d. there 1435.

BAMBOCIO, bam-bot-cho, an eminent painter, whose real name was Peter Van Laer; but he is better known by the nickname of Bamboccio, on account of his deformity. He lived at Rome several years, and improved himself by a close application to his profession. He painted inns, farriers' shops, and cattle, with great effect. His style is soft, and his touch delicate, with great transparency of colouring. b. at Laeren, near Narden, 1613; d. 1673.

BAMBURGH, Christopher, bam'-bridj, archbishop of York, a native of Westmoreland, who was sent by Henry VIII. as an ambassador to Pope Julius II., who gave him a cardinal's hat. In 1514 he was poisoned by his servant, in revenge for some blows which he had inflicted upon him.

BAMFIELD, Joseph, bam'-feeld, or, as Clarendon calls him, BAMFORD, was a native of Ireland, who, on the breaking out of the civil war between Charles I. and the Parliament joined the king, held several commissions from him, and took part in defending Arundel against Sir William Waller; but his most memorable exploits were the stealing away the duke of York, whom he conveyed to Holland, and the part he took in inducing the fleet to declare against the government of Cromwell. He held an appointment in the household of the duke of York; but was afterwards cast off by the royal family, and returned to England to push his fortune under the new government, but did not succeed, and lived afterwards in neglect and obscurity in Holland, where, at an advanced age, he published his "Apology," a rare tract connected with the history of those stormy times.

BAMFIELD, or BAMFFELDE, Francis, a nonconformist divine, who, in 1641, obtained a prebend in Exeter cathedral, and was also minister of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire, but was deprived of both situations at the Restoration, for nonconformity. He was imprisoned in Newgate for holding conventicles, where he died in 1684. —He wrote a book in vindication of the observation of the seventh-day sabbath, and another called the "House of Wisdom." The object of this book was to make the Hebrew "the universal language over all the inhabited earth, to be taught in all schools, and children to be taught it as their mother tongue." All books, too, that were in the world, were to be translated into that language; and the only philosophy that was to be tolerated, was to proceed from Scripture. The Utopian character of such notions will, we fear, in the reader's estimation, scarcely coincide with the title of his book—as containing much "wisdom."

BAMPTON, Rev. John, bamp'-tun, the founder of the celebrated series of lectures at Oxford which bear his name. He was educated at Trinity College, and to the university bequeathed, upon trust, his lands and estates, for the endowment of eight divinity lecture-sermons, to be delivered annually. These lectures set a valuable body of divinity, and a complete set of them is worth about £50. b. 1689; d. 1751.

BANCAL, Jean Henri, ban'-kal, one of the most able, courageous, and honest, though not noisy, men who figured in the first French revolution. Elected to the National Convention in 1792, by his native department of Puy-de-Dôme, he opposed the incorporation of Savoy with France; questioned the right of the Convention to try the king, and subsequently voted for an appeal to the nation for Louis's imprisonment or banishment; in February he demanded that there should be an official inquiry whether Marat was mad; and he even dared to oppose the appointment of the Committee of Public Safety. He was sent as a commissary to observe the conduct of Dumouriez; that officer delivered him up to the Austrians, who imprisoned him at Olmutz, and thus, probably, saved him from the guillotine, for his boldness in resisting their measures had made him specially obnoxious to the leaders of the extreme party. Having been exchanged for the Duchess of Angoulême, he was elected, in 1796, a member of the Conseil des Cinq-cents, and on his entering the chamber he was received in triumph, carried to the president's chair, elected a secretary, and a decree passed approving the manner in which he had executed his mission. He subsequently took an active and useful part in the proceedings of the Convention, proposing for instance, the abolition of the gambling and other infamous houses, the foundation of a new social order of religion, though the time was not ripe for measures of that character. He retired in 1797 to Clermond Ferrand, where, till his death in 1826, he lived in perfect privacy, occupying his time in studying the Greek and Hebrew tongues, and in pious duties.

BANCHI, Seraphin, bawn'-ke, a Dominican of Florence, to whom Peter Barrière, a fanatic, revealed his intention of murdering King Henry IV. The priest communicated the secret to a nobleman, whereby the horrid design was prevented. The king gave him as a reward the archbishopric of Angoulême, which he afterwards resigned, and retired to a monastery at Paris, where he died in 1623.

BANCROFT, Richard, bun'-kroft, archbishop of Canterbury, who evinced so much learning in combating the tenets of the Puritans, that, in 1507, he was made bishop of London. He bore a principal part in the famous conference at Hampton Court, about the beginning of the reign of King James I.; and, on the death of Archbishop Whitgift, was translated to Canterbury, where he exerted himself with great vigilance in behalf of the Anglican church. b. at Farnworth, Lancashire, 1544; d. in his palace at Lambeth, 1610.—Fuller says that, when Bancroft was out of passion, "he spake most politely;" but his severity was very great against the Puritans. He was the principal supervisor of the authorized translation of the Bible.

BANCROFT, John, a nephew of the above, was in 1809 elected master of University College, Oxford, where he continued above twenty years. He was at great pains and expense to recover the ancient lands belonging to that foundation. In 1622 he was made bishop of Oxford, for which see he built the palace of Cuddesden. d. 1640.

BANCROFT, George, is an American, and the son of the Rev. Aaron Bancroft, D.D., author of a "Life of Washington." He was originally designed for the pulpit, but a love of literature turned the course of his studies into different channels from such as are necessary to form the deep theologian and sound divine. His first publication was a volume of poems, in his twenty-third year; and shortly afterwards he produced a translation of Heeren's "Reflections on the Politics of Ancient Greece." In 1833 he was made collector of the port of Boston, and in 1845 was appointed secretary of the navy of the United States. In the following year he was despatched as minister plenipotentiary to Great Britain, where he resided till 1849, and where he was much esteemed and respected. On his return to his native country, he adopted New York as the place of his residence, and entered eagerly into literary pursuits. He published some of his orations, and contributed articles to the North American and Boston Quarterly Reviews; but it is by his "History of the United States" that he is most widely and likely to be most permanently known. Of this work seven volumes have appeared: the last was published in 1858, and embraces the first period of the American revolution, leading us, in a lucid and well-sustained narrative, through all those stirring events and conflicts of opinion which characterized the first features of the revolution immediately after the blockade of Boston. As an historian, his position ranks with Prescott and the best American writers. b. at Worcester, Massachusetts, 1800.

BANDARRA, Gonzales, ban-dar'-ra, a Portuguese poet, whose verses aspired to be prophetic of the fate of Portugal. He fell under the suspicion of the Inquisition, and figured in an auto-da-fé in 1541, narrowly escaping being burnt as a heretic. d. 1556.—Although Bandarra could neither read nor write, his songs were in the mouths of all; and there appear to have been both talent and spirit in them.

BANDELLO, Matthew, bawn-dail'-o, an Italian Dominican monk, who wrote some lively novels after the manner of Boccaccio. On the invasion by the Spaniards of the Milanese territory in 1525, he went to France, where he obtained the bishopric of Agen, but resigned it in 1555. d. 1561.—This author, besides his novels, wrote a vast number of Italian verses on different subjects.

BANDETTINI, Teresa, bawn-dai-té'-ne, an Italian poetess, was designed by her parents for an opera dancer, but having shown considerable talent as an improvisatore, she was saved from that career, and devoted herself to poetry. She published, in 1788, a volume of short poems; and afterwards "The Death of Adonis," a poem in four cantos; and a tragedy, called "Il Polidoro." In 1789, she was married to Pietro Landucci, of Lucca; and in private life is stated to have been modest and amiable. b. at Lucca, in 1763; d. early in the present century.

BANDINELLI, Baccio, bawn-de-nail'-e, a distinguished Florentine sculptor and painter, greatly patronized by Cosmo de Medici, Francis I., and other eminent personages. His works do not place him in the first rank of Italian sculptors, but he is among the foremost in the second. Among his best performances is his "Horvulus and Cacus," which was executed with a view to rival the "David" of Michael Angelo, but which does not nearly approach the excellence of that composition. b. at Florence, 1497; d. 1561. Many of the works of this artist are to be seen in the churches and palaces of Florence. He was made a cavalier by Clement VII., and also by Charles V.

BANER, Johann von, bai'-ner, sprung from an ancient family of Sweden, was one of the most distinguished lieutenants of Gustavus Adolphus, and though his education had been very defective, his great talents and industry enabled him to remedy that defect. He particularly distinguished himself against Pappenheim's cavalry in the battle of Breitenfeld, where he acquired the title of "The Lion of Sweden." He was charged with the pursuit of Tilly's defeated army, and finally drove Pappenheim out of Lower Saxony. He was afterwards present in the battles near Donauwerth, before Ingoldstadt, and at Nuremberg, in the latter of which he was wounded in the arm; and commanded the troops in Bavaria when Gustavus marched to Saxony. The death of the king so affected him, that he wished to be dismissed from the army, but this was refused; and in 1633 he was named field-marshal, with the command of the army of Silesia; and during the subsequent portions of the Thirty Years' War played a conspicuous part, having measured swords with Wallenstein, Piccolomini, and other imperial generals of note. Baner took and retook several important fortresses on the Aar, made incursions into Bohemia, Saxony, &c.; and in 1634, conceived the bold idea of taking prisoners the crowned heads assembled together in Regensburg; owing, however, to the tardy action of his colleagues, the attempt failed, and Banier was compelled to make a retreat from Bohemia, in the midst of snow and harassed by the troops of Piccolomini. Banier was now so enfeebled by illness, that he could scarcely keep his seat on horseback, and, on reaching Lower Saxony, was utterly exhausted, and died in 1641.

BANIER, Anthony, ban-ne-ai, a French writer, who, after studying at Paris, became tutor to the sons of M. de Metz. He wrote an historical explanation of the fables of antiquity, which was afterwards published under the title of "Mythology; or, the Fables explained by History." n. 1673; p. 1711. He had a hand in Picart's "Religious Ceremonies," and other esteemed works. An English translation of his "Mythology" was printed in 1741, in 4 vols. 8vo.

BANIM, John, ban-nim, an Irish author of a number of popular novels, among which may be particularly noticed the first and second series of the "Tales of the O'Hara Family," which, on their appearance, were immediately recognised as works of genius. He was also the author of the celebrated tragedy of "Damon and Pythias." The greatest defect, perhaps, in his writings is a degree of overstrained excitement, which he generally produces by calling to his aid the operations of the worst and darkest passions of human nature. n. 1800; p. near Kilkenny, 1842.

BANISTER, John, ban-ister, a distinguished botanist and student of natural history, who, born in England, emigrated to Virginia, and wrote several works on the botany and natural history of that country, and on the natural productions of Jamaica, &c. Ray published a catalogue of the plants observed in Virginia by Banister, in the first volume of his "History of Plants;" and a plant was named Banisteria in honour of him, by Dr. Houston, of which about twenty-four species are enumerated. He made a collection of Virginian plants, which was bought by Sir Hans Sloane. n. about 1689.

BANISTER, John, an eminent English comedian, was born in London, in 1760, and after an honourable career, relinquished the stage in 1815, and retired into private life, enjoying the esteem and affection of all who knew him till his death, in 1836.

BANKES, Sir John, banks, lord chief-justice of the Common Pleas in the time of Charles I., was born at Keswick, Cumberland, in 1589. His first public employment was that of attorney-general to the prince of Wales; in 1630, he became Lent reader at Gray's-inn, and in the following year treasurer of that society. In 1634, he succeeded Noy as attorney-general, on which occasion he was knighted. At the beginning of the troubles between Charles and the Parliament, he adhered to the king, but was so well-esteemed by the Parliament, that in their proposals to Charles, in 1641, they requested that Bankes might be continued in his office. Having, however, declared the conduct of the parliamentary generals, Essex, Manchester, and Waller, treasonous, the Parliament voted him a traitor, and ordered Corfe Castle, his seat in the Isle of Purbeck, to be besieged. His lady, however, gallantly defended the castle, though she had at first but five men in it, and never more than forty, till the siege was raised by the earl of Carnarvon, Aug. 4, 1643. Sir John, who had been made chief justice of the Common Pleas, died on Dec. 23, 1644. Lord Strafford wrote of him—"Bankes hath been commended that he exceeds Bacon in eloquence, Ellesmere in judgment, and Noy in law." He was buried at Christ Church, Oxford.

Banks

BANKES, Henry, a descendant of the above, was long a distinguished member of Parliament, first for the borough of Corfe Castle, and afterwards for Dorsetshire. He had a seat in the House from 1780 to 1830, and was of rigid conservative principles, but great personal independence. He was more remarkable, however, for his fine scholarship than his political achievements, and will be mentioned with esteem for his "Constitutional History of Greece," published in 1813, when the party warfare of his time is forgotten. He was born about 1757, and died 1835.

BANKS, John, an English play-writer, originally a lawyer; but, getting weary of the courts of Themis, he quitted them, and became a follower of Thespis. He produced several pieces deposited in the church of St. James, Westminster. Lived at the end of the 17th century.

BANKS, Sir Joseph, a distinguished naturalist, who, in 1760, entered as a gentleman commoner at Christ Church, Oxford. In 1761 he came into possession of his paternal fortune, and in 1768 was chosen a member of the Royal Society. In the same year he made a voyage to Newfoundland for the purpose of collecting plants, and in the following winter returned by way of Lisbon. He now made the acquaintance of Dr. Solander, a Swedish gentleman, who had been a pupil of Linnæus, and who had recently been appointed assistant librarian to the British Museum. In 1768, he and Dr. Solander, as naturalists to the expedition, accompanied Captain Cook on a voyage to the South Seas, the ostensible object being to observe the transit of the planet Venus over the disc of the sun. He remained four months on the island of Otaheite, and after being absent nearly three years, returned to England with a large collection of specimens illustrative of natural history. He afterwards made a voyage to Iceland with his friend Dr. Solander, during which they examined the Hebrides, and were the first to discover the columnar stratification of the rocks surrounding the caves of Staffa, an account of which was published in the same year, 1772, by Mr. Pennant, in his "Tour in Scotland." A large addition to his various botanical collections was the result of this voyage. In 1777 he was elected president of the Royal Society, which position he held till the time of his death. n. at Westminster, 1743; p. 1820.—Sir Joseph Banks bequeathed his books and botanical collections to the British Museum.

BANKS, Thomas, one of the best sculptors of Great Britain. By his thirty-third year his style was formed, and he competed, among many rivals, for the gold prize offered by the Royal Academy in 1770, and carried it away. His designs at this period were principally illustrative of classical history, and they discovered so much fertility of invention in the different modes in which the same subjects were treated, that the members of the Royal Academy determined to send him to Rome at the expense of that institution. Accordingly in 1772 he set out for the "Eternal city," where he placed himself under Capizoldi, a distinguished professor. He was, however, though much admired, little encouraged; and after spending seven years in Rome, he returned to England, only to meet with disappointment. He was now in his 49th year, and setting out for Russia, he received from the Empress Catherine an acknowledgment of his merits. She purchased a subject of his, called "Psyche with the Butterfly," and placed it in a temple expressly built for it in her gardens. He soon again visited his native country, when his "Mourning Achilles," now in the hall of the British Institution, fixed him prominently and permanently in the eye of the public. He was now kept in constant employment throughout the remainder of his days. B. at Lambeth, 1735; D. 1805.

BANNATYNE, George, bán-a-fine, the compiler of the celebrated MS. entitled "Corpus Poeticum Scotorum," or, Body of Scotch poetry, now in the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh. Of this work Allan Ramsay exhibited specimens in his "Evergreen;" but little or nothing is known of its compiler. In his diary, Sir Walter Scott remarks, "Thought upon an introduction to the notices which have been recovered of George Bannatyne. They are very jejune." Yet it is a satisfaction to know that this great benefactor to the literature of Scotland had a prosperous 1607. It was upon his name that the "Bannatyne Club" was founded in 1823, by Sir Walter Scott, over the meetings of which he presided from its institution till 1831. Originally this association consisted only of 31 members; but as it rose in fame, many persons of rank and literary distinction were desirous of being connected with it; and, in 1833, the number was increased to 100.

BANNATYNE, Sir William, an eminent Scottish lawyer, judge, and man of letters, was born in January, 1743. He rose rapidly in his profession, and enjoyed besides a high reputation for his contributions to the "Mirror," "Lounger," &c. He was raised to the bench in 1799, which he occupied till his resignation in 1823, when he was succeeded by the famous John Clerk, Lord Eldin. He was one of the founders of the Highland Society, and had for his friends all the most distinguished men of his time, such as Blair, Mackenzie, Erskine, Craig, Abercrombie, and Cullen. He died in Ayrshire, on the 21st of November, 1834.

BANKERT, Joseph van Tappen, and Adrien, bán-kairt, father and son, two distinguished Dutch admirals, who took a prominent part in the wars of Holland with Spain, France, England, and Portugal, in conjunction with the Van Tromps, the De Buyters, and Hein. Joseph died of apoplexy on his return with the prizes he had taken after defeating the Portuguese fleet in the Brazils, in the year 1646. Adrien died at Middleburg, in 1684. They were sprung from an obscure family of Flessingen, Joseph having entered the navy as a common sailor, and raised himself to the rank of admiral of the Dutch fleets. There was a John Bankert killed in battle with the English in June, 1665, who is supposed to have been a near relative of the above.

BANQUO, or BANCHO, bán-quo, a Scotch general of royal extraction, who obtained several victories over the Highlanders and the Danes, in the reign of Duncan I. He tarnished his glory by aiding Macbeth in a conspiracy

BAPTISTE, John Baptist Monnoyer, bap-tíst, a distinguished French painter in the department of fruits and flowers. He adorned the palaces of Versailles, Meudon, Marly, and Trianon. He visited England at the invitation of Lord Montague, and for nearly 20 years lived in this country, enjoying uninterrupted patronage from the great. B. at Lisle, 1635; D. 1690.

BAPTISTE, John Gaspar, bap-tíst, a Dutch painter, who came to England during the civil wars, and was much engaged by Sir Peter Lely in painting his draperies and backgrounds. B. at Antwerp; D. 1601.

BAPTISTIN, John Baptiste Stuck, bap-tisten, an Italian musician, who first introduced the violoncello into France. He was, besides, a good composer. B. at Florence about 1677; D. 1753.

BARADEUS, also called ZENZARS JACOBUS, bá-rit-de-us, a monk who revived the sect of the Monophysites, who maintained that there is but one nature in Christ. His party made him bishop of Edessa. He died in 543, and from him the sect took the name of Jacobites.

BARAGUAY D'HILLIERES, Louis, bar-n-gai deel-guir, a French general of the revolutionary period, who served under Bonaparte in Italy, Hungary, the Tyrol, Egypt, Spain, and Russia. After the capture of Malta, he was sent home with the news of the event, but was captured by the English. Napoleon made him a grand officer of the Legion of Honour, and colonel-general of dragoons, twice appointed him governor of Venice, and gave him the command of a division of the grand army in the Russian expedition of 1812, but in the retreat from Moscow he was nearly surrounded, and a part of his division having been obliged to surrender, Bonaparte deprived him of his command, and ordered him home for trial by court-martial. He, however, died in Berlin, in December, 1812, on the way, and thus did not live to see the downfall of the mighty genius whose fortunes he had so long followed. B. 1764.

BARAGUAY D'HILLIERES, a French marshal, who, in his eighteenth year, lost his left hand at the battle of Leipzig. Under Louis Philippe he served in Algiers; in 1849, under Louis Napoleon, was sent on a temporary mission to the pope; and in 1854, during the war with Russia, he commanded a force of 10,000 men, sent to the Baltic to co-operate with the allied French and English fleets in their attack on Bomarsund. He subsequently received the baton of a marshal of France, served in the campaign in Italy in 1859, and was entrusted with the command of one of the grand military districts into which Napoleon III. divided the empire. B. Sept. 8, 1795.

BARANTE, Amable Guillaume Prosper, Baron de Brugiere, ba-rant, the son of a French barrister, served in several offices in the time of Napoleon I., whose fall did not affect Barante's fortunes unfavourably. He became, under Louis XVIII., councillor of state, and secretary of the home department. In 1819 he was nominated a peer of France. After the revolution of July, 1830, he resided at the court of Sardinia, in the capacity of ambassador, and in 1835 occupied a similar position at the court of Russia. After the revolution of 1848 he retired from public life, residing in Auvergne.

THE DICTIONARY

Baratier

B. at Riom, 1782.—Notwithstanding a strict integrity in exercising his political functions, Baratier was able to devote much of his time and talents to literature. His most important work is his "History of the Dukes of Burgundy," which placed him amongst the first of the French historians of the day. He besides wrote a "History of the National Convention," in six volumes, and various other works. Others of this family were writers.

BARATIER, Johann Philip, ba-ra'-te-er, an extraordinary German youth, who at five years of age understood Greek, Latin, German, and French. He afterwards studied Hebrew; and at nine years of age was able to translate any part of the Scriptures into Latin, and made a dictionary of the most difficult Hebrew and Chaldaic words, studying with avidity the works of the Jewish writers. In 1731 he wrote a letter to M. le Maître on a new edition of the Bible, Hebrew, Chaldaic, and Rabbinical, which is inserted in the "Bibliothèque Germanique." In his thirteenth year he published the "Travels of Benjamin of Tudela," translated from the Hebrew into French. In 1734 the margrave of Anspach gave him a pension of 50 florins a year and the use of his library. The year following he submitted to the Royal Society a plan for finding the longitude, which, however, proved to be an old exploded scheme. He was the same year admitted a member of the Academy at Berlin, and created M.A. by the university of Halle. B. at Schwabach, near Nuremberg, in 1721; d. at Halle, in 1740.—Besides the above, he wrote critical dissertations upon points of ecclesiastical history, and a treatise against the Socinians, called "Anti-Artemonius," yet at his death he wanted four months of being twenty years of age.

BARBACENA, Felisberto Caldeira, marquis de Brant, bar'-ba-nai-na, a Brazilian statesman and soldier, who served with distinction in the Portuguese navy and army. He was chosen by Don Pedro, the prince-regent (afterwards emperor), to negotiate with Portugal, the mother-country, the independence of Brazil; and, by the mediation of England and Austria, a treaty was signed at Rio Janeiro, on August 27, 1823, which secured the separation of the two crowns of Portugal and Brazil. He was afterwards employed to accompany the young queen of Portugal to Europe, and subsequently became finance minister of Brazil, and by his talents contributed greatly to the progress of his country. He was the first to introduce from Europe the steam-engine and steamboat. B. at Sabora, 1772; d. at Rio Janeiro, 1842.

BARBANGRE, Baron Joseph, bar-ban-ai'-jer, one of Napoleon's generals, was born in 1772, at Pontac, in the department of the Lower Pyrenees. In 1801, he had attained the rank of captain of brigade; as colonel of the 43th Regiment, he distinguished himself in the campaign of Ansterlitz; in 1809 he was created general of brigade, and was conspicuous in the battles of Ratisbon and Wagram. In the expedition to the North in 1812, he held the posts of governor of Borisov and Smolensko, was wounded in the retreat at Krasnoi, and took refuge with the remnants of his division in Stettin, which he defended with gallantry till compelled to surrender. Louis XVIII. took him into favour on his return to France; but on the escape of Napoleon from Elba, Barbanegre again joined him, and held Hünningen against the allies till August 27, 1816. He died at Paris in 1830.—His brother, Jean Barbanegre, was also a distinguished officer in the armies of Napoleon, and fell at the battle of Jena.

BARBADILLO, Alphonso Jerome de Salas, bar'-ba-deel'-yo, a Spanish dramatic writer, who, besides several comedies, also wrote the "Adventures of Don Diego de Noche," 1624, 8vo. B. at Madrid about 1580; d. 1630.

BARBARO, Francis, barr'-bar-ro, a learned Venetian, who was governor of several places, but distinguished chiefly on account of his oratorical powers and literary works, particularly his translations of some of Plutarch's Lives. He wrote "De Re Uxorâ," "On the Choice of a Wife, and the Duties of Women," printed at Paris, in 1516, and which were afterward translated into various languages. Besides these, a collection of his letters was printed in 1743. B. 1398; d. 1454.

BARBARO, Ermolao, grandson of the above, gave lectures on the Greek language gratuitously. The emperor Frederick, to whom he went ambassador, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and Pope Innocent VIII. made him patriarch of Aquileia, for accepting which dignity the Venetians expelled him their republic. He then went to Rome, where he resided during the remaining years of his life. B. 1454; d. 1495. He translated the Rhetoric of Aristotle, and other works; and published critical elucidations of Pliny.

BARBAROSSA, Horush, bar'-ba-ros'-sa, a famous pirate, who from being the son of a potter, rose by his skill, cunning, and bravery, to lay the foundation of the Turkish dominion in Algiers. After having acquired immense wealth by piracy, he was called in to assist the Algerines against the Spaniards, when he took possession of the throne, and had himself proclaimed Horush, sultan of Algiers. He next defeated the king of Tunis, and having taken the capital, caused himself to be proclaimed king. After this he marched to Tiemsen, the inhabitants of which put to death their own monarch, and opened their gates to Horush. The heir to the kingdom of Tiemsen, however, applied for assistance to the marquis de Co-mares, governor of Oran, who besieged Barbarossa in the citadel, and reduced him to the greatest distress. He escaped thence by a subterraneous passage, but was overtaken, with a small number of Turks, on the banks of the river Malleh, where he fell, with his followers, after making a desperate defence. B. at Mitylene, about 1474; slain 1518.—It is said that the name of Barbarossa was given to this adventurer by the Christian sailors, on account of the colour of his beard, which was red.

BARBAROSSA, Khair Eddin, "the good of the faith," succeeded his brother in the kingdom of Algiers, and became commander of the naval forces of Solymán II., the Turkish sultan, in 1533. He made himself master of Tunis, but was driven from it by Charles V., in 1536. After this he ravaged several parts of Italy, and reduced Yemen, in Arabia Felix, to subjection to the Turkish government. B. at Constantinople, in 1546.—It was under this adventurer that Algiers, in 1519, became subject to the dominion of the Porte.

enemy of Robespierre and Marat, against whom he repeatedly brought charges. It was he who proposed the trial of Louis XVI. and family. When the Girondists were overthrown, he was arrested, but made his escape. He was afterwards taken, however, and guillotined at Bordeaux, in 1794. b. at Marseilles, 1767.—Before entering the political arena, he had devoted himself to the study of scientific subjects, was a correspondent of Benjamin Franklin, and wrote an interesting sketch on the extinct volcanoes near Toulon.

BARBATELLI, Bernardino, bar'-ba-tail'-e, surnamed POCCHETTI, an Italian painter, who studied at Rome with so much assiduity as frequently to forget the refreshments of food and sleep. He excelled in painting historical subjects, fruit, animals, and flowers. b. in 1612.

BARBAULD, Anna Lætitia, bar'-bauld, an authoress of considerable celebrity, and, in her "Essays on Romance," the best imitator of the style of Dr. Johnson. She edited selections from the "Spectator," "Tatler," "Guardian," and "Freeholder;" and also a series of the "British Novelists," published in 50 vols. She also wrote several poetical effusions, and, to some extent, assisted her brother, Dr. John Aikin, in producing his "Evenings at Home." b. at Kibworth-Harcourt, in Leicestershire, 1743; d. at Stoke Newington, 1825.

BARBAZAN, Armand Guilhem de, bar-ba-zan', a French captain in the time of Charles VI. and Charles VII. of France, called the "blameless knight," who defended Melun against the English in 1420, who kept him prisoner for eight years. He died of wounds received at the battle of Bulguerville in Lorraine, in 1432, and was buried at St. Denis by order of Charles VII.

BARBEAU DE LA DRYÈRE, Jean Louis, bar-bé broo'-yair, a French writer, who published a historical map of the world, which combines geography, chronology, and history in one view. He also edited, and partly compiled, several other works of geographical and topographical merit. b. at Paris, 1710; d. 1781.

BARBÉ-MARBOIS, Francis, marquis de, bar'-boy mar'-barw', a French statesman and writer, born at Metz in 1745, who became in 1795 a member of the Council of Ancients. Suspected of holding communication with the exiled royalists, he was sent to Gulana, but was permitted to return shortly after, and became minister of finance under Napoleon I. In 1805 he was empowered to arrange the terms of the cession of Louisiana to the United States. In 1808 he became president of the Court of Exchequer, which he held till 1834. b. at Paris, 1787.

BARBER, John, bar'-ber, an eminent civilian, who was the friend and confidential adviser of Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, who appointed him to visit the college of All Souls in 1541, to correct certain abuses in the habits of the members which had incurred the censure of the archbishop. Barber also assisted in the preparation of the treatises famous under the title of the "King's Book," the "Necessary Doctrine," and "Erudition of a Christian Man," which it was proposed to substitute for the Bible in the hands of the bulk of the laity. Barber afterwards joined in a conspiracy to effect the downfall of Cranmer, but, on its failure, was forgiven and reinstated in favour by the generous primate. He was educated at Oxford, and died at Wrotham in 1549.

BARBERINI, Francis, bar'-lai-re'-ne, a Roman cardinal, nephew of Massio Barberini, Pope Urban VIII., and legate in France and Spain. He was the father of the poor, and the patron of the learned. b. 1670.—His brother Anthony was also a cardinal; but on the election of Innocent X., who was the enemy of his family, he retired to France, where he was made archbishop of Rheims, and died there, in 1671.—Taddeo Barberini, another member of this family, and general of the Pontifical troops under Urban VIII., was a turbulent and ambitious man, who caused much commotion among the surrounding states. On the disgrace of the family, he retired to France, but was allowed to retain his principality of Palestrina.

BARBES, Armand, bar'-bai, a French revolutionist, whose first attempt against the then existing government of Louis Philippe was in 1834, when he was arrested. Again, in 1835, he was included in those who were suspected of being privy to Fieschi's plot, and was liberated only to be once more brought before the authorities, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment for secretly manufacturing gunpowder. Again, in 1839, he was concerned in an overt act of rebellion, and was condemned to death, but was, at the last moment, pardoned by the king. The revolution of February, 1848, set him free, the 12th regiment made him their colonel, and the department of the Aude returned him as a member of the Constituent Assembly. But, the same year, he was found guilty of an attempt to overturn the government, and condemned to imprisonment for life in the prison of Belleisle-en-Mer. He was released in 1854, when he went into voluntary exile. b. at Pointe-à-Pitre, 1810.

BARBEYRAC, John, bar'-bai-rak, an eminent French professor of law and history, first at Lausanne, and afterwards at Groningen. He translated into French Puffendorf's "Law of Nature and Nations," his treatise on the "Duties of Man," and Grotius's book of the "Rights of War and Peace," with learned notes of his own. He also wrote a treatise on the "Morality of the Fathers," and another on "Gaming," the argument of which is to establish the proposition that games of chance of any kind are not, in themselves, immoral. Besides these, he produced other essays upon historical and juridical subjects. b. at Beziers, 1674; d. at Groningen, 1744.

BARBIE DU BOCAGE, Jean Denis, bar'-bai doo-bo'-kaje, a learned French geographer, who was long connected with the geographical departments of the Bibliothèque du Roi before the Revolution, and of the foreign office afterwards, for which he constructed a variety of valuable maps. He was also associated with the Count de Choiseul-Gouffier, the Abbé Barthélemy, and the Baron de Sainte-Croix, and others, in various works connected with geography, voyages, &c. He became member of the Institute in 1806, professor of geography at the Sorbonne in 1810, a special chair having been created for him; was decorated with the order of the Legion of Honour in 1814, became dean of the faculty of letters in 1815, and, in 1821, member of the Académical Council of Paris. He was a member of most of the learned societies of Europe, and one of the founders of the Paris Geographical Society, of which he was twice president. b. April 28, 1760, at Paris; d. Dec. 28, 1825.—His son, Alexandre François, succeeded him in his chair, and held the office of secretary to the Geographical and Antiquarian Societies of Paris; but close study impaired his health, and he died in 1835, in his 37th year. He left a Dictionary of Biblical Geography, and several memoirs. The dictionary was published in 1831. n. at Paris, Sept. 14, 1788.

BARBIER D'AUCOUR, John, bar'-be-ai do' keor, a councillor in the Parliament of Paris and tutor to the son of the famous Colbert. In 1683 he became a member of the French Academy. On the death of his patron he returned to the bar. B. at Langres, in 1641; D. at Paris, 1694. He wrote several pieces against the Jesuits.

BARBIER, John Francis, bar'-be-air'-e, surnamed GRACINO, a noted historical painter, who studied under the Caracci, but followed the manner of Caravaggio. His taste was natural, but not always elegant. B. in 1592; D. in 1666.—His brother Paolo Antonio excelled in painting still life and animals. D. in 1640.

BARBOUR, John, bar'-boor, a Scotch divine, who became archdeacon of Aberdeen, and one of the earliest and best of Scottish poets and historians. King David Bruce made him his chaplain, and sent him on several embassies. He wrote in verse "The Life and Actions of King Robert Bruce," undertaken, it is supposed by Dr. Henry, at the request of David II., the son of the celebrated monarch. This, however, has been deemed doubtful, although the high character of the work has never been questioned. Warton, in his "History of English Poetry," speaking of Barbour and Henry the Minstrel, says, "I cannot pass over two Scotch poets of this period" (the middle of the 14th century), "who have adorned the English language by a strain of versification, expression, and poetical imagery far superior to their age, and who, consequently, deserve to be mentioned in a general review of the progress of our national poetry." Although a Scotchman, Barbour figures as a student among the eminent names that adorn the scroll of Oxford. D. in 1395.—The metrical chronicle of "The Bruce" embraces the period between 1306 and 1329.

BARCLAY, Alexander, bar'-klai, a writer who, according to some, was a native of Scotland, but who others maintain was an Englishman. However this may be, we find that he travelled through most parts of Europe, and on his return became a monk at Ely; but on the dissolution of his monastery he obtained a living in Somersetshire, and afterwards in Essex. D. 1552. Barclay was one of the first refiners of our language by his productions, which are chiefly translations from foreign writers. He rendered into English that curious book entitled "Navis Stultiterni; or, the Ship of Fools," and to which he added much original matter. This book was first printed by Pynson in 1609, a copy of which edition is very rare, and is worth about £100. Barclay also wrote some eclogues, which Warton says were the first that appeared in the English language; and were like those of Petrarch and Virgil, that is, of the moral and satirical kind, and containing few touches of rural description and bucolic imagery.

BARCLAY, William, a native of Aberdeenshire, where he was born in 1546, who in early life was attached to the court of Mary Queen of Scots, but being disappointed in his hopes of preferment, emigrated to France in 1573, and in 1578 became professor of common law in the newly-established university of Pont-à-Mousson, of which Edmund Hay, his uncle, was the first rector. In 1600 he published a book advocating despotic principles; and in 1603, having resigned his chair in consequence of a quarrel with the Jesuits, he came to England, hoping to obtain the favour of James I.; in this, however, he was disappointed, and in 1605 was appointed professor of civil law at Angers, where he died. He wrote a work against Belarmin on the supremacy of the Pope, as well as several other learned works, some of which were subsequently translated into English.

BARCLAY, John, a son of the above, was educated in France, and on the death of his father visited London, where he lived ten years. B. at Pont-à-Mousson, 1582; D. at Rome, 1621.—He wrote several ingenious works; the chief of which are, "Euphormio," a satire in Latin, and a romance entitled "Argenis." This last has been translated into several languages, and is an evidence of the fleeting nature of literary popularity. "It absolutely distresses me," says Coleridge, "when I reflect that this work, admired as it has been by great men of all ages, and lately by the poet Cowper, should be utterly unknown to the general reader." It was of this Barclay that the learned Grotius said,

"A Scot by blood, and French by birth, this man

At Rome speaks Latin as no Roman can."

BARCLAY, David, born at Kirkcubright-hill, and sprung from an ancient Scottish family, was one of the earliest members of the body called Quakers. He passed some years in the army of Sweden, where he attained the rank of major; he afterwards returned to Scotland, and during the government of Cromwell was one of the Scottish representatives in the English parliament in the proceedings of which he took an active part. After the Restoration, he was imprisoned in Edinburgh Castle, somewhat unfairly, as he had been an adherent of the Royalist party in early life, and had a command in the king's army. It was during this confinement that, about 1670, he embraced the doctrines of the Friends. B. 1610; D. 1686.

BARCLAY, Robert, son of the preceding, who walked in his father's footsteps in so far as he embraced the tenets held by the Society of Friends. At an early age he was sent to Paris, to be under the care of his uncle, who was principal of the Scots college. He there embraced the Romish religion, on which his father sent for him home, and having himself become a convert to the opinions of the Quakers, he persuaded his son to do the same. In 1760 he published a defence of his new religion, at Aberdeen; and in 1775 printed a catechetical discourse, or system of faith, according to the opinions of his sect. But his greatest work is, "An Apology for the true Christian Divinity, as he same is held forth and preached by the people called, in scorn, Quakers," printed in Latin, at Amsterdam, in 1776, and translated into English in 1778. He not only benefited his party by his writings, but travelled through various countries, particularly Germany and Holland, to obtain converts. He spent the latter part of his life on his paternal estate of Ury, in Kincardineshire, Scotland. B. at Gortonstown, Morayshire, 1648; D. at Ury, 1690.

BARCLAY, John, a Scotch divine and founder of the sect called Bereans or Barclayans, studied under Dr. Archibald Campbell, some of whose semi-heretical notions he imbibed, and of whom

I became pastor of a congregational castle; in the following year he himself in Edinburgh, where he cont years, and afterwards preached in Bristol, and other towns. He died burgh July 29, 1793. He was a able, though somewhat violent and dogmatic, controversialist. He printed an edition of his works in three volumes. The sect he founded has since almost if not altogether died out.

BARCLAY DE TOLLY, bar-klay-dai-toi-le, a Russian general, who, in the German and Polish field-marshal.

1815 led them into France. commands, he at one minister of war, and conferred on him. d. 1818.

BARCOCHEBAS, or BARCOCHAB, bar-rok-si-bas, the 'son of a star,' a famous impostor among the Jews, who pretended to be the star predicted by Balaam. He gained many followers, who overran Judaea, putting numbers of Romans to the sword. He was at last defeated and slain by Julius Severus, who, in revenge for the atrocities perpetrated by Barcochebas and his partisans, committed a dreadful massacre on the Jewish nation. A.D. 134.

BARBONE, Praise God, bar-bone, a Puritan, who was by trade a leatherseller, and who became, in 1653, one of the most active members of Cromwell's parliament, which was named after him. When General Monk came to London to restore the king, this man appeared at the head of a formidable rabble, and presented a petition to parliament for the exclusion of the king and the royal family. Monk, in consequence, wrote a letter of complaint to the and "If Christ had not died, then hadst been damned, Barbone." The parent of this hopeful family could scarcely have carried his fanaticism further in christening his children.

BARBETS, Thierry, la-rents, a Dutch painter of history and portraits, who studied in the school of Titian, with whom he continued several years. B. at Amsterdam, 1634; d. 1692.

BARÈRE DE VIEUZAC, Bertrand, bar-air-veu-zak, a noted member of the "Committee of Public Safety" during the French revolution. He voted for the death of Louis XVI., whom he styled Louis the Traitor. In the troubles of the revolution, he acquired, from his flowery style, when speaking or writing of the acts of the republicans, the name of the "Anacreon of the Guillotine." An intimate associate of Robespierre, he yet retained some influence after the latter's death; and he was made, by Bonaparte, editor of a paper to declaim against the English, and became attached to the police. On the fall of Napoleon he returned to Belgium, but in 1830 returned to Paris, where he died. B. at Tarbes, 1755; d. 1841.—Barère was one of the most violent of the revolutionists, although actuated by no high principle, and was for a considerable period the main organ of the Committee of Public Safety, and in that capacity proposed most of the measures which characterize the Reign of Terror. As a specimen of the sentiments Barère was in the habit of uttering, we may quote the remark he made in reply to Brissot, when the question of the king's trial was being discussed, that "The tree of liberty could never sprout but when watered with the blood of tyrants." Altogether, he may be said to have been the most pliant, and at the same time the most blood-stained, of all the actors in the horrors of the great revolution.

BARETTI, Joseph, bar-rail-e, an ingenious Italian writer, and the son of an architect at Turin, of the early part of whose life little is known, except that he was a great traveller. In 1750 he visited England, and soon acquired a knowledge of the language, which he afterwards wrote with facility and correctness. About 1753 he became acquainted with Dr. Johnson, by whose means he was introduced as a teacher of Italian into the family of Mr. Thrale. In 1760 he returned to Italy, and began to publish at Venice a periodical work entitled "Frusta Letteraria," but on account of the freedom of its sentiments, found it expedient to quit that country, and once more visited England. In 1769 he was tried at the Old Bailey for killing a man who had assaulted him in the Haymarket, and was acquitted. Next year he published his "Travels through France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy," 4 vols. 8vo. On the establishment of the Royal Academy, he was appointed its foreign secretary, and during Lord North's administration obtained a pension. b. 1716; d. 1789.—He was a talented, pleasant, and able man. Besides the and Italian, 2 vols. 4to; "A Grammar of the Italian Language," 8vo; "An Account of the Manners and Customs of Italy," 2 vols. 8vo; "An Introduction to the most Useful European Languages," 8vo; "A Dictionary, English and Spanish," 4to; by which, and his Italian Dictionary, he is best known.

BAREHAM, Rev. Richard Harris, bar-ham, rector of St. Augustine and St. Faith, in London, known to the world by his literary name of Thomas Jugoldsbry. His "Ingoldsby Legends" were first contributed to "Hentley's Miscellany," and afterwards collected into volumes. For many years he was a contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine," the "Literary Gazette," and other periodicals; and was the author of the popular novel entitled "My Cousin Nicholas." B. at Canterbury, 1788; d. 1845.

BARÈTH, or BAREITH, bar-root, Frederica Sophia Wilhelmina, margravine of, was the daughter of Frederic William I. of Prussia, and sister of Frederic II., called the Great, between her and whom a most tender affection subsisted, they having both suffered much cruelty from their father. She was in early youth proposed as the bride of the heirs to the English, Danish, Swedish, and Polish crowns, but finally gave her hand to the Prince of Bareith; and on the death of her father-in-law became margravine. She cultivated literature with much success, had Voltaire for an admirer and friend, exercised great influence over her brother Frezeal that he was arrested, and burnt at Smithfield in 1540.—He wrote a treatise on Justification, and some other books.

BARNES, Barnaby, a poet of some note in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., was a son of Dr. Barnes, bishop of Durham. His productions, which were popular in their day, consisted principally of sonnets, odes, madrigals, elegies, and some pieces in imitation of the Greek poets, to which he gave Grecian titles. He was born about 1590. He is said to have been a soldier, and to have accompanied the Earl of Essex to France in 1591. In 1606 he translated Cicero's "Offices;" in 1607, published a tragedy founded on the life of Pope Alexander VI., entitled the "Devil's Charter," after which no further mention of him is found, the date of his death being unknown.

BARNES, Joshua, an English poet and professor of Greek at Cambridge, who, although he published a variety of works, is best known for his poetical version of the Biblical story of Esther, which was printed in 1676, after having been very carefully revised and polished. It was enriched by learned notes; is written in Greek hexameters, and was accompanied by a Latin scholia. He was author of a life of Edward III.; edited editions of Euripides, AEschylus, and Homer; and began a poem called "Franciados," referring to the adventures of the Black Prince. He married, in 1700, a Mrs. Mason, a widow lady of Hemingford, who was so great an admirer of Barnes that she offered to settle £100 a year upon him; this, however, he declined, unless accompanied with the honour of her hand, which she accordingly granted. n. 1654; p. 1712. His editions of the Greek classics, though distinguished by much painstaking and research, were not very successful, and are now totally forgotten.

BARNES, Sir Edward, a distinguished military officer, who, after passing through the various subordinate grades, was made major-general in 1813, and commanded a brigade in the battles of Vittoria, Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, &c. He also served in the campaign in the Netherlands, was wounded at Waterloo, and afterwards held commands in Ceylon and India. He attained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1825, was a K.C.B. and K.G.B., was decorated with several foreign orders, and was M.P. for Sudbury in two parliaments. n. 1776; p. 1833.

BARNES, Albert, an American biblical commentator, well known as the author of "Barnes's Notes," which have gone through many editions in the United States, have been republished in England, and are so much esteemed, that a circulation of nearly half a million is said to have been reached up to 1859. n. at Rome, U.S., 1798.

BARNET, Curtis, bar'-net, a commodore in the British navy, who did much excellent service, especially in the Indian seas, where his conduct in connexion with the defence of Madras, when besieged by the French, has been much commended. Instead of directly aiding in the defence of the British settlement, he attacked Pondicherry, and thus succeeded in drawing off the French army, which retreated from Madras, and returned by forced marches to the defence of Pondicherry. Previous to this, in 1746, he captured, in conjunction with the Earl of Northesk, their ships being the Deptford, of 60 guns, and the Preston, of 50, three valuable French ships, each mounting 30 guns, carrying 150 men, and having cargoes valued at £100,000 a piece. Barnett was eminent for his knowledge of naval law and etiquette, and was at one time famous for a controversy in which he engaged with admiral Lestock, and for having been twice concerned in questions of breach of neutrality, by the French on one occasion, and by himself, it is said in retaliation, on another. p. 1746, in the prime of life, and when in a fair way to win an eminent name in British naval annals.

BARNEVELDT, John van Olden, bar'-velt, Grand Pensionary of Holland, who rose from the position of an advocate to the first dignities in the Dutch government. During the struggle of the Netherlands with the Spaniards, he assisted, in 1573, as a volunteer, in the defence of Haarlem; and in 1575, the year following the assassination of William, prince of Orange, was sent as ambassador to England. Here he was successful in procuring military assistance from queen Elizabeth, and on his return from the embassy was made advocate-general. Endeavouring, however, to limit the power of the stadtholder, Maurice, prince of Orange, and also approving the doctrines of the Arminians, which Maurice, as a Gomarist, opposed, he made himself obnoxious to that prince, who was possessed of great power, and was arrested and tried for plotting to deliver up his country to the Spanish monarch. Of this he was found guilty, and beheaded in 1619. p. at Amersfoort, 1547.—His sons, William and René, formed a conspiracy against Maurice, to revenge their father's death, which was discovered. William escaped, but René was taken prisoner and executed. The widow of John Barneveldt having solicited the pardon of René, Prince Maurice expressed his astonishment that she should do for her son what she had refused to do for her husband. To this she nobly replied, "I would not seek pardon for my husband, because he was innocent; I ask it for my son, because he is guilty." (For full details of the life and labours of Barneveldt, see Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic.")

BARNET, Joshua, bar'-ne, a distinguished American seaman, who early sought the sea, and, at the commencement of the War of Independence was appointed mate of the American sloop Hornet. On board this and other vessels he soon showed his brave and seamanlike qualities, and was very active and successful in capturing British merchant-ships. He, however, was taken prisoner and sent to England; but escaping, made his way home, and again commenced his attacks on the British. On peace being made, he was for a short time in the French navy, but resigned his command and engaged in commercial pursuits. In the second war between England and America, in 1812, he was appointed commander of the flotilla in Chesapeake Bay, and having disembarked his men to assist the land forces, was present at the engagement of Bladensburg, where he was wounded and again taken prisoner. p. 1759; p. 1818.

BARO, Peter, bar'-o, a French Protestant divine, who, to avoid persecution, came to England, and, in 1575, was chosen Margaret professor of divinity at Cambridge; but involving himself in disputes by opposing the Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, he, in 1598, resigned his professorship. p. about 1600.—He published some polemical books in Latin.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Baroche

rods-e, Giacomo da Vignola, one of the most distinguished Italian architects of modern times, was the son of a Milanese gentleman, and was born at Vignola in 1507. The death of his father in reduced circumstances devolved the education of Giacomo upon his mother, who, finding his taste and talents inclined him to the study of architecture, allowed him to follow the bent of his genius, and removed to Rome in order to afford her son the best opportunities of study. He first brought himself into notice by a small treatise on perspective, then little understood, and which he reduced to rule. He was then, on the formation of the Academy of Architecture at Rome, appointed director, and made a collection of drawings of all the ancient edifices of the Holy City for the use of the students. He next travelled in France, and made several designs for Francis I. On his return to Italy, he composed a façade for the church of St. Peter, at Bologna, built the Solani palace at Minerbio, completed the canal of the Naviglio, and designed the ducal palace at Piacenza. He again returned to Rome, where Pope Julius III. took him into his service, and for whom he designed and executed the luxurious villa Giulio, outside the Porta del Popolo, the interior of which has been characterized as a masterpiece of elegant, refined, and classic beauty and luxury. His other works are—the church of St. Andrea, near the same gate; the Capo d'Opera at Caprarola, 23 miles from Rome, one of the most elegant structures in Italy, the circular staircase in which is considered to be the finest in the world; the church of the Madonna degli Angeli, near Assisi, those of Mazzano and St. Oreste, the rustic gateway to the Farnese Gardens at Rome, and various other buildings, which he either wholly designed or contributed to the decoration of. He succeeded Michael Angelo as the architect of St. Peter's, at Rome, and various portions of that stupendous building were executed under his care. When Philip II. of Spain was about to erect the Escorial, the plans which had been prepared were submitted to Vignola, with a request that he would either select the best, or form a combination of all such as should be worthy the object intended. It is believed that he put the whole aside, and formed a design of his own, upon which the Escorial, which cost 5,260,670 ducats, and contains 12,000 doors and windows, was erected. Baroccio published a work on the orders of architecture, in which he reduced the proportions of the several parts to a consonant and harmonious principle, and which is still used as a textbook for the student. He died, 1573, at the age of 66, beloved and honoured for the vastness of his achievements, the originality of his genius, the integrity of his character, and the amiability and geniality of his disposition. It was his constant prayer that he should neither know poverty nor superfluity—a wish that appears to have been gratified; for it is said that he left to his son Hyacinth, also an architect, who completed some of his father's works, no other inheritance than his name, his fame, and the example of his virtues.

BAROCHE, Peter Jules, ba'-rosh, a distinguished French advocate, who on the 23rd February, 1848, signed the bill of charges brought by Odillon Barrot against Guizot, for having prevented the reform banquet. Subsequently he became, under the government of Louis Napoleon, minister of the interior, foreign minister, president of the council of state, and minister without portfolio, or one of the two "talking ministers" whose duty it is to answer in the Chambers for all departments of the government. B. at Paris 1802.

BARON, Hyacinthe Theodore, ba'-rong, a French physician, who accomplished many useful reforms in the mode of medical treatment adopted in his time. b. 1656; d. 1753. His son, of the same name, was also an eminent physician.

BARON, Michael, ba'-rong, a famous French actor, the son of a leather-merchant, who himself was something of a performer. His proper family name, or surname, was Boyrui. For nearly thirty years he played with the greatest success in Molière's troupe, and then, in 1691, without any apparent reason, suddenly retired from the stage. In 1720, however, he again returned, and was received with immense enthusiasm, playing, with great success, even the most youthful parts. In September, 1729, he was compelled by old age and a severe asthma to retire from the stage, and died in the December following. b. 1633.—Although his merit in his profession was very great, yet his vanity was equally so. This will appear from a saying of his, that "Once in a century we might see a Cæsar, but that 2000 years were not sufficient to produce a Baron;" and he was about to refuse the pension granted him by Louis XIV., because the order for it was worded, "Pay to the within-named Michael Boyrui, called Baron," &c. He wrote also some plays, three volumes of his comedies being printed after his death.

BARONI, Leonora, ba-ro'-ne, a famous Italian singer, the daughter of the fair Adriana of Mantua, on whose beauty and accomplishments numerous panegyrics were printed. Leonora possessed eminent talents, and a volume of poems in different languages, written in her praise, was printed in 1636. She herself produced several poetical pieces of merit. b. at Naples, and flourished during the 17th century.

BARONIUS, Cæsar, ba-ro'-ne-us, a learned cardinal, who entered into the congregation of the Cratry; and, in 1533, was elected superior-general of that order, and subsequently became librarian of the Vatican and confessor to Clement VIII., whom he would have succeeded as pope, but for the opposition of the Spanish party. b. 1533; d. 1607.—The fame of Baronius rests on his celebrated and laborious work, "Annales Ecclesiasticæ," which was published in twelve volumes, and has been reproduced in many forms, and contains the history of the first twelve ages of the church.

BARRABAND, Pierre Paul, bar'-ra-bawng, a celebrated French painter of birds, was the son of a carpet manufacturer of Aubusson, where he was born in 1767. Removing to Paris at the age of 16, he at first painted flowers, but afterwards devoted himself to the delineation of ornithology, and illustrated a variety of works on that subject; among which were an edition of Buffon, the "History of Insects" of Latrèille, and others. He was employed by Napoleon I. to decorate the banqueting-room at St. Cloud, and also executed some works for Joseph Bonaparte, in which he exhibited fine taste and skill in colour. In 1807, he was named professor at the Lyons School of Arts, but died in 1809, at the early age of 42. His pupils erected a monument to his memory in the principal cemetery at Lyons.

Barre

one of the five members of the French Directory, early entered into military life, and took part in the defence of Pondicherry, in India, against the English, and was present at the battle of Progua, and soon after returned to France. The revolution now discovering itself, Barras assisted at the taking of the Bastille, and afterwards of the Tuileries. In 1793 he was elected a member of the National Convention, and voted for the unconditional death of Louis XVI. He was sent, in 1793, to the south of France, and commanded the left wing of the besieging army under Dugommier at Toulon, and it was here that he first met Napoleon Bonaparte, then captain of artillery. The patriotic reputation of Barras was so well established, that he and Fréron were the only representatives not denounced by the popular societies. Robespierre, however, was no friend of his, and often wished to arrest him; Barras, knowing this, became one of the principal actors of the 9th Thermidor, and put himself at the head of the troops which surrounded Robespierre at the Hôtel de Ville. In 1794 he was named one of the "Committee of General Security," and became a great enemy to the members of the Mountain. In February, 1795, he was elected president of the Convention, and, in that capacity, declared Paris in a state of siege when the assembly was attacked by the populace. Afterwards, when the Convention was assailed, Bonaparte, by Barras' advice, was appointed to command the artillery; and that general, on the 13th Vendémiaire (Oct. 5, 1795), decisively repressed the reactionary movement. For his services, Barras was now named one of the Directory, and took a prominent part in the changes which that body underwent until Napoleon's coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire (Nov. 9, 1799), which effectually overthrew the power of Barras and his colleagues. His life, from this date, was, generally speaking, one of retirement; and after living at Grosbois, Marseilles, and Brussels, he went to Chaillot, near Paris, where he died, 1820. p. 1755.—Napoleon said of him, "The passion with which he spoke would make one imagine he was a resolute, determined man; but he was not so,—he had no decided opinion on any subject connected with government."

BARRÉ, Louis François Joseph de la, bar'-rai, an ingenious writer, who assisted Anselm Banduri in his "Imperium Orientale," and the collection of medals of Roman emperors from the emperor Decius, for which he had a pension given him by the Duke of Tuscany. He also published "Memoirs for the History of France and Burgundy," and several other works. p. 1638; p. 1738.—There are others of this name distinguished in French literature and history.

BARRELIÈRE, bar-rell'-e-ai, a French botanist, at first a physician, but who became a Dominican, and devoted himself to the study of botany, travelling through the south of France and Spain collecting specimens of plants. He subsequently visited Italy, and founded at Rome a botanical garden. Here he also had engraved some of the plants he had collected, and after remaining at Rome twenty-three years, returned to Paris, where he endeavoured to perfect his labours, with a view of publishing an account of his discoveries, but died there, 1673. p. 1606.—His valuable MSS. were, after his death, nearly all destroyed by fire, and only a few of his copper-plates saved; these, however, were used by

Barrington

Antoine de Jussieu in a work published in 1714; and Plumier, in honour of Barrelier, established the genus Barreliera, of the order Acanthac'æ.

BARRETT, George, bar'-et, a landscape painter, who was self-taught, and obtained, when young, the premium of £50 offered by the Dublin Society for the best landscape in oil. In 1762 he came to London, and the year after his arrival he gained the premium given by the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, &c., for the best landscape. p. at Dublin, 1732; p. at Paddington, 1731.—He was one of the first who suggested the foundation of the Royal Academy, of which he became a member.

BARRETT, William, an English topographical author, who spent more than twenty years in collecting materials for a history of his native city, Bristol, which he published in 1788. p. 1789.—He was the early patron of the gifted but eccentric Chatterton.

BARRETT, John, D.D., vice-provost and professor of Oriental languages in Trinity College, Dublin, was distinguished alike for his learning, his penurious habits, his eccentricities, and his utter want of worldly knowledge. It was said of him, that though he had been eating the college mutton for more than half a century, he was unable to tell a sheep from an ox when he saw them alive. His learning, however, was profound, and his "Inquiry into the Origin of the Constellations of the Zodiac," and other works, gained for him a wide renown. He died, Nov. 15, 1821, leaving the greater part of his property, which was considerable, to charitable uses.

BARRI, or BARRI, Giraldu de. (See GERALDUS CAMBRENSIS.)

BARRINGTON, John Shute, Lord Viscount, bar'-ing-ton, the first Lord Barrington, was the son of Mr. Shute, a merchant; but a Mr. Barrington, who had married his cousin, having left him his estate, he, by act of parliament, assumed his arms and name. He wrote several works advocating the rights of Protestant dissenters, and, in 1720, was created an Irish peer, being then member for Berwick. In 1725 he published his "Miscellanea Sacra." He also wrote "An Essay on the Several Dispensations of God to Mankind," and other works. p. at Theobalds, Herts, 1678; p. in Berkshire, 1734.—It is remarkable that another gentleman, John Wildman, of Becket, should also have left Lord Barrington a considerable estate in Berkshire, although they were but slightly acquainted.

BARRINGTON, William Wildman, Viscount, eldest son of the above, played a conspicuous part in politics between 1739 (when he was chosen member for Berwick) and 1778, when he retired into private life. In 1745 he became one of the commissioners of the Admiralty; in 1754 he was chosen to represent Plymouth, and was named master of the Great Wardrobe; in 1755 he became secretary-at-war; in 1761, chancellor of the exchequer; in 1762, treasurer of the navy; and in 1765, again secretary-at-war. p. 1710; p. 1733.

BARRINGTON, the Honourable Daines, fourth son of the first Lord Barrington, was brought up to the law, and in 1757 was made a Welsh judge, after which he was appointed second justice of Chester. He resigned these offices long before his death, and lived in retirement in the Temple, occupying himself principally in the study of antiquity and natural history.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Barrington

He wrote "Observations on the Statutes," a work which has frequently been reprinted, and to which, in the later editions, new matter has been added. He also wrote tracts on the possibility of reaching the north pole. These were intended to promote a favourite project of the author, and embodied a vast amount of traditional as well as conjectural evidence as to the possibility of finding a passage to the pole. Besides these, he contributed several papers to the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, of both of which he was a member, and of the latter vice-president. B. 1727; D. in the Temple, 1800.

BARRINGTON, Samuel, younger brother of the above, who was, in 1778, created rear-admiral of the White, and sent to the West Indies, where his valour and prudence gained him the highest reputation; and, against a far superior force, he greatly distinguished himself by the taking of St. Lucia. In 1782 he served under Lord Howe, and bore a part in the memorable relief of Gibraltar. B. 1729; D. 1800.

BARNOCCHI, Frederigo, barn-ot'-che-o, an eminent Italian painter, who, under the patronage of Pope Pius X., assisted in embellishing the Belvedere palace at Rome. The Annunciation, in fresco, on one of the ceilings, and a picture of the Holy Virgin with the infant Saviour, were of his execution; but his finest performances are the Presentation in the Temple, and the Visitation of the Virgin Mary to Elizabeth, which he painted for the Chiesa Nuova during the pontificate of Gregory XIII. B. at Urbino, 1525; D. 1612.

BARNOS, or DE BARNOS, John, bar'-ros, a learned Portuguese historian, who was tutor to the sons of King Emanuel; and when his pupil Don Juan ascended the throne as King John III., he had conferred upon him the governorship of St. George da Mina, on the coast of Guinea. He was subsequently recalled to Lisbon, and appointed agent-general for the Portuguese colonies, in which capacity he composed his great work entitled "Asia Portuguesa," and which he divided into four decades of ten books each. B. at Viseu, 1498; D. near Pombal, 1570.—The style of this writer is considered a model of Portuguese prose.

BARROT, Camille Hyacinthe Odillon, bar'-ro, a celebrated French statesman, who showed great talents at an early age, and acquired considerable reputation as an advocate. After the revolution of 1830, in the principal transactions of which he was deeply engaged, he accompanied the dethroned dynasty to Cherbourg. Under Louis Philippe, Barrot, as a member of the Chamber of Deputies, was in opposition to Guizot, and was ardent in agitating for reform, and attended several of the provincial banquets, the interdiction of which ultimately led to the revolution of 1848, at the commencement of which he pleaded in vain for the establishment of the regency of the duchess of Orleans. He subsequently became, in December, 1848, president of the council; and, in September, 1849, from ill health, resigned; and, in 1852, withdrew from public affairs. B. at Villefort, 1791.

BARROW, Isaac, bar'-o, an eminent mathematician and divine, who was first placed in the Charter-house, and afterwards removed to Felssted school, in Essex, whence he was entered at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1647 he was chosen a scholar, and subscribed the engagement; but repenting of what he had done, he went back and struck out his name from the list. This was in strict conformity with the remarkable antagonistic and belligerent spirit which, up to the present period, he had frequently, if not usually, displayed. At school he was distinguished for his pugilistic qualities, and in the eyes of his father, who was linen-draper to Charles I., seemed such an incorrigible boy, that in his conversation he would express himself that if it pleased Providence to remove any of his offspring, that it might be Isaac, for he could best be spared. But however high might be his combative qualities, they were by no means superior to his intellectual powers. He had been a hard student, and the writings of Bacon, Descartes, Galileo, and similar philosophers were his favourites, because they were profound. In 1619 he was chosen fellow of his college, and studied physic with a view of making it his profession; but by the advice of his uncle, afterwards bishop of Ely, Asaph, he forsook it, and devoted himself to theology. In 1655 he went on his travels, and at Constantinople read over all the works of St. Chrysostom. During this cruise up the Mediterranean, the vessel in which he sailed was attacked by an Algerine pirate, when he assumed carnal weapons, and took his part with the rest of the crew in driving off the enemy. On his return he was episcopally ordained, and in 1660 was chosen Greek Professor at Cambridge. In 1662 he was appointed Gresham professor of geometry; and in the year following was elected fellow of the Royal Society. In 1664 he gave up the Gresham professorship, on being appointed Lucasian professor of mathematics at Cambridge, which chair he resigned in 1669 to his pupil, then Mr. Isaac Newton. In 1670 he was created D.D., and two years afterwards appointed master of Trinity College; on which occasion the king said that he had given it to the most learned man in England. In 1675 he served the office of vice-chancellor, at which time the life of this truly great man was drawing to a close. B. in London, 1630; D. 1677, in his 47th year, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.—Not only as a mathematician, but as a divine, Barrow merits to rank with the highest of England's worthies. In the former capacity, Dr. Pemberton remarks, "He may be esteemed as having shown a compass of invention, equal, if not superior, to any of the moderns, Sir Isaac Newton only excepted." He was the originator of the idea of what has been called the incremental triangle, and proved the error of his predecessors in affirming that a portion of a curve may be taken so small, that it may, in calculation, be considered as a straight line. He was the author of many mathematical works; amongst which we may mention his "Lectiones Mathematicæ," which are esteemed perfect models of sound geometrical reasoning. As a divine, he seems inexhaustible in argument, knowledge, and power. Bishop Heber, speaking of the three greatest religious teachers of England, Taylor, Hooker, and Barrow, thus distinguishes them:—"Of such a triumvirate, who shall settle the pre-eminence? The first awes most, the second convinces most, the third delights and persuades most. . . . To Barrow the praise must be assigned of the closest and clearest views, and of a taste the most controlled and chastened." If the opinion of Charles II. is worth anything on such a point, it may be mentioned that, in judging of him as a preacher, he said Barrow was the most unfair he ever heard, because he exhausted every subject on which he discoursed. Bishop Warburton remarks that in reading him you are obliged to think; and the great earl of Chatham, when, in early life, he was qualifying himself for public speaking, read Barrow's sermons again and again, till he could recite many of them from memory. Of his personal prowess and courage there are many anecdotes. Walking about the premises of a friend in the evening, he was attacked by a fierce mastiff, which being chained all day and let loose at night, set on him with great fury. The doctor caught him by the throat, and throwing him down, lay upon him; once he had a mind to kill him, but he altered his resolution on recollecting that this would be unjust as the dog only had done his duty. At length his shouts were heard by some of the family, who came out and freed both from their disagreeable situation. As a proof of his wit, we are told that, being on one occasion at court, he met the witty Lord Rochester, who, by way of banter, thus accosted him:—"Doctor, I am yours to my shoe-tye." Barrow, seeing his aim, returned his salute obsequiously, with, "My lord, I am yours to the ground." Rochester replied, "Doctor, I am yours to the centre;" which was followed by Barrow, with, "My lord, I am yours to the antipodes." Upon which Rochester, scornful to be foiled by a musty old piece of divinity, as he used to call him, exclaimed, "Doctor, I am yours to the lowest pit of h—l." On which Barrow, turning on his heel, answered, "There, my lord, I leave you."

BARROW, Sir John, rose from being a mathematical teacher at Greenwich to the post of second secretary to the Admiralty, which he discharged for forty years. His first step to advancement in public life, however, arose from his accompanying, as private secretary of Sir George Staunton, the expedition of Lord Macartney to China. On his return he published his "Travels in China," which, at the time, was considered one of the most valuable and interesting accounts which had appeared of the Chinese. In 1797 he accompanied Lord Macartney to the Cape of Good Hope in the capacity of private secretary; and on his return published a volume of his "Travels in Southern Africa." In 1814 he received from Lord Melville his appointment to the second-secretaryship of the Admiralty, when his ardour in the pursuit of geographical knowledge and scientific discovery was soon evinced by the manner in which he endeavoured to serve his country in bringing before various governments the desirability of prosecuting voyages to the arctic regions. These services were honourably noticed in various ways; and in 1835 he was created a baronet. b. near Ulverstone, p. 1848.

BARRY, Robert and Philip de, barr'-e, two brothers, natives of Wales, who took an active part along with Robert Fitzstephen and Raymond le Grosse in the conquest of Ireland, where they greatly distinguished themselves, and were the founders of the numerous families of that name in Cork and other counties, especially that of Barry Court, in Cork, where Philip built a castle in 1206. Flourished between 1189 and 1230. Giraldus de Barry, usually called Giraldus Cambrensis (which see), the chronicler, was another brother. Lords Duttavant and Barrymore are descended from the gallant companions of Fitzstephen.

BARRY, Lodowick, was the author of a comedy called "Ram Alley, or Merry Tricks," which for liveliness of incident, and spirit and humour in dialogue and character, is one of the best of our old English dramas. It was first printed in 1611, again in 1636, and is contained in Dodsley's collection of old plays. Of the author little is known with certainty, but he is believed to have been an Irish gentleman.

BARRY, Spranger, a celebrated actor, who was bred a silversmith, which trade he abandoned for the theatre, and made his first appearance in the character of Othello in 1744. In 1747 he came to England, and was engaged at Drury Lane, which he soon quitted for Covent Garden, and proved a formidable rival to Garrick, who was the leader of the former house. In 1753 he went to Ireland; but his speculations in two theatres, one in Dublin and the other in Cork, proving unsuccessful, he returned to England, when he and his wife were engaged by Mr. Foote, at the Haymarket. In 1766 he accepted proposals made by Garrick, and removed to Drury Lane. About 1773 Barry left Drury Lane for Covent Garden; but he did not live long after, being worn out by an hereditary gout. b. in Dublin, 1719; p. 1777. His great excellence was in tragedy.

BARRY, James, an eminent lawyer, whose father, in the time of Charles I., was a representative of the city of Dublin. In 1620 he was made king's serjeant, and in 1634 one of the barons of the Exchequer, with the honour of knighthood. He was a great friend to the earl of Strafford, and, at the Restoration, was advanced to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench in Ireland and the peerage. b. at Dublin; p. 1673.—He wrote "The Case of Tenures upon the Commission of Defective Titles," Dublin, 1637, folio.

BARRY, James, a celebrated painter, who, at the age of nineteen, painted an historical picture on the legend of the baptism of the king of Cashel, which was exhibited to the Dublin Society for the Encouragement of Arts. The genius exhibited in the treatment of this subject brought him under the notice of Burke, the distinguished statesman, who introduced him to Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Johnson, and other eminent men. Burke enabled him to visit Italy, where he studied with ardour. On his return, in 1775, he published "An Inquiry into the Real and Imaginary Obstructions to the Acquisition of the Arts in England," 8vo., a work of considerable merit. About this time he proposed to paint gratuitously for the Society of Arts a series of pictures, illustrative of the position, that the happiness of mankind is promoted in proportion to the progress of knowledge. His offer was accepted, but his labour was ill requited, and these great works now adorn the institution in the Adelphi. He was subsequently elected royal academician, and in 1783 was appointed professor of painting to the Royal Academy, where his lectures were greatly admired. In 1797 he was removed from his office, and soon after expelled from that institution, on account of some severe allegations which he made against the Academy in outvoting him upon several of his propositions for the advancement of art. b. at Cork, 1741; p. in London, 1806.—Mr. Barry was engaged some years in painting a large picture of Pandora, eighteen feet long and ten broad; but it was not finished at his death. It is, however, on his "Victors of Olympia" that his fame principally rests. It forms the third of the series painted for the Society of Arts. "There is a grasp of mind in it," said Dr. Johnson when he saw it, "you will find nowhere else;" and the celebrated Canova, when in this country, highly commended the work.

BARRY, Sir David, a very distinguished physician and physiologist, was a native of Ireland, having been born in the county of Rosecommon, on the 12th of March, 1780. He joined the medical staff of the army in 1806, and served with distinction in the Peninsular war, at the close of which he was named staff-surgeon of the district of Braganza, and remained in Portugal till 1820, when he returned to England. He devoted himself for several years to the development of certain views he entertained regarding the circulation of the blood, the function of absorption, and the treatment of poisoned wounds. These speculations attracted much attention, were reported on by Cuvier, Laennec, and others, and are considered to have thrown much valuable light on the points to which they refer. Dr. Barry was afterwards employed by government to investigate the fever which prevailed in Gibraltar in 1823; in 1831, he was sent to St. Petersburg, along with Sir William Russell, to inquire into the character of the cholera which then appeared in Europe, and on his return was named a member of the board appointed to investigate the epidemic. In 1833, he was one of the commission of inquiry into the health of children employed in factories; and in the following year was one of the commissioners appointed to investigate the condition of the poor, and of the public charities in Ireland. In all these inquiries he rendered valuable services, in consideration of which he was knighted by his sovereign. He rose to the rank of physician to the forces; and died from the bursting of an aneurism in the thoracic aorta in November 1835, while engaged in arranging his papers on the Irish inquiry.

BARRY, Martin, a distinguished physiologist, who, having studied in the universities of Edinburgh, Paris, and Berlin, merits notice principally on account of his having devoted the greater portion of his time to the study of animal development and embryology. On these subjects he wrote a number of treatises, and in 1839 was the first to announce the important discovery "that the segmentation of the yolk, which had been observed in batrachian reptiles, was also true of mammals." B. at Fratton, Hampshire, 1802; D. at Beccles, in Suffolk, 1855.

BARRY, Marie Jean, Countess du bar'-re, the favourite of Louis XV., was the daughter of an exciseman of the name of Vaubernier. After having passed some portion of her early life in a convent, we find her, at little more than the age of fifteen, engaged at a fashionable milliner's in Paris. Possessing a remarkably handsome person, which she displayed with a vulgar familiarity of demeanour, she had already passed through several stages of vice, when she was presented to Louis XV. by Lebel, his own valet-de-chambre. In order that she might appear at court, that licentious monarch conferred upon her the title by which she is generally known. During the reign of Louis XV. her influence was all-powerful; but when he died, in 1774, she was shut up in a convent near Meaux. She was subsequently released by Louis XVI.; and the residence of Luciennes, which the preceding sovereign had built for her, was restored to her with a pension. After this she lived in retirement and all but forgotten, till the Revolution broke out. It is gratifying to have it sometimes to record, that there are, in life, situations which will call forth, from the most degraded, virtues the most exalted. Gratitude is one of the noblest sentiments of the human mind; and, whatever may have been the vices of the Countess du Barry, she seems to have possessed this one virtue in an eminent degree. Appreciating the kindness with which she had been treated by Louis XVI., she now took the deepest interest in the misfortunes of him and his family. She left her retirement, not only to mourn over, but to endeavour to repair, the broken fortunes of royalty. Regardless of danger, she visited England in 1793, that she might dispose of her jewels, and, with the proceeds, assist the queen of France and her children, who were then prisoners in the Temple. On her return, in the same year, she was arrested, taken before the revolutionary tribunal of her country, and, on the charge of "being a conspirator, and of having worn mourning in London for the death of the tyrant," was condemned and executed in November. B. at Vaucouleurs, suffered, 1793.

BART, Sir Charles, Bart'-e, architect of the Houses of Parliament, whose first building which attracted attention was the Travellers' Club-house, Pall-Mall. Fifteen years later he built the Reform Club-house; and amongst other edifices of which he was the architect may be named King Edward's Grammar-school, Birmingham; the new buildings at University College, Oxford; and Clifden House, near Maidenhead. B. in Westminster, 1795; knighted, 1852; D. 1860.

BART, Jean, bart, a celebrated French naval hero, whose father was a poor fisherman, and was killed in a naval action. Bart early entered the Dutch navy, and served under Admiral De Ruyter, distinguishing himself, from time to time, by his courage and strength, in which he was superior to most of his shipmates. When, in 1672, war was declared by France against Holland, Bart quitted the Dutch service, and entered that of France. After several private enterprises, in which he greatly distinguished himself, his name became known to Louis XIV., who sent him a gold medal and chain, with the rank of lieutenant in the royal navy. He now rapidly rose, and, in 1690, commanded a 40-gun ship in the Brest fleet under Admiral de Tourville, to whom he was of signal service in the action off Dieppe, in which the French were successful over the English and Dutch fleets. In the following year he landed on the coast of Scotland, and destroyed several villages. In 1692 he had the command of a squadron of frigates and a fire-ship, with which he destroyed 86 sail of English merchant-vessels, landed near Newcastle, where he burnt 200 houses, and returned to Dunkirk with prizes valued at 500,000 crowns. In 1694 he was sent with a squadron of six ships to convoy a fleet laden with corn. This fleet had been captured, when Bart fell in with it, by a Dutch squadron of men-of-war; but, though he was much in force, he rescued the prizes, took 1 tors, and carried the whole to France. For this a patent of nobility was granted to him and his descendants. The peace of Ryswick, in 1697, put an end to the war, after which he retired to live with his family. B. at Dunkirk, 1651; D. 1702.—The eldest son of this brave seaman became a vice-admiral, and died in 1755.

BARTAS, William Sallust du, bar-ta, a French poet, was the son of a treasurer of France, and rose to be honoured so far as to be sent by Henry IV. on several embassies. He wrote a poem, entitled "The Week of the Creation," in seven books, translated into English by Sylvester. The reputation of this work was so great, that it passed through thirty editions in six years. It was translated into several languages; and yet, although so popular on its appearance, it has long ago fallen into neglect. B. at Montfort, 1514; D. of the wounds he received at the battle of Ivry, 1590.

BARTIN, Dr. Heinrich, bart, a celebrated African traveller, who, in early life, commenced the pursuit of travelling, with the view of advancing geographical discovery. In 1815 he left Marseilles, and followed the French and Spanish shores as far as Gibraltar, passed over to Tangier, in Africa, and proceeded to Algiers, making excursions to Tunis, and other places in the interior. On his way to Cairo, he was wounded in an affray with the Arabs, and lost all his papers. He then explored Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Asia Minor, and Greece; thus nearly making the circuit of the Mediterranean. An account of these travels he published at his own expense. He afterwards accompanied Dr. Overweg and Mr. Richardson in their travels through North and Central Africa, during which they traversed more than 12,000 miles. The volume in which he gives an account of these explorations is a most valuable work. B. at Hamburg, 1821; D. at Berlin, 1865.

BARTHE, Nicholas Thomas, bart, an ingenious French writer, the author of several dramatic pieces, and a translator of Ovid's "Art of Love" into French verse. B. at Marseilles, 1731; D. at Paris, 1785.

BARTHELEMY, Jean Jacques, bar-tai-lai-me, a learned French writer, who received his education first in the college of the Oratory at Marseilles, whence he removed to that of the Jesuits. In 1714 he visited Paris, and was nominated associate in the care of the cabinet of medals, afterwards became secretary to the Academy of Inscriptions, and obtained the appointment of keeper of the cabinet of medals. In 1754 he visited Naples, then rendered interesting to antiquary by the discovery of the treasures of Herculaneum. He wished much to have a specimen of the ancient writing in the Greek manuscripts; but he was told by those who had the care of the curiosities, that they could not grant his request. On this he only asked to see a manuscript page for a few minutes. It contained twenty-eight lines, which Barthélemy read attentively, and, going aside, transcribed the whole, and sent the fac-simile to the Academy of Belles-lettres—an act which many may applaud for its cleverness, but few for its honesty. In 1758 the duke de Choiseul gave him a pension, to which he subsequently added the treasurership of St. Martin de Tours and the place of secretary-general to the Swiss Guards. In 1793 he published his great work, entitled "The Voyage of the Younger Anacharsis in Greece," upon which he had been employed thirty years. Of the merits of this work it is now hardly necessary to speak, yet the sketches of Grecian manners which it gives are not much to be relied on. In 1739 he was chosen a member of the French Academy; and now, when he was nearly eighty years of age, he was arrested during the reign of terror, and, as an aristocrat, cast into prison. He was, however, released by Danton the next day, the Jacobins being themselves ashamed of the atrocity of such an act. B. at Cassis, in Provence, 1716; D. at Paris, 1795.—Barthélemy was a member of the most distinguished foreign societies, as well as of those in his own country. He united with his profound learning, modesty, simplicity, and good-nature. Besides his "Anacharsis," he wrote a number of papers, chiefly on medals and coins, in the collection of the Academy of Inscriptions, and in the "Journal des Savans." If ever a man was weary of life, it was he; for the French revolution had not only swept away his income of 25,000 francs a year, for which he cared little; but he had seen his oldest, dearest, and best friends first cast into prison, and thence led to perish on the scaffold.

BARTHEZ, Paul Joseph, bar-tai, a celebrated French physician and voluminous writer on medicine, pathology, physiology, &c., having been educated at Narbonne and Toulouse, was a professor, and afterwards chancellor, of the university at Montpellier, the school of which he largely contributed to render famous. He afterwards removed to Paris, where he was appointed consulting physician to the king, Louis XVI., and first physician to the duke of Orleans, and where he practised with eminent success for ten years. The revolution compelled him to retire to his native town, where, although he had lost the greater part of his fortune, he practised his profession gratuitously, devoting his leisure to the philosophical speculations connected with medicine, which had always been his favourite study. On the restoration of the university, he was named honorary professor, age and infirm health precluding him from taking an active share in teaching. He published a great variety of works, the most important of which are his "Treatise on Gouty Diseases," the "New Elements of the Science of Man," "New Doctrines concerning the Human Functions," &c.; which, although they contain some fanciful speculations, and display an undue tendency to generalise, are replete with valuable facts, and had a large influence in overthrowing many crude theories and absurd doctrines, which had prevailed in the French medical schools. Barthez's writings are much better known on the continent than in England, where they have attracted comparatively little attention. His style is simple, accurate, and excellently suited for teaching the sciences he treats of. B. at Montpellier, 1734; D. Oct. 15, 1806.

BARTHIUS, Gaspard de, bar-té-us, an erudit scholar, born at Custrin, in Brandenburg, June 22, 1537, was descended from one of the oldest families in Europe, an ancestor of his having commanded the cavalry of the emperor, in 836, in the wars with the Vandals, in the course of which he was killed. Gaspard Barthius early became such a master of languages, that while yet a boy he translated the memoirs of Comines, and thirty romances from French, Spanish, and Italian into Latin; besides rendering seventeen of the Psalms into different kinds of Latin verse, when only twelve years of age; and, before he was nineteen, published a considerable collection of Latin poems. Joseph Scaliger, who was anything but profuse of praise, said of him, that there was in Barthius another genius born to eternity; and should he live, sound learning would be preserved for a time. Barthius afterwards edited editions of Virgil, Claudius, Statius, &c.; in all of which he displayed prodigious learning, as well as extraordinary powers of memory, having generally quoted the passage he was commenting on from recollection. He subsequently abandoned profane for sacred studies; and his "Soliloquia" was said by Spenzel to contain thoughts well worthy of St. Augustine himself. He was twice married, and by the second wife left a son to transmit the ancient honours of his family, a matter about which he is said to have been extremely anxious. b. Sept. 19, 1653.

BARTHOLDY, Jacob Solomon, bar-to'-de, a diplomatist greatly employed by Prussia in secret missions, was born of Jewish parents, at Berlin, in 1779, and after studying at Halle, travelled in Greece, upon which country he wrote a book which greatly contributed to direct the attention of Europe to the condition of that then oppressed land. In 1805, he was baptized by the Protestant pastor, Reinhard; and shortly afterwards, conceiving a violent hatred of Napoleon, he went through Germany preaching against him, joined the Austrian militia, and fought bravely at Ebersberg, where he was severely wounded. In 1813 he was appointed to a high place in the Prussian chancellery; followed the allies to Paris in 1814; took part in the deliberations of the Congress of Vienna; was sent on secret missions to London and other courts; in 1815 was appointed Prussian consul-general at Rome; afterwards filled missions to Florence and Naples, and again at Rome, where he devoted himself to archaeological studies, and died there in 1825. Although of a repulsive exterior, Bartholdy was a man of rare genius, and was highly esteemed by all the distinguished men of his time—Metternich, Hardenberg, Consalvi, &c. He was a great patron of art, and had an extensive collection of articles of vertu, such as coloured glass, antique vases, oil-paintings, &c. He was a staunch opponent of revolutionary ideas, and a firm supporter of the doctrines of legitimacy.

BARTHOLINE, Thomas, bar-to'-leen, a celebrated physician at Copenhagen, who took his doctor's degree at Bâle, in 1615. In 1617 he was appointed professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, and in the following year obtained the anatomical chair. Whilst he held this office, he published many valuable medical and anatomical works, the most celebrated treating of the discovery of the lymphatic vessels, to which he laid claim; but this is contested in favour of Rudbeck, a Swedish anatomist. In 1661, owing to delicate health, he resigned his professorship, and retired to the country; but, in 1670, a fire destroying his house, with his library and manuscripts, he returned to Copenhagen, when the king appointed him his physician, and afterwards, in 1675, member of the Grand Council of Denmark. b. 1616; d. 1680.—He left five sons and three daughters, most of whom were distinguished for their talents and learning.

BARTHOLOMEW, bar-thol'-o-mu, archbishop of Braga, assisted at the council of Trent, where he strenuously urged the necessity of a reform among the clergy. He was the father of his flock, and, in a time when the plague raged amongst them, remained at his post doing good. He subsequently resigned his archbishopric, and retired to a monastery, the convent of Viana, which he had founded. b. at Lisbon, 1511; d. 1590.—His works are in 2 vols. folio.

BARTHOLOMEW, commonly called ANGELUS, an English Franciscan monk, whose family name was Glanvil, and who studied at Oxford, Paris, and Rome, was the author of a celebrated work, entitled "De Proprietatibus Rerum," and nineteen books treating of God and the whole circle of created things. Lived in the middle of the 11th century.

BARTHOLOMEW, St., one of the twelve apostles. He preached the gospel in the Indies, in Ethiopia, and Lycaonia, and is said to have been flayed alive in Armenia; but this assertion does not seem to be well founded.

BARTHOLOMEW, David Edwin, a native of Llanthegwysire, and captain in the British navy. He was impressed in 1795, and was promoted, for his exemplary conduct, to the petty officer's post of master's mate. In 1798 he was the patronage of Sir Home Popham, and for three years served under that officer, on the coast of India, in the Romney; and on their return, in 1803, was paid off. Failing to obtain promotion, he applied to the first lord of the Admiralty, which led to a most unwarrantable proceeding on the part of that minister, who took steps to secure his impressment a second time, on his presenting himself at the Admiralty. This proceeding was brought under the notice of the House of Commons, who severely censured it as a violation of the usage of the navy. He was sent to join the Inferrible as foremastman, but was quickly replaced on the quarter-deck. In 1815 he was advanced to the rank of post-captain for gallant conduct in the river Potomac; and the same year obtained a companionship of the order of the Bath. In 1818 he fitted out the Zeeen for surveying service, and, after examining the whole of the Azores, part of the African coast, and some of the Cape Verde Islands, terminated his career at the island of St. Mayo, in 1821.

BARTLEMAN, or BARTHELEMON, Hypolite, bar'-tel-mân, a celebrated violinist and composer. He was engaged by Garriek to set several dramatic pieces for the theatre; and was afterwards engaged for several seasons as leader at the Italian Opera. He was greatly admired for his taste and execution. b. 1741; d. 1801.—His facility in setting music to words was so great that he is reported, on his first interview with Garriek, to have written down the notes of a song, to be introduced into the "Country Girl," as fast as the manager composed the verses.

BARTOLI, Cosmo, a celebrated Italian writer, who lived at Florence in the 16th century. He wrote a life of the emperor Frederic Barbarossa, and several historical works.

BARTOLI, Giovanni, bar'-to'-le, a goldsmith of Siena, who made, with G. Marci, in 1669, by order of Pope Urban V., the silver busts of Peter and Paul, on which the skulls of these apostles were placed.

BARTOLI, Daniele, an Italian, who, at the age of fifteen, entered the order of the Jesuits, and, in 1650, was sent for to Rome by the father-general, and commissioned to write the history of that order in the Italian language. He arranged his subject according to the several missions which the order had established; and his most interesting volumes are those treating of the first success of the Jesuits on the Malabar and Coromandel coasts, the missions to Cochinchina and Tonquin, and the rapid diffusion of Christianity in Japan, from the landing of Francis Xavier, in 1519, till its total eradication in 1637, when Japan was closed against all Europeans except the Dutch. He also wrote various works on morality, physical phenomena, and language, and was appointed rector of the Gregorian or Roman college, in 1671. b. at Ferrara, 1603; d. 1635.

BARTOLI, Pietro Santi, a painter and engraver of Bartola, who bore also the name of Perugino. He was a pupil of Nicolas Poussin. His original pictures are few, as he chiefly copied from others; but he is celebrated for his engravings, which are very beautiful and highly finished. He was appointed antiquary to the pope and to Christina, queen of Sweden. b. 1635; d. at Rome, 1700.

BARTOLOMEO, Andreas de, baw'-to-lo'-mai-o, an eminent Italian jurist, who studied at Bologna, and took his doctor's degree in 1430. He afterwards became professor of canon law at the university of Ferrara, which post he relinquished for the chair of civil law at Bologna, of which place he was created a citizen in 1442. He is supposed to have been present at the council of Bâle, in 1431, and distinguished himself by advocating the doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. He was created, in 1466, by John, king of Aragon, his counsellor, and was also knighted. His nativity is uncertain, both Messina and Noto having been named as the place. b. 1400; d. 1479.

BARTOLOMEO, a Spanish sculptor of the 13th century, who executed the nine statues at the portal of the cathedral of Tarragona.

BARTOLOMEO DI CAPUA, an Italian jurist, created, in 1284, by Charles II. of Naples, protonotary of his kingdom; which situation he held till his death. He took his doctor's degree in 1278, and d. 1323.

BARTOLOMEO, Leonardo di, a native of Palermo, one of the most celebrated politicians of Sicily in the 15th century. In 1431 he gained great popularity among his countrymen for having obtained most important privileges for the city of Palermo from King Alfonso the Magnificent. He exercised a great part of the supreme power in 1436, when the viceroy went to Gaeta; and conferred a great benefit on the state, by obtaining for it the statute called Ritus Magnæ Regiæ Curis et totius Regni Sicilia Curiarum, a regular code of legal procedure long known under the title of Rito del Re Alfonso. He was killed at Palermo, in a popular tumult regarding the administration of public alms, it is said by command of King Alfonso, to whom his popularity had become offensive. The murderer (Tommaso Crispo) was never punished. b. 1450.

BARTOLOMEO, Dionisio di, a Neapolitan architect, who built, in the years 1586 to 1597, the church and convent of the PP. Oratorii at Naples, a celebrated architectural work.

BARTOLOMEO, Maestro, an Italian artist of the 13th century, who painted the picture of the "Annunciation" in the church of the Servi in Florence.

BARTOLOZZI, Francesco, baw'-to-lot's-e, the eminent Florentine designer and engraver, was the son of a silversmith, and commenced engraving under Joseph Wagner, of Venice. When he had completed his engagement, he married a Venetian lady, and removed to Rome, whither Cardinal Borgia had invited him, and here he established his reputation by his plates from the "Life of St. Nilus," and his portraits for a new edition of Vasari. He shortly, however, returned to Venice, where he was engaged by Mr. Dalton, librarian to George III., to engrave a set of plates after Guercino, and afterwards was invited by him to England, on a stipend of £300 per annum. He was elected a member of the Royal Academy in 1769; and, for thirty years after, was incessantly occupied in his profession, especially in the new mode of stippling in imitation of chalk. His most numerous engravings are from the pictures of Angelica Kauffmann and his fellow pupil at the Florentine academy, Cipriani, who had also settled in England, and with whom he had ever maintained a close intimacy. In 1802 he accepted an invitation from the prince regent of Portugal to superintend a school of engraving at Lisbon, with a handsome salary, to which was annexed an elegant residence and the profit of the engravings. b. 1725; d. 1815.—Bartolozzi was the father of the celebrated Madame Vestris.

BARTON, Elizabeth, bär'-ton, commonly called "the Holy Maid of Kent," first became known in 1525, when a servant at an inn at Aldington, in Kent, for her sanctity and miraculous endowments. About 1534, during the negotiations for Henry VIII.'s divorce from Katherine of Aragon, she, under the influence of a trance, spoke words which were taken by those about her for the effect of inspiration, and a priest, named Richard Masters, conveyed an account of her proceedings to Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, who encouraged him to note carefully all she should say. Masters, in conjunction with Dr. Boocking, a monk of Canterbury, took her under his direction, and put into her mouth pretended revelations against the doctrines of the Reformation and the king's divorce. Among other things, she predicted that, should the king proceed with the divorce, "he should not be a king a month longer, and, in the reputation of Almighty God, not one hour longer; but should die a villain's death." This denunciation was followed by others still more menacing spoken by the favourers of Queen Katherine, and at length moved the king to harsh measures. The Maid of Kent, with her principal accomplices, was cast into prison, and a most wretched series of impostures was elicited. The parliament adjudged the offence one of treason; and she, with five priests, was executed at Tyburn in 1534.

BARTON, Benjamin Smith, M.D., a distinguished American naturalist, was born in Pennsylvania, in 1766, studied at Edinburgh and Göttingen, and was the first to occupy a chair of botany and natural history in the United States, having been chosen to that office in the college of Philadelphia in 1790. He was afterwards president of the American Philosophical Society, and professor of Materia Medica at Philadelphia; and his lectures and writings entitle him to be considered the founder of the science of natural history in America. b. 1815.

and wrote several religious and literary works, the chief of which is the "Life of Ariosto." n. at Ferrara, 1740; p. 1817.

BARWICK, John, bar'-wik, an English divine, who exerted himself with singular dexterity in behalf of the royal cause during the civil war, for which he was committed by the parliamentarians to the Tower, where he remained a long time. At the Restoration, in producing which he had a considerable share, he obtained the deanery of Durham, which he afterwards exchanged for that of St. Paul's. n. at Witherlack, Westmoreland, 1612; p. 1664.

BARWICK, Peter, brother of the above, also favoured the royal cause; and, on the Restoration, was appointed physician to Charles II., and was assiduous in his duties at the time of the plague, being one of the few who did not desert his post. Of his writings, which are numerous, the most celebrated are those in defence of Dr. Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood; works which were received with considerable favour. n. 1619; p. 1694.

BARZZA, Gasparino, bar'-tseds'-ar, an Italian writer, who was one of the principal revivers of classical literature in Italy. Owing to his diligent research, three books of Cicero's "De Oratore," the treatise on Rhetori, and Quintilian's Orations, were rescued from oblivion. n. about 1870; p. 1431.

BAS. (See LE BAS.)

BASAITI, Marco del Friuli, bas'-saw-e'-le, an Italian painter, the rival of Bellini, whom he surpassed in composition, but not in colouring. His principal pictures are, the "Descent from the Cross," in the Gallery of Munich; a fine "Christ Praying in the Garden," in the church of St. Giobbe; and the "Calling of St. Peter and St. Andrew," in the Academy of Venice, which is considered one of the most beautiful pictures of that age. Lived between 1460 and 1530.

BASAN, Peter Francis, bi'-sawng, a French engraver and printseller. He compiled many catalogues of prints, and a dictionary of ancient and modern engravers, which, notwithstanding some faults, is the best yet published. An edition of this re-appeared in two volumes 8vo, in 1809. n. at Paris, 1723; p. 1797.

BASCHENIS, baw'-kal'-nes, an Italian priest and painter, who is famed for his representations of every kind of musical instrument, which he interspersed with inkstands and other objects with a truthfulness which has not yet been equalled: his productions are still highly esteemed. n. at Bergamo, 1617; p. 1677.

BASCHENOW, Wassili, bas'-ke-nov, a Russian architect, who studied at the academy of Moscow. He designed a model for the rebuilding of the Kremlin, and built the palace of Zarizin in the Gothic style, but this palace was destroyed soon afterwards by order of the empress Catherine II. n. at the commencement of the 18th century; p. 1798.

BASCHT, Matteo, baw'-ke, founder of the Capuchin Friars, was admitted at an early age into the order of St. Francis at Montefalcone, when, shocked at the abuses which had crept into this society, he set himself to restore the primitive discipline in all its original severity. For this purpose he gave out that St. Francis had appeared to him, clothed in a particular habit, which was surmounted by a hood, terminating in a peak called capuccio, and hence the designation of "Capuchins." Assuming this dress, he repaired to Rome, and obtained from Pope Clement VIII. permission to adopt the habit, and to observe literally the rule of St. Francis. This reform raised him many enemies, especially amongst the body of monks he left, who succeeded in getting him sent to prison, from which he was liberated by the Clement, and in 1522 appointed vicar general of the order. Two years after he resigned the appointment, and went about preaching for nearly twenty years. n. about the end of the 15th century; p. at Venice, 1532.

BASEDOW, John Bernard, bas'-e-dow, a German writer and philosopher, who made great efforts to reform education, and entered with zeal into the disputes concerning the truths of Christianity, avowing himself a sceptic. In 1774, under the patronage of Prince Francis of Anhalt-Dessau, he established the "Philanthropinum," a school which became the model of many others which afterwards arose, and produced a number of excellent teachers. At Magdeburg he also busied himself with the reformation of the system of instruction, and with some success. n. at Hamburg, 1723; p. at Magdeburg, 1790.—The principal of his works are "Philalethia; or, New Views into the Truths and Latin. This latter was an enlargement of the educational plan of J. J. Rousseau and Comenius.

BASEILHAC, John, la-sail'-hak, a celebrated French lithotomist, who studied surgery under his uncle at Lyons, after which he was admitted a student at the Hôtel-Dieu at Paris. Attracted by his talents, the archbishop of Bayeux appointed him his surgeon in ordinary, and built a hospital, which he confided to his care. In 1728 the archbishop died, leaving Baselihae a collection of surgical instruments, and a sufficient sum of money to enable him to be received as a master in surgery. He was, however, so grieved at the loss of his patron, that he repaired to Paris, and was admitted, in 1729, into the fraternity of the Feuillans, or Begging Friars, under the name of Frère Jean de St. Côme, but continued still to exercise his profession, and soon became celebrated in Paris. He took no recompense from the poor, and devoted the sums received from the rich to the support of a hospital near the Rue St. Honoré, which he established in 1753. Although Baselihae was eminent in every branch of his profession, he was particularly celebrated for his success in operations for the cure of stone and of cataract. In rectifying the first-named disorder, he used an instrument, which he had invented in 1743, known as "lithotome caché," and is said to have performed more than one thousand operations for this disease, and upwards of five hundred for cataract. Simple in his habits, sober in life, generous to the poor, and truly religious, Baselihae ranks amongst the most celebrated men of his time. n. at Poyastrac, near Tarbes, 1703; p. at Paris, 1761.

BASHKIN, Mattel Semenov, bas'-kin, the leader of an heretical sect at Moscow, which not only opposed the ordinances and ceremonies of the Greek church, but also the divinity of Christ. He was imprisoned by Ivan the Terrible, but recanted and gave up the names of his followers among the clergy and religious orders. Lived about the middle of the 16th century.

BASIL, bäs-il, a physician, the founder of a sect who asserted that God had another son besides Jesus Christ, called Euthaniel, who, having revolted against his Father, was, with his companions, cast down from heaven to earth; and that Jesus Christ being sent to destroy his power, shut him up in hell, and altered his name by cutting off the last syllable. His followers were allowed to have everything, even their wives, in common. By order of the emperor Alexius Comnenus, he was burnt alive in 1118.

BASIL, first bishop of Ancyra, was ordained to that office by the bishops of the Eusebians, in place of Marcellus, but was himself excommunicated, and his ordination annulled in the council of Sardica, in 347, though he still retained the see. In 351 he attended the second council of Sirmium, where he disputed successfully against Photinus. He was one of the greatest enemies to the Arians, but considered the head of the Semi-Arians; and procured their opinions to be established by a council held at Ancyra in 353. He was deposed in 360. D. 362.

BASIL, ST., surnamed THE GREAT, bishop of Cæsarea, was ordained by Eusebius, whom he succeeded in 370. He was persecuted by the emperor Valens, because he would not embrace Arianism. The best edition of his works was published by the Benedictines of St. Maur, 3 vols. folio, Paris, 1721-30. B. 326; D. 379.

BASIL, archbishop of Thessalonica, generally known as ASCHOLIUS or ACHOLIUS. He baptized Theodosius on the occasion of a fit of illness, 880, and was the beloved friend of St. Ambrose. D. 384.

BASILISCUS, bäs-e-lis'-kus, emperor of the East, was brother to Verina, wife of the emperor Leo I., by whose means he was appointed to the command of a fleet sent against Genseric, king of the Vandals, who had conquered Africa; the greater part, however, of his fleet and army perished, and he fell into disgrace. At the death of Leo, he conspired against his successor Zeno, and succeeded in placing himself on the throne in 475; but subsequently Zeno defeated him and entered Constantinople, putting Basiliscus into confinement, where he died, 477.

BASILISUS, or BASIL, *ba-sil'-e-us, surnamed the "Macedonian," rose to be emperor of the East, though originally a common soldier. His conduct recommended him to the emperor Michael III., who made him his equerry and chamberlain. He accused Bardas of conspiring against the emperor, and afterwards assassinated him in the emperor's tent, and was made by Michael his colleague in the empire, in 866. Basiliscus remonstrating with the emperor for his cruelty, Michael attempted to depose him; but he anticipated his design, and one evening, when he retired intoxicated, murdered him in his bed, 867. His conduct on the throne was wise and equitable. He reformed the abuses in the state, defeated the Saracens in Asia, and carried the arms of the empire beyond the Euphrates in 872. He entered into a treaty with the Russians of Kiev, and sent them an archbishop; from which time the Russians acknowledged the authority of the Greek Church. B. at Adrianople, 813; D. from a blow by a stag while hunting, 886.

BASILISUS II. succeeded John Zimisces in 976. He was the son of Romanus the younger, and was associated in the government with his brother Constantine. He turned his arms against the Bulgarians, over whom he obtained a great victory in 1014; but treated his prisoners with horrid barbarity, dividing them into hundreds, and then putting out the eyes of ninety-nine, left the hundredth with one eye to guide the rest. In this condition they were sent to their king, Samuel, who was so horrified that he died two days after. B. 953; D. 1025.

BASILEWITZ, John, emperor of Russia. (See IVAN.)

BASKERVILLE, John, bäs'-ker-vil, a celebrated printer, who, in 1736, kept a writing-school in Birmingham. He subsequently engaged in the jannpanning business, and became possessed of considerable property. In 1750 he turned printer and letter-founder, in which he was most successful. His types were purchased by a society in Paris, in 1779, who made use of them in printing an edition of Voltaire's works. B. at Wolverley, Worcestershire, 1708; D. 1775.—His works now possess a high value, especially his editions of some of the classics, which are greatly esteemed both in this country and on the continent.

BASKADJI, bas-mad'-je, "The Printer," the surname bestowed upon IBRAHIM EFFENDI, an Hungarian, who, having become a convert to Mohammedanism, was the first to introduce printing into Turkey, he having, under the patronage of Said-Effendi, established a printing press at Constantinople, in 1778, under the sanction of the Sultan Achmet III. Ibrahim continued to superintend the establishment till his death, in 1746, but only produced sixteen works during that time. The original office is still in existence.

BASQUE, Michael le, bas', a famous buccaneer, who, in connexion with L'Olonnais, took, about 1680, the towns of Maracaibo and Gibraltar, in the Gulf of Venezuela; the plunder amounting to upwards of 400,000 crowns.

BASS, George, bäs, the discoverer of Bass Strait, between Australia and Tasmania, was a surgeon on board H.M.S. Reliance. With Captain Flinders in a small boat, called Tom Thumb, with only one boy, Bass doubled the heads of Botany Bay, and explored George's River, and afterwards Port Jackson River. In 1797, being furnished with greater resources, he made further explorations, and in 1798 determined the existence of the strait which now goes by his name. He died, it is said, somewhere in America, and received, for his discoveries, carried out with so few advantages, neither distinction nor reward.

BASSANI, John Baptist, bas'-za'-ne, a musical composer of the 17th century, and master of the famous Corelli. His compositions, consisting of six operas and thirty-one other pieces, range from 1680 to 1703, and are characterized as pure and pathetic. B. at Padua, about 1657. D. 1716.

BASSANO, James, bas'-za'-no, called THE OLD, an Italian painter, who excelled in landscape, and whose works are held in high estimation. Three of his sons were eminent artists. Francis put an end to himself in 1593; Leander was knighted; John Baptist imitated the manner of his father; Jerome, another son, was educated for a physician, but became a painter also. B. at Bassano, 1510; D. at Venice, 1592.

BASSANTIN, James, bäs'-an-tin, a Scotch astronomer, who was educated first at Glasgow, and afterwards at Paris, where he became teacher of mathematics. B. about 1504; D. 1563.—On his return to Scotland in 1563, he had an inter-

BASSI, Laura, baw'-ee, a learned Italian lady, was famed for her knowledge in philosophy, mathematics, and literature. Her singular attainments procured her, when twenty-one years of age, the title of doctor of philosophy.
In 1745 she read lectures upon experimental philosophy, and continued to do so till her death. In 1738 she married Dr. Verati, and preserved an excellent character by the practice of every virtue. B. at Bologna, 1711; D. 1778.

BASTA, George, bas'-ta, a soldier and military writer of the 16th century, served under the duke of Parma, and distinguished himself in 1566, by provisioning the town of La Fère, which was besieged by Henry IV. Afterwards he was engaged by the emperor, to whom he rendered signal services in Hungary and Transylvania, and was made a count. B. at Rocca; D. 1607.
—He wrote two works on military discipline.

BASTIAT, Frederick, bas'-te-a, a distinguished French economist and advocate of free trade, was born at Bayonne, June 19, 1801, and educated at Saint Sever and Sorèze. He subsequently embraced commerce as an occupation, visited England about 1845, and published several works on economic subjects, the most important of which are his "Economic Sophisms," "Property and Law," "Protectionism and Communism," "Capital and Rent," "Harmonies of Economics," &c. D. Dec. 24, 1850. He was a member of the Legislative Assembly after the revolution of 1848.

BASTIDE, Jules, ba'-teed, an eminent French politician and journalist of the republican school, was an active member of the Carbonari, and a determined opponent of the institution of monarchy after the revolution of July, 1830, and continued, though defeated on that occasion, to advocate his opinions with great energy and force. He conducted the "National," in conjunction with Armand Carrel and Armand Marrast; and, later, the "Revue National," along with Buchez. His best work is on the "Religious wars in France." B. at Paris in 1800.

BASTON, Robert, bas'-ton, a monk, a prior of the convent of Carmelites at Scarborough, and poet-laureate and public orator at Oxford, flourished in the 14th century. When Edward II. invaded Scotland, in 1304, he took Baston with him, in order that he might celebrate the victories to be won there, but the result of the battle of Bannockburn, where he was taken prisoner, compelled the poet to change his note, and instead of singing the triumphs of Edward, he celebrated those of Bruce. He wrote a volume of tragedies and comedies in English, and several pieces, in Latin, on the wars of Scotland, together with satires on the luxuries of the priests, sermons, &c. D. about 1310.

BASTWICK, John, bäst-wik, an English physician, who attacked the Church of England in several publications, for which he lost his ears in the pillory, and was sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in the Selly Isles. In 1610 he was released by the Parliament, and had a reward of £5000 allowed him out of the archbishop of Canterbury's estates. B. at Writtle, Essex, 1593; D. about 1650.

BATE, George, bait, a writer and doctor, who became principal physician to Charles I. at Oxford. During the civil war he resided in London, where he was highly esteemed, and in 1651 attended Cromwell. At the Restoration he was made physician to the king, and elected a fellow of the Royal Society. Dr. Bate wrote a history of the civil wars in Latin, and some tracts on physical subjects. B. at Mad: Morton, Buckinghamshire, 1603; D. in London, 1685.—Bate was charged with administering some potion to Cromwell which produced his death.

BATHMAN, Thomas, an English physician, distinguished for his great labours in the cause of medical science, principally connected with diseases of the skin. B. at Whitby, 1778; D. 1821.
—He is the author of several medical works, some of which have been translated into French and German.

BATES, William, bait, an English nonconformist divine, who was one of the commissioners at the Savoy conference for revising the liturgy, and was offered the deanery of Lichfield, which he refused. B. 1625; D. at Hackney, 1699. His theological works were collected and published in one volume folio, after his death. He published the "Lives of Learned and Pious Men," in one volume 4to, 1681, Latin.—Bates is considered the politest writer, if not the best scholar, of the whole body of ministers who, in 1662, on the passing of the Act of Uniformity, seceded from the church, and founded what is called the Dissenting interest.

BATHORI, Stephen, ba-to'-re, king of Poland, who was sovereign prince of Transylvania, and was elected to the throne of Poland in the place of Henry of Valois. He reformed many abuses, and defeated the Russians, who were forced to cede Courland and a part of Livonia to the Poles. D. at Grodno, 1586. Others of his family succeeded him.

BATHURST, Allen, Earl, bäth'-urst, an eminent statesman, who was a zealous opposer of the measures of Sir Robert Walpole. In 1742 he was admitted of the Privy Council; in 1757 was appointed treasurer to the Prince of Wales, obtaining, at the accession of George III., a pension of £2000 a year; and in 1772 was created Earl Bathurst. B. in Westminster, 1654; D. near Cirencester, 1775.—His son Henry was, in 1771, created Lord Apsley, and made lord chancellor, and afterwards president of the council under Lord North. b. 1714; d. 1794.

BATHURST, Ralph, M.D., an uncle of Earl Bathurst, was born in 1620. He studied first for the church, but changed his career for that of medicine, and was, after the breaking out of the civil war, appointed physician to the State. At the Restoration he again abandoned physic, and resumed divinity; was elected a fellow of Trinity College, Oxford; entered into holy orders, was appointed chaplain to the king, dean of Wells, vice-chancellor of Oxford, and was even offered the bishopric of Bristol, by William and Mary, but this he declined. He was an accomplished philosopher, orator, poet, and wit—his powers of ridicule being so great that he used no other means of correcting the delinquents of his college. Some poetical pieces by him were printed in the "Musæ Anglicanæ," and are excellent of their kind. He wrote both in Latin and English. b. 1704, aged 84.

BATONI, Pompeo, baw-to'-ne, an Italian painter, whose pieces are celebrated for their truthfulness, character, and colouring, and of which the most admired is "Simon the Sorcerer contending with St. Peter." b. at Lucca, 1703; d. at Rome, 1787.

BATTAGLINI, Mark, baw'-tal-le'-ne, bishop of Cesena, wrote a History of Councils, 1696, folio, and "Annales du Sacerdoce et de l'Empire du XVII. Siècle," 1701 to 1711, 4 vols. folio. b. 1645; d. at Cesena, 1717.

BAUDET, Stephen, bo'-dai, a French engraver, whose chief work is a print of Adam and Eve, from a painting by Domenichino. b. at Blois, 1643; d. 1716.

BAUER, Bruno, baw'-er, a modern German biblical critic and political writer, who at an early age commenced his theological disquisitions by reviewing Strauss' "Life of Jesus," and other works. Many of his writings contain very bold and speculative opinions, and one of them, "Christianity Unveiled," was destroyed in 1843, at Zurich, before its publication. In his "Review of the Epistles attributed to St. Paul," he argues that the four leading ones were not written by the apostle, but are the production of the 2nd century. b. at Eisenberg, 1809.

BAUJIN, Jean and Gaspard, brothers, baw'-i, two distinguished botanists, were born at Bâle, Jean in 1541, and Gaspard in 1560. They were both educated for the medical profession, in which they attained considerable eminence; but their favourite study was botany, to the advancement of which science their researches and writings greatly contributed. Jean died in 1613, and Gaspard in 1624.

BAUMGARTEN, Alexander Theophilus, bawm-yar'-ten, a German philosopher, who studied at Halle, and became professor of philosophy there, and afterwards at Frankfort on the Oder. b. at Berlin, 1714; d. at Frankfort on the Oder, 1762.—Baumgarten may be considered as the creator of the æsthetic, or of the philosophy of the beautiful. He wrote "Metaphysica" 8vo; "Ethica Philosophica," 8vo; "Æsthetica Initia Philosophiæ practicæ primæ."—His brother Sigismund was a distinguished divine of the Lutheran church, and professor of theology at Halle. He died in 1757.

ings and landscapes are very excellent. b. 1600; d. at Vienna, 1640.

BAUR, Frederick Wilhelm von, a Russian engineer-general, who engaged early in military life; and in 1755 was in the British service, as an officer in the Hessian Artillery. In 1757 he obtained the rank of general and engineer. Frederick II. of Prussia ennobled him. In 1769 he entered into the service of Catherine II., empress of Russia, and was employed against the Turks. The empress had a high notion of his talents, and employed him in making the aqueduct of Tsarskoe-Selo, to supply Moscow with water, and in deepening the canal near St. Petersburg, at the end of which he constructed a large harbour, and other important undertakings. b. at Bieber, 1735; d. at St. Petersburg, 1783.—Baur had for his secretary the celebrated Kotzebue, who directed in his name the German theatre at St. Petersburg.

BAUTAT, William, bo'-troo, member of the French Academy, and a celebrated wit. b. at Angers, 1583; d. at Paris, 1665.

BAVIUS and MÆVIUS, bav'-ve-us, mæ'-ve-us, two stupid and malevolent poets, in the age of Augustus, who attacked the superior talents of contemporary writers, and have therefore become immortalized by the satire and ridicule which they drew upon themselves.

BAXTER, Richard, bax'-ter, a celebrated non-conformist divine, who in 1638 was ordained by Bishop Thornborough, and two years later was chosen vicar of Kidderminster; but, on the breaking out of the civil war, he became suspicious of the designs of the Parliament, and resolved to repair instantly to the army and use his utmost endeavours to bring back the soldiers to the principles of loyalty to the king and submission to the Church. There was a grand sense of duty abroad in the breasts of the men of the 17th century. The moral as well as military heroism which sprung from this high sense makes us overlook, yea, almost forget, much of the violence by which many of their actions were crimsoned. Baxter, however, belonged to the church; but, so strong was the sense of duty in him, that when Cromwell was declared Protector, he bravely withstood him to the face, telling him that "the honest people of the land took their ancient monarchy to be a blessing and not an evil." His sympathies, however, being with the Parliament, he became chaplain to Colonel Whalley's regiment. Whilst officiating in this capacity, he wrote his "Saint's Rest;" and was present at the taking of Bridgewater, and the sieges of Exeter, Bristol, and Worcester. Ill-health compelling him to leave the army, he, in 1657, returned to Kidderminster. Before his appointment to Whalley's regiment, however, he had passed some time at Coventry, officiating in the ministry; and he had even preached within hearing of the sound of cannon, when the roll of battle was passing over Edgehill. At the Restoration it was expected that moderation would have pervaded the councils of the nation, and that a form of ecclesiastical government that should reconcile all parties would be established; but this was not the case, and the Act of Uniformity of 1662 drove Baxter from the church. He now occupied himself with literary composition, and his "Call to the Unconverted" was one of the fruits of this retirement. In 1672, when the flames of religious persecution, which had run over the land, began to expire, he once more came forth from his retreat. He settled in London, and preached usually at Pinners' Hall and in a chapel in Fetter Lane. He now occupied without fear and without reproach an ancestry of warriors, most of whom fell on various mental bait His fat while he was suffering from indisposition, and he was only saved from being dragged to a prison by the accidental interposition of his physician. Two years later he became one of the victims of the sanguinary Jeffreys. He was apprehended on a charge of sedition, and for being hostile to episcopacy. His trial took place in 1684-5. On this occasion Jeffreys declared, "I will not give him a moment's time more to save his life. Yonder stands (ates in the pillory with him. I would say two greatest rogues and rascals in the kingdom stood there." When Baxter made an attempt to speak, the lord chief justice exclaimed, "Richard! Richard! dost thou think we'll hear thee poison the court? Richard, thou art an old fellow, an old knave; thou hast written books enough to load a cart. Hadst thou been whipped out of thy writing trade forty years ago, thou hadst been happy." The result was a fine of 500 marks, imprisonment till paid, and bonds for good behaviour for seven years. Lord Powis, however, stepped in, got the fine remitted, and Baxter was liberated in eighteen months. He lived for five years after this, preaching the gospel without molestation. a. in Shropshire, 1615; b. in London, 1691, and was buried in Christ Church.—The fame of this persevering, brave-spirited, and long-enduring man rests principally upon his two popular treatises, "The Saint's Everlasting Rest," and "A Call to the Unconverted."

BAXTER, William, nephew of the above, who was celebrated for his proficiency in the classics and his antiquarian research, was appointed master of the Mercers' School in London. He published a grammar of the Latin tongue in 1685; an edition of Anacreon in 1695; an edition of Horace in 1700.

Roman Antiquities was first printed in 1723. a. at Llanugan, Shropshire, 1650; b. 1723.

BAXTER, Andrew, an ingenious writer on metaphysics, was the son of a merchant in Old Aberdeen, where he was born in 1686 or 1687, and was educated at King's College. His life was spent in the capacity of tutor to young gentlemen of rank, and among his pupils were the lords Blantyre and Gray, and other youths of good family. His leisure was occupied in metaphysical speculations, which he embodied principally in a work called "An Inquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul," which went through several editions, and in which he deduces the immateriality of the soul from reason and philosophy. He travelled much on the continent, especially in Germany, and was the friend and correspondent of such opposite characters as Wilkes and Dr. Warburton, bishop of Gloucester. He was much esteemed for the uprightness, benevolence, and candour of his disposition. b. at Whittingham, East Lothian, in 1747.

BAYARD, Peter, Chevalier de, bai-yar, the celebrated French warrior, and called "the arms, Bayard, at 13 years old, was placed in the house of the duke of Savoy, where he remained for five years. On the completion of his eighteenth year, he entered upon the actual duties of a soldier. The first battle at which he fought was that of Fornovo, in 1494, under the banner of Charles VIII.; and the chivalric spirit of his ancestors, it was evident, had found a fitting representative in the young hero. Two horses were killed under him in that battle; and he himself performed feat that procured him the approbation of all who beheld him. Several years after this he was engaged in the Italian wars of Louis XII., when, on one occasion, it is said that he held a bridge over the Gurigliano, single-handed, against 200 Spaniards, and enabled the main body of the French to make good their retreat. In 1513 he fought at the famous battle of the Spurs, in Picardy, where his valour saved the whole French army from disaster. In this field, also, fought Henry VIII. of England, then a young man, but commanding in person the English force. On this occasion Bayard surrendered to an English knight, but was soon exchanged. In the battle of Marignano, fought September 13th, 1515, Bayard displayed his usual valour, against the count of Nassau, with a force of 35,000 men, assisted by a powerful artillery. In 1524, whilst fighting against the Imperialists in Italy, he continued to display his usual romantic valour until he fell from his horse, wounded by a ball. In this condition he was pressed to withdraw from the field; but answering that he never turned his back upon an enemy, desired that he might be placed with his back against a tree, that he might watch the varying fortunes of the fight; and he there sunk under his wound. a. in Dauphiny, 1478; b. in battle, by the Sesia, 1524.—The marquis of Pescara, who on this occasion commanded the Spanish troops, caused the body of Bayard to be embalmed and sent to his relations. When it drew near the country of his birth, people of all ranks came forth to meet it.

BAYER, Johann, bai'-er, a German astronomer, who, in 1603, published an excellent work, entitled "Uranometria," being a celestial atlas, or folio charts of all the constellations. He was the first to distinguish the stars by the letters of the Greek alphabet, and according to the order of the magnitude of the stars in each constellation. This work was republished, with great improvements by the author, in 1627, under a new title, viz., "Cælum Stellarum Christianum." a. at Augsburg, in Bavaria, about the year 1572; b. 1660.

BAYER, Gottlieb Siegfried, grandson of above, a learned philologist, who acquired a great knowledge of the eastern languages, particularly the Chinese. In 1717 he was appointed librarian at Königsberg; and in 1726 was invited to St. Petersburg, where he was made professor of Greek and Roman antiquities. His "Museum BAYLE, Peter, bail, a celebrated French writer, author of the well-known "Historical and Critical Dictionary," was educated for the ministry among the Protestants; but while attending the Jesuits' college, became a Roman Catholic. Shortly afterwards, however, returning to his former communion, he went to Geneva, where he formed an intimacy with Basnage. He was subsequently appointed to the chair of philosophy at Sedan; but when that academy was suppressed, in 1681, he removed to Rotterdam, and was chosen professor of philosophy and history there. In 1684 he began a literary journal entitled "Nouvelles de la République des Lettres," which obtained great celebrity. In 1693 he was deprived of his professorship; and in two years afterwards appeared the first volume of his greatest work, "The Historical and Critical Dictionary," which quickly reached a second edition. B. at Carlat, in Foix, 1647; p. 1706.— Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote, "Thoughts on Comets," "A Criticism on Maimbourg's History of Calvinism," "A Philosophical Comment on the words of Christ, 'Compel them to come in,' &c. His writings, however, are generally allowed to betray no small portion of scepticism on religious subjects.

BATTE, Moses, one of the leaders of the Montagnards and Terrorists of the first French revolution, among whom he was distinguished for his violence and determination. He strongly defended the massacres of the 2nd of September; was president of the Convention in 1793; was a firm friend of Robespierre, whom he had the courage to defend after his fall; and when it was proposed to prosecute Barère, Collot-d'Herbois, and others, he refused to be separated from them. He ultimately submitted to the ascendancy of Napoleon, held a small office in the police, but was always more or less connected with the restless demagogues of the period. He died in 1815 in great poverty.

BAYLY, Lewis, bail-le, an eminent prelate, educated at Oxford, who was ordained bishop of Bangor, 1616, and is celebrated for his well-known work, entitled, "The Practice of Piety." B. at Carnarthen, about 1565; p. 1632.

BAYTUN, Admiral Sir William Henry, G.C.B. bain'-tun, a distinguished naval officer, was the son of a gentleman who held the office of British consul at Algiers, and who, after taking part in the capture of Martinique in 1794, of Trinidad in 1797, on all which occasions he greatly distinguished himself, was commander of the ship Reunion when she was wrecked in the Severn, in December 7, 1796. He subsequently served in the West Indies; and in the Leviathan joined Nelson in the pursuit of the combined French and Spanish fleets, and was fortunate enough to be present in the memorable battle of Trafalgar on the 21st of October, 1805, where, after breaking the enemy's line, and being hotly engaged with several ships, among which the huge Santissima Trinidad was one, he came to close quarters with the Saint Augustin, and quickly compelled her to strike. In the latter part of the same year, he accompanied the expedition under Admiral Murray and General Crauford, originally intended for the reduction of Chili, but afterwards sent to the La Plata, where, although the success of the expedition was marred by the unmethodical way in which it was conducted by the commander-in-chief, General Whitelocke, the most efficient aid was given by the naval squadron. Bayntun attained the honour of a flag, August 12, 1812, was made K.C.B. in 1839, received a medal and a pension of £300 a year for good service, and died at Bath, December 16, 1840, aged 75.

BEALE, Mary, beel, an English portrait-painter, who copied with great exactness the works of Sir Peter Lely and Vandyke. B. 1631; p. 1697.

BEATON, David, be'-ton, a cardinal, and archbishop of St. Andrew's, in Scotland. In 1519 he was appointed resident at the court of France, and in 1523 he obtained the rich abbey of Arbroath. In 1528 he was made lord privy seal, and negotiated the marriage of James V. with Princess Magdalen of France, and afterwards with Princess Mary. Paul III. raised him to the cardinalate in 1538; about which time he was made primate of Scotland. On the death of the king, the lords of the council sent the cardinal to prison, whence he was released, not long after, by the regent, and made chancellor. He persecuted the Protestants with great fury; and, among others, caused the celebrated Wishart to be burnt before his own palace. B. 1494; fell by the hands of assassins, 1546.

BEATON, James, the uncle of the cardinal, was likewise an eminent divine and statesman. He was successively abbot of Dumfermline, bishop of Galloway, and archbishop of Glasgow and of St. Andrew's, and held the political offices of lord-treasurer, chancellor, and president of the council of regency during the absence of the duke of Albany in France, while James V. was a minor. The nobility was split up into two factions, at the head of one being Albany, the king's uncle, who had been chosen regent by the parliament of the kingdom, and at that of the other the earl of Angus, husband of the queen-mother and head of the powerful house of Douglas. Beaton espoused the interests of Albany, and was the principal stay of the party, the duke himself being a man of mild temperament, and little fitted for those turbulent times. It was customary for the adherents of each faction to enter into a bond pledging themselves to support, by every means in their power, the interests of their leaders and friends. Beaton had entered into such a compact with the noblemen of his party, and Angus, alleging that he had good reason to believe that it contained a plot against his life, sent his uncle, Gawin Douglas, the learned bishop of Dunkeld, to remonstrate with the archbishop and his friends. Gawin boldly charged them with the crime of intended assassination, on which Beaton protested his innocence "on his conscience," striking his breast at the same time to give force to his assertion. The blow caused the coat of mail which he wore beneath his cassock to ring. "Alas, my lord," exclaimed bishop Gawin, "I perceive your conscience is unsound. Did you not hear it clatter?" In a subsequent affray between the partisans of the rival factions, Beaton was attacked, had to take refuge at the altar, and was only saved from massacre by the interference of bishop Gawin Douglas. Beaton was an able, learned, skilful, but bold and unscrupulous man, much better fitted for the cares of state than for the cure of souls. His whole life nearly was passed in the midst of political intrigue and turmoil, and he made himself particularly useful to both James IV. and James V. in resisting and curbing the overweening pride and power of the great barons. He was determinedly opposed to the reformed doctrines in religion, which were then making way in Scotland; and several persons, among them Patrick Hamilton and Henry Forrest, suffered martyrdom at his instance. After James V. broke loose from the control of his father-in-law, and

"Douglas of the stalwart hand
Was exiled from his native land,"

Beaton was the chief counsellor of the young king, by whom he was entrusted with some of the most important affairs of state, in the conduct of which, if he was not always just and forbearing to his opponents, he cannot be accused of incapacity or want of zeal. He died in 1539.

BEATON, James, a nephew of the cardinal, was also archbishop of Glasgow, and, under his uncle's auspices, took part in the government of the state, and in other public employments. He likewise had his share in the troubles of the time, the old feud between the Beatons and the Douglasses having been handed down to him, with the addition of an equally bitter quarrel with the earl of Arran. In consequence of these disputes, and the growing influence of the adherents of the reformed doctrines, he was compelled, in 1560, to flee to France, where he long acted as ambassador, both of the unfortunate Mary and of her son James VI. He was not only a learned man himself, but a great patron and encourager of learning in others, and contributed materially to extend the Scots College in Paris, where he died in 1603. These famous churchmen were sprung from the old family of the Beatons, of Bethunes, of Balfour, in Fifeshire, a race which has still landed representatives in that country.

BEATSON, Robert, Beet-son, author and compiler of several useful works, among which are "A Poetical Index to the Histories of Great Britain and Ireland;" "N. N. Memoirs of Great Britain Register of both Houses of 1807," &c. He was in the army in early life, and for several years held the office of barrack-master at Aberdeen, from the university of which he received the degree of LL.D. B. 1742; D. 1818.

BEATTIE, James, LL.D., be-te, a distinguished Scotch writer, was the son of a shopkeeper and farmer, who sent him to the University of Aberdeen, where he pursued his studies with so much success as to receive a bursary, which is equivalent to an exhibition or scholarship in the English universities. After following the profession of a schoolmaster for some time, and publishing a volume of poems and other works, he, in 1771, produced the first canto of his poem called "The Minstrel," which was received with great favour. He was now admitted to the friendship of Dr. Johnson, Garrick, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and other celebrities of the period. Previous to the appearance of "The Minstrel," he had published an "Essay on Truth," designed to stem, if possible, the tide of infidelity which the philosophic speculations of David Hume were then diffusing over the land. For this he received, in 1773, a substantial token of the royal favour in a pension of £200 a year. The second canto of "The Minstrel" appeared in 1774, and was as enthusiastically received as the first. He had now been sixteen years professor of moral philosophy and logic in Marischal College, Aberdeen, an appointment which he retained until a short period before his death. B. at Laurencekirk, Scotland, 1735; D. 1803.—Beattie wrote several other works, which were much thought of in his day; but his time rests principally on his "Minstrel," which was designed to trace the progress of a poetical genius, from the first dawning of fancy and reason till that period at which he may be supposed capable of appearing in the world as a minstrel.

BEATTIE, James Hay, eldest son of the above, was a youth of great promise, being unusually pious and talented. He was a good musician, performing well on the organ and violin, and succeeded in building an organ for himself. B. at Aberdeen, 1763; D. November 19, 1790.

BEATES RHEMANUS, be-ai-rus re-ma-nus, a learned man, whose name was Bilde, which he altered to Rhenanus, from the place of his nativity, Rheinaeh. He was a profound scholar, and was the first who published the History of Velleius Paterculus. He also edited the works of Tertullian, adding valuable notes, which he likewise did to several other classical works. D. at Strasburg, 1547.

BEAT, Charles le, le(r) bo, a French writer, was professor in the Royal College, and secretary of the Academy of Inscriptions. B. 1701; D. at Paris, 1778.—He is the author of a "History of the Lower Empire," in 22 vols. 12mo, and also of "Opera Latina," 3 vols. 12mo.—A brother, John Louis le Beau, was the editor of an edition of Homer in Greek and Latin.

BEAUCARE DE PEGUTILLON, Francis, bo-kair, a bishop of Metz, who, at the council of Trent, pleaded with great eloquence in favour of reformation in the church. He afterwards resigned his bishopric, went into retirement, and wrote his "Rerum Gallicarum Commentaria, ab anno 1461 ad annum 1562." B. 1514; D. 1581.

BEAUCLERK, Lord Aubrey, bo-clerk, son of the first duke of St. Albans, was a brave and the Prince Frederick, in 1740.

BEAUFORT, Cardinal Henry, bo-fort, bishop of Winchester and cardinal of St. Eusebius, was an illegitimate son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, the father of Henry IV., by Catherine Swynford. He assumed the guardianship of Henry VI. in opposition to Humphry, duke of Gloucester, who was the nominal head of the council of regency which took the reins of government on the death of Henry V. In 1429, after several years of determined rivalry, the cardinal succeeded in destroying the power of the duke, and had the young king crowned. Notwithstanding this circumstance, the hostility between them continued until the death of the duke of Gloucester, which took place on the 28th of February, 1447. The cardinal survived him only six weeks, and died, according to Shakespeare's delineation, in an agony of despair—

"Lord Cardinal, if thou think'st on heaven's bliss,

Hold up thy hand, make signal of thy hope.
He dies, and makes no sign."

His last words to those by whom his deathbed was surrounded were, "I pray you all to pray for me." B. about 1370; D. 1447.—He was buried in the elegant chantry which bears his name in Winchester Cathedral.

BEAUFORT, Margaret, countess of Richmond and Derby, was the daughter and heiress of John, duke of Somerset, and married Edmund

Tudor, earl of Richmond, by whom she had a son, afterwards Henry VII. Her first husband dying in 1455, she married Sir Henry Stafford, by whom she had no issue; and on his death she became the wife of Thomas Lord Stanley, afterwards earl of Derby. b. 1441; d. 1509, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. She distinguished herself as an authoress, and founded Christ's and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge.

BEAUFORT, Francis de Vendôme, duke of, the son of Caesar, duke of Vendôme, was imprisoned on the charge of conspiring against Cardinal Mazarin, but escaping, began a civil war, which soon ended. He was subsequently made admiral of France, and in 1665 defeated the Turkish fleet near Tunis. b. 1616; killed at the siege of Candia, 1669.

BEAUFORT, Louis de, a learned writer, who was chosen fellow of the Royal Society of London, and is the author of the "History of Germanicus," "Dissertations upon the Uncertainty of the First Five Ages of the Roman Republic," "History of the Roman Republic; or, Plan of the Ancient Government of Rome." d. at Maestricht, 1793.

BEAUHARNAIS, Eugène de, bo-har'-nai, was the son of Josephine, the first wife of Napoleon I., and of Vicomte Alexandre de Beauharnais, who, in his 34th year, suffered on the revolutionary scaffold at Paris. Eugène entered the army, and under the eye of Napoleon fought in the campaigns of Italy, and also went with him to Egypt, where he acted as his aide-de-camp. As a matter of course, he rose to rank with his years, and with the fortunes of Napoleon I., and fought in the Consular Guards at Marengo. When Napoleon assumed the emperorship, he was created a prince, and in 1805 was appointed viceroy of the kingdom of Italy. In the following year he was adopted by Napoleon, and married to the daughter of the king of Bavaria. When, in 1809, the war between Austria and France broke out, he was actively engaged, being placed in command of the French and Italian army, and displayed great knowledge of his profession. He was with the emperor in the Russian campaign of 1812; and during the retreat, after Napoleon and Murat had left the army, he took the chief command. At the battle of Lutzen he commanded the left of the new army which the emperor had raised. He adhered to Napoleon so long as fortune lent a ray of hope, but, on the final ruin of his patron, he retired with his family to Bavaria, and during the remainder of his life lived principally at Munich, with the title of Prince of Leuchtenberg. b. at Paris, 1781; d. at Munich, 1824.

BEAULIEU, Sebastian Pontault de, bole-yu(r), a French engineer and field-marshal under Louis XIV., and the author of "Views and Plans of the Sieges and Battles of Louis XIV." d. 1674.

BEAULIEU, John Peter, Baron de, an Austrian general, who was actively engaged as an artillery officer during the Seven Years' War, and in 1792 commanded the Austrians against the forces which the French republic sent into the Netherlands, and gained several victories over them. In 1796 he was commander-in-chief in Italy, where his army was routed in several conflicts with General Bonaparte, whose fame was then beginning to dawn. b. 1725; d. 1820.

BEAUMARCHAIS, Peter Augustin Caron de, bo-mär'-shai, a celebrated French writer, was the son of a clockmaker at Paris, and applying himself to the same trade, was the inventor of a new escapement, which brought him into notice at the French court, where he became a great favourite with the daughters of Louis XVI., having great musical talent, and playing exceedingly well on the flute and harp, which latter instrument he much improved. He now became acquainted with Duverney, the rich farmer-general, and at his death was involved in lawsuits with his heir, gaining great notoriety from the wit, satire, and reasoning which distinguished his pleadings and memorials. He is best known to the world, however, by his being the author of several comedies, of which "The Barber of Seville" and "The Marriage of Figaro" are the best; the latter meeting with immense success. b. at Paris, 1732; d. 1790.

BEAUMONT, Francis, bo-mont, a distinguished dramatist, of whose life very little is known. His grandfather was a master of the Rolls, and his father, Francis, one of the judges of the court of Common Pleas. He himself became a member of the Inner Temple, but from the shortness of his life, and the great number of his productions, it is to be presumed that he devoted very little of his time to the study of law. He tells us himself, in an epistle, that he was intimate with rare Ben Jonson, whom, with other wits of the period, he would seem to have been in the habit of meeting at the Mermaid tavern. Here he would, no doubt, also see William Shakespeare; but how or where he became acquainted with his friend Fletcher, who was ten years older than himself, we have no means of knowing. It is beautiful, in retrospect, to contemplate the friendship of these two celebrated dramatists. Their affection for each other appears, in every respect, to have been of the closest kind; they lived in the same house, and, it is affirmed, held their worldly goods in common; and although their geniuses would seem to have been cast in different moulds, yet how well and how sweetly do they amalgamate! "I have heard," says Aubrey, "Dr. John Erle (since bishop of Sarum), who knew them, say that Beaumont's main business was to correct the overflowings of Fletcher's wit." But be this as it may, the names of Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher will, as long as the English language shall last, be associated as two of the brightest ornaments of our dramatic literature. b. in Leicestershire, 1586; d. in London, 1616, being not quite thirty.—His brother, Sir John Beaumont, was also a poet of some merit, being an excellent versifier, but deficient in vigour and invention. b. 1582; d. 1629.

BEAUMONT, Jean Baptist Armand Louis Leonce Elie de, bo-mawny, an eminent French geologist, who has done more, perhaps, for the advancement of the science of geology than any man living. He succeeded Arago as secretary of the Academy of Sciences in 1853, and, as a testimony to his striking talent, was made by Napoleon III. a senator, and decorated with the grand cross of the Legion of Honour. He has written many works on mines and mining, and geology. b. at Canon, Calvados, 1798.

BEAUNE, Florimond de, bone, a French mathematician, who discovered a method of determining the nature of curves by the properties of their triangles. b. at Blois, 1601; d. 1652.

BEAUNE, James de, baron of Samblançay, was superintendent of the finances under Francis I., and lent to the queen-mother a sum of 300,000 crowns, which had been sent to Lautrec to pay his troops, and for want of which the expedition to relieve Milan failed. The queen-mother bribed his secretary, Gentil, to deliver to her the receipts she had given, which being the only testimonies poor Samblancay had, he was accused of having applied the money to his own use, and was hanged in 1527. The fraud was afterwards discovered, and his secretary, Gentil, hanged.

BEAURAIN, John de, bo'-rā, a celebrated geographer at the court of Louis XV., who constructed a number of charts, and published a topographical and military description of the campaigns of Marshal Luxembourg, from 1690 to 1698. b. at Aix-en-Essart, 1696; d. 1772.

BEAUREGARD, Peter Gustave Toussaint, bo'-ro-gar, a general in the service of the Confederate States of America, who defeated the Federal army at Bull Run in 1861, and defended Charleston, South Carolina, during a siege of many months' duration against the Federal forces. b. near New Orleans, 1818.

BEAUVILLIERS, Francis de, bo'-vil'-e-ai, Duke of St. Aignan, a member of the French Academy; he wrote several poems, and had the direction of the court fêtes of Louis XIV. b. 1607; d. 1687. There are other members of this family who figure in French history.

BEAUVOIS, Ambrose Maria Francis Joseph Palisot de, bo'-vuw, a French naturalist and traveller, whose enterprising disposition led him to pursue his investigations over a great portion of W. Africa and America. During his wanderings in the latter country, he discovered, on the banks of the Ohio, the jaws and molar teeth of the great mastodon, and from the west of Virginia brought the tooth of a megalonyx. He published various works in connexion with his travels and pursuits. b. at Arras, 1752; d. at Paris, 1820.

BEAUZEE, Nicholas, bo'-zai, a French writer and member of the academy, who wrote the articles on grammar in the Encyclopédie; and though allied with sceptics, was himself a sincere Christian. Beauzée once asked Diderot how they came to elect him a member of the academy, as he was a Christian? "Because," answered the other, "we had not a grammarian among us, and we knew you to be an honest man." He wrote a "Universal Grammar; or, an Exposition of the Elements of Languages;" an "Exposition of the Historical Proofs of Religion;" and other works. b. at Verdun, 1717; d. 1789.

BECCADRELLI, Antonio, bai'-kaw-dai'-e, called Antony of Palermo, and also PANORMITA, was professor of belles-lettres and rhetoric at Pavia, where he, in 1432, received the poetic laurel from the emperor Sigismund. Alfonso, king of Naples, created him a nobleman, and gave him several honourable employments. He wrote a book on the sayings and actions of Alfonso, king of Aragon; and a collection of his epistles and other pieces was printed at Venice in 1453. b. at Palermo in 1394; d. at Naples, 1471.—This man is said to have sold a farm in order to buy a copy of Livy.

BECCAFUMI, Domenico, bai'-kaw-foo'-me, originally a shepherd, became an historical painter, and studied the works of Raphael and Michael Angelo Buonarrotti. b. at Siena, 1484; d. at Siena, 1549.—His "Saint Sebastian" is one of the finest pictures in the Borghese palace.

BECCARIA, John Baptist, bai'-kar'-rea, a Piedmontese philosopher, who was professor at Palermo and at Rome, whence he removed to Turin. He was greatly respected by the king of Sardinia, to whose sons he was tutor, and made several discoveries in electricity, publishing some valuable works on that and other philosophical subjects. b. at Mondovì, 1716; d. 1781.

BECCARIA, Cesare Bonesana, Marchese di, a political philosopher, who wrote on legislative affairs, but whose most remarkable production was a small work on crimes and punishments, which met with the most marvellous success, having run through six editions in Italy within eighteen months; and in the course of a few years two translations were made into French, both of which passed through several editions; it was likewise translated and published in English, German, Russian, Swiss, and Greek. It received the approval of several crowned heads of Europe, and was incorporated into the laws of Russia by Catherine II., and into those of Austria by Joseph II. Beccaria afterwards filled the chair of political economy in Milan, and his lectures were published in the collection of the Italian Economists. He, however, was persecuted by the priesthood, and it was only the decided and firm conduct of Count Firmian of Milan that prevented his falling a victim to their malice. He was also one of the founders of a society called the "Caffè," which had for its object the publication of essays on men and manners, and the elucidation of important questions in philosophy, politics, and morals. b. at Milan, 1738; where he died in 1794, of apoplexy.

BECCERRA, Gaspard, bai'-ser'-ra, a celebrated Spanish sculptor, the pupil of Michael Angelo. His principal work is a statue of the Virgin, executed by order of Queen Isabella de Valois. He also painted well in fresco. b. at Buxa, 1520; d. at Madrid, 1570.

BECHER, Johann Joachim, bei'-er, an eminent German chemist, who was appointed professor of medicine in the university of Mentz. He was of a roving disposition, residing for some time at Vienna, and assisting in a variety of manufactures; then at Haarlem, where he invented a machine for throwing silk. In 1690 he came to England, and examined the mines in Cornwall and Scotland, and returning to Germany, he there died. b. at Spire, 1625; d. 1692.—His principal works are "Physica Subterranea," "Institutiones Chymicæ," and "Theses Chymicæ."

BECHSTEIN, Johann Matthew, bei'-stine, a celebrated German ornithologist, who, intended for the church, relinquished theology for natural history; and, in 1785, was made professor of the Botanic Institute of Salzmanna, at Schnepenthal. In 1791 he proposed to the duke of Gotha to create a forest school; but, not meeting with success, he resolved to establish one at his own cost, at Kemnote, near Walterhausen. He afterwards published a journal devoted to forest science, called "Diana;" and in 1800 offered his services to the duke of Saxe-Meiningen, who gave him the direction of a botanic academy, newly founded at Dreissgracker. b. at Walterhausen, 1757; d. 1822.—Bechstein's whole life was spent in enriching natural history with most important observations. He published many valuable works, of which may be named "German Natural History," "Forest Entomology," "Complete Course of Forest S

"Natural History of Cage-birds," which has been translated into English, and has passed through several editions.

BECK, John, baron de, dek, a distinguished soldier in the service of Spain, who, after beginning life as a shepherd, a postilion, and a private soldier, rose rapidly, till he became a general officer, was governor of Luxemburg, did eminent service in the wars in the Low Countries between 1639 and 1648, and finally, after having nearly destroyed the rear-guard of Prince Condé's army, was taken prisoner, and carried to Arras, where he died. He received a patent of nobility from the Spanish sovereign, carried his honours with great humility, never forgot what had been his origin, and was deservedly reckoned one of the ablest soldiers of his age. The exact date of his birth is unknown. b. 1648.

BECKET, Thomas à, dek'-et, archbishop of Canterbury, distinguished in English history by the haughty demeanour which he displayed in his quarrels with his sovereign, King Henry II. b. in London, 1119; assassinated before the altar of the cathedral of Canterbury, 1170.—It was an expression of momentary passion which caused the death of Becket, for which King Henry was afterwards obliged, by the Pope, to do penance before his tomb, by having his royal back scourged by the monks, and passing one whole day and night fasting upon the bare stones. Two years after his death, Becket was canonized: and his pretended miracles were so numerous that his shrine became the richest in Europe.

BECKET, Isaac, an early English engraver in mezzotinto, in which branch of art he attained some eminence. He was originally apprenticed to a calico printer, but afterwards devoted himself to engraving. He worked in connexion with one Lutterell, who had stood his friend in one or two matters of difficulty into which Becket fell, and with whom he contracted an intimate friendship. Becket's early years were beset with troubles, chiefly arising from an inveterate inclination to intrigue which characterized him; but having at length married a wealthy lady, he settled quietly to the practice of his art. b. in Kent, 1683; d. about 1715.

BECKFORD, William, dek'-ford, the only legitimate son of Alderman Beckford, who had the honour of being twice lord mayor of London. He is known by his great wealth, which enabled him to erect the magnificent structure called Fonthill; and by his being the author of "Vathek," and several other works. This work is an Arabian tale, which was composed at one sitting. "It took me," said he, "three days and two nights of hard labour. I never took off my clothes the whole time." It is a work of great genius, and, according to Byron, for correctness of costume, beauty of description, and power of imagination, the most sublime of all European imitations of Eastern tales. b. 1770; d. near Bath, 1844.

BECKINGHAM, Charles, dek'-ing-ham, an English dramatic author, who wrote two plays of merit, viz., "Henry IV. of France," and "Scipio Africanus." He also wrote some poems. b. in London, 1699; d. 1730.

BECKINGTON, Thomas, dek'-ing-ton, an English prelate of the 15th century. He was tutor to Henry VI., who made him secretary of State, keeper of the Privy Seal, and bishop of Bath and Wells. Beckington was a great improver of his cathedral, but a still greater pluralist, as he held many benefices. He was dean of the Court of Arches, and one of the prosecutors of the Wickliffites. There is a book by him, still in MS., in defence of the right of the English kings to the French crown. b. towards the close of the 14th century; d. January, 1465.

BECKMANN, John, dek'-man, professor of philosophy at the university of Göttingen, known to the world by his remarkable work entitled "Contributions to the History of Inventions." This work has, in several different editions, appeared in England in a translated form. b. at Hoya, Hanover, 1739; d. at Göttingen, 1811.

BECKWITH, Sir George, dek'-with, second son of Major John Beckwith, was born in 1753, entered the army in 1771, and after serving with distinction in North America, both in a military and diplomatic capacity, was, in 1797, made governor of Bermuda; in 1804 of St. Vincent; in 1805, of Barbadoes, with the command of all the British troops in South America. In this latter capacity, in 1809, he captured Martinique from the French, and took the first eagle ever lost by France. For these services, he was made K.B., and received the thanks of the House of Commons. He also took Guadaloupe shortly afterwards; and such had been the excellence of his government, that, on quitting Barbadoes in 1814, on account of ill-health, a service of plate was offered him, which he declined, and a speaker at a farewell dinner declared his the most "unsullied administration our annals can boast." The local legislature sent him £2500 worth of plate after his departure, notwithstanding his own objections. After his return to England, Beckwith was appointed to the command of the troops in Ireland, which office he held from 1816 to 1820, during which time not a single outrage occurred—a rare state of things at that time. His health broke down under his long and arduous services in different climates, and he died on the 20th of March, 1823, leaving a reputation for talents, zeal, and integrity seldom equalled.

BEQUEREL, Antoine César, dek'-at-rel, a distinguished French physicist, to whom we are indebted for several discoveries in electro-chemistry, especially the method of electric coloration on gold, silver, and copper, now generally adopted in the arts. b. at Châtillon-sur-Loire, 1788.

BEDA, or BÉDE, bed, the Venerable, an ancient English writer, whose fame for learning was so great, that Pope Sergius wrote to his abbot to send him to Rome; but Bede declined the honour. He devoted the whole of his life to writing his "Ecclesiastical History" and other works, and to instructing the young monks. b. at Wearmouth, Durham, 672; d. 735.—An English council directed his works to be publicly read in churches.

BEDA, Noel, bei-da, a turbulent doctor of the Sorbonne, Paris, who opposed the study of languages in the university of Paris on the ground that they tended to introduce heresies; attacked, calumniated, and mutilated and falsified the works of Erasmus, who, in replying to Beda, accused him of publishing 181 lies, 310 calumnies, and 47 blasphemies—charges to which he only replied by further falsification and abuse. He succeeded, however, in getting the works of Erasmus condemned by the Sorbonne. Beda took an active part in opposition to the divorce of Henry VIII., and made a violent attempt to pervert the decision of the Sorbonne on the question by tearing the record of the votes from the hand of the beadle, and substituting another list of his own. He was twice banished for his mutinous and turbulent conduct, and on being recalled, and still continuing incorrigible, he was compelled to make a public apology for slandering the king, Francis I., and for other offences, and was exiled to the Abbey of Mount St. Michael, where he died in 1537. His writings are barbarous, abusive, coarse, and devoid of critical skill and taste; and but for the influence his violent and domineering conduct gave him, he would never have attained to any prominence, or have merited notice by posterity.

BEDDOES, Thomas, bed'-does, an eminent English physician, chemist, anatomist, geologist, botanist, controversialist, and even poet, was born at Shifnal, Shropshire, April 13, 1769, being descended of an ancient Welsh family. He was the intimate friend of Dr. Darwin, and was either the correspondent or the personal friend of all the eminent scientific men of his time. His writings are numerous, principally on pneumatic chemistry, which, amid his multifarious pursuits, was his favourite theme. He held the chemical lectureship at Oxford, and is said to have so successfully imitated Dr. Darwin's style in the poem on the "Economy of Vegetation," as to have imposed some poetry of his own on a company of connoisseurs as that of Darwin, and subsequently avowed the manuscript lines as his, to the confusion of the critics. B. at Clifton, Nov. 24, 1803. Sir Humphry Davy says he was "a very remarkable man, more admirably fitted to promote inquiry than to conduct it; he had talents which would have exalted him to the pinnacle of philosophical eminence, if they had been applied with discretion."

BEDFORD, John, duke of, bed'-ford, was the third son of Henry IV. of England, and one of the greatest commanders ever opposed to the French. By the will of Henry V. he became regent of France, and well sustained the glory of his country in the whole of the struggle which raged in that kingdom throughout his career. He laid siege to Orleans, which, on account of the supernatural awe which his troops entertained for Joan of Arc, he was compelled to raise; but was subsequently one of the principal instruments in bringing that extraordinary maid to the stake. B. 1390; D. at Rouen, 1435.

BEDFORD, Arthur, an English divine, who wrote several works, the principal of which are against stage plays and vocal music, especially condemning the immoral character of many of the dramatic productions of his day. B. 1668; D. 1745. His other works are chiefly on controverted points of divinity.

BEDLOE, William, Captain, bed'-lo, an infamous informer, who gave evidence respecting the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and for his perjury received a reward of £500. D. 1830.

BEDWELL, William, bed'-well, a distinguished divine and topographical writer, who was engaged on the revised translation of the Scriptures, published in the reign of James I. He was vicar of Tottenham, in the church of which place he was buried; and the epitaph on his tomb, which still remains, says he was "one of King James' translators of the Bible, and for the eastern tongues was as learned a man as most who lived in these modern times." B. 1562; D. 1632.

BEECHER, Amos, born in 1775 was a Congregational church at East Hampton. He subsequently became pastor of a church in Boston, and took an active part, in opposition to Dr. Channing and others, in a controversy which occurred among members of a number of the churches of New England in 1826. In 1842 he became president of the Lane Theological Seminary at Cincinnati; but since 1842 he has resided principally at Boston. B. at New Haven, Connecticut, 1775. D. 1863.—He wrote many theological works, sermons, and treatises on temperance, and was father of Mrs. Beecher Stowe.

BEECHER, Henry Ward, son of the above, studied theology under his father, at Lane Seminary, and in 1847 became pastor of the Plymouth church, in Brooklyn, New York. As a preacher, he is said to have the largest uniform congregation in the United States. B. at Litchfield, Connecticut, 1813.—He is the author of several works, which have for their object the promotion of the religious welfare of the community, and a novel called "Norwood."

BEECHER, Harriet. (See Stowe.)

BEECHER, Sir William, B.A., be'-che, a celebrated English portrait painter, who, although originally articulated to a conveyancer, pursued his art with such ardour that he became portrait painter to the queen of George III. He painted the portraits of most of the celebrated characters of his time, became a Royal Academician, and received the honour of knighthood. B. at Burford, in Oxfordshire, 1753; D. at Hampstead, 1839.

BEECHER, Frederic William, son of the above, early entered the navy, and in 1818 accompanied Franklin as a lieutenant in his voyage in search of the north-west passage. Being possessed of considerable artistic talent, he made drawings of many of the natural objects which came under his observation in this expedition, and for which he was rewarded by a parliamentary grant of £200. In 1843 he published a narrative of the voyage. In the following year he accompanied Sir Edward Parry to the Polar seas, and in 1821 was commissioned, with his brother, to examine the coasts of N. Africa to the east of Tripoli. On his return from this service he received the command of the Blossom, with orders to penetrate the Polar Sea by the Pacific Ocean and Behring's Strait, while Franklin was to make the attempt overland by North America. This expedition occupied two years and a half. In 1827 he received the rank of post-captain, and being afterwards unemployed for some time, devoted himself to writing accounts of the various expeditions in which he had been engaged. Between 1829 and 1830 he was employed in surveying the coasts of S. America and Ireland, and in 1834 was created rear-admiral of the Blue. B. in London, 1796; D. 1856.

BEEK, David, boke, a Dutch artist, and a pupil of Vandyck, was much esteemed by Charles I. of England, and subsequently was appointed portrait painter to Queen Christina, of Sweden, who commissioned him to paint the sovereigns of Europe for her gallery. B. at Delft, 1621; D. at the Hague, 1686.

BEER, Michael, beer, brother of Meyerbeer, the composer, a German dramatic author, was born at Berlin in 1800, and wrote a variety of plays, which much resemble Schiller in style, but are too rhetorical and subjective. His plays were not very successful in representation, though his language is pure and elevated, and much reflection is displayed in the management of his plots. The titles of the tragedies are, "The Brides of Aragon;" "Clytemnestra;" "The Paria;" and "Struensee." The two last are the best known. p. 1833, at Munich.

BEETHOVEN, Ludwig von, bai't'-ho-ven, a celebrated musical composer, and the pupil of Haydn. In his thirteenth year he was capable of playing extemporaneous fantasias, which were the admiration of the most accomplished musicians of his time. About 1791 he composed his opera of "Leonore," better known in England by the name of "Fidelio," which, however, had not much success. He continued, however, to compose in every style of music, bequeathing to posterity a noble monument of his industry and genius in his many brilliant compositions. b. at Bonn, 1770; d. at Vienna, 1827.—In 1815 a statue was erected to his memory in his native town, and inaugurated in the presence of the queen of England.

BEGARFELI, Antony, bai'-gaw-rai'-le, an eminent modeller in clay, was born at Modena about 1493, and died 1565, after having filled the churches of his native town with statues, groups, &c., besides many which he executed for Parma, Mantua, and other towns. Michael Angelo said of Begarcelli's works, "If this clay were only to become marble, woe betide the ancient statues"—high praise when coming from such a man.

BEGEYS, Abraham, be'-gine, a Dutch painter, who executed some fine landscapes for the royal palaces, and several good pictures, which are at the Hague. Lived between 1630 and 1700.

BEGON, Michael, bai'-gawny, a magistrate of the French West India Islands, who collected a noble library, and a cabinet of antiquities and curiosities. He also caused to be engraved portraits of the illustrious men of the 17th century, and collected memoirs of their lives. b. at Blois, 1638; d. at Rochefort, 1710. In his honour the order of plants Begonia was so named.

БЕЛЛИМ, Martin, be'-hem, a German geographer and navigator, who accompanied Diego Cam, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, in his voyage of discovery along the west coast of Africa, in the year 1484. John II. of Portugal conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He made a curious globe, which is still in existence at Nuremberg, and several maps and charts. b. at Nuremberg, 1436; d. at Lisbon, 1506.

БЕНН, Aphra, ben, an English authoress, who at Surinam became acquainted with Prince Croonoko, whose story she afterwards published. In 1686 she was at Antwerp, where, it is said, she was employed as a spy by the English government, and discovered the design of the Dutch to ascend the Thames and burn the English fleet. This intelligence she communicated to the English court; but it was treated with contempt. She subsequently returned to London, and devoted herself to pleasure and the muse, writing several plays, histories, and novels, which evince a lively but licentious imagination. b. at Canterbury; d. in London, 1689.

BEHRING, Vítus, beer'-ing, a Dane, who, entering the naval service of Russia, was subsequently, by the empress Catharine, promoted to the command of various expeditions fitted out, for the purposes of geographical discovery. Behring Strait derives its name from him, although it is believed that he never reached it; and he was the founder of a settlement at Petropaulovski. Shipwrecked on Behring Island, where he died, 1741.

BEICK, Joachim Francis, bike, a German painter and engraver, who excelled in painting landscapes and battles. b. at Ravensburg, 1666; d. at Munich, 1748.

BEINASCHI, or BENASCHI, John Baptiste, bai'-nas'-ke, an historical painter, was a native of Piedmont, whose principal works are cupolas, ceilings, &c.; and are to be seen in the churches of Naples. b. at Turin, 1636; d. about 1690.—He was so little able to bear criticism, that he would assault, sword in hand, those who discovered faults in his works.

BEITRAR, or AREN BEITRAR, Abdallah-ben-Ahmed, bi'-thar, an African botanist and physician, who wrote a work treating of all substances, animal, vegetable, and mineral, used in pharmacy, which is considered to be the best treatise of the time on medicine and botany. b. in Africa, about 1390; d. at Cairo, 1243.

BEKKER, Balhasar, bel'-er, a Dutch divine, who published a book entitled "The World Bewitched;" in which he opposed the popular superstitions respecting witchcraft, incantations, &c.; and which was a great thing to attempt in those days. This work has been translated into French, English, and Italian. b. in Friesland, 1631; d. 1693.

BEL, Matthias, bel, an Hungarian divine, the author of "Apparatus ad Historiam Hungariæ," and "Notitia Hungariæ novæ Historico-geographiæ," for which Charles VI. made him imperial historiographer. b. at Orsova, 1684; d. 1749.—His son Charles Andrew was librarian and professor of philosophy and poetry to the Leipzig university.

BELCHER, Sir Edward, K.C.B., F.R.S., and F.G.S., bel'-cher, hydrographer, and one of the most scientific naval officers of the day, was born in 1799. After serving several years in the navy, which he entered as a first-class volunteer in 1812, Mr. Belcher was, in 1825, appointed assistant-surveyor to Captain Beechey, in his voyage to Behring's Straits. He was promoted to the rank of commander in 1829; and from November, 1836, to August, 1842, was employed in the Sulphur surveying vessel, and made a voyage round the world, of which he has published a "Narrative;" in 1841 he explored and sounded the various inlets to the Canton river, and contributed materially to the success of the war in China under Sir Hugh Gough. In 1843 he was knighted; and in 1852 to 1854 was in command of a searching expedition for Sir John Franklin. He was compelled to abandon his ships, for which he was tried by a court-martial, but acquitted.

BELESIUS, bel'-e-sis, a Chaldean, who raised Arsaces to the throne of Media, for which he was rewarded with the government of Babylon, 820 b.c. When Sardanapalus, with his gold and silver, was burnt in his palace, Belesius was permitted to take away the ashes, and extracted immense treasures. Lived in the 9th century b.c.

BELGRADO, James, bai'-graw'-do, an Italian Jesuit, who was an eminent mathematician, antiquary, and poet. b. at Udine, 1704; d. 1789.—His works are principally in Latin, and in his eighty-first year he published a book filled with new views on Egyptian architecture.

Belidor

BELIDOR, Bernard Forest de, bel'-e-dor, a continental engineer, professor of the French school of artillery at La Fère, well known by his "Dictionnaire Portatif de l'Ingénieur," and his "Course of Mathematics, Hydraulics, and Architecture," for engineering and artillery officers. This work rapidly passed through many editions, and Belidor's fame brought around him military men of all countries and high rank to gain instruction. b. in Catalonia, 1693; d. at Paris, 1761.—He made numerous experiments on, and entered deeply into, the powers of gunpowder; and discovered that it was erroneous to suppose that the greater the charge the further the bullet would be carried, and he proved that nearly one-half of the powder used at that time was wasted.

BELING, Richard, be'-ling, an Irish writer, who was concerned in the rebellion of 1741, and was appointed ambassador from the council of Kilkenny to the pope in 1645. On his return, he went over to the marquis of Ormond, through whose intercession at the Restoration he recovered his estates. a. at Belinstown, Dublin, 1613; d. Dublin, 1677.

BELISARIUS, bel-i-sai'-re-us, a Roman general in the emperor Justinian's reign, who ended the war in which that prince was engaged with the Persians. In 533 he took Carthage, and made prisoner Gélimer, king of the Vandals. He was next sent against the Goths, in Italy; and arriving on the coasts of Sicily, he took Catania, Syracuse, Palermo, and other places. He then proceeded to Naples, which he captured, and then marched to Rome. After this he conquered Vitiges, king of the Goths, and sent him to Constantinople, at the same time refusing the crown, which was offered him. For these great exploits he was appointed sole consul in 535, and was regarded as the saviour of the empire; medals are still extant which bear this inscription, Belisarius gloria Romanorum. He was soon obliged to go into the East against Chosroes I., king of Persia; and, having succeeded, he returned to Italy, whence he expelled the Huns in 553. In 563 Belisarius was accused of participating in a conspiracy against the emperor, who imprisoned him, and confiscated his estates, to which, however, he was shortly restored. The tradition that he was deprived of his eyes is not authentic. a. at Germania, in Illyria, about 505; d. 565.—Belisarius married, 527, Antonina, an actress of abandoned character, who exercised great influence over him, and doubtless was the cause of the worst passages of his life.

BELL, Dr. Andrew, bel, a clergyman of the Church of England, who introduced the Madras system of education, was born at St. Andrews, Scotland, in 1753. In 1789 he was chaplain of Fort St. George, and minister of St. Mary's, at Madras, and there, in superintending the Military Orphan School, he adopted those arrangements, borrowed from the practice of the native schools, which were afterwards introduced into England, and have since become very generally adopted, especially in the National Schools. The system consists of forming the school into classes, and appointing the more advanced scholars to teach the younger; and the result is that each pupil has a tutor, and each tutor a pupil—and the merit claimed for the system is, that both the class of tutors and of pupils learn faster than they would under other systems. Joseph Lancaster is often said to be the introducer of this system into England: but the merit is, we believe, due to Dr. Bell. He was rewarded for his exertions by a prebend's stall in Westminster Abbey, and the mastership of Shertlun Hospital, Durham. He amassed a large fortune, £120,000 of which he left for the establishment of schools to be taught upon the Madras system, and for other charitable purposes. He died at Cheltenham, June 27, 1832; his remains being brought to London, and interred in Westminster Abbey, with all the marks of distinction which his worth so well merited.

BELL, George Joseph, a Scottish advocate and writer on law and jurisprudence, was born near Edinburgh, March 26, 1770. Among other works, he published, in an enlarged form, one entitled "Commentaries on the Laws of Scotland, and on the Principles of Mercantile Jurisprudence, considered in relation to Bankruptcy, Competitions of Creditors, and Imprisonment for Debt," which was long a standard work on Scottish law, being held next in estimation to Erskine's "Institutes," and is even now, although the alterations in the law of bankruptcy in that country has made much of it obsolete, still considered an authority on all points of the old law not now repealed. p. 23rd Sept. 1843.

BELL, Henry, bel, was the first person who applied steam successfully to the purposes of navigation in Europe. In 1812 he launched a small steam-vessel, which he called the Comet, on the river Clyde, to be propelled with a steam-engine of his own construction; and so successful was his experiment, that it encouraged others of greater means to undertake similar enterprises. a. in Linlithgowshire, Scotland, 1767; d. at Helensburgh, on the Clyde, 1830.

BELL, Sir Charles, one of the most distinguished anatomists of modern times, and the discoverer of the arrangement and operation of the nervous system, which places him on an equality with Harvey, the discoverer of the circulation of the blood. a. at Edinburgh, 1774; d. at Hallow Park, the seat of Mrs. Holland, on his way to London, 1842.

BELL, John, an eminent modern sculptor, who has executed many beautiful and graceful figures; among which may be noticed his "Una and the Lion," his "Babes in the Wood," his "Dorothea," and his "Child's own Attitude," which is now the property of the queen. He has also sculptured some of the historical statues for the new Houses of Parliament; such as Falkland, Shakespeare, and some others. a. in Norfolk, 1812.

BELL, Thomas, an eminent naturalist, who, conjointly with Kirby and McLeay, originated the Zoological Club of the Linnean Society. a. at Poole, 1792.

BELLAERIN, Robert, bel'-ar-meen, a Roman cardinal, who, at the age of eighteen, joined the society of Jesuits. In 1599 he was made a cardinal, and in 1601 archbishop of Capua. a. in Tuscany, 1542; d. at Rome, 1621.—His writings are numerous, but chiefly polemical, and have acquired a great reputation. He was one of the most virtuous members of the conclave, and was accustomed to say that "one ounce of peace was worth a pound of victory." His works were published at Cologne in seven volumes folio, in 1617.

BELLA, Stefano Della, bell'-aw, a distinguished Italian etcher in copper, was originally apprenticed to a goldsmith of Florence, b devoted himself to the arts, and selected etching as his special walk. He was patronized by the Medici family, who sent him to Rome to pursue his studies, and there he laid the foundation of his future fame by several views of that city, etched in a very superior manner. He afterwards accompanied the Florentine embassy to Paris, where he acquired great fame by his works. He subsequently returned to Florence, and was appointed drawing-master to Prince Cosmo, afterwards Cosmo III., which office he held till his death, in 1664. b. at Florence, 1610.

BELLEGADE, Gabriel du Pac, bail-à-gard, a learned French critic and historian, who was a canon at Lyons, but subsequently joined the Port Royal party, and retired to the seminary of Rhynswik, near Utrecht, where he occupied himself with studies and compositions, chiefly connected with ecclesiastical history. His great work is an edition of the works of Arnauld, one of the founders of the Port Royal School, which was published at Lausanne, in 1782, in 45 vols., having occupied four years in printing. Bellegarde intended to have executed a similar work for Nicole, the colleague and friend of Arnauld, but he died in 1780. b. 1717.

BELLAY, Joachim du, bel-ai, a French poet, surnamed "The French Ivid," was celebrated for his odes, both in French and Latin. b. at Liré, near Angers, 1524; d. at Paris, 1560.—Forty-seven sonnets of his on the "Antiquities of Rome" were, in 1611, translated into English verse.

BELLE, Alexis Simon, bel, a French portrait-painter, who was a disciple of Francis de Troy. b. 1674; d. 1734.

BELLEAC, bail-lo, a French poet, one of the seven poets known as "La Pléiade Française," and whose pastorals are held in great esteem. b. at Nogent le Rotrou, 1529; d. at Paris, 1577.

BELLENDEN, Dr. John. (See DALLENDEN.)

BELLENDEN, William, bel-en-den, a native of Scotland, and an eminent scholar, especially in Cicero's literature, having composed several works on the life and orations of the great Roman orator. Three of his works were reprinted in London, in 1787, by Dr. Parr, who accompanied them with a preface, in which he held up Burke, Fox, and Lord North as the three great luminaries of British politics and oratory—an idea derived from an essay by Belenden, in which Cicero, Seneca, and Pliny were so distinguished among the ancients. Lived in the 17th century.

BELLIN, Jacques Nicholas, bel-lä, a French marine geographer, who was a member of the Royal Society of London, and published the "Hydrographie Française," containing maps of all the seaboard in the world then known, and several other valuable geographical works. b. at Paris, 1703; d. at Versailles, 1772.

BELLINI, or BELLIN, Gentile, bail-le-ne, a Venetian artist, who was employed by the republic in painting pictures for the council-hall. It is said that, while at Constantinople, he was engaged by Mahomet II. to paint the Beheading of St. John the Baptist. The sultan, who was a connoisseur, pronounced the work inaccurate, and ordered a slave to be beheaded in his presence, to prove that the skin of the Baptist's neck was faultily portrayed. This sight so shocked the painter, that he took the earliest opportunity to return to his own country. b. 1421; d. 1501.

BELLINI, John, brother of the above, who, along with him, is generally held to be the founder of the Venetian school of painting which afterwards produced Giorgione and Titian. b. 1426; d. 1516.—In 1819, at Lebrun's sale, a half-length figure of the "Virgin holding the Infant Jesus," by John Bellini, was sold for £4000, and the "Virgin at her Throne," once in the Louvre, but restored to the church of St. Zacharias, in Naples, is estimated to be worth £8000.—James, the father of these two painters, was likewise an artist of merit.

BELLINI, Vincenzo, a distinguished musical composer, who in his youth discovered so much genius as to induce the inhabitants of the town of Catania to send him to Naples to study at their expense. In his twenty-third year, he produced his first opera, which was performed within the walls of the Conservatorio at Naples, and contained sufficient indications of the originality of his genius to raise high expectations in those who heard it. In 1831 he produced, at Milan, "La Sonnambula" and "Norma," both of which were received with the utmost enthusiasm. In 1833 appeared his "Beatrice di Tenda," which was heavy; and in 1834 came forth his "I Puritani," which is one of his most brilliant efforts. Shortly after this he was taken ill, and ended his short career in a few days. b. at Catania, in Sicily, in 1802; d. at Pateaux, near Paris, 1835, aged 33.

BELLMAN, Charles Michael, bell-man, one of the most popular and national poets of Sweden, was born at Stockholm in 1741, and began his literary career by some serious effusions, which tone speedily gave way to a very different style. He devoted himself to the delineation of the domestic and social life of his countrymen, and his descriptions are so natural and happy as to have obtained for him the title of the "Literary Teniers of the North." He appears to have been to the Swedes what Burns was to the Scots, though with less of power, elevation, and sentiment, but a larger share of fun and jollity. Many of his pieces were the spontaneous effusions of his rather boisterous festive hours, and such lyrical improvisations were not only enthusiastically welcomed at the moment, but are still chanted by the firesides and at all social gatherings of the Swedish peasantry. Gustavus III. was an admirer of Bellman, and appointed him to the post of secretary of the national lottery. He died in 1795. Several posthumous editions of his writings, especially his songs, were published. His compositions all breathe a spirit of gay, merry carelessness, and it is said that his own character was precisely such as his verses depict—enjoying the passing hour, and careless of the next.

BELOE, William, be-lo, an eminent scholar and critic, and a pupil of the celebrated Dr. Samuel Parr, was born at Norwich in 1756, and educated at Cambridge. He entered the church, in which he held several preferments, though not of any great pecuniary value. His chief occupations were literary, and his publications numerous, being mainly of a classical and critical character. He was also, however, engaged in periodical writing, and was, along with archdeacon Nares, the founder and joint editor of the "British Critic," which he also conducted as sole editor. He was at one time a warm admirer of the French revolution, but subsequently went over to the other side, in consequence of which he suffered a good deal of abuse from some of his former friends. He died in 1817, leaving behind the reputation of BELLOI, Joseph René, bail-lo, a lieutenant in the French navy, who volunteered to accompany the expedition sent out in 1851, under Captain Kennedy, to search for Sir John Franklin. He volunteered in another expedition, under Captain Inglefield, in 1853, and was unfortunately drowned, August 18, off Cape Bowden. B. at Paris, 1826.

BELLOX, Peter Lawrence Burette de, bail-loi, a French dramatist, who was for some time an advocate, but quitted the law for the stage, and went to Russia, where he acted as a comedian with considerable success. Returning to France in 1758, he brought out his tragedy of "Titus," which was followed by the "siege of Calais," and other pieces. B. at St. Flour, 1727; D. 1775.

BELLUCCI, Anthony, bail-loot'-che, an Italian painter of the modern Venetian school, whose chef-d'œuvre is the ceiling at Buckingham House. B. at Pieve di Soligo, 1654; D. 1728.

BELON, Peter, bail'-awn, a distinguished French naturalist, who travelled into Palestine, Greece, and Arabia, and formed during his travels a valuable collection, enriched natural history with a number of entirely original observations, and also examined the ruins and antiquities of the countries he visited. For his numerous works Henry II. gave him a pension in 1558. He was assassinated in the Bois de Boulogne in 1564. P. 1517.—The result of his travels he communicated to the world, in his "Observations of many Singular and Memorable Things found in Greece, Asia, Judæa, Egypt, Arabia, &c.," which has been translated into Latin and German.

BELSHAM, Thomas, bail'-sham, a Socinian divine of some eminence, succeeded Dr. Priestley as minister of the congregation at Hackney in 1794, where he continued till 1805, when he removed to a chapel in Essex-street, London, where he officiated till 1820, when old age and infirmity compelled him to retire. B. at Bedford, in 1750; D. at Hampstead, 1829. Belsham was the son of a Presbyterian minister, and began life as pastor of a congregation of that body at Worcester in 1778; but resigned in 1789, on embracing the doctrines of Dr. Priestley. He published a great many works in nearly all departments of metaphysics and theology, a large proportion of which are controversial, and had a principal share in the preparation of what was entitled an "improved" translation of the New Testament, published by the Unitarian Society.

BELSHAM, William, younger brother of the above, distinguished himself as a political and historical writer. Besides essays on all the leading topics of the day, he composed a History of Great Britain from the Revolution of 1688 to the Peace of Amiens, 1802; first published in separate divisions, and afterwards combined into one work. He was a decided Whig in politics, and was intimate with many of the leaders of that party. B. 1752; D. 1823.

BELSUNCE, Henry Francis Xavier de, bail'-soonz, a French prelate, who, in 1720, while a pestilence raged in Marseilles, of which he was bishop, went into every infected district carrying spiritual and temporal aid to the sick and dying, putting to shame the inactivity and selfish cowardice of the civil authorities, and displaying a perfect picture of Christian charity, self-abnegation, and holy zeal. It has been truly said, that in the conduct of Belsunce, and of Charles

Bembo

Borromeo, at Milan, on a like occasion, the world has had set before it examples of the purest and holiest devotion of which humanity is capable. He, happily, passed safely through the risks to which he exposed himself; the contagion spared him, and he lived to give a further proof of disinterestedness, by declining several rich preferments which were offered, and remained in Marseilles, endeared to him for the labours and trials he had borne for its sake. Pope, in his "Essay on Mgn.," has made a fine allusion to Belsunce's exemption from the contagion that was immolating multitudes all around him:—

"Why drew Marseilles' good bishop purer breath,

When Nature sicken'd, and each gale was death?"

Unhappily, his later years were not blessed with the repose which his devotion so well merited. He was a zealous opponent of the Jansenists, and his persecution of the sect involved him in a contest with the civil authorities, and at his death Marseilles was a prey to confusion and bitterness. B. 1671; D. 1755.

BELZONI, Giovanni, bail'-dso'-ne, a distinguished traveller, whose Egyptian explorations have been of great value to those who are engaged in the study of antiquities. He caused to be transported from Egypt the colossal bust now in the British Museum, and was the first to open the great temple of Abousambul, which is cut in the side of an Egyptian mountain. In 1817 he commenced his excavations at Karnak, and opened the splendid tomb in the Deban-el-Moulouk, or Valley of the Tombs of the Kings. He also opened numerous other sepulchres, and in all that he did, not only displayed great ingenuity, but much perseverance, under labours and difficulties of the most discouraging kind. In 1818 he visited the shores of the Red Sea, and discovered the ruins of the ancient Berenice, and visited the emerald-mines of Mount Zabarah. After an absence of five years, he returned to England, and published an account of his operations. In 1823 he set out for Africa, with the view of exploring part of that country. Arriving at the Bight of Benin, he was well received by the king of the country, and prepared to set out on a journey to Houssa, when he was attacked by dysentery, which carried him off. B. at Padua about 1774; D. at Gato, in Benin, 1823.

BEMBO, Joseph, bem, a brave general, who first served in the army under Marshal Davoust, and subsequently under Macdonald, at the siege of Hamburg. In 1819 he was made a captain, and became professor of a school of artillery established at Warsaw. In 1830 he took part in the Polish insurrection, and after the defeat of the patriotic army, fled into France. On the commencement of the revolution of 1848, he tried to organize an insurrection at Vienna, and afterwards attached himself to the Hungarian cause. In 1849 he fought at the battle of Temesvár, in which the Hungarians were defeated. Seeking refuge in Turkey, he subsequently became a Mussulman, and was raised by Abdul-Medjid to the dignity of a pasha. B. in Galicia, 1796; D. at Aleppo, 1850.

BEMBO, Peter, baim'-bo, a cardinal and poet, who, in 1613, was appointed by Leo X. his secretary, and made bishop of Bergamo by Paul III. He was also a favourite of the celebrated Lætzia Borgia when residing at Venice. His principal works are the "History of Venice," "Letters," containing anecdotes of the age; &c.

BENBOW, John, ben'-bo, a brave English admiral, who early entered the merchant service, and in 1680 commanded a ship in the Mediterranean trade, with which he beat off a Saltee rover. The gallantry of this action being reported to Charles II. of Spain, he invited the captain to court, and presented him with a letter of recommendation to King James II., who gave him an appointment in the navy. William III. dispatched him to the West Indies to protect the British colonies, and on his return he had great respect paid to him; he was advanced to the rank of vice-admiral, and after a brief period, during which he was sent to blockade Dunkirk, he was once more, in 1701, dispatched to the West Indies. Shortly subsequent to his arrival there, he fell in with the French admiral Du Casse, near St. Martha, on the Spanish coast, when a skirmishing action commenced, which continued three or four days; in the last day the admiral was singly engaged with the French, his other ships having fallen astern. Though a chain-shot had shattered his leg, he would not be removed from the quarter-deck, but continued the fight till morning, when the French bore away. The admiral made signal for his ships to follow; but his orders were disobeyed. In consequence of this, he was obliged to return to Jamaica, and on his arrival ordered those officers who had behaved so ill to be confined, and, on their return to England, they were brought to trial by court-martial, when the most culpable of them suffered according to their deserts. B. 1659; p. from the effects of his wound, 1702.

BENDISH, Bridget, ben'-dish, is worthy of notice here, as being the daughter of General Ireton, and granddaughter of Oliver Cromwell. Her husband's name was Thomas Bendish. B. about 1727.

BENEDETTO DA MAJANO, bai'-nai-det'-o, a distinguished Florentine, who, as well as his brother Julian, excelled in both sculpture and architecture. He was the architect of the celebrated Strozzi palace at Florence, which, begun by him in 1460, was finished by Simon Palajola about 1500. B. at Florence, 1444; p. in his native town, 1493.

BENEDICT, ben'-e-dikt, a famous English abbot, who made frequent tours to Rome, and took to England several artists, eminent in architecture, painting, and music. He founded the monastery at Wearmouth in 674, and that of Jarrow in 682. B. in Northumberland; p.

BENEDICT, St., founder of the religious order of the Benedictines, and who retired at an early age to Subiaco, 40 miles from Rome. He was followed by a number of persons, who adopted the rules he established, and in a short time he had twelve monasteries under his direction. About 523 he withdrew to Monte Casino, where he founded a monastery, which became the prototype of all the institutions of that kind in western Europe. B. at Nursia, 480; p. 542 or 543.

BENEDICT, a name adopted by a great number of the Roman pontiffs, among whom the most distinguished were:—

BENEDICT VIII., who obtained the tiara in 1012. He crowned the emperor Henry II. and his wife in the church of St. Peter, on which occasion the pope presented the emperor with an apple of gold, surrounded with two circles of precious stones crossel, and surmounted with a cross of gold. This pope united the character of the warrior with that of the ecclesiastic, and defeated the Saracens and Greeks, who invaded his territories. p. 1024.

BENEDICT XII. was the son of a baker, and became doctor of the university of Paris, and cardinal priest. In 1334 he was elected to the papal chair, on the death of John XXII. On this occasion he said to the cardinals, "You have chosen an ass." He corrected several abuses in the Church. B. at Avignon, 1342.

BENEDICT XIII. was born at Rome in 1649, of illustrious family, and took the religious habit among the Dominicans at Venice. In 1671 he was made cardinal, and, in 1685, became archbishop of Benevento, where, in 1688, his palace was shattered by an earthquake, and the cardinal narrowly escaped with his life. In 1724 he was chosen pope; and the year after he called a council at Rome, in which the bull Unigenitus was confirmed. p. 1730.

BENEDICT XIV. was born at Bologna in 1675, of the noble family of Lambertini. In 1728 he received a cardinal's hat; and in 1731 was nominated archbishop of Bologna. On the death of Clement XII., the cardinals were a long time deliberating on the choice of a successor. Lambertini, by way of quickening them, said, "Why do you waste your time in discussions? If you wish for a saint, elect Gotti; a politician, choose Aldrovandus; a good companion, take me." This sally pleased them so much that they elected him at once. He reformed abuses, introduced good regulations, cultivated letters, encouraged men of learning, and was a patron of the fine arts. p. 1758. His works make 6 vols. folio.

BENEDICT, Jules, a modern German pianist and musical composer. He studied under Hummel and Weber, and in 1824, on the recommendation of the latter, was appointed musical director of the theatre of the Carthusians at Vienna. At the San Carlo of Naples he produced his first compositions, and was subsequently very favourably known as an admirable performer on the piano in most of the large cities in southern Europe, and finally settled in London. He was with Jenny Lind in the United States, during her remarkably successful engagement there under the auspices of Barnum. B. at Stuttgart, 1805. The principal of his works are, "I Portoghesi a Goa," "Un Anno ed un Giorno," "The Gipsy's Warning," "The Lily of Killarney," &c. B. at Stuttgart, 1804.

BENEZET, Antony, ben'-e-zet, an American philanthropist, who, at an early age, removed with his family from London to Philadelphia, where they became Quakers. He devoted his life to acts of charity, the negroes being especially the objects of his care. He published various tracts on Guinea and the slave trade, an account of the Society of Friends, &c. B. in London, in the year 1713; p. 1784.—A fine eulogium was pronounced over his remains by an American officer. "I would rather," said he, "be Antony Benezet in that coffin, than George Washington with all his fame."

BENNET, Henry, ben'-et, earl of Arlington, a statesman, who served in the royal army during the civil war, and after the Restoration made one of the ministry known by the name of the Cabal, which word was formed from the initials of the noblemen who composed it; viz.—Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington

Lauderdale. In 1672 he was created an earl, and afterwards invested with the order of the Garter, and appointed Lord Chamberlain. Æ. at Arlington, 1618; D. 1635.

BENNETT, William Cox, a modern English song-writer, whose poems of childhood and other home subjects have deservedly attained celebrity. His first volume of "Poems" was published 1847; "War Songs," 1857; "Queen Eleanor's Vengeance and other Poems," 1858; "Songs by a Song-writer," and "Baby May and other Poems on Infants," both in 1859. Æ. at Greenwich, 1820.—His verses have a large number of readers as well in America as in England.

BENNETT, William Sterndale, an eminent composer and pianist, was born in 1816 at Sheffield, where his father was organist of the principal church. He was brought up by his grandfather, John Bennett, one of the lay clerks of the choir of Cambridge University, by whom he was entered, when eight years of age, as a chorister of King's College, and is now professor of music in the university where he thus early began his career. After studying in London, he spent several years in Germany, where his compositions were very favourably received, and where he formed an intimate friendship with Mendelssohn, which had a most beneficial influence on the career of the young composer. He subsequently fixed his residence in London, was appointed professor of music at Cambridge in 1856, and has published a great variety of pieces of high merit. Indeed, Professor Bennett has gained a European reputation, and, as a performer, has done credit to the English school. His works include overtures to the "Naiades," "Parisina," the "Wild Nymph," the "Merry Wives of Windsor," with concertos, sonatas, songs, duets, pianoforte pieces, &c., &c. He composed a cantata for the inauguration of the International Exhibition of 1862, to which Tennyson wrote words, and which, with marches composed by Außer and Meyerbeer, was performed on the opening day.

BENSSERADE, Isaac de, ben'-se-rad', a French poet, whose wit and political talents introduced him to the court of Louis XIV., where he obtained the patronage of Cardinal Richelieu. His writings consist principally of sonnets and dramas. — at Lyons la Forêt, 1612; D. at Paris, 1691.

BENSLY, Thomas, ben'-le, a distinguished English printer of the beginning of the present century, who, among other improvements he made in typography, was connected with the early attempts to introduce machine-printing, which was first applied with success to the execution of the Times in 1814, and has since received immense developments and improvements.

BENTHAM, Jeremy, ben'-tham, the son of an attorney, and remarkable from his earliest years for the fascination which books had over him. In his fifth year he was named by his family the "philosopher;" and in his fourteenth was admitted to Queen's College, Oxford, where he soon distinguished himself among his fellow-students. He studied for the law, but abandoned that profession, in disgust at the exorbitant and unjust charges which he beheld made upon suitors, and from other corruptions by which he saw the machinery of the law upheld. After visiting France three different times previous to the breaking out of the great Revolution, he became acquainted with M. Dumont, the Swiss librarian of the marquis of Lansdowne, then residing at Bowood. This gentleman greatly assisted him in the improving and the polishing of his compositions before they were given to the world. The biography of such a person as Bentham can contain little more than the record of his writings and opinions. The sum of his existence was the improvement of legislation and jurisprudence. The leading principle of his philosophy is, that the end of all human actions and morality is happiness. Finding, in a pamphlet of Dr. Priestley, the phrase, "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," he saw delineated, for the first time, "a plain as well as a true standard of whatever is right or wrong, useful, useless, or mischievous in human conduct, whether in the field of morals or politics." From this his whole life took its direction, and he laboured long and continually for what he conceived to be the happiness of his species. D. in London, Feb. 15, 1748; D. in Westminster, 1832. —The principal works of this distinguished judicial philosopher are his "Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation," a "Fragment on Government," a "Book of Fallacies," the "Rationale of Judicial Evidence," the "Plan of a Judicial Establishment," and his "Panopticon," a work on prison discipline. He produced many other books, and, in the words of Sir James Mackintosh, "has done more than any other writer to rouse the spirit of juridical reformation, which is now gradually examining every part of law; and, when further progress is facilitated by digesting the present laws, will doubtless proceed to the improvement of all. Greater praise is it given to few to earn."

Æ. William, ben'-tink, the first earl of Portland, was a page to William Prince of Orange (afterwards William III.), to whom he endeared himself by a singular act of devotion. The prince being ill of the small-pox, it was deemed necessary that he should receive the natural warmth of a young person in the same bed with him. Bentinck, though he never had had the distemper, immediately proposed himself for this hazardous service. He subsequently suffered severely from the disease, but recovered, and his master ever afterwards esteemed him as one of his greatest friends. He accompanied William to England, and, on the prince's accession to the English crown, he was created earl of Portland, and was employed in several high offices, military and civil, and attended his master on his death-bed. Æ. in Holland, 1648; D. in London, 1709, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

BENTINCK, Lord William Charles Cavendish, the second son of the third duke of Portland, entered the army, and, after serving in Flanders, Russia, and Egypt, attained to high rank, and, in 1803, became governor of Madras. Here the singularity of his reforms in reference to the beards, moustaches, and turbans of the sepoy led, in 1805, to the mutiny at Vellore, which caused him to be recalled. On his return he received several diplomatic appointments, filled some military commands with indifferent success, and ultimately, under the government of Canning, was appointed to the governor-generalship of India. There again his reforming spirit led to much dissatisfaction as the soldiery. He, however, effected the lition of suttee, or the practice of widow-burning, which, on December 14th, 1829, was declared illegal. He also obtained the liberty for Englishmen to settle in India, although belonging to neither the military nor the civil service; systematically favoured the native population, and extended the liberty of the press. He also annexed the territory of the rajah of Coorg to the British possessions. In 1835 his health began to fail, when he resigned his office, and left Calcutta in the month of March of the same year. The native population regretted his departure, and erected an equestrian statue to commemorate his administration. After his arrival in England he became, in 1836, M.P. for Glasgow, for which city he sat until a few days before he died, when he resigned. B. 1774; D. at Paris, 1839.

BENTINCK. Lord William George Frederick Cavendish, was the third son of William Henry, fourth duke of Portland. This nobleman is best known as Lord George Bentinck, and entered the army, but quitted the profession of arms to take a part in the politics of his country. In 1826 he became private secretary to his uncle, George Canning, who was then secretary for foreign affairs. In 1827 he was returned to the House of Commons for the borough of King's Lynn, for which he sat till the close of his life. Up to 1846 he may be said to have been an ardent supporter of Sir Robert Peel; but when, in that year, that statesman repealed the corn-laws, he became one of his greatest opponents. B. 1802; D. 1843.—Lord George threw great ardour and energy into all that he undertook; and, with Mr. Disraeli for his ally, was one of the strongest opponents of free trade. He was passionately fond of horseracing, and was wont to say that "the winning of the Derby was the blue ribbon of the turf."—(See "Life," by Disraeli.)

BENTIVOGLIO, Guy, bain'-te-voll'-le-o, a cardinal, was sent as nuncio to Flanders by Paul V., to endeavour to bring it again under the papal authority; and here it was he wrote his historical work on the insurrection of Flanders against the Spaniards, and the subsequent wars of the duke of Alva and the Hollanders. In 1616 Bentivoglio was sent as nuncio to France, and in 1621 was made a cardinal, and afterwards became the confidant of Urban VIII., whom it was supposed he would have succeeded as pope but for his death. B. at Ferrara, 1570; D. 1644.

BENTIVOGLIO, Hercules, an Italian poet, whose satires are considered next in merit to those of Ariosto. B. at Bologna, 1506; D. at Venice, 1573.

BENTLEY, Richard, bent'-le, a celebrated divine and critic, who, from Wakefield school, was sent, at the age of fifteen, to St. John's College, Cambridge. Thence he removed to Oxford, where he took the degree of M.A., and, in 1691, published a Latin epistle to Dr. Mill, containing critical observations on the Chronology of John Malala. He was the first appointed to preach the lecture founded by Mr. Boyle, on which occasion he delivered eight admirable discourses in confutation of atheism. In 1693 he was appointed keeper of the royal library. In 1697 commenced his famous controversy with the Honourable Mr. Boyle on the genuineness of the epistles of Phalaris, in which much personal abuse passed on both sides; but, though some of the greatest wits of the age were on the side of Boyle, posterity has determined the case in favour of Bentley. About this time he was presented to the mastership of Trinity College, Cambridge, with which he held the archdeaconry of Ely; but, in consequence of some encroachments made by him on the college for his own emolument, a charge was laid against him, which never came to a determination. He afterwards became regius professor of divinity, when, having exacted an exorbitant fee from persons who were admitted to the degree of D.D. by mandate, he was suspended in the vice-chancellor's court. This arbitrary decree was subsequently reversed by the court of King's Bench, and the doctor was restored to his privileges. B. at Oulton, in Yorkshire, in 1681; D. 1742.—Dr. Bentley is advantageously known as a critic by his editions of Horace, Terence, and Phædrus, his unrivalled epistle to Mill, and his splendid dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris. These last established his reputation throughout Europe as a critic of the very highest order of excellence.

BENTLEY, Sir John, a brave English admiral, who, having served under A. Atthews, Anson, Hawke, and Boscawen, with much distinction, was knighted for his gallant conduct, having been present in every affair which could be dignified with the name of a battle from the action under Admiral Matthews, in 1744, to the defeat by Sir Edward Hawke of the last naval armament attempted by France during the war. While captain of the Barfleur, in 1756, he was one of the court-martial which tried the unfortunate admiral Byng. In 1763 he was appointed rear-admiral of the White, and after attaining the rank of vice-admiral, he died, Dec. 14, 1772.

BENVENUTO CELLINI. (See CELLINI.)

BENYOWSKY, ben'-e-ous'-ke, Count Mauritius Augustus de, an Hungarian adventurer, who in 1768 joined the confederacy of the Poles against the Russians. Falling into the hands of the latter, he was exiled to Kamtschatka; but, gaining the good offices of the governor, Nilof, he was made preceptor to his children, which gave him favourable opportunities of maturing a plan of escape. Afterwards, accompanied by eighty-five exiles, his companions, he quitted Kamtschatka, and, in 1771, sailed to Formosa, and afterwards to Macao, where the greater part of his comrades died. On his return to France, he was commissioned to found a colony in Madagascar, and in 1774 landed there, but, through endeavouring to make conquests in the island, he offended the natives, who destroyed the settlement, and compelled him to quit the country in 1779. In 1783 he sought assistance from England and America for another expedition to Madagascar, and landed there in 1785. At the commencement of hostilities against the French he was mortally wounded. Benyowsky wrote his memoirs and an account of his travels. B. at Verbowna, 1741; fell, 1786.

BERANGER, Pierre Jean de, bas'-rawnz'-ai, a French poet, who, from being first a tailor, became a printer, and then a writer of poetry. His first performances were by no means propitious to his fame or his fortunes; and when Napoleon I. was in Egypt, Béranger entertained the idea of proceeding to that country and realizing a dream of riches and glory with which he had been haunted. This, however, circumstances prevented; and, in 1803, when suffering from great indigence, he sent some of his poems to Lucien Bonaparte, who subsequently assigned him an income as a member of the Institute,

He now continued to write, became an editor, and, in 1803, was appointed a clerk in the secretary's department in the Academy. By this time he had written many songs, and had become popular. His effusions had spread far and wide; and as many of them were pointed satires against the governments which succeeded the fall of Napoleon, he was, in 1821, discharged from his office, and subsequently, up to 1830, was twice fined and imprisoned. In the revolution of that year, he says, "he was treated with as one of the great powers;" but he remained free and independent. After the revolution he was elected a representative of the department of the Seine, in the Constituent Assembly, but soon resigned the honour which the admiration of his country had forced upon him. In his retirement he continued to chant and employ himself with a biography of his contemporaries, but did not publish so freely as he had formerly done. B. at Paris, 1780; D. in Paris, July 17, 1857.—His funeral, on the day after his death, was attended by an immense concourse, who assembled to pay their last tribute of respect to the remains of one of the greatest of the national poets of France.

BERCHETT, Peter, bair'-shai, a French historical painter and engraver, who painted the ceiling of the chapel in Trinity College, Oxford. B. 1659; D. 1720.

BERENGARIA, wife of Richard Cœur de Lion. (See RICHARD I.)

BERENGARIUS, Jacobus, bai'-rain-ga'-re-us, an eminent anatomist of Carpi, was the first to discover the peculiar curative qualities of mercury, and used it with great effect. Lived in the first half of the 16th century.—He amassed great wealth, which he bequeathed to the duke of Ferrara.

BERENGER or BERENGARIUS, bai'-rainzh'-ai, a conspicuous controversialist of the 11th century, was the contemporary and rival of the great Lanfranc, master of the seminary of Bee, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury under the Conqueror and Rufus. Berenger was unequal in ability and learning to Lanfranc, and feeling his inferiority, took to somewhat heretical opinions in order to obtain, as is alleged, that distinction from novelty which he could not gain by his talent. This involved him in difficulties, and he was several times tried and condemned for unsoundness of faith. In consequence of his controversies with Lanfranc and others, on the eucharistic presence, it is believed the church of Rome was first induced formally to adopt the doctrine of transubstantiation. B. at St. Cosme, near Tours, Jan. 6, 1083, aged 90.

BERENICE, ber'-e-ni-ce, daughter of Agrippa the Elder, king of the Jews. She was married to Herod, her uncle, after whose death she became the wife of Ptolemy, king of Cilicia; but she afterwards left her husband, and lived, until she went to Rome, with her brother Agrippa. Titus fell in love with her, and would have declared her empress, but for fear of the Roman people. B. 28.—Berenice forms the subject of one of Racine's tragedies.

BERENICIUS, Paul Peter, ber'-e-ni'-e-us, a Dutch poet and adventurer, who was conjectured to be an expelled Jesuit, and got his livelihood by sweeping chimneys and grinding knives. It is reported that he would turn into extempore verses what was said to him in prose; translate the gazettes from Flemish into Greek or Latin verse, standing on one foot; that modern and ancient languages were quite familiar to him; and that he knew by heart Horace, Virgil, Homer, Aristophanes, and several parts of Cicero and Pliny. He was suffocated in a bog, into which he fell while in a state of intoxication. The "Georgarchonismachia" is attributed to him. Lived about the middle of the 17th century.

BERESFORD, William Carr, Viscount, ber'-es-ford, was the natural son of the first Marquis of Waterford, and early entered the army. He served in Nova Scotia, at Toulon, and several other places, when, in 1803, he went to Portugal with the British forces, and organized the Portuguese army. On May 4th, 1811, he invested Badajoz, and on the 16th defeated Marshal Scult at Albuera. In 1812, he was wounded at Salamanca; and, under Wellington, had command of a division at Vittoria and Bayonne, where he greatly distinguished himself. On the 10th of April, 1814, he carried the heights of Toulouse, and was created a British peer, with the title of Baron Beresford. In 1814 and 1815 he was at Brazil; and on his return resumed the command of the army of Portugal, but in a few years resigned it. In 1823 he was made Viscount Beresford; in 1823 was appointed master-general of the ordnance; and, at the time of his death, was governor of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and also governor of Jersey. B. 1763; D. at Dedgebury Park, Kent, 1854.

BERETTINI, Peter, surnamed PETER of CORTONA, bai'-rai-te'-ne, an eminent Tuscan painter, remarkable for the boldness of his conceptions. He decorated many chapels at Rome, as also the Barberini Palace; then went to Florence, where he painted the ceiling of the Pitti Palace. His style, however, is described as loose, and as having tended to corrupt the taste of his age. B. at Cortona, 1596; D. 1680.

BERG, Mathias van den, bairg, a Flemish painter, who became a pupil of Rubens. He excelled chiefly as a skilful copyist, being defective in composition. B. 1615; D. 1647.

BERGEN, Dirk van den, bair'-jen, a celebrated landscape and animal painter, who was a pupil of Vanderveldt. B. at Haarlem, about 1690; D. 1699.

BRAGHEM, Nicholas, bairg'-hem, a Dutch painter, celebrated for his landscapes, into which he introduced architectural ruins, and groups of figures and cattle so admirably arranged that they appeared directly copied from nature. Some of his compositions are in the Dulwich Gallery. His drawings and etchings are also very beautiful, and are eagerly sought after. B. at Haarlem, 1624; D. 1653.

BRAGHIER, Nicholas, bair'-ge-ri, a French historian, who wrote a "History of the Great Roads of the Roman Empire." This work is of great utility to the student of ancient geography, and the best edition is that of 1736, published at Brussels. B. at Rheims, 1607; D. at Grignon, 1623.

BRAGLER, Joseph, bairg'-ler, an eminent historical painter, and director of the Academy of Prague, where he trained several distinguished artists. His principal works are altar-pieces for the churches in Prague and the neighbourhood. B. at Salzburg in 1753; D. at Prague in 1829. He was especially distinguished as a generally effective colourist.

BRAGMAN, Torbern Olof, bairg'-man, a celebrated Swedish chemist, was educated at Upsal, where he devoted himself to medicine and the sciences connected with it. Here he gained the friendship of Linnæus, to whom he communicated a collection of nondescript insects, to one of which Linnæus gave the name of Bergman. In 1761 he was appointed professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Upsal, and we find his name in the list of those who observed the transit of Venus in 1761. In 1767 he obtained the chemical professorship. We are indebted to him for the knowledge of the nature of fixed air, and for a number of chemical discoveries. He was knighted by the king of Sweden, and received a pension of 150 rix-dollars; and his wife, at his death, received a pension of 200 rix-dollars, on condition of giving up his library and apparatus to the Royal Society of Upsala. His works were published in 6 vols., under the title of "Opuscula Physica et Chemica," p. at Catherinberg, 1735; p. at 784.

BERKELEY, George, earl of berk'-le, descended from Robert Fitzharding, of the royal house of Denmark, was one of the privy council to Charles II., and bestowed on Sion College a valuable library. He was the author of an excellent little book, entitled "Historical Applications and Occasional Meditations upon Several Subjects, written by a Person of Honour," 12mo, 1670. p. 1698.

BERKELEY, Sir William, of the same family, was vice-admiral of the white, and led the van in the desperate engagement with the Dutch, June 1, 1666. He steered into the midst of the enemy's fleet, where he was overpowered by numbers, was mortally wounded, and at the close of the action was found dead in his cabin, covered with blood.

BERKELEY, John, Lord Berkeley of Stratton, a distinguished British admiral, who, in concert with Sir Cloudesley Shovel, Admiral Russel, and Vice-Admiral Aylmer, undertook various expeditions against the coast of France between the years 1693 and 1698, several of which—such as those at Brest and Dunkirk—were unfortunate in their results, while others were eminently successful. He died of pleurisy and fever in 1698, aged 34, after having been eight years an admiral—an almost solitary instance of any one attaining so high a rank at so early an age in the British service. He owed his promotion, however, not to favouritism, but to the general confidence in his ability, integrity, and patriotism.

BERKELEY, George, a celebrated divine, who was educated first at Kilkenny, and next at Trinity College, Dublin, of which he was chosen fellow in 1707. The same year he published "Arithmetica absque Algebra aut Euclide demonstrata." In 1709 he published his "Theory of Vision," which was the first attempt that ever was made to distinguish the immediate and natural objects of sight from the conclusions we have been accustomed from infancy to draw from them. In 1710 appeared the "Principles of Human Knowledge," and in 1713 the "Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous," the object of both being to disprove the common notion of the existence of matter, and to establish the hypothesis that material objects have no other existence than in the mind. However singular his opinions were, there was so much beauty in his writings that the greatest men—amongst others Steele and Swift—courted his friendship. For the former he wrote several papers in the "Guardian," and through him became intimate with Pope. Swift recommended him to the earl of Peterborough, who took him abroad as his chaplain. In 1714 he returned to England, but set out again for the continent, with a son of Dr. Ashe, bishop of Clogher, and continued on his travels four years. He returned in 1721, and became chaplain to the duke of Grafton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. At this time he took his degree of D.D., and a fortune was bequeathed to him by a lady of Dublin. In 1724 he was promoted to the deanery of Derry, and the year following he printed a proposal for converting the American Indians, by erecting a college in the Bermudas. His mind was so intent on this project that he obtained a grant of £10,000 from the Commons, and set sail for America, where he resided nearly two years: but the scheme failed, owing to the minister having applied the money to other purposes. In 1732 he published the "Minute Philosopher," in 2 vols. 8vo, which is a masterly attack on infidelity. The next year he was made bishop of Cloyne, and about this time published the "Analyst," in which he endeavoured to prove that the mathematicians admitted mysteries, and even falsities in science, particularly instancing the doctrine of fluxions. He was answered by several writers, to whom he replied in 1739, in "A Defence of Freethinking in Mathematics." In 1736 he published the "Queries," addressed to magistrates, occasioned by the licentiousness of the times; and in 1744 his book on the virtues of tar-water made its appearance. p. at Kilerin, in Ireland, 1634; p. at Oxford in 1753, and was buried in Christ-church, where there is a monument to his memory.—Pope ascribed, no less justly than beautifully, to Berkeley, "every virtue under heaven." But Pope was not the only one who admired and loved the good bishop of Cloyne. Bishop Atterbury says, "So much understanding, so much innocence, and such humility, I did not think had been the portion of any but angels, till I saw this gentleman." He, of all mankind, died BERKEN, or BERQUEN, bair'-ken, a Fleming, who, in 1476, discovered the art of cutting and polishing the diamond by means of a wheel and diamond-powder. p. at the commencement of the 15th century.

BERKENHOUT, John, bair'-ken-hout, a physician and naturalist, who was descended from a Dutch family, and intended for the mercantile profession, which he quitted, and entered first into the military service of Prussia, and next into that of England. In 1760 he went to Edinburgh, and studied physic, but took his doctor's degree at Leyden in 1765. While at Edinburgh he published his "Clavis Anglica Lingue Botanice," a book of considerable merit. In 1778 he attended the British commissioners to America, and on his return obtained a pension, and resided for the remainder of his life at Isleworth. p. at Leeds, 1730; p. 1791.

BERKHUYDEN, Job, bair'-hi-den, a Dutch painter, who excelled in portraits and landscapes. p. at Haarlem, 1623; p. 1698.—His brother Gerard, also a painter, was famed for his architectural designs. p. 1645; p. 1693.

Oxford, of which he became fellow. In 1641 he was named governor of Virginia; and, during the civil war, took the side of the king, Virginia being the last of the colonies to acknowledge the authority of Cromwell. In 1651 he was compelled to submit to the rule of the Commonwealth; but, on the death of Governor Matthews, who had been appointed by Cromwell, he resumed the government, on condition that the people would submit to the king's authority. This was agreed to, and Charles II. was accordingly proclaimed in Virginia before his restoration to the throne took place in England. n. 1677. Governor Berkley had local as well as national difficulties to contend with, the most harassing of which were his quarrels with General Nathaniel Bacon, the "rebel" (whom see).

BERLIOZ, Hector, haur'-le-oz, an eminent French musician, whose father was a physician, and who was forced to study for the medical profession greatly against his inclinations. When he reached his twentieth year, he was sent to Paris to finish his studies; but there the natural bent of his genius prevailed over every other consideration. He quitted the lectures of the faculty and entered the Conservatoire de Musique, and in 1830 gained the first prize of the Conservatoire by his cantata of "Sardanapalus." He then went to Italy, where he studied for eighteen months, when he returned and produced his overture to "King Lear." He now gradually rose in fame, and is the author of a great many works, although public opinion is divided as to his merits as a composer. As a conductor of concerts, however, he has attained considerable eminence in England, Germany, and Russia. n. at Côte-St.-André, in the department of Isère, 1803.

BERNADOTTE, Jean Baptiste Jules Marshal. (See CHARLES XIV. of Sweden.)

BERNARD of Menthon, St. ber'-nard, founder of the monasteries of the Great and Little St. Bernard in the Alps, was born at Annecy, in 923, and died in 1003, after having established, and himself superintended for several years, these most benevolent institutions, the monks of which have ever since continued to fulfil the aims of their excellent founder—that of rescuing lost travellers in the snows of the Alps, a task in which they are greatly aided by the celebrated St. Bernard race of dogs.

BERNARD of Thuringia, a hermit, who, at the close of the 10th century, announced that the end of the world was approaching. A total eclipse of the sun happening at that time, many people hid themselves in caves; but the return of light dispelled their fears; the hermit retired to his cell, and the world resumed its tranquillity, although confidence was not entirely restored till the end of the 11th century.

BERNARD, St., the founder of the order of Bernardines, one of the most distinguished saints of the Romish calendar, was educated at the university of Paris, which in his time was one of the most celebrated seats of learning in Europe, and, at the age of 22, entered the Cistercian monastery of Cîteaux, near Dijon, inducing upwards of thirty of his companions to accompany him in his retirement. By his rigorous practice of the austerities of the order (the strictest in France), Bernard so recommended himself, that he was chosen, in 1115, head of the colony which founded the abbey of Clairvaux. His celebrity was so great, that, in 1123, he was employed to draw up the statutes of the order of the Templars; and his influence prevailed so far at the courts of both France and England as to induce them to acknowledge, contrary to justice, Innocent II. as legitimate pope, in opposition to Anacleto. In 1148 he persuaded the king of France, and other sovereigns, to enter on a crusade, and was offered the command of the army, which, however, he refused. He was canonized by Alexander III. in 1174. n. at Fontaines, 1081; n. at Clairvaux, 1153.—His works were published in Paris in 4 vols. by Gaume, in 1835-40.

BERNARD, Claude, surnamed "Poor Bernard," was the eldest son of a distinguished French magistrate, in the time of Henry IV., and after a youth spent in dissipation, took orders and consecrated his life to aiding the poor, the sick, and the criminal. For twenty years he exercised his charity at the hospitals in Paris, devoting his heritage of £20,000 to the use of the unfortunate. n. at Dijon, 1533; n. at Paris, 1641.

BERNARD, duke of Saxe-Weimar, a celebrated general, who was one of the principal supports of the Protestant cause in Germany during the Thirty-years War. His first essay in arms was made under the king of Bohemia, and when nineteen years of age he distinguished himself at the battle of Wimpfen. He afterwards served under Gustavus Adolphus, gaining several advantages over Wallenstein, and aiding in the taking of Wurtsburg and Mannheim. On the death of Gustavus, at the battle of Lützen, 1632, he took the command of the army, and followed up the victory. In 1634, however, he was beaten in the decisive battle of Nordlingen, which was gained by the Imperialists. From that time he allied himself closely to France, which had joined the Protestant league, and succeeded and retook several towns—amongst others, Mayence, in 1635, and effected an admirable retreat into Lorraine. Subsequently, in 1636, he supported the movements of Condé in Burgundy, and in 1638 took Rheinfeld, Friebourg, and Brisach. In the midst of his successes he died, some say by poison, near Neubourg on the Rhine, 1639. n. at Weimar, 1604.

BERNARD, Richard, a Puritan divine, and scholar, was the first to translate Terence into English, and also wrote several original works, such as "The Faithful Shepherd," "Look Beyond Luther," "Thesaurus Biblicus," &c. He was educated at Cambridge, and was vicar of Worksop, in Notts, and subsequently rector of Batcombe, Somerset, where he died in 1611; n. 1566.

BERNARD, Samuel, a French painter and engraver, who was a pupil of Vouet and professor in the Royal Academy at Paris. He excelled in miniatures and paintings in water colours. His son, the celebrated banker, Samuel Bernard, rendered valuable services to the government of Louis XIV. and XV. n. at Paris, 1615; n. there, 1687.

BERNARD, J. Frederick, a learned Dutch writer and publisher, who established himself at Amsterdam in 1711. He is the author of a number of works, of which the most important are a "Collection of Voyages to the North," "Religious Customs and Ceremonies of all Nations," and "Ancient and Modern Superstitions." n. 1752.

BERNARD, Catherine, a celebrated French authoress, who composed many novels, poems, and two tragedies, "Brutus" and "Lodamia," the former of which was much esteemed. She was admitted a member of the Académie des Récovrati at Padua, and obtained the poetical prizes many times at the French Academy, and at the Floral Games at Toulouse. She was the friend of Fontenelle. B. at Rouen, 1662; D. at Paris, 1712.

BERNARD, James, a French divine, who was educated at Geneva, after which he became minister of the church of Vinsobres; but when the persecution commenced, he retired to Switzerland till the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and then went to Holland, where he established a school for fine arts, philosophy, and mathematics. He wrote an historical and political account of the state of Europe, and succeeded Le Clerc in the management of the "Bibliothèque Universelle." In 1693 he continued the "Nouvelles de la République des Lettres." In 1705 he was chosen one of the ministers of the Walloon church at Leyden, and professor of philosophy and mathematics in that university B. at Nîmes, 1653; D. 1718.

BERNARD, Edward, a learned astronomer and philologist, who, in 1669, was appointed deputy to Sir Christopher Wren in the Savilian professorship of astronomy, and, in 1673, succeeded that great man. In 1684 he took his degree of D.D.; and, in 1691, was presented to the rectory of Brightwell, in Berkshire. B. near Towcester, 1638; D. at Oxford, 1697.—Bernard is celebrated for his knowledge of the Eastern languages and mathematics, and for the labour he expended in searching for and collecting MSS. for the reprints of the old mathematicians which rendered the Oxford press famous at that period. His works are very numerous.

BERNARD, Peter Joseph, called by Voltaire, Gentil-Bernard ("pleasant"), showed, at an early age, a great taste for poetry, and though at first only an attorney's clerk, afterwards became secretary to Marshal Coigny, who had the command of the army of Italy. After the marshal's death, he obtained a lucrative appointment, and was now able to indulge his poetic tendencies. He wrote an opera, "Castor and Pollux," which had a great success; "The Art of Loving," and a number of odes, songs, &c. His works were collected and reprinted in 1803. B. at Grenoble, 1710; D. at Paris, 1775.—In 1771, Gentil-Bernard, having been guilty of an excess, entirely lost his memory, and for four years was in a state of imbecility.

BERNARDES, Diego, bair-nar'-dais, a Portuguese poet, who especially succeeded in the idyl, and is regarded as the Theocritus of Portugal. He called a collection of his eclogues "Lyma," from the name of the stream on the banks of which he composed his verses. B. about 1540; D. 1596.

BERNARD, Charles de, a French novelist, who wrote many novels and romances of a pleasing character from 1833 to 1847. His best works are "The Yellow Rose," and "Gerfaud." He belonged to a distinguished French family. B. at Besançon, 1804; D. at Sablonville, 1850.

BERNARDIN, St., bair-nar'-den, of Siena, an Italian monk, whose courage and charity were conspicuous during the plague which ravaged Siena in 1400. In 1404 he entered the order of Franciscans, and was sent to the Holy Land. On his return to Italy he founded above 300 monasteries. He was much respected by the emperor Sigismund, and his eloquence had the most beneficial effect on all classes in Italy. B. at Massa-Carrara, 1380; D. at Aquila, 1444.

Bernini

BERNAZZANO, bair-nawd'-dso'-no, an Italian painter of the 14th century, who excelled in landscape, fruit, flowers, and animals. D. 1538.

BERNERS, John Bourchier, Lord, ber'-ners, a favourite of Henry VIII., who employed him in several capacities, and gave him the appointment of governor of Calais, where he remained until his death. B. about 1474; D. 1532.—He was the author of several productions; but his greatest work is his translation of Froissart's "Chronicles," which was undertaken by the king's command.

BERNERS, Juliana. (See BARNES, Juliana.)

BERNETTI, Thomas, ber-net'-ti, a cardinal and Italian statesman, born at Fermo in 1779; was minister of war under Pius VII. in 1816. He was created a cardinal in 1827. After the accession of Gregory XVI. he offended the Austrian government by persuading the pope to enrol troops for the defence of the state, instead of depending as formerly on Austrian soldiers. On quitting office in 1836, Gregory made him vice-chancellor of the Romish church. When Pius IX. became pope, he laboured earnestly to bring about the reforms that were so much needed at the Papal court, and when the pope left Rome in 1849, and retired to Gaeta, he returned to Fermo, where he died, 1852.

BERNIA, or BERNI, Francis, bair'-ne-aw, an Italian poet and canon of Florence, who is famous for his witty and satirical pieces, and has given his name to that class of writing in Italy. He was attached to Alexander and Hippolytus de Medici, who had quarrelled, and is supposed to have been poisoned by the former. D. 1536.—He is called the Scarron of the Italians.

BERNIEB, François, bair'-ne-ai, a French traveller and physician, whose account of his travels was much appreciated, as he visited countries before unknown to Europeans, and threw considerable light on the state of India up to the time of Aurungzebe, at whose court he resided twelve years, during eight of which he held the appointment of physician to the emperor. B. at Angers, about 1625; D. 1698.

BERNINI, or BERNIN, bair'-ne'-ne, Giovanni Lorenzo, a Florentine sculptor and architect, exercised his profession chiefly at Rome, where he produced his most famous works; amongst which may be mentioned "The Confession of St. Peter," the Barberini Palace, and the front of the College de Propaganda Fide. He executed also three busts of Charles I. of England from a picture by Vandyck, on viewing which he is said to have observed, that it was "the most unfortunate face he ever beheld." At the age of 68 he visited Paris, at the pressing invitation of Louis XIV., and his progress to that city was one continuous ovation. He was received by Louis as a man whose presence honoured France; but when he saw the front of the Louvre, then being erected under Claude Perrault, Bernini said "that a country which had architects of that stamp had no need of him." While at Paris he executed a bust of Louis XIV., and on his return to Rome an equestrian statue of the same monarch, which was placed at Versailles. At 80 years of age he executed a statue of Christ, and presented it to Queen Christina of Sweden, who, however, declined it, saying she was not rich enough to pay for it as it deserved; he, however, bequeathed it to her by his will. Bernini was also a painter, and left about 150 pictures. b. at Naples, 1593; d. at Rome, 1680.

Bernis

BERNIS, Francis Joachim de Pierres de, bair'-na, a French cardinal and archbishop of Albi, who was indebted to the marchioness de Pompadour affairs, and obtained a cardinal's hat. But the ill success of the French arms, and the derangement of the finances, occasioned his disgrace and temporary banishment from court. In 1714 he was recalled, and nominated archbishop of Albi. He afterwards was appointed ambassador to the pope, and had a considerable share in procuring the destruction of the Jesuits. He had the additional title of Protector of the French Church at Rome, where he lived in splendour and hospitality till the Revolution disordered his finances, on which he obtained a pension from the court of Spain. He wrote some works, consisting principally of poems. b. at St. Marcel, 1715; d. at Rome, 1794.

BERNOULLI, James, bair'-noo-eel'-e, a famous mathematician, who was destined for the Reformed church, but whose inclination led him to the study of mathematics, which he pursued privately and without any assistance but from books. In 1676 he set out on his travels, and at Geneva devised a method of teaching a blind girl to write. He wrote a treatise on the comet which appeared in 1680, and soon after went to Holland, where he studied the new philosophy. He returned to Bâle in 1692, and read lectures on experimental philosophy and mechanics. About 1684, Leibnitz published, in the "Acta Eruditorum" at Leipsic, some essays on his new calculus differentials, but without discovering the method. Bernouilli, however, and his brother, discovered the secret, and were highly praised by Leibnitz. His works were printed at Geneva, 1744. b. at Bâle, 1654; d. 1705.

BERNOULLI, John, brother of the above, whose labours in the sciences he shared, was in 1695 appointed professor of mathematics at Groningen, and on the death of James he returned to Bâle, where he succeeded him in the professorship of mathematics. In 1714 he published a treatise on the management of ships; and in 1730 his memoir on the elliptical figure of the planets gained the prize of the Academy of Sciences. His writings were published at Geneva in 1742. b. at Bâle, 1667; d. 1748.—John Bernouilli left two sons, Daniel and John, and a nephew Nicholas, who were all celebrated for their mathematical acquirements.

BERNSTORFF, John Hartwig Ernest, Count of bairn'-storf, a celebrated Danish statesman, who in 1750 became prime minister of Denmark under Frederic V., in which office he distinguished himself as the patron of manufactures, commerce, and art. Under Christian VII. he was created a count, but was deprived of the offices he held at the instigation of Struensee; at whose death, however, he was reinstated. He emancipated the peasants on his estates, who in gratitude raised a monument to his memory. b. at Hanover, 1712; d. at Hamburg, 1772.

BERNSTORFF, Andrew Peter, Count of, nephew of the preceding, was educated at Leipsic and Göttingen, and after travelling through Europe, became gentleman of the chamber to the king of Denmark. He was created count in 1767, and in 1769 was appointed prime minister,

b. 1700; d. 1797.

BERNSTORFF, Christian Gantner, son of the above, was appointed minister of foreign affairs in 1797, after his father's death; but his conduct did not contribute to maintain the reputation of the family name. His obstinacy in persisting in arming Danish neutral merchant-ships brought his country into collision with England, and led to the attack on Copenhagen. He was subsequently ambassador at Vienna and Berlin; and finally renounced his country, and joined the Prussian ministry in 1818, as chief foreign minister, and distinguished himself by his determined opposition to the introduction of constitutional government in Germany. b. 1760; d. 1835.

BERNULF, or Beornwulph, bair'-nulf, a king of Mercia, who, in 821, usurped the government on the death of Ceolwulf. He only held power for about a year, having been killed by the East Anglians in their efforts to throw off the Mercian yoke.

BERGALDO, Filippo, bair'-o-arl'-do, console one of the greatest literary characters of his age, was born at Bologna in 1453, of a noble and opulent family. He was carefully educated, and became professor of belles lettres in the university of his native town. He wrote numerous works in elegant Latin, which extended to 40 volumes. d. 1505.

BERQUIN, Arnauld, bair'-kã, a French writer, who first distinguished himself by his idylls, which are full of sensibility and sweetness, but whose principal work is his "Ami des Enfants" (The Children's Friend), which the French Academy declared to be the most useful book that had been published during the year. He translated from the English, "Sandford and Merton," and several other interesting and wholesome books for youth. b. at Bordeaux, 1749; d. at Paris, 1791.

BERRE, Frederick, bair, an eminent French musician, who at the age of sixteen, became bandmaster of a regiment of the line, was professor of the clarionet at the Conservatoire at Paris, and a member of the Legion of Honour. He wrote 500 original pieces of military instrumental music, besides several arrangements and solos, especially for the clarinet, which are highly esteemed as some of the finest music for that instrument in existence. b. at Mannheim in 1794; d. 1833.

BERREY, or BERRI, bair'-re, the title borne by several princes of the royal family of France, at various periods of the history of that country, none of whom, however, were particularly distinguished for either ability or virtue. Two of the dukes of Berry—John, son of John II. of France, and Charles, son of Charles VII.—took part, from ambitious and selfish motives, in the wars which desolated France in the 13th and 14th centuries, and generally known as the wars of the Burgundians and Armagnacs, and those between Charles the Bold of Burgundy and the crafty Louis XI.

BERREY, Sir John, ber'-e, an English naval commander, who first distinguished himself at the battle of Southwold Bay, for which he was, knighted. In 1632 he commanded the Gloucester frigate, in which James, duke of York, was proceeding to Scotland; and when that vessel was wrecked at the mouth of the Humber, he, by his presence of mind, saved the prince, with many about him. On the prince of Orange's approach, in 1633, Sir John Berry became sole commander of the fleet; but on William III.'s accession to the throne, he attached himself to his government, and so retained his appointments and influence. He was poisoned while paying off a king's ship. b. in Devonshire, 1635; p. at Portsmouth, 1691. v

BERRY, Caroline Ferdinande Louise, Duchesse de, bair-re, the daughter of Ferdinand I., king of Naples and Sicily, was married to the Duke de Berry, the second son of Charles X. The duke was assassinated on a Sunday, whilst handing the duchess to a carriage as she came out of the opera-house. She passed through a variety of troubles, and in 1830, after the second French revolution, accompanied Charles X. to Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh. In 1832 a movement in La Vendée took place in her favour. She was under hiding in Nantes, when, being betrayed by a converted Jew, she was found in a small hole behind a stove, where she had been inclosed for sixteen hours, and was carried to the castle of Blaye. In 1833 she was released, having married a son of the prince of Lucchesi-Palli, with whom she retired to Sicily. b. at Naples, 1788.

BERRYER, Pierre Antoine, bair-re-ai, a distinguished French advocate and pleader, who, in 1815, assisted in the defence of the generals who followed Napoleon I. to Waterloo. From that period he rose to great eminence as a defender of order and an asserter of the liberties of his country. He unsuccessfully defended Louis Napoleon on his trial for landing at Boulogne, and in 1855 was engaged for the defence of the count de Montalembert, when that nobleman was proceeded against by the French government for certain alleged libellous expressions contained in his celebrated article in the "Correspondant" newspaper, "A Debate in the English Parliament on India." M. Berryer was a legitimist in politics—or rather had a chivalrous respect for the race of the ancient kings of France; but has all through life been distinguished for the moderateness of his views and his opposition to tyranny and despotic rule. In 1830, he was returned to the Chamber of Deputies by the Haute Loire, and was the ornament, but never the tool, of his party. He did not follow the Bourbons into exile after the revolution of 1830, but remained in France to act as a centre for the action of the friends of the dynasty. Since the coup d'état of the 2nd of December, 1851, which placed all but despotic power in the hands of Louis Napoleon, M. Berryer has taken little part in politics, excepting to use his influence to effect a reconciliation of the two branches of the French Bourbons. He was elected a member of the French Academy in 1855, and in his inauguration address made certain allusions which were offensive to the government, and the publication of the oration was suppressed. The interdiction, however, was removed within twenty-four hours. In 1860-61, he was engaged in the famous Patterson-Bonaparte cause; and on the anniversary of his fiftieth year at the bar, was entertained at a splendid banquet by his confrères of all shades of opinion. b. in Paris, 1790; p. 1868.

BERTAULT, John, bair-to, a French bishop and poet, whose first essays charmed the court of Henry III. He was mainly instrumental, with the cardinal of Penon, in the conversion of Henry IV., who gave him the rich abbey of Amay, and he was named chief chaplain to Marie de Medici on her marriage with the French monarch. In 1606 he was made bishop of Séz. His poems were printed at Paris in 1620; and besides these he wrote several theological pieces. b. at Caen, 1552; p. 1611.

BERTHIER, Alexander, bair-te-ai, one of the marshals of Napoleon I., prince of Neuchâtel and Wagram, and vice-constable of France. He first served in the American War of Independence, under Lafayette, and at the commencement of the French revolution was made a general. He behaved with great bravery in La Vendée, and was at the head of Napoleon's staff in Italy, Egypt, and Germany. Indeed, he occupied the first place in the confidence of the emperor, and was with him in all his expeditions. In 1814 he submitted to the new régime and was created a peer; but when the emperor escaped from Elba, he retired to his family at Bamberg, where he shortly afterwards committed suicide by throwing himself from the third story of his palace. b. 1763; p. 1815.

BERTHOLLET, Claude Louis, bair-toi-at, one of the most eminent chemists of his day, who, with Lavoisier, Fourcroy, and Guyton de Morveau, planned a new chemical nomenclature, which, with all its drawbacks, was found of essential service to chemical science. He accompanied Napoleon I. in his Egyptian expedition; and on his return became a senator and an officer of the Legion of Honour. On the fall of the emperor, however, he was among the first to desert him; and Louis XVIII. conferred on him the title of count. His greatest work is "Essai de Statique Chimique;" but he wrote a great number of memoirs and other scientific essays. b. at Tullioire, in Savoy, 1743; p. 1822.

BERTHUS, Peter, bair-te-os, a Flemish geographer, who became professor of philosophy at Leyden, which office he lost for being an Arminian. He then went to Paris, joined the Romish church, and was made cosmographer to Louis XIII., and professor of mathematics. b. at Bavenre, 1665; p. 1629.—His best works are "Theatrum Geographia Veteris," and an "Introduction to Universal Geography."

BERWICK, James Fitz-James, duke of and marshal, ber-ik, was the illegitimate son of James II. of England, by Arabella Churchill, sister of the celebrated John Churchill, duke of Marlborough. Berwick was educated in France, joined the imperial army, and fought under the duke of Lorraine in Hungary. He was created duke of Berwick by his father in 1687; and on the expulsion of James from England, accompanied him into exile. He was present at the battle of the Boyne, and in 1690 was named commander-in-chief of his father's Irish army. He subsequently joined the French army, attempted in 1696 to excite an insurrection in England, and is said to have been cognizant of Barkly's plot to assassinate William III. He afterwards distinguished himself in suppressing the religious wars in the south of France, gained high reputation in the war of the Spanish succession, defeating, in 1708, the earl of Stanhope at Almanza, thereby seating Philip V. on the Spanish throne. He was created a Spanish grandee for his services, was made duke of Liria and Xerica; and was from that time reckoned one of the ablest generals of the day, the French government entrusting him with a variety of important commands, in all of which he acquitted himself with ability. He was killed by a cannon-ball on the 12th of June, 1734, before the walls of Philippsburg, on the Rhine, the siege of which had been undertaken by his advice. The duke of Berwick was twice married: first, in 1695, to a daughter of the Earl of Clanricarde; and, second, to a lady named Bulkeley, in 1699. From the first marriage the dukes of Liria, in Spain, are descended; from the second sprung the dukes of Fitz-James in France. B. at Moulins, 1670.

BERZELIUS, Jons Jacob, ber-zel-le-us, a distinguished Swedish chemist, whose powers as an analyst were considered perfect. He rose to the highest honours in his native country, and, in 1838, the Royal Society of London awarded him the Copley medal. He was a member of almost all the learned societies in the world; and at his death the members of the scientific societies of his native country were mourning for two months out of respect for his memory B. at Wätersunda, East Gothland, 1779; D. at Stockholm, 1843.

BESSER, Frederick William, bes-sel, an eminent Prussian astronomer, who, in 1810, became director of an observatory erected by the king of Prussia at Königsberg. Here he pursued his labours uninterruptedly, and in 1818 produced his "Fundamenta Astronomiæ," a work which struck the greatest philosophers with amazement, and placed his reputation on the highest pinnacle of scientific renown. He produced many other works, and was elected a member of the most celebrated learned societies of the world. B. at Minden, 1784; D. 1846.

BESSIERES, Jean Baptiste, bes-se-air, one of the marshals of Napoleon I., and created by that emperor duke of Istria. He distinguished himself in many memorable battles, and at Marengo led the final charge which decided the fate of the day. He defeated Kutusoff at Olmutz, and at Jena, Friedland, and Eylau displayed the most consummate skill in handling his troops. For his conduct in the Peninsula, he was, in 1809, made duke of Istria, and at the battle of Esslingen, in Germany, he worsted the division of the Austrian general Hohenzollern. In the Russian expedition, he was commander of the cavalry of the Guard, and in 1813 commanded the whole of the French army in Germany. On the morning before the battle of Lutzen, Bessières fell, struck by a bullet in the breast, and for some time his death was kept a secret from the army. B. at Preissac, near Cahors, 1763; killed 1813.

BESSUS, bes-us, a Persian satrap of Bactria, who at first aided Darius against Alexander of Macedonia, but when the affairs of the Persian monarch became desperate, Bessus put him to death, and assumed the title of king; but he fell into the hands of Alexander two years after, was given up to the successor of Darius, and put to death with much cruelty.

BETANCOS, Domingo de, de-tant-so, a Spanish missionary, who, after having spent some years as a hermit in a cave on the island of Poma, near Naples, went to South America on a mission to the natives, and there spent a large portion of his life, displaying throughout a simplicity and purity of life somewhat unusual in the Spanish clergy of the period. It was at his instigation that Pope Paul III. issued the bull forbidding the persecution of the native Mexicans, on the ground that they really were of the same blood as the Spaniards, and that their destruction was not at all necessary to the glory of St. James and the spread of Christianity. Betancos returned to Spain in July, 1519, and died a month afterwards.

BETHAM, Sir William, bet-um, an eminent antiquary and genealogist, was created a Privy Keeper of Records at Dublin in 1802, and about eight years after, became Ulster-keeper-of-records. He spent his life in abstracting, arranging, and indexing the documents, &c., which had come under his observation. He amassed several hundreds of volumes of valuable information of this description, together with a large collection of rare and precious MSS. In 1826-7, he published a work, entitled "Irish Antiquarian Researches," in 1834, "The Origin and History of the Constitution of England, and of the Early Parliaments of Ireland," and the "Gael and Crim." In 1842, "Eretria Colloca" appeared, in which he maintained the identity of the Hiberno-Celtic, Etruscan, and Phœnician languages. B. at Stranorlar, Suff. Co., in 1779; D. suddenly near Dublin, from a collection of the heart, October 20, 1832.

BETHENCOURT, John de, bet-ten-kort, a Norman baron, who was elected king of the Normans, king of France, and being repulsed in the war with England, sought to repair his fortunes in foreign countries, and made a descent from Spain on the Canary Isles, in 1402. Not having sufficient force, however, he returned, and obtained reinforcements from Henry III. of Castile, with which he was successful, and became governor of the islands as a fief of Spain. He converted the greater portion of the Canaries to Christianity, the native king of the islands being baptized under the name of Louis. In the year 1406 he returned to Normandy, where he passed the remainder of his days. B. 1425.

BETHELL, Sir Richard, Lord Westbury, bet-el, an eminent English lawyer, was born at Bradford, Wiltshire, in 1800, his father being Dr. Bethell, a physician of Bristol, and descended from an ancient Welsh family. Bethell was called to the bar by the Middle Temple benchers in 1823; was made Q. C. in 1840; was returned to Parliament for Aylesbury in 1852; in 1853 was appointed solicitor-general; in 1856, attorney-general; and in 1851 was selected by Lord Palmerston to succeed Lord Campbell as Lord High Chancellor, when he was raised to the house of Peers by the title of Baron Westbury. His lordship is especially famous as a chancery lawyer, is an earnest advocate of law reform, an able debater, and had the chief share in accomplishing the change in the law which led to the establishment of the Court of Probate and Matrimonial Causes, presided over by Sir Cresswell Cresswell. His latest achievement is the reform of the bankruptcy laws, which he several times proposed, and only succeeded in passing in a modified form.

BETHLEN, Gabriel, Prince of Transylvania, bet-ten, one of the most distinguished men of his time, as well for high character, enlightened views and firmness, as for ability. He was a staunch friend of toleration in religion, which he allowed to all sects in his state; and determinedly resisted the persecuting tendencies of Ferdinand II. of Germany, whom he defeated in many battles, and compelled to sign treaties securing toleration in Hungary and elsewhere, Bethlen was elected king of the Hungarians in 1620, but declined to be crowned, satisfied with securing freedom to the country under the treaty of Nikoloburg, concluded in 1621. He never lost a battle, was a mediator between the Emperor and the Turks, and when he died in 1629, left Transylvania in a high state of prosperity. B. 1530.

BETHUNE, Alexander and John, beth'-u-n, two brothers born in the humblest rank of life in Fifeshire, Scotland, who lived in a rude cottage built by themselves, received no education save what they taught themselves, struggled hard with poverty through life, but are famous in death by their joint literary productions, such as the "Tales and Sketches of the Scottish Peasantry," "Practical Economy," poems, songs, &c., which they wrote in common, and which were published in two volumes. Alexander was born in 1804, and died in 1843; John was born in 1810, and died in his 30th year.

BETIS, bé-tis, governor of Gaza, for Darius, which city he courageously defended against Alexander the Great, who, after taking it, put him to death, and dragged his corpse at his chariot wheels, B.C. 332.

BETZERTON, Thomas, bét-er-ton, an English tragedian, born in the month of August, 1638, in Tothill-street, Westminster, being the son of an under-cook in the household of Charles I. He, however, received a good education, conceived a liking for the stage, was brought out by Sir William Davenant, and attained to the reputation of being the best actor of his day. He was especially famous for his rendering of Shakspeare, his Othello, Hamlet, Macbeth, Hotspur, and Brutus being deemed perfection. In 1695, he opened a theatre of his own, but failed in securing success, although Congreve wrote for him; and he died in reduced circumstances in 1710.

BEUST, Frederick Ferdinand, Baron von, boost, an eminent statesman, born at Dresden, January 13, 1800. After serving as secretary of the Saxon legation at Berlin and Paris, and holding various diplomatic posts at Munich and London, he became minister of foreign affairs for Saxony in 1849, and in 1853, minister of the interior. He was the representative of the Germanic Diet at the Conference of London in 1864. At the close of the war between Prussia and Austria in 1866, he transferred his services to the latter, becoming minister of foreign affairs, and, in 1867, president of the council. He has inaugurated judicious reforms in the government of Austria and Hungary, and has shown himself a sincere promoter of civil and religious liberty.

BEVERIDGE, William, bév-er-idj, an eminent bishop and theological writer, who at the age of eighteen wrote a treatise on the excellence and use of the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and Samaritan tongues, with a Syriac grammar. In 1600 he was ordained, and soon after presented to the vicarage of Baling, in Middlesex, which he resigned on being chosen rector of St. Peter's, Cornhill. His earnestness and diligence were so unwearied, that he was called "the restorer and reviver of primitive piety;" and his parish was referred to as a model of Christian regularity and order. He was successively prebendary of St. Paul's, archdeacon of Colchester, and prebendary of Canterbury. In 1704 he was preferred to the see of St. Asaph, in which he behaved as an apostolical prelate. His works, which are very numerous, and are highly esteemed, were published complete in 9 volumes 8vo, in 1824. B. at Barrow, in Leicestershire, 1638; D. at Westminster in 1708.

BEVERLEY, John of, bév-er-le, an English ecclesiastic, who was one of the first scholars of his age and tutor to the Venerable Bede. He embraced the monastic life, and became abbot of St. Hilda, till Alfred, king of Northumberland, made him bishop of Hexham, whence, in 687, he was translated to York, which see he held for upwards of thirty-three years. In 704 he founded a college for secular priests at Beverley. B. at Harpham, York; D. at Beverley, 721. So highly was he venerated, that when William the Conqueror ravaged the north, he ordered that the town of Beverley should be spared for his sake.

BEVERINGX, Jerome van, bai-vair-neenk, a Dutch statesman, who was one of the most skilful diplomatists of his day, and obtained the cognomen of the "Pacifier." He concluded the peace between England and Holland in 1654; and was successfully employed in various other negotiations, the chief of which was the treaty of Nimeguen, in 1678. He was, besides, a celebrated botanist, and on account of his scientific acquirements, was named curator of the University of Leyden. B. at Tergau, 1614; D. at Leyden, 1690.

Bewick, Thomas, bú-ik, an English artist, who, from his spirited illustrations of his "History of Quadrupeds," imparted the first impulse to the art of wood-engraving, which has now attained to such a high state of perfection. He, in conjunction with his brother, illustrated numerous other works, and deservedly rose to considerable celebrity. B. at Cherryburn, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in 1753; D. 1823.

BEYLE, Marie Henri, baile, a French novelist, poet, and publicist, was born at Grenoble in 1783, and died at Paris in 1842. He published his early works anonymously, and practised much mystification to conceal his name. One of his books was reviewed and praised in the "Edinburgh Review," an extract being given to justify the commendation, which passage was subsequently discovered to have been taken from the pages of the Review itself. Besides literature, Beyle was engaged in almost every conceivable occupation—he was a farmer, a merchant, a diplomatic agent, a confidential instrument of Napoleon I., a consul, a writer of public documents, was in the army, in the civil service—"everything by turns, and nothing long."

BEZA, Theodore, bai'-za, a learned divine, and one of the chief reformers of his age, was educated for the bar at Orleans, and there, after a youth of dissipation, imbibed the principles of the Reformed religion, retired to Geneva, and shortly after was appointed to the Greek professorship at Lausanne. After residing there about ten years, he became assistant to Calvin in the church and university of Geneva, which had just been founded. Some time afterwards he went to Navarre by desire of the king, to assist at a conference held with the Catholic divines, where he displayed his eloquence to great advantage, converting to Protestantism "King Henry of Navarre." In the war between the Catholics and the Huguenots, he accompanied the prince of Condé, and was present at the battle of Dreux. In 1563 he returned to Geneva, and in the following year, on the death of Calvin, was everywhere regarded as the head of the reformers.

Bezout

In 1571 he went to France, and presided at the synod of Rochelle, where all the churches of the reformed religion were represented; and he ceased not till his death to work most zealously towards the propagation of his doctrines. B. at Vezelai, Burgundy, 1519; D. 1605.—The principal works of Beza are a "Translation of the Psalms of David into French Verse," a "History of the French Reformed Churches," and a new translation of the New Testament. A Greek MS. of the New Testament which once belonged to Beza is now in the University library at Cambridge.

BEZOUT, Stephen, baï-zoo(t), a French mathematician, who was a member of the Academy of Sciences. In 1763 he was appointed by M. de Choiseul examiner of the marines and the pupils of the artillery corps. He wrote a course of mathematics for the use of the navy, with a treatise on navigation; another course of mathematics for the corps of artillery, a general theory of algebraic equations, and other esteemed works. B. at Nemours, 1730; D. in le Gatinais, 1783.

BLANCHI, Francesco Ferrari, de-awn'-ke, an Italian painter, whose works are not of much importance; but he is worthy of notice as being the reputed master of Correggio. B. at Modena, 1447; D. 1510.

BLANCHI, Peter, an Italian painter, who was celebrated for the comprehensiveness of his style; painting with equal facility historical subjects, landscapes, portraits, sea-pieces, and animals, as well in oil as distemper. B. at Rome, 1694; D. 1740. There are other Italians of this name, which signifies "white."

BIANCHINI, Francis, de-awn-ke'-ne, an Italian astronomer and antiquary, who at an early age went to Rome, where he enjoyed the favour of Pope Alexander VIII. and his successors, being employed in several important scientific missions. He was Alexander's librarian, and was secretary of a commission charged with the reform of the calendar. He also erected a dial on a very large scale in the church of St. Mary of the Angels, drew a meridian line through Italy, improved many astronomical instruments, and discovered the spots on the planet Venus. His principal works are "Universal History," in Italian, and "Observationes circa Planetarum Veneris." B. at Verona, 1662; D. at Rome, 1729.

BIARD, Peter, be'-ar, a French sculptor and architect, who executed many excellent pieces, the chief of which is the equestrian statue of Henry IV. placed over the grand entrance to the Hôtel de Ville, Paris. B. at Paris, 1559; D. 1609.

BIARD, Auguste François, a distinguished French artist, whose paintings of "Crossing the Line" and "The Slave Trade" have made him as well known in England as in France. In 1832 his picture of a "Family of Mendicants" gained him the prize of a gold medal at the Paris Exhibition. He has exercised his genius on a vast number of subjects, and has attained very high celebrity. B. at Lyons, 1800.

BIAS, bi'-da, one of the seven wise men of Greece, who devoted himself to the study of philosophy, and practised what he learnt. He took an active part in public affairs, and made good use of the ample fortune he possessed. After the defeat of Croesus, Bias recommended the Ionians to settle in Sardinia; but they would not listen to him, and were subsequently subjugated by the generals of Cyrus. The inhabitants of Priene, his native town, alone resolved to leave, and take their household goods with them; and, seeing that Bias was unencumbered, asked "why he was not saving something?" to which he replied, "All my goods I carry with me." B. at Priene, about 570 B. C.

BIBBENA, Bernard, bee'-be-ni'-nar, a Roman cardinal, who entered into the service of the Medici family, and was made cardinal by Leo X., who employed him on several important missions. Aspiring to the papacy, he is said to have excited the pope's jealousy, and is supposed to have been poisoned. Bibbena wrote a famous comedy called "Calandra," which is still in repute among the Italians. B. at Bibbiena, 1470; D. 1520.

BIBBIENA, Ferdinando Galli, a very skilful Italian painter and architect, one of the most eminent artists of his day. He introduced a new form in the building of theatres, and was the inventor of theatrical decorations. He went to Barcelona, on the marriage of the archduke of Austria, to superintend the fêtes, and was named by him, when emperor, superintendent of the court fêtes at Vienna. He wrote on architecture, perspective, and theatrical decoration. B. at Bologna, 1657; D. blind, 1745.

BIBLIANDER, Theodore, bee'-le-an'-der, a Protestant divine, whose real name was Buchmann, and who became professor of divinity at Zurich, after Zwingle's death. He published a translation of the Koran, with a life of Mohammed, and commentaries on the Scriptures. B. at Bischofzell, 1504; D. at Zurich, of the plague, 1564.

BIRULUS, Marcus Calpurnius, bi'-u-lus, consul of Rome at the same time with Cæsar. Opposing at first the agrarian measures proposed by his colleague, he saw that his resistance was useless, and took no further part in the public affairs. The wits of Rome were accustomed to designate that period as the year of the consulate of Caius and Julius Cæsar, alluding to Cæsar's two names. D. about 40 B. C.

BICKERSTAFF, Isaac, bik'-er-staf, the author of a number of light comedies and musical pieces, produced under the management of Garrick. His "Love in a Village" and his "Maid of the Mill" for a long time held possession of the stage. B. in Ireland, 1735; D. on the continent in obscurity.

BICHAT, Marie François Xavier, be'-sha, a celebrated French physiologist, who, at the age of 29, was appointed physician to the Hôtel-Dieu at Paris. He, at the same time, was engaged in the duties of a professorship, and, surrounded by pupils, still pursued laborious anatomical researches, and published some great works. His health failed, however, under these numerous occupations, and he died in 1802. B. at Thoirette, near Bourg, 1771.—A statue was erected to his memory at Bourg.

BICKERSTETH, Edward, bik'-er-steth, a clergyman of the evangelical section of the Church of England, many years secretary to the Church Missionary Society, was originally a lawyer, but in 1815 obtaining priest's and deacon's orders from the bishop of Norwich, went to Africa as a missionary; he returned to England the following year, and was at once appointed mission secretary. This office he held for fifteen years, when he retired to the rectory of Walton, Herts, where he died after several weeks' illness, on the 28th of February 1850. B. at Kirkby-

Lonsdale, Westmoreland, in 1786. Mr. Bickersteth published a vast number of works on religious subjects, and was held in great respect by the church generally, but especially by the particular section of it to which it belonged.

BICKERSTETH, Henry, baron Langdale of Langdale, was born at Kirkby-Lonsdale, in 1753, was called to the bar in 1811, became king's counsel and bench of the Inner Temple in 1827, and was treasurer of the society in 1839. In the latter year he succeeded Lord Cottenham as master of the rolls, and was called to the House of Peers and made a privy councillor. He devoted much attention to the reform of the court of Chancery, his exertions in connexion with which so impaired his health, that he was unable to accept the offer of the chancellorship made to him on the resignation of Lord Cottenham in 1850. p. at Tunbridge Wells in 1851, having continued to discharge his official duties to within a month of his death.

BIDDLE, John, bid'-el, usually denominated "The father of English Unitarianism," because he revived the system of belief so called, was born in Gloucestershire in 1615, studied at Oxford, was admitted to orders, and appointed master of the free school of St. Mary Crypt, Gloucester. His heretical opinions, however, getting him into trouble with the magistrates, he was committed to gaol, tried before a committee of the House of Commons at Westminster, and continued in confinement for five years; a paper of his called "Twelve Arguments," published in his defence, having been ordered to be burnt by the common hangman. His death even was demanded, but this Cromwell refused to allow. At length, in 1651, he was discharged, and established a society of his adherents in London, where he published a number of pieces from time to time, till 1655, when he got into fresh trouble, and was banished to the Scilly islands, where he remained five years. After the Restoration he was less mildly treated than under Cromwell's sway, for he was fined and committed to prison, where he died in five weeks, on the 22nd of September, 1662.

BIDLOO, Godfrey, bed'-loo, a celebrated anatomist, who was successively professor of anatomy at the Hague and at Leyden, and afterwards became physician to William III. His writings are numerous, but his best work is a folio volume of anatomical plates published in 1685. p. at Amsterdam, 1619; p. at Leyden, 1713.

BIELE, William, Baron von, bee-ai'-la, a Prussian nobleman, born at Stolberg, March 19, 1732. He entered the Austrian service, and acquired some reputation as an astronomer, discovering, in 1820, the comet which bears his name. p. 1856.

BIEZLINGEN, bee'-ling-en, Christian Jans van, a Dutch portrait-painter, whose portrait of William prince of Orange, the opponent of Philip II. of Spain, after his assassination, was considered a better likeness than any taken during his lifetime. p. at Delft, 1558; p. 1600.

BIGNON, Jerome, bee'-yang, a French writer and statesman, who became preceptor to the dauphin, afterwards Louis XIII. At the age of ten years he wrote a description of the Holy Land, and at fourteen an account of the principal antiquities of Rome. When only thirty-one years old, he was made advocate-general in the grand council, and, some time after, the king appointed him counsellor of state, and advocate-general in the parliament. The next year he was made king's librarian. His learning was said to be so great, that there was no branch of human knowledge in which he was not profoundly versed. p. at Paris, 1589; p. 1656.

BILDERDYK, Willem, beel'-dair'-dike, one of the most eminent litterateurs of Holland. His works embrace poetry, prose, and translations from the Greek classics. p. at Amsterdam, 1756; p. at Haarlem, 1831.

BILLAULT, Augustus Adolphus Marie, beel'-o-ull, a French politician, who, in Louis Philippe's reign, at first supported the policy of M. Thiers, but afterwards opposed that minister, and also M. Guizot. At the revolution of 1848 he joined the Socialist party, and subsequently attached himself to the fortunes of Louis Napoleon. After the coup-d'état of December 2, 1851, he was made president of the legislative body, and on the institution, in 1861, of "speaking ministers," or ministers without portfolios, he was appointed, with M. Baroche for a colleague, to answer for the government in the chambers on all questions. p. at Yannes, 1806; p. 1863.

BILLINGSLEY, Sir Henry, bil'-lings-le, an eminent mathematician, who was educated at Oxford; after which he was bound apprentice to a haberdasher in London. He acquired a large fortune, and became successively sheriff, alderman, and in 1586 lord mayor, when he was knighted. He received into his house Whitehead, an expelled friar, from whom he learned mathematics, in which he became remarkably skilled. Sir Henry was the first who published Euclid's Elements in English, with annotations drawn from the MSS. of his master. This was in 1570. p. 1606.

BILSON, Thomas, bil'-son, a learned prelate, who was educated at Winchester School, of which he afterwards became master, prebendary of the cathedral there, and warden of the college. In 1585 he published a treatise on the "Difference between Christian Subjection and Unchristian Rebellion," dedicated to Queen Elizabeth; and in 1593 another, on the "Perpetual Government of Christ's Church," one of the most able treatises in favour of episcopacy ever written. In 1596 he was made bishop of Worcester, and the following year was translated to Winchester. In 1601 he published a famous book, on "Christ's Descent into Hell;" and in the same year was one of the managers at the Hampton-court conference. He had also a share in the authorized translation of the Bible. p. at Winchester, 1536; p. at Westminster, 1618.

BINGHAM, Joseph, bing'-ham, a learned divine, who was elected a fellow of University College, Oxford, in 1689, and became one of the college tutors. In 1695 he delivered a sermon on the doctrine of the Trinity, which raised such a party against him, that he was compelled to resign his fellowship and retire to the rectory of Headbourne-worthy, in Hampshire, to which he was presented by Dr. Radcliffe, the most celebrated physician of his day. Here he began the "Origines Ecclesiasticæ," which was completed in 1772, in 10 vols. 8vo. and 2 vols. folio, and which is one of the most celebrated ecclesiastical works in the English language. In 1712 Bishop Trelawny gave him the rectory of Havant, near Portsmouth. p. at Wakefield, 1668; p. at Headbourne-worthy, 1723.

BINK, Jacob, benk, a famous old German engraver and painter, who was ranked among what were called the "little masters," was born at Cologne, about 1500, and lived some time in Nuremberg, and has hence been thought by some to have been a native of that city. He was a pupil, as is believed, of Albert Dürer, and engraved a vast number of plates, but as he seldom put his name in full to his works, but only his initials, J. B., which were likewise those of several other artists of his time, it is difficult to fix definitely whether many pieces attributed to him are really his or not. b. about 1530 or 1563.

Bion, bî-on, a Greek bucolic poet, who was contemporary of Theocritus and Moschus. He wrote some idyls, which are marked by great taste, and which have been translated into several languages. b. at Smyrna. Flourished in the 3rd century b.c.

Bion, a philosopher and sophist of Borysthenes, in Scythia, who rendered himself famous for his knowledge of poetry, music, and philosophy. b. 241 b.c.

Bion, Jean Baptiste, bê-o, an eminent mathematician and natural philosopher of France, whose researches in connexion with the polarization of light, procured him the award of the Rumford medal by the Royal Society of London in 1840. He was an extensive contributor to science, and a member of several of the leading learned societies of Europe. b. at Paris, 1774; d. 1802.

BIRAGUE, René de, bê-raug, a Milanese of a noble family, who entered the French service, and became a favourite of Henry II., who gave him the government of the Lyonnais. Birague soon became a confidant of Catherine of Medici, and, under Charles IX., one of the principal instigators of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. By this monarch he was naturalized, and, in 1570, was appointed keeper of the seals, and, in 1573, chancellor. He entered into all the follies and vices of the court of Henry III., and introduced the fashion of keeping the breed of small Maltese and Lyonnese dogs. On becoming a widower he took orders, and was made bishop of Lavaur, and then cardinal. He restored and magnificently endowed the church of St. Catherine du Val des Ecoliers, at Paris, and erected close by a monumental fountain. Indeed, so lavish was he, that at his death, his only daughter was supported by alms. p. 1533.—He was a time-serving and unprincipled character.

BIRAGUE, Clement, a Spanish engraver, who invented the art of engraving on diamonds. The first work he executed of this kind was a portrait of Don Carlos, son of Philip II.; and he also engraved on a diamond the arms of Spain, to serve as a seal for that prince. Lived in the second half of the 16th century.

BRACH, Thomas, birch, an English divine, who was indefatigable in literary pursuits, and has left many valuable historical and biographical works. He was designed by his parents, who were Quakers, for business; but, at his earnest desire, was permitted to indulge his taste for literature. In 1730 he was ordained in the established Church, and was introduced to Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, to whom he principally owed his advancement. He was a fellow and secretary of the Royal Society, and a trustee of the British Museum, to which institution he bequeathed his library and MSS., and £500 towards increasing the stipends of the three assistant librarians. His principal work was "The General Dictionary, Historical and Critical," in 10 volumes, which included a translation of Bayle's; and, besides this, he wrote several other biographical and historical works.

Birger de Bielbo

b. in London, 1705; d. by a fall from his horse, 1766.

BIRDE, William, bird, an English musician, who was attached to the chapel royal of Edward VI.; and, in the reign of Elizabeth, was organist of the queen's chapel. His compositions are numerous and excellent, he being one of the principal contributors to Queen Elizabeth's "Virginal Book," and the celebrated canon, "Non Nobis, Domine" is also generally ascribed to him. b. 1513; d. 1623.

BIRD, Edward, B.A., bird, an artist, who confined himself chiefly to comic subjects, but produced many historical and religious pieces besides. He became historical painter to the Princess Charlotte of Wales. b. at Wolverhampton, 1772; d. in Bristol, 1819.—His "Village Politicians" is a well-known picture.

BIRD, John, a famous mathematical instrument maker of the last century, was a native of the county of Durham, brought up to be a cloth-weaver. He subsequently turned his attention to making clock-dials, and gradually extended his operations, till he became one of the most eminent scientific mechanicians of his time. He constructed quadrants for Greenwich, Oxford, the Ecole Militaire at Paris, and various other places. He introduced great improvements in the method of dividing astronomical instruments, and in the construction of mural quadrants, for which the commissioners of longitude gave him £500 on condition of his instructing an apprentice, and freely disclosing the methods he used. p. March 31, 1776, aged 67.

BIRD, Dr. Robert Montgomery, an American novelist, was born in 1803, and educated at Philadelphia. He first appeared as a writer of comedies, and published the "Gladiator," "Orissa," and "The Broker of Bogota." He then turned to romance, and in 1831 appeared "Calavar, the Knight of the Conquest," a Mexican story; followed in rapid succession by "The Fidel, or the Fall of Mexico," the "Hawks of Hawks' Hollow," "Nick of the Woods," "Peter Pilgrim," and "The Adventures of Robin Day," which appeared in 1839, after which Dr. Bird abandoned literature, and took to farming on an extensive scale.

BIREX, John Ernest, bê-râ, duke of Courland, was descended from a mean family in that country, and repaired in 1714 to St. Petersburg, where he ingratiated himself into the good graces of Anna, duchess-dowager of Courland, who made him her favourite; and, when she became empress of Russia, intrusted to him the administration of the kingdom. His conduct was arbitrary and cruel. Several noble families were reduced to ruin, and more than 20,000 persons were exiled by him to Siberia. In 1737 he empress compelled the nobles to choose him duke of Courland, where he governed in the like despotic manner. On the death of the empress he assumed the regency, by virtue of her will; but, in 1740, a conspiracy was formed against him by Marshal Munich, and he was condemned to death, which sentence was changed to banishment. Peter III. recalled him, and Catherine II. restored him to his former dignity. In 1763 Biren re-entered Mitau; and, profiting by the lessons of misfortune he had experienced, governed for the remainder of his life with mildness and justice. b. 1690; d. 1772.

BIRGER DE BIRGER, bê-ger-dê, a descendant of Sweden, who married Ingeborg, f King Eric le Begue. In 1226 he saved which was besieged by the Danes, and subsequently brought over to Christianity the inhabitants of Finland, whose incursions had desolated Sweden. At the death of Eric IX. he was named regent, and governed well and wisely till his death, in 1266. B. 1210.—It was he who founded the city of Stockholm.

BIRINGOCIO, or BIRINGUCCI, Vannuccio, be'-ren-got-che-o, an Italian mathematician, who was the first of his countrymen who wrote on the art of casting cannon, making gunpowder, and fireworks. His work, entitled "Pyrotechnia," was printed at Venice, in 1540, 4to. Lived in the first half of the 16th century.

BIRKBECK, George, M.D., birk'-bek, one of the greatest friends of the working classes of England, and an active promoter of every professional or scientific pursuit which had for its aim public utility. In 1799 he became a lecturer on natural and experimental philosophy in the Andersonian Institution of Glasgow. In 1814 he relinquished his professorship, and went to London, where he settled, and rapidly rose into eminence as a physician. He was the originator of the mechanics' institutions, and in 1823 presided at a meeting which had for its object the founding of the "London Mechanics' Institution." On the 15th December of the same year, he was elected president of that institution, an office which he held to the time of his death. B. at Settle, in Yorkshire, 1776; D. in London, 1841.

BIRKENHEAD, Sir John, birk'-en-head, a political writer, who, in the civil war, conducted, in favour of the court, a periodical work, called "Mercurius Aulicus," and also wrote a number of pamphlets against the parliamentarians, when these were in power, for which he was several times imprisoned. At the Restoration he was knighted, and made master of requests; and was a member of the Royal Society. B. at Northwich, Cheshire, 1615; D. at Westminster, 1679.

BIRON, Armand de Gontaut, baron de, be-rang, a celebrated French general, who was for some time page to Queen Margaret of Navarre; and, afterwards entering the army, signalized himself in the wars of Piedmont, under Marshal Brissac. He displayed great courage and prudence in the civil war, being present with the Catholic army at the battles of Dreux, St. Denis, and Moncontour, although he secretly favoured the Huguenot party, and saved several of his friends in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, in 1572. In 1577 he was made a marshal of France, and was dispatched by Henry III. to the Low Countries to succour the duke of Alençon, but was defeated by the Duke of Parma. On the death of Henry III. he was one of the first to recognise Henry IV., and rendered great services to that prince at the battle of Arques and the attack on Paris. B. in Périgord, 1524; D. 1592, at the siege of Eprenay, in Champagne.

BIRON, Charles de Gontaut, duc de, son of the above, was admiral and marshal of France, and is noted for the friendship which Henry IV. entertained for him, and for his treason towards that monarch. He made his first essays in war under his father, and covered himself with glory at the battles of Arques and Ivry, and at the sieges of Paris and Rouen. The king loaded him with honours, and saved his life at the fight of Fontaine Française, and sent him ambassador to England. Notwithstanding, however, all these favours, Biron, swollen with pride, ambition, and avarice, entered into a conspiracy with Spain and Savoy against his sovereign; and the plot being revealed by Lafin, who had been its instigator, he was beheaded. Henry endeavoured to make him avow his crime, with the view of pardoning him, but was unsuccessful in his magnanimous attempt. B. 1562; suffered 1602.

BISCAINO, Bartholomew, bes-kai'-no, an Italian painter and engraver, the best of whose works are in the Dresden Gallery; viz., the "Adoration of the Magi," the "Circumcision," and the "Woman taken in Adultery." B. at Genoa, 1632; D. 1657.

BISCHOP, John van, bees'-kop, a Dutch designer and engraver, who, although following the profession of an advocate, executed a great number of prints, the most considerable of which is a set of plates for the "Paradigmata Græphicæ variorum Artificum." B. at the Hague, 1646; D. at Amsterdam, 1686.

BISROP, Sir Henry Rowley, bish'-op, one of the best of our English musical composers, who received his musical tuition under Signor Bianchi; and in the course of nearly twenty years, during which he was connected with Drury-lane or Covent-garden theatres, produced upwards of seventy operas, ballets, and musical entertainments. Many of his songs and glees are the most beautiful effusions in English melody, and by their qualities of animation, grace, and pathos, will, probably, long continue to please the ear. He relinquished composing for the stage in 1826, and in 1848 was elected professor of music at Oxford University. B. in London, 1780; D. 1855.—We may mention, as among his best works, "Guy Raining," "The Slave," "The Virgin of the Sun," "The Barber of Seville," and "The Marriage of Figaro." Many of his arrangements are also extremely beautiful.

BISMARCK-SCHENHAUSEN, Otto Edward Leopold, Count de, bees'-mark shern'-hou-sen, a Prussian statesman, who, after spending many years in the diplomatic service of his country, became minister of foreign affairs in 1862. After the aggressive war which Prussia and Austria carried on jointly against Denmark in 1864, Bismark, who had long wished to render Prussia supreme in Germany, found a pretext of declaring war against Austria, and after a campaign of seven weeks, in 1866, compelled that power to submit to exclusion from all participation in German affairs. In this war Bismark added Hanover and other independent states to Prussia, and raised his country to a position to cope single-handed with France. B. 1814.

BLACK, Joseph, blak, an eminent Scotch chemist, who, in 1765, succeeded Dr. Cullen in the chemical chair at Edinburgh. He was the author of several chemical works, and was the discoverer of latent heat, on which subject he issued a pamphlet; but his researches prindivine, archdeacon of Cleveland, who wrote in favour of religious liberty, and was desirous of removing subscriptions to the Articles of the Church, and remodelling the liturgy so as to embrace every description of Protestant against the Papists. He leaned so much towards the dissenters, that the congregation of Dr. Chandler, on his death, invited him to become their minister, but he declined. His principal work is "The Confessional," which first brought him into notice, and a complete edition of his works was published in 1805, 7 vols. 8vo. B. at Richmond, Yorkshire, 1705; D. 1787.

BLACKLOCK, Thomas, blak-lok, a Scotch divine and poet, was the son of a mason, and lost his sight by the small-pox in his infancy. In 1740 he was deprived of his father, who had been particularly attentive to his education; and Dr. Stephenson, a physician of Edinburgh, then placed him at the university, where he made considerable progress in the classics and sciences. In 1762 the earl of Selkirk procured for him a presentation to the church of Kirkcudbright: but the appointment was violently opposed by the congregation on account of his blindness and the too great elevation and refinement of his preaching. After two years' litigation, he resigned, and retired to Edinburgh on a small annuity. His poems were published in 1754. B. at Annan, 1721; D. at Edinburgh, 1791.—Dr. Blacklock was a friend of the poet Burns, some of whose poetical epistles are addressed to him.

BLACKSTONE, Sir William, blak-stone, a learned English judge, who, in 1733, was entered at Pembroke College, Oxford, and at the age of 20 composed a treatise on the elements of architecture. He also cultivated poetry, and obtained Mr. Benson's prize medal for the best verses on Milton. These pursuits, however, were abandoned for the study of the law, when he composed his well-known effusion, called "The Lawyer's Farewell to his Muse." In 1740 he was entered at the Middle Temple, and in 1743 chosen fellow of All-souls College. In 1749 he was appointed recorder of Wallingford, in Berkshire, and in the following year became LL.D., and published an "Essay on Collateral Consanguinity," occasioned by the exclusive claim to fellowships made by the founder's kindred at All-souls. In 1758 he printed "Considerations on Copyholders;" and the same year was appointed Vinerian professor of the common law, his lectures in which capacity gave rise to his celebrated "Commentaries." In 1759 he published "Reflections on the Opinions of Messrs. Pratt, Moreton, and Wilbraham," relating to Lord Litchfield's disqualification; his lordship being then candidate for the chancellorship. The same year appeared his edition of "The Great Charter, and Charter of the Forest." Of this work it has been said that there is not a sentence in the composition that is not necessary to the whole, and that should not be perused. In 1761 he was made king's counsel, and chosen member of parliament for Hindon in Wilts. The same year he vacated his fellowship by marriage, and was appointed principal of New-inn Hall. In 1763 he was appointed solicitor-general to the queen, and bencher of the Middle Temple. In the next year appeared the first volume of his "Commentaries," which was followed by three others. It is upon these that his fame now principally rests; and, although opinion is divided as to the correctness and depth of the matter they contain, the beauty, precision, and elegance of their style have called forth universal admiration. In 1766 he resigned his places at Oxford; and in 1769 was chosen member for Westbury, in Wiltshire. In 1770 he became one of the judges in the court of King's Bench, whence he removed to the Common Pleas. He now fixed his residence in London, and attended to the duties of his office with great application, until overtaken by death. B. in London, 1723; D. 1780.—The fundamental error in the "Commentaries" is thus pointed out by Jeremy Bentham. "There are two characters," says he, "one or other of which every man who finds anything to say on the subject of law may be said to take upon him,—that of the expositor, and that of the censor. To the province of the expositor it belongs to explain to us what he supposes the law is; to that of the censor, to observe to us what he thinks it ought to be. Of these two perfectly distinguishable functions, the former alone is that which it fell necessarily within our author's province to discharge." Blackstone, however, makes use of both these functions throughout his work, and hence the confusion. His productions have found several translators on the continent.

BLACKWOOD, Sir Henry, blak-wood, a brave British admiral, who entered the navy in his eleventh year, and was present at the engagement off the Dogger Bank. When hostilities began with the French in 1793, he was made first-lieutenant in the Invincible man-of-war; and when "the glorious 1st of June" of 1794 arrived, he fought with such gallantry that he was promoted to the rank of commander. In 1798 he became captain of the Brilliant, of twenty-eight guns; and off the island of Teneriffe, defeated two French frigates, each of them nearly double his strength. He continued to be actively engaged till he was appointed to the Penelope, of thirty-six guns, serving under Lords Keith and Nelson, Sir Sidney Smith, and other distinguished commanders. At Trafalgar he was captain of the Ex-Valer, and was present at the death of the heroic Nelson, whose last words to him were, "God bless you, Blackwood, I shall never see you more." In 1806 he was appointed to the command of the Ajar, of eighty guns, which, on the night of the 14th of February, 1807, took fire, and went down, carrying half of her crew along with her. Sir Henry was saved with the greatest difficulty. He now commanded the Warrior, and continued throughout the war to be constantly employed against the enemy. In 1814 he was made captain of the fleet, and was deputed to convey to this country the allied sovereigns. On this occasion he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, and made a baronet. In 1819 he became commander-in-chief of the naval forces in India, and in 1827 was elevated to the command at Chatham. B. 1770; D. 1832.

BLADEN, Martin, blai-den, a lieutenant-colonel under the duke of Marlborough, to whom he dedicated a translation of "Cæsar's Commentaries." He sat in five parliaments, and in 1715 was made comptroller of the Mint, and in 1717 commissioner of trade and plantations. D. 1746.—Besides translating the "Commentaries," he was the author of "Orpheus and Eurydice," a masque; and "Solon," a tragedy. BLAIR, Robert, blair, an ingenious Scotch poet, and the minister of Athelstaneford, in East Lothian, Scotland. He is known to as being the author of "The Grave," in which is the often-quoted sentiment of "Angels' visits, few and far between." n. at Edinburgh, 1699; p. 1749.

BLAIR, John, a learned Scotch chronologist, who, in 1754, published his "Chronological Tables," folio, which were well received, and reached a second edition in 1783. He subsequently was appointed mathematical tutor to the duke of York, and in consequence obtained several church preferments, the principal of which was a prebend of Westminster. n. at Edinburgh; p. 1782.—Sir Henry Ellis, principal librarian in the British Museum, edited an edition of the Chronology of this author in 1844.

BLAIR, Hugh, an eminent Scotch divine, was the son of a merchant of Edinburgh, where he received his education. While yet a student, he formed a comprehensive scheme of chronological tables for his own use, which being communicated to his learned relative John Blair, mentioned above, were improved and extended by the latter into a work of great labour and value. In 1739 he took the degree of M.A., and in 1741 was licensed to preach. The year following he was ordained to the parish of Coleslie in Fife, and then to the charge of the Canonicate church at Edinburgh, where he officiated till 1753, when he was removed to the High Church, which was the most important ecclesiastical charge in Scotland. The university of St. Andrew's conferred on him, in 1757, the degree of D.D., and in 1759 he began a course of lectures on rhetoric and belles-lettres, which were so much applauded, that in 1762 George III. endowed a professorship for him at Edinburgh, with a salary of £70 a year. In 1763 he wrote a dissertation on the poems of Ossian, in which he urged many ingenious observations in behalf of their authenticity. In 1777 a volume of his sermons appeared, which attained so rapid a sale as to induce the author to publish another volume in 1779, which was as well received as the former; and these were subsequently followed by three volumes more. In 1780 he obtained a pension from the crown of £200 a year; and three years afterwards he quitted his professorship through infirmities; but his salary was continued to him for life, and an addition of £100 a year was made to his pension. At that time he published his lectures, which have had an immense circulation, and, as has been the case with his sermons, have been translated into various languages. n. at Edinburgh, 1718; p. 1800.

BLAKE, Robert, blak, one of England's most skilful and intrepid naval and military commanders, was educated at Oxford, where, in 1617, he took the degree of B.A. In 1640 he represented Bridgewater in parliament, and at the beginning of the civil war took part with the Parliamentarians, and served under Colonel Fiennes at Bristol, when that town was taken by Prince Rupert. He afterwards assisted in taking Taunton by surprise, of which place he was made governor, and in 1645 defended it against Goring with such bravery for two successive sieges, that he was publicly thanked and rewarded by Parliament. In 1649 he was appointed commander of the fleet in conjunction with Deane and Popham; and soon afterwards sailed in search of Prince Rupert, whose fleet he blockaded in Kinsale harbour. The prince afterwards escaping to Lisbon, he was there followed by

Blake

Blake, who demanded leave of the king of Portugal to attack him, and, being refused, he took several of the Portuguese ships coming home from Brazil laden with treasure. During his absence Prince Rupert made sail to the Mediterranean, whither he was followed by Blake, who attacked him in the harbour of Malaga, and destroyed nearly the whole of his fleet. After this he returned to England with several prizes, again receiving the thanks of Parliament, by whom he was also made warden of the Cinque Ports. Soon after this he reduced the Scilly Isles, Guernsey, and Jersey, for which he was again thanked by the House, and appointed one of the council of state. On the prospect of a war with the Dutch in 1652, he was appointed sole admiral of the fleet, and was attacked in the Downs by Van Tromp, who had 45 sail, whilst Blake had only 23. He fought, however, with such determination that the Dutch admiral was glad to retreat. In the November following, Van Tromp sailed into the Downs, with above 80 ships of war, and off the Goodwin sands, on the 20th of that month, an obstinate battle was fought between him and Blake, who had only half his force, and who was compelled to run with his shattered ships into the Thames. It was on this occasion that Van Tromp passed through the English Channel with a broom at his maintop, signifying that he had swept the sea of the English ships. In February, 1653, Blake was enabled to put to sea with 80 men of war, and off Cape la Hogue fell in with the Dutch, who had an equal number and 300 merchantmen under convoy. A most bloody engagement ensued, which lasted three days, and in which the Dutch lost 11 men of war and 30 merchant vessels, whilst the English lost only one ship. In June following the fleets of the belligerent admirals fought again off the Foreland; and the Dutch, sustaining a severe defeat, barely saved themselves by taking refuge in the shallow waters of Calais. In 1654 Blake sailed into the Mediterranean, where he demolished the castle of Tunis because the dey refused to deliver up the English whom he held as captives. In 1658, a fleet under Blake was sent to blockade Cadiz, when some of the ships under his command intercepted and took some Spanish vessels laden with treasure. Blake having received information that more treasure ships lay at Santa Cruz, in Teneriffe, sailed thither, and notwithstanding the strength of the place, boldly went in, burnt the ships, and came out with comparatively little loss, whilst the slaughter of the Spaniards was immense. For this he again received the thanks of Parliament, and was presented with a diamond ring worth £500. He soon afterwards returned to his station at Cadiz, but his ill health inspired him with a strong desire to return to England; and accordingly he set sail for his native land, but died as his ship was entering Plymouth harbour, August 17, 1657. His body was interred in Henry the Seventh's chapel, Westminster Abbey, whence it was removed at the Restoration, and buried in St. Margaret's churchyard. n. at Bridgewater, 1698. are generally elevated and noble, the sentiments benevolent and pure, though the versification is often inharmonious. He illustrated his own poems, both the verses and the pictures being etched on copper. His drawings are sometimes of a singularly mystic character, and there is little doubt that there was a vein of chronic insanity in his mind, for he ultimately came to regard his imaginings as a species of spiritual realities. He illustrated Young's "Night Thoughts," Chaucer's "Canterbury Pilgrims," Blair's "Grave," and other works. Flaxman and Blake were warm friends, and Charles Lamb considered him "one of the most extraordinary persons of the age." n. in London, 1757; d. 1817.

BLANC, Louis, blong, a talented French political and historical writer, who, in 1839, established a paper in Paris, called "La Revue de Progrès," intended to be the organ of certain democratic and communistic sections then in existence in France. In 1840 his work on the "Organization of Labour" appeared, advocating the doctrine that men should labour for the community, rather than for themselves, and that they should be remunerated in accordance with their wants by a central government under a chosen administration. These principles enjoyed an ephemeral popularity even in England, which, however, was soon at an end. After the revolution of 1848 he was elected a member of the provisional government, and was principally instrumental in abolishing the punishment of death for political offences. In the same year he was compelled to leave his country, when he took refuge in London. n. at Madrid, 1812.—Louis Blanc has written a "History of the Ten Years," 1-30-40; and "History of the French Revolution." He has likewise delivered lectures in London and elsewhere, on certain historical and social phenomena, and writes on English affairs in the "Temps," and other French journals and periodicals.

BLANCHARD, Laman, blänck'-ard, a various and frequent contributor to English periodical literature. His first work was entitled the "Lyric Offering," which was published in 1823, and in 1831 he became editor of the "New Monthly Magazine." He was afterwards editor of the "True Sun" newspaper, and was subsequently on the staff of several other papers, and at his death assisted in conducting the "Examiner." b. at Great Yarmouth, 1803. Put an end to his life in London, 1845.

BLANCHARD, Jacques, blong-shar, a French artist, who attained to great perfection as a colorist, and has hence been called the Titian of France, but whose death at the early age of 38 frustrated the hopes entertained of him, was born at Paris in 1800, and died in 1838. The majority of his works are on religious subjects, and of small size, though with the figures of life dimensions.

BLANCHE of Castile, blänsh, queen of France, was the daughter of Alphonso IX., king of Castile, and in 1200 married Louis VIII. of France, by whom she had nine sons and two daughters. On the death of her husband in 1236, she became regent, her son Louis (afterwards Louis IX.) being only twelve years old. In this position, aided by Cardinal Bomain, she acted with firmness and prudence, and defeated several attempts made against her and the government. The education of the young king she sedulously promoted, and he was early married to the daughter of the count of Provence. During the expedition of St. Louis to the Holy Land, she also governed the kingdom with great discretion; but the news of his defeat and imprisonment so affected her spirits, that she died in 1252. b. 1194.—Blanche was equally noted for her beauty as her wisdom. Thibaut, count of Champagne, was greatly enamoured of her, and sang her charms in his verses.

BLAND, Rev. Robert, bländ, an eminent scholar and poet, was born at London, in 1779. He studied at Cambridge, was an assistant master at Harrow, and afterwards curate of Kendalworth. He published two vols. of original poems, entitled "Edwy and Elvira," "The Four Slaves of Cythera," and was the author of a work on the "Elements of Latin Hexameters and Pentameters," which has gone through several editions. He is best known, perhaps, for his translations and commentaries on the Greek minor poets, some of which he executed in conjunction with Mr. Merivale, and which have been several times reprinted. d. 1825.

BLADDYN, bläd'-in, an ancient British prince, who reigned, with his brother Rygwallon, in North Wales, till 1685, when he ruled alone. Fell in battle in 1673. Bladdyn was an active prince, and framed a code of good laws.

BLADDYN, a British bard, many of whose pieces are in the Welsh Archaeology.—Flourished in the 13th century.

BLEECK, Peter van, bleek, an eminent painter, who executed the celebrated picture of Johnson and Griffin, two famous comedians, in the characters of Ananias and Tribulation, in the "Alchemist." b. 1700; d. in London, 1761.

BLESS, Henry, bläss, an historical and landscape painter, whose pieces are called extempores, because he placed that bird as a mark. b. in Bovine, near Dinant, 1480; d. 1550.

BLESSINGTON, Marguerite, countess of, bles-sing-ton, was the third daughter of a Mr. Edmund Power, whose fortunes were entirely dissipated by reckless extravagance. She, in her 15th year, was married to a Captain Farmer, with whom she led a very unhappy life, and whose house she left. Subsequently, he, in a state of intoxication, fell from a window in the King's Bench prison, and was killed. Four months after this event she married the earl of Blessington, and after passing a few years in the enjoyment of every luxury, she and her husband in 1822 set out on a continental tour, which was prolonged to the death of the earl, which took place in 1829. In 1827 Count D'Orsay had married a daughter of Lord Blessington, by his first wife; but this marriage proving unhappy, they separated, and he, after the death of the earl, continued to live with Lady Blessington during the remainder of her life. After the decease of the earl, she came to London, where, for twenty years, her salons were as popular as those of Holland House, and were the resort of all the celebrated men of the day. To support her expenditure, she entered upon a career of authorship, which knew little relaxation throughout the remainder of her life. She wrote "Conversations with Lord Byron," several novels, an endless number of tales and sketches; edited Heath's "Book of Beauty," "the Keepsake," "Gems of Beauty," and also contributed to the columns of the Daily News, and those of the Sunday Times. With all this industry, however, she could not support her extravagance, and in 1849, the costly furniture of Gore House had to be sold. Count D'Orsay, in the hope of getting employment under Louis Napoleon, went to Paris, where he died in 1852. The countess had followed him in April, 1849, and shortly afterwards suddenly expired. n. near Clonmel, Ireland, 1789; p. at Paris, 1849.

BLIGH, William, blī, a seaman, who, when a lieutenant, was appointed to the command of the ship Bounty, in which he made a voyage to Otaheite for the purpose of obtaining bread-fruit plants and others, to be transported to the islands of the West Indies. A mutiny took place on board his ship, when he and eighteen others were cast adrift in an open boat, in which, after sailing upwards of 3500 miles, they arrived at the island of Timor without having lost a man. Bligh subsequently reached England, and narrated the history of his adventures, when he was again sent out to the South Seas, and carried out the object of his original mission. In 1806 he was appointed governor of New South Wales, but the wildness of his conduct and the severity of his measures caused him to be arrested by order of the civil and military officers of the colony, which ended his government. n. 1753; p. 1817.—The mutiny of the Bounty was made use of by Lord Byron for some of the passages in his poem of "The Island." (For an account of the fate of the mutineers of the Bounty, see ADAMS, John.)

BLOCH, Mark Eleazer, blok, a German naturalist, who practised medicine at Berlin, and was a member of the Society of the Curiosities of Nature. He wrote a "Natural History of Fishes," with 432 plates, which has been translated into French, and forms 12 vols. folio. It is one of the finest works of its kind. n. at Anspach, 1723; n. at Berlin, 1799.

BLUMART, blo'-mart, a family of Flemish painters and engravers, of whom the best known is Cornelius. He went to Paris in 1630, and executed the engravings for the "Temple of the Muses." He afterwards went to Rome, and was the head of the school which produced the Natalis, Rousselet, &c.

BLOMFIELD, blom'-feeld, Charles James, bishop of London, was the son of a school-master, and received his university education at Trinity College, Cambridge. He was distinguished by his classical, critical, and philological abilities. In 1824 he was raised from the rectory of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, to the episcopal bench as bishop of Chester; and, in 1828, succeeded Bishop Howley as bishop of London. From that time he exerted himself to extend the influence of the Church, and in the discussion of all ecclesiastical subjects took a prominent part in the House of Lords. n. at Bury St. Edmunds, 1786; p. 1857.—He edited, with commentaries, an edition of the tragedies of Æschylus.

BLONDEL, blon-dēl, a favourite minstrel of Richard I., Cœur-de-Lion, who, on being made prisoner and thrown into a German dungeon, on his return from the Crusades, was accidentally discovered by Blondel singing, beneath the walls of his prison, the first part of a lay of their joint composition. Lived in the 12th century.

BLON, Colonel Thomas, blud, originally an officer in Cromwell's army, and who has rendered himself famous by his extraordinary exploits. One of these was the seizing of the duke of Ormond, with an intent to hang him at Tyburn; from which fate his grace was delivered by his servants. A second was the stealing of the crown and other regalia from the Tower. In this daring enterprise he was taken disguised as a clergyman. Charles II. caused him to be brought before him; and in his presence, Blood confessed that he had once formed a design against his life, but that the sight of his majesty awed him so greatly, that he desisted from its execution. The king granted him a pardon, and gave him a pension of £500 a year for life; but for what reason, or upon what principle of justice, history has never yet explained, p. 1630.

BLOOMFIELD, Robert, bloom'-feeld, was the son of a tailor, and himself a shoemaker, in which position he was when he composed "the Farmer's Boy," a beautiful didactic poem, in which the scenes of rustic labour are truthfully described. He was patronized by Capel Lofft, Esq., who brought out his poem in 1800. The admiration which it excited is attested by the fact of 26,000 copies having been sold in three years. He wrote several other effusions, but his first was the best. n. at Honington, Suffolk, 1766; p. at Shefford, Bedfordshire, 1823.

BLOUNT, Charles, blount, lord Mountjoy and earl of Devonshire, was the second son of James Lord Mountjoy. His person and accomplishments attracted the notice of Queen Elizabeth, who conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and some of our readers will remember the manner in which he is introduced, among the courtiers of that queen, in Sir Walter Scott's "Kenilworth." In 1594 he was made governor of Portsmouth, and succeeded his brother in the peerage, assembling some troops, with which he served in the Netherlands and in Brittany; but the queen was displeased at his absence, and ordered him to remain at court. She made him knight of the Garter in 1597, and gave him a military appointment in Ireland, where he suppressed a rebellion. In 1603 he returned to England, bringing with him Tyrone, the rebel chieftain. Subsequently, James I. created him earl of Devonshire, and made him master of the ordnance. Towards the close of his life he fell into disgrace, by marrying the divorced Lady Rich, daughter of Essex. n. 1563; p. 1606.

BLUCHER, Field-Marshal Lebrecht von, blou'-ker, a distinguished Prussian general, whose bravery and boldness procured him the sobriquet of "Marshal Forward." In his fourteenth year he entered the Swedish service as an ensign, and fought against the Prussians in the Seven Years' War. He was made a prisoner, when he was persuaded to enter the Prussian service, in which he was afterwards to become so distinguished. He soon rose to a senior captaincy, but, taking disgust at the system which promoted an inferior officer to merit over him, he requested permission to retire, which was granted by his eccentric sovereign, Frederick the Great. He now became a farmer in Silesia, where, by industry, he accumulated a good estate, upon which he seemed likely to settle for life, as he had already passed fifteen years in getting it together. In 1786, however, Frederick-William succeeded to the throne of Prussia, when Blucher was courteously recalled to the army, invested with the rank of major in his old regiment of Black Hussars, and began to serve against the French. In 1789 he received the order of Merit; and, in 1793-4, fought at the battles of Orcbies, Luxembourg, Oppenheim, Frankenstein, Kirchweiler, and Edesheim. In 1802 he possessed himself of Erfurt and Muhlhausen; and, in the same year, after the battle of Jena, made a successful retreat before Soult, Murat, and Bernadotte, and although ultimately forced to capitulate, only did so in consequence, as stated in writing, of being "without ammunition and provisions." Being now a prisoner to the French, he was exchanged for General Victor; and, in 1813, was again in the field, at the head of a combined force of Prussians and Russians. At the battles of Lutzen, Bautzen, and Haynau, he greatly distinguished himself, and received, in acknowledgment, the order of St. George from the emperor Alexander of Russia. In 1813 he held the undivided command of 60,000 men, with whom he defeated Marshals Ney, Macdonald, Sebastiani, and Lauriston, and contributed greatly to the victorious results of the battle of Leipzig. In 1814 he took possession of Nancy; and, at Brienne, withstood a determined attack from Napoleon I. In the same year he entered Paris, and would have taken a dreadful revenge upon its inhabitants, had he not been restrained by Wellington and the other generals. He now wore on his breast the insignia of all the illustrious orders of Europe, and the king of Prussia created a new one in his especial honour. Its symbol was a cross of iron, as the sign of his invincible courage. At this time Blücher visited England, where he had the academical degree of D.C.L. conferred on him by the University of Oxford. After this he returned to his country, and retired to his Silesian estate. In 1815, however, the escape of Napoleon from Elba summoned him once more to the battlefield, and he took command of the Prussian army in Belgium. He was defeated, with great loss, at Ligny, on the 16th of June, where his horse was shot under him, and he himself lay, covered by the animal, until several regiments of French cuirassiers had passed over him. He was reported dead to Napoleon; but le vieux diable, ("the old devil") Napoleon's name for him, appeared at the close of the battle of Waterloo, and inflicted a terrific slaughter upon the flying French. After this crowning triumph, he once more retired to his château in Silesia, where his sovereign visited him in his latest moments. "I know I shall die," said the veteran; "I am not sorry for it, seeing that I am now no longer of any use." n. at Kostock, on the Baltic, 1742; n. at Kriblowitz, Silesia, 1819.

BLUMENBACH, Johann Friedrich, bloo'-men-bak, a distinguished German anatomist and physiologist, who in 1775 published a work on the "Varieties of the Human Race" which fixed his fame. In 1776 he became extraordinary professor of medicine in the university of Göttingen; and from that time devoted himself to the promotion of the sciences connected with medicine, anatomy, and physiology. He published numerous works, and in 1812 was appointed secretary to the Royal Society of Sciences at Göttingen. In 1816 he was made physician to the kings of Great Britain and Holland; and in 1821 a knight commander of the Guelphic order. In 1831 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences of Paris. n. at Gotha, 1752; d. 1840.

BOADICEA, bo'-a-dis'-ea, or bo-a-di-se'-a, an ancient British queen, the wife of Prasutagus, king of the Iceni, who, for the security of his family, made the Roman emperor eschir with his daughters. On this, the Roman officers to revenge, assembled her countrymen and stormed Camalodunum (the present Colchester) and put its garrison to the sword. The subsequent Suetonius Paulinus defeated the Britons, and Boadicea either fell among the slain or poisoned herself after her defeat, a.d. 61.

BOCCACCIO, John, bok-kut'-che-o, a celebrated Italian writer, the son of a Florentine merchant, and who, when young, became intimate with the poet Petrarch. He resided a long time at Naples, where he fell in love with the natural daughter of the king, and where the sight of the tomb of Virgil determined his future vocation. His "La Teseida," written in octosyllabic measure, was the first chivalrous poem in the Italian language. Chaucer borrowed from it his "Knight's Tale," to which Dryden gave a new name, and re-cast it as "Palamon and Arcite." He wrote several other poems; but the work upon which his fame rests is the "Decamerone," consisting of one hundred tales, ten of which are supposed to be told in the afternoons of ten successive days, by a party of three young men and seven young women. The stories chiefly consist of love-intrigues, and are of a licentious character. n. at Paris, 1313; n. at Certaldo, in Tuscany, 1375.—Boccaccio and Petrarch were the revivers of classical learning in Italy, and the former may justly be considered as the father of Italian prose in its purer state; for, although he is chiefly known as an admirable story-teller, yet he, at the same time, was a learned man, and wrote several treatises on classical subjects, and was the first to introduce into Italy copies of the Iliad and Odyssey. Of Boccaccio's works many editions and translations have been published.

BOCCAGE, Maria Anne Lepage du, bo'-kaj-e, a French poetess, who at the age of 18 married Peter Joseph du Boccage. At an early period she displayed a taste for poetry, and acquired the friendship of several eminent literary characters; amongst whom were Voltaire, Hénault, and Montesquieu. In 1746 she obtained a prize from the academy at Rouen; and contended for another given by the French Academy for a eulogium on Louis XV.; but on this occasion succumbed to Marmontel. She published a poem entitled "Paradis Terrestre," taken from Milton, and translated the "Death of Abel." n. at Rouen, 1710; d. 1802.

BOCCHERINI, bok-kui-re'-ne, a musical composer, who excelled in symphonies, in which it was the precursor of Haydn. The king of Spain attached him to his court, and he settled at Madrid. n. at Lucca, 1740; d. 1806.—Contemporary critics say that his compositions are of so religious a kind, that if the Almighty wished to listen to mundane music, He would choose Boccherini's.

BOCCOLD, John, bo'-kold, commonly called JOHN OF LEYDEN, li'-den, a fanatic tailor of that city, who associated himself with Mathias, a baker of Haarlem. They, at the head of a rabble of Anabaptists, made themselves masters of the city of Munster. Here, however, they were besieged by the bishop, and Mathias being slain in a sally, Boccold succeeded him, assuming the royal and prophetic character. He set up a government modelled according to a perversion of scriptural declarations, and called himself king of Sion. He allowed a plurality of wives, and took fourteen to himself; one of whom he put to death for questioning his divine authority. The city being taken, Boeold was hanged, in the year 1536. b. about the close of the 15th century.

BOCHART, Samuel, bok'-ar, a celebrated Oriental scholar, a minister at Caen, Normandy. He was versed in most of the Eastern languages, — Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldean, Arabic, Ethiopian, &c. Christina of Sweden wishing to see him, he in 1652 went to Stockholm, where he was received with great honours. On his return to Caen he died suddenly, whilst arguing against Huet in the academy there. He is the author of many works; of which the principal are, "Sacred Geography," "History of the Animals of Scripture," "An Account of the Minerals, Plants, and Precious Stones of the Bible." b. at Rouen, 1599; d. 1657.

BOCK, Jerome, bok, called also Lu Bock, a German naturalist, one of the fathers of botany, being the first who attempted a natural classification of plants, and to seek under their modern names those mentioned in the Bible. b. at Heidelberg, 1493; d. at Hornbach, 1551.

BODLEY, Sir Thomas, bod'-le, the patron of the Bodleian Library at Oxford, and from whom it derives its name, was, in 1564, chosen fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and served the offices of public orator and proctor. He was subsequently employed by Queen Elizabeth in several embassies; but, in 1597, falling into disgrace, he determined to retire from public life, and the same year began to restore the University Library of Oxford. That noble fabric was almost wholly rebuilt by him, and furnished with a great number of books collected at considerable expense, and at his death he bequeathed nearly his whole property for its support and augmentation. By this means the Bodleian Library has come to be the first of its kind in the world. On the accession of James I., Bodley received the honour of knighthood. b. at Exeter in 1541; d. at Oxford in 1612, and was buried in the chapel of Merton College.

BOCEX, or BOZTRUIS, Hector, bo-e'-the-us, a Scotch historian, who, on the foundation of King's College, Aberdeen, by Bishop William Elphinstone, was made the first principal. In gratitude for this honour, he, on the death of that prelate, wrote his life, with an account of his predecessors in that see. But his greatest work is the "History of Scotland," in Latin, which is written in an elegant style, although full of legendary tales and perverted facts. b. at Dundee in 1465; d. 1536, and was buried near the tomb of Bishop Elphinstone, in the chapel of his college.

BOERHAAVE, Herman, boor'-haf, a celebrated physician, who was educated at the university of Leyden, with a view to the ministry, and in 1639 took his degree of Doctor of Philosophy. In two discourses he had refuted the doctrines of Epicurus and Spinoza, by which he raised his character for piety and learning. Subsequently, however, a report spread that he had become a disciple of Spinoza, and which, although untrue, determined him to renounce the ministry, and adopt medicine for his profession. In 1701 he read lectures upon the institutes of physic; and in 1709 was appointed professor of medicine and botany. In 1715 he was chosen rector of the university, and displayed so much spirit against Cartesianism, as to rouse the resentment of the friends of that system against him, particularly a theological professor at Franeker, who charged Boerhaave with being a deist; for which the furious divine was obliged, by his own university, to make an apology. I a science which he greatly improved. In 1730 he was again made rector of the university of Leyden, in addition to the offices which he already held. His fame had now spread over the world. He was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and of the Royal Society of London; and a Chinese mandarin is said to have written him a letter with this direction, "To the illustrious Boerhaave, physician, in Europe." b. at Voorhout, near Leyden, 1669; d. in 1738. — Boerhaave was the most distinguished physician of his age, and wrote a great many works upon those sciences in close connexion with his profession. He excelled as an illustrative experimentalist, and it is said that he had such unwearied patience, that he performed one experiment 320 and another 877 times.

BOETIUS, or BOETIUS, Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus, bo-e'-the-us, a Roman philosopher, who was descended from a patrician family, and who in 510 was advanced to the consulship. He was a profound scholar, and well versed in mathematical learning. He defended the Catholic faith against the Arians, and for his zeal in defence of Albinus, a senator, Theodoric, king of Italy, sent him prisoner to the tower of Pavia, where he wrote his immortal book, entitled "Consolation of Philosophy," which has passed through numerous editions, and was translated into Anglo-Saxon by King Alfred. b. at Rome, 455; beheaded in prison, in Pavia, 526. In 906 Otho III. erected to his memory, in the church of St. Augustine, in Pavia, a monument, which existed till the last century, when the church was destroyed.

BOHEMOND, or BOHEMOND, Mark, bo-he'-mond, the first prince of Antioch, who, in 1091, accompanied his father, Robert Guiscard, duke of Apulia, in his attempt on the Eastern empire. On the return of Guiscard to Italy, he left the command to his son, who defeated the emperor Alexis in two battles. On his father's death in 1085 he became prince of Tarentum; but, desiring to increase his dominions, took part in the first crusade. In 1093 he captured Antioch, of which he was made prince by the Crusaders, and established there a little kingdom, which existed nearly 200 years. He afterwards took Laodicea, but was himself made prisoner. On gaining his liberty, he returned to Greece with a large army, but met with little success. d. 1111. — Six princes of his name succeeded him in the sovereignty of Antioch, the last, Bohemond VII., being dethroned in 1268.

BOILEAU, Francis Adrien, boiild'-yu(r), a French composer, who was made professor at the Conservatory, and subsequently quitted Paris for St. Petersburg, where the emperor Alexander appointed him master of the chapel. In 1812 he returned to Paris. His principal works are, "The Caliph of Bagdad," "La Dame Blanche," "La Famille Suisse," "Ma Tante Aurore," "Jean de Paris," &c. b. at Rouen, 1775; d. at Grosbois, near Bordeaux, 1834.

progress. His satires gained him great reputation, and placed him in the foremost rank of the reforming poets of his time. Louis XIV. was highly pleased with them, and distinguished him by several marks of his favour. His "Art of Poetry" appeared in 1673, and served in some degree as a model for the English poet Pope, who imitated it in many of his best passages in the "Essay on Criticism." In 1684 Boileau was chosen member of the French Academy, and in 1701 was elected pensionary of the Academy of Inscriptions and Medals, which he held till 1705, when his growing infirmities obliged him to resign. The best edition of his works is that of Brossette, Amsterdam, 1703. n. at Paris, 1636; p. 1711.—Boileau rendered great services to French literature in superseding the vicious works of his age, and teaching the people to admire Corneille, Molière, and Racine, and at the same time himself offering the most beautiful models of pure and perfect poetry.—He had two brothers, who were the authors of some unimportant writings.

BOISMONET, Nicholas, bwa'-ma-nay, a French preacher, well known for sermons and panegyrics, in which are many very eloquent passages, and who was admitted to the Academy in 1755. His sermon which is most to be noted was preached in 1782, in order to gather contributions for the establishment of an asylum for disabled soldiers and ecclesiastics. Such was its great effect on his auditors, that a sum of £150,000 was collected, and the asylum founded at Rougemont. He delivered the funeral orations over the Dauphin, Queen Maria Lezinska, Louis XV., and Maria Theresa. n. 1715; p. 1736.

BOISSY D'ANGLAS, Francis Antony, bwa'-se dawng'-glah, a French statesman, who was, in 1792, elected by the department of Ardèche a member of the Convention, in which assembly he distinguished himself by his moderation, powers of application, and by his heroic firmness. He was president on the 1st Prairial (1795), when the mob, invading the Assembly, wished to force the Convention to establish the Reign of Terror. Boissy was insulted and menaced; and, to terrify him, the head of representative Féraud, who had just been beheaded before his eyes, was shown to him. He uncovered himself, and saluted this relic of his unfortunate colleague; then, resuming his seat, remained unmoved in the scene of disorder and anarchy which ensued. He took a part in all the affairs of his country during the Republic and the Empire, and at the Restoration was made a peer. n. at St. Jean la Chambre, near Annonay, 1756; p. at Paris, 1826.

BOLLYN, Anne, bol'-en, wife of Henry VIII., king of England, and mother of Queen Elizabeth, was the daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, afterwards created Viscount Rochford and earl of Wiltshire. Her mother was lady Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the duke of Norfolk. Her early years were spent at the French court, where she attended the wife of Louis XII., on whose death she returned to England, and became maid of honour to Queen Katharine, which occasioned her to be often in the company of Henry. That monarch became enamoured of her person, and in order to make her his wife, determined to procure a divorce from his queen. This design he carried into execution, and married Anne privately; but, when she became pregnant, he publicly acknowledged her his queen, and she so continued till he conceived a passion for Jane Seymour. He then caused her to be tried for high treason, in having been unchaste with her brother and four other persons.—Henry Norris, Sir Francis Weston, William Brereton, and Mark Smeton, all of whom suffered death for their alleged crime. n. 1507; beheaded, on the green before the Tower, 1536.—The body of this unfortunate lady was thrown into a common chest of elm-tree, "used to put arrows in," and her brutal husband married Jane Seymour the day following her execution.

BOLINGBROKE, bol'-ing-brok, or bol'-ing-brok, Henry St. John, Viscount, a distinguished political writer and statesman, who, in 1701, entered parliament as member for Wotton-Basset, and, in 1704, became secretary at war. In 1705 he resigned; but, in 1710, he was again one of the ministry. For the next four years he assisted in governing the country, and, by the inglorious treaty of Utrecht, in April, 1713, brought the war with France to a close. In 1712 he was created Viscount Bolingbroke; but the death of Queen Anne, in 1714, was a fatal blow to Bolingbroke, who had quarrelled with his old friend Harley, the earl of Oxford, and who was endeavouring to form a new cabinet. The death of the queen disarranged all Bolingbroke's schemes, and in the following year he was compelled to make his escape to France in disguise, to evade the vengeance of his enemies. On the accession of George I., he was impeached, by Walpole, at the bar of the House of Lords, and, not appearing to take his trial, was attainted by act of parliament. Meanwhile he had accepted the service of Charles Stuart, the Pretender, who appointed him his prime minister, but who, after his return from Scotland, dismissed him. In 1723 he was permitted to return to England, but was not re-admitted to the House of Lords. This excited his animosity, and he began to write against the ministry with considerable effect, and finally succeeded in overthrowing Sir Robert Walpole. In 1733 he once more withdrew to France, where he resided until the death of his father; which event enabled him to take possession of the family estates at Battersea. Here he passed the remainder of his days, employing his pen upon other subjects besides such as had political tendencies. n. at Battersea, 1678; p. at Battersea, 1751.—The works of Bolingbroke are now little read, notwithstanding the many charms which his style possesses.

BOLIVAR, Simon, bol'-a-var, a South American, and the liberator of Bolivia from the Spanish yoke, was the most distinguished general that has yet appeared in that country. He received his university education at Madrid, and afterwards visited Italy, Switzerland, Germany, France, and England. In 1802 he returned to Madrid, and married a beautiful lady three years younger than himself, he being then only 19. In 1809 he returned to S. America, where, shortly after his arrival, his wife died, when he once more visited Europe, and did not return till the following year, when he dedicated himself to the freedom of his country, and in Venezuela entered upon his military career as a colonel in the service of the newly-founded republic. In June, 1810, we find him in London, endeavouring to induce the British cabinet to assist the independent party against the royalists, and in the following year he was acting as governor of Puerto Cabello, the strongest fortress of Venezuela. He was now fairly committed to the revolutionary cause, serving under General Miranda, whom he afterwards accused as a traitor, and who subsequently died in a dungeon in Spain. The war continued to rage, and after many reverses and changes, Bolívar gradually won his way to that goal for which he heroically and disinterestedly fought. At length, in 1821, the independent troops were successful in the battle of Cerabobo, where the royalists lost upwards of 6000 men, and which decided the cause against Spain. On the 20th of August of the same year a republican constitution was adopted, and decreed to continue, as then defined, till 1834. Bolívar was chosen president, and turned his attention to the internal administration of the country. In 1823 he assisted the Peruvians to obtain their independence, and was declared their liberator, and invested with supreme authority. On the 10th of February, 1825, however, he convoked a congress, and resigned his dictatorship in the following words:—"I felicitate Peru on being delivered from two things, which, of all others on earth, are most dreadful—war, by the victory of Ayacucho, and despotism, by this my resignation." He now visited the upper provinces of Peru, which, calling a convention at Chuquisaca, gave the name of Bolivia to their country, in honour of their liberator, and appointed him perpetual protector, and to draw up a constitution. On the 25th of May, 1826, he presented his Bolivian code to the congress of Bolivia, which was afterwards adopted, though with some dissatisfaction, and it was also subsequently adopted by the congress of Lima, where, under its provisions, he himself was elected president for life. He now set out for Colombia, where disaffection and party strife were at their height. His conduct here was misconstrued, and he was supposed to be assuming the powers of a dictator. These suspicions seem to have deeply affected him, for he wrote to the senate, in February, 1827: "Suspicions of tyrannous usurpation rest upon my name, and disturb the hearts of Colombians. I desire to be made only a private citizen." In 1829 new disturbances arose, and in 1830 a convention was called for the purpose of framing a new constitution for Colombia. The proceedings were begun by Bolívar, who once more tendered his resignation. He was pressed to retain his position; but his resolution was already formed, and he bade adieu to public life, broken in mind and body. He retired to Carthagena, whence, in 1831, he sent an address to the Colombians, vindicating his conduct, and complaining of their ingratitude. This was his last act which had relation to public affairs; for by the end of another week he was no more. B. at Caracas, 1783; D. at San Pedro, near Carthagena, 1830.

BONAPARTE, FAMILY OF, bo'-na-parte, a distinguished family, originally from Tuscany, but settled in Corsica for several generations previous to the close of the last century.

BONAPARTE, THE EMPERORS. (See NAPOLEON I., II., and III.)

BONAPARTE, Charles, a judge of the island of Corsica, the father of Napoleon I., emperor of the French, and of a large family of sons and daughters, most of whom, under the patronage of their great brother, attained a considerable position and influence in Europe. Charles Bonaparte married, in 1767, Letitia Ramolino,

Bonaparte

D. at Montpellier, 1785, shortly after the birth of his youngest child, Jérôme. Letitia, left with eight children and little property, was obliged in 1793 to quit Corsica, and repaired to Marseilles, where she lived with her family in a very humble manner. On the establishment of the consular government, in 1799, the Bonapartes went to Paris, altering but little the style of their living. In 1804, Napoleon being proclaimed emperor, Letitia received the title of Madame la Mère, and also that of "general protectress of charitable establishments." She saved a large sum of money, and was in the habit of saying, "Who knows but one day I shall have to find bread for all these kings?" After the downfall of the Emperor, she retired to Rome. D. there 1836; B. at Ajaccio, 1750.—Letitia was a woman of great energy and courage; and Napoleon ascribed no little of his greatness to the influence of the early training of his mother.—The eight children of Charles and his wife are mentioned below in the order in which they were born.

BONAPARTE, Joseph, eldest son of the above, after taking a prominent part in the events which happened during the Consulate and the Empire, was appointed, in 1806, by Napoleon I., king of Naples. Reigning over this kingdom two years, he was transferred, in 1808, to Madrid, and was nominally king of Spain till 1813. He afterwards retired to the United States, under the name of count of Survilliers, then to England, and finally to Florence. B. 1768; D. at Florence, 1844, leaving two daughters. In 1794 he married Julia Clary, daughter of a Marseilles merchant.

BONAPARTE, Napoleon, second son. (See NAPOLEON I.)

BONAPARTE, Lucien, third son, was, in 1799, president of the council of the Five Hundred, and contributed greatly to the successful result of the Napoleon coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire. He was afterwards employed in a mission to the court of Spain, and in 1808 was made prince of Canino. On his way to America he was, in 1810, taken prisoner by the English, and detained at Ludlow, Shropshire, for three years. After 1814 he returned to Italy. B. 1775; D. at Viterbo, 1840.—Lucien was possessed of great boldness and talent; and, less docile than his brothers, Napoleon I. could not so effectually mould him to his purposes, being encountered, in all his demands on Lucien, by a haughtiness and intelligence equal to his own. He was twice married; the best-known of his children being Charles Lucien, prince of Musignano and Canino. B. 1803; D. 1857.

BONAPARTE, Eliza, eldest daughter of the above, was married in 1797 to Felix Baciocchi, a Corsican soldier of good birth. She was afterwards made a princess of Piombino and Lucca, and subsequently grand duchess of Tuscany. In all these positions Eliza had the chief power, her husband being simply her first subject and aide-de-camp. B. 1777; D. at Trieste, 1820.—She left one child, Napoleon Eliza. (See BACIOCCHI.)

BONAPARTE, Louis, the fourth son of the above, accompanied Napoleon in his expeditions to Italy and Egypt, was employed by the emperor in several capacities, and, in 1806, was proclaimed king of Holland. For four years he reigned over the Dutch; and although but a viceroy of his brother, yet his good and admirable qualities endeared him greatly to the people. In 1814 he retired to Rome; and afterwards, under the name of count de St. Leu, to Florence. b. 1778; d. at Leghorn, 1846.—Louis was fond of study and retirement, and it was only in obedience to the stronger mind of Napoleon that he undertook the burdens of administration and government. In 1802 he married Hortense Beauharnais, daughter of Josephine; but this marriage, although his wife was a most beautiful and accomplished woman, proved exceedingly unhappy, and they separated in 1810. Their first son, Napoleon Charles, whom the emperor fondly loved and adopted, died in 1807. Their second son, Charles Napoleon, died at Forli, in 1831, fighting for Italian independence. Their third son, Louis Napoleon, born in 1808, was elected president of the French republic, 1848, and emperor of the French, 1852. (See HORTENSE.)

BONAPARTE, Marie Pauline, the second daughter of the above, was first married to General Leclerc, whom she accompanied to St. Domingo, where she displayed the greatest courage. Leclerc dying in the isle of Tortuga, Pauline returned to France, and Napoleon married her in 1803 to Prince Camillo Borghese, duke of Guastalla, a wealthy Italian noble. This union, unlike the first, was not a happy one. b. 1780; d. 1825.—Pauline was of a haughty but kind disposition, and possessed strong prejudices. She was never favourably inclined to Maria Louisa, and Napoleon exiled her from court in consequence of a public affront to that empress. After the emperor's downfall, however, Pauline thought no more of his resentment, but sent him some magnificent and valuable diamonds, the only offering she had in her power to make. She left no children.

BONAPARTE, Caroline, the third daughter of the above, married in 1800 Joachim Murat, grand duke of Berg, who was proclaimed in 1809 king of Naples. On the death of her husband in 1815, she retired to Italy, where she lived with the title of countess of Lipona. b. 1782; d. 1839.—She left one child, Lucien Napoleon Murat, better known as Prince Murat. b. 1803.

BONAPARTE, Jérôme, the fifth and youngest son of the above, after serving in the navy in the West Indies, and performing missions in the service of France, married, in the United States, a Miss Patterson, daughter of a rich Baltimore merchant. This marriage was afterwards dissolved, and Jérôme, by Napoleon's desire, married, in 1807, the Princess Catherine of Wurtemberg, and in a few days after became king of Westphalia, which dignity he held till 1813. After the fall of Napoleon, he resided in Italy for some time, with the title of prince de Montfort. When, under Louis Napoleon, the fortunes of the Bonaparte family were again in the ascendant, Jérôme returned to Paris, and was appointed president of the state council. b. 1764; d. 1880.—He had by his second wife the Princess Mathilde, b. 1820, who was married in 1841 to Prince Demidoff, and Prince Napoleon-Joseph-Charles-Paul, b. 1822, and known as Prince Napoleon. In 1861, M. Bonaparte Patterson, grandson of Prince Jérôme by Miss Patterson, instituted a suit in the French courts to have the validity of their marriage declared, which, after being heard for several days, was decided against the American branch of the family.

BONAPARTE, Prince Louis Lucien, second son of Lucien Bonaparte, is distinguished for his devotion to scientific and philological pursuits, and has written several works on chemistry, in French and Italian, and in 1857 published the "Bonaparte Polyglot," being the parade of the sower, from St. Matthew, in seventy-two European languages and dialects. He is likewise a proficient in that singular language, the Basque, of which he has published a grammar. Under Napoleon III., he was made a senator. b. at Mornigrove, Worcestershire, 1813.

BONAPARTE, Prince Napoleon-Joseph-Charles-Paul, son of Jérôme Bonaparte and Princess Catherine of Wurtemberg, was, on the recall of the Bonaparte family from their long exile, elected to the Constituent Assembly, and became one of the leaders of the extreme republican party. He subsequently, however, retired from this course, and attached himself to his cousin, Napoleon III. In 1854 he had a command in the expedition of the allies against Sebastopol, and fought at the battle of the Alma. In 1858 he was appointed minister of Algeria, but shortly afterwards resigned this post. In 1859 he married the Princess Clothilde, daughter of Victor Emmanuel, king of Sardinia, and in the Italian campaign of that year, had the command of the French reserve in the centre and south of the Peninsula. b. at Trévis, 1822.

BONE, Henry, R.A., Jon, the most eminent enamel-painter of his age, having carried the art to a pitch of perfection never before attained, was the son of a chair-maker, at Truro, where he was born in 1756. He was apprenticed to a china-manufacturer, at Bristol, where he obtained the first rudiments of the art which he afterwards practised with so much success. He removed to London, and at first painted enamels for jewellers and watchmakers, but afterwards confined his attention to miniature painting, many of his portraits being enamelled. He also executed several works in enamel from classical themes; was elected an academicien in 1811, and was successively enamel-painter to George III., George IV., and William IV. d. 1834. His son, H. P. Bone, held the office of enamel-painter to her majesty Queen Victoria.

BONHEUR, Rosa, bon-heur, a French artist, distinguished as a painter of animal and still life. Her father, being himself an artist, directed her studies and taught her to copy nature; and with this view he frequently took her into the country, where she could see it in all its aspects, and at the same time copy the living creation as she beheld it moving in its freest and most careless conditions, or in a state of labour. Her "Labourage Nivernais" (ploughing in the snow) fixed her reputation, and her "Horse Fair," which was exhibited in 1855, at the French Exhibition in London, excited universal admiration. Her whole family are more or less artistic in their tastes, and she has both brothers and sisters who have acquired distinction in the paths of sculpture and painting. b. at Bordeaux, 1822.

BONIFACE, St. bon-i-face, a saint of the Roman calendar, and a native of England, who was sent by Gregory II. to convert the Germans. Gregory III. made him an archbishop. b. in Devonshire, 680; slain by some peasants in Friesland, in 755. His letters were printed in 1816.

BONIFACE I., pope and saint, succeeded Zozimus in 418, and was maintained in the pontifical chair by the emperor Honorius, against his rival Enallius. p. 422.

BONIFACE II. succeeded Felix IV. in 530. He was born at Rome, his father being a Goth. He compelled the bishops in a council to allow him to nominate his successor, and accordingly he named Vigil; but another council disavowed the proceedings of the first. p. 532.

BONIFACE III. succeeded Sabinianus in 607, and died shortly after his election; but he obtained from the emperor Phocas the acknowledgment that the see of Rome was supreme over all other churches.

BONIFACE IV. was the son of a physician, and came to the tiara in 607. He converted the Pantheon into a church. p. 615.

BONIFACE V. was a Neapolitan, and succeeded Adeodatus in 617. He endeavoured to convert the natives of Britain to Christianity, and confirmed the right of sanctuary in churches. p. 627.

BONIFACE VI. came to the chair on the death of Formosus, in 903, but held it only fifteen days; for, being elected by a popular faction, he was deposed.

BONIFACE VII., whose surname was Francon, assumed the chair after murdering Benedict VI. in 971. He was driven out of Rome, but returned in 983, and caused the reigning pope, John XIV. to be murdered in prison. He was killed a few months after.

BONIFACE VIII., in 1294, terrified his predecessor Celestine into a resignation, by threatening him, by night, with eternal damnation if he did not quit the pontifical chair. The credulous pope, thinking this a supernatural voice, obeyed the command next day, and the crafty cardinal was elected. He commenced his pontificate by imprisoning his predecessor, and laying Denmark under an interdict. He also behaved in a haughty manner towards the Colonnas, a distinguished Roman family, who protested against his election, and called a council to examine the charge. Boniface excommunicated them as heretics, and preached a crusade against them. He incited the princes of Germany to revolt against Albert of Austria; and also issued a bull, in which he asserted that God had set him over kings and kingdoms. Philip the Fair caused this bull to be burnt at Paris; on which Boniface laid France under an interdict. Philip appealed to a general council, and sent his army into Italy, which took Boniface prisoner. The pontiff's behaviour on this occasion was bold enough; for, putting on the tiara, and taking the keys and the crozier in his hands, he said, "I am a pope, and a pope I will die." p. at Rome a few months afterwards, in 1303. He wrote several works. His persecuting tendencies are alluded to by Dante in the 27th chapter of the "Inferno." p. about 1228.

BONIFACE IX. was a Neapolitan by birth, and of a noble family. He was made cardinal in 1381, and pope in 1389. p. 1404.

BONINGTON, Richard Parkes, bon'-ing-ton, an English artist of considerable promise, was born near Nottingham, in 1801, and after studying in Paris, visited Venice, and painted many excellent views of that picturesque city. He returned to England, and died of decline in Sept., 1828, at the early age of 27. Mr. Bonington had prepared sketches for several other pictures of Italian, and especially Venetian scenery, but was not permitted time to work them out. He painted, chiefly in water colours, marine and river views; his style is simple, picturesque, and free from conventionalisms.

BONNER, Edmund, bon'-ner, who rose to be an English prelate, was educated at Oxford, and afterwards entered into the service of Wolsey, who bestowed upon him several benefices. Henry VIII., to whom he was chaplain, sent him to Rome to get the sentence of divorce from Katherine of Aragon confirmed; and here his behaviour was so bold, that the pope threatened to throw him into a caldron of boiling lead. In 1538 he was nominated bishop of Hereford, being then ambassador at Paris; but, before his consecration, he was translated to the see of London. Hitherto he had professed a zeal for the Reformed doctrines, but now that Henry was dead, and Edward VI. reigning in his stead, he scrupled to take the oath of supremacy, for which he was sent to prison; but on making his submission, was released. His negligence, however, in complying with the laws, occasioned him a second imprisonment, and the loss of his bishopric. On the accession of Mary, he was restored to his episcopal functions, when he deprived the married priests in his diocese, set up the mass in St. Paul's, and, through the whole of this reign, evinced a most sanguinary spirit, bringing numbers of Protestants to the stake. When Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, however, retributive justice fell upon his head, and he was sent to the Marshalsea prison, where he was confined during the remainder of his life. His body was interred in St. George's churchyard, Southwark. p. at Hanley, Worcestershire, at the close of the 15th century; p. in prison, 1509.

BONNET, Charles, bon'-nai, a Swiss naturalist, whose studies were chiefly directed to the elucidation of the conditions of insect life. p. at Geneva, 1720; p. 1703.

BONNEVAL, Claude Alexander, count de, bon'-ne-val, a French military adventurer, who, after serving in the army and navy of his own country, transferred his allegiance to Austria, and subsequently became a Mussulman. In Turkey he attained high distinction; and, under the title of Achmet Pasha, introduced European tactics, and taught the Turks the management of artillery. p. 1675; p. in Turkey, 1747.

BONNIVARD, Francis de, bon'-ne-var, Byron's "Prisoner of Chillon," whose liberal opinions induced him to adopt the republic of Geneva as the most agreeable government for him to live under. For his defence of the rights of the republic against Charles III., duke of Savoy, he was twice imprisoned, the first time at Grôlée, where he was immured for two years; and the second in the castle of Chillon, on Lake Geneva, where he remained six years. p. at Seyssel, in the department of the Ain, 1406; p. at Geneva, 1570.—Bonnivard wrote a history of Geneva, bequeathed his ecclesiastical possessions to the state, and to the town his books, which were the foundation of its public library. The shuddering picture which Byron has drawn of the sufferings of the two brothers of Bonnivard while chained to the stone columns in the dungeon of Chillon, has no foundation in truth. "The eldest of the three" was the only one of his kindred confined there.

BONONCINI, Giovanni, bon'-on-che'-ne, a musical composer, who, in conjunction with Handel and Ariosti, was engaged for the establishment of the Royal Academy of Music in London. His compositions were deficient in vigour, but were marked by much grace and tenderness. b. at Bologna about 1660; d. about 1760.

BONPLAND, Aimé, bonp'-land, a superior botanist and the companion of Humboldt in his South-American explorations. In 1804 he became superintendent of the gardens of the empress Josephine at Malmaison, and when she died, in 1814, he resigned his situation. In 1816 he once more visited S. America, and, after encountering considerable dangers, finally settled in the neighbourhood of San Borja, a small town on the banks of the Uruguay, in Brazil, where he continued to reside till his death. b. at La Rochelle, 1773; d. 1853.

BOONE, Daniel, boon, a colonel in the United States service, and one of the earliest settlers in Kentucky, where he signalized himself by his many daring exploits against the Red Indians, and also by his extensive surveys and explorations of that state. In 1793 he removed to Upper Louisiana, then belonging to the Spaniards, and was named by them commandant of a district there. b. in Virginia, U.S., 1735; d. in Missouri, 1822. Boone was one of the most successful of the enterprising American pioneers of the 18th century, and may be said to have explored, defended, and aided in the settlement of the country from the Alleghany Mountains to the frontier of Missouri.

BOOTH, Barton, booth, an English actor, who, at the age of 17, entered into a strolling company, and whose reputation became so great that Betterton engaged him. When Addison's "Cato" was to be acted, he was selected to perform the principal part, and sustained it so well that one night a subscription of fifty guineas was collected in the boxes and sent to him. He afterwards became manager of the house, and continued to perform nearly to his death. b. in Lancashire, probably at Warrington, 1681; d. 1733.

BOOTH, Sir Felix, the owner of a large distillery, distinguished for the great liberality he showed, when sheriff of London in 1829, in paying all the expenses, amounting to £17,000, of Captain Ross's second expedition to the Arctic regions, and whose name will always be honourably connected with the history of maritime discovery. He was knighted by William IV., and received the thanks of Parliament. b. 1755; d. at Brighton, 1850.

BORDA, John Charles, bor'-da, a French mathematician, who early entered the navy, and was employed on a voyage of discovery along the coasts of Europe and Africa, with a view of improving navigation and geography. The result of this expedition was published in two vols. 4to, 1778. In the American war he served under D'Estaing, with the rank of rear-admiral. Before this he had introduced uniformity into the architecture of the French ships of war. He contributed numerous papers to the memoirs of the Academy of Sciences, chiefly relating to the construction of vessels, and to hydraulics. In 1787 he published the "Description and Use of the Circle of Reflection," in which he recommended the employment of the specular circles invented by Tobias Mayer. He also invented many instruments now used in surveys by triangulation. One of his last labours was the accurate determination of the length of the pendulum vibrating seconds at Paris. b. at Dax, 1733; d. at Paris, 1796. To this mathematician and Coulomb is ascribed the rise of the correct views of experimental philosophy for which the French have since become distinguished.

BORDE, John Benjamin de la, bord, a French writer, who was valet to Louis XV., and on the death of that monarch was appointed farmer-general. He employed his leisure hours in studying music and the belles-lettres. His collection of airs, in 4 vols. 8vo, and essays on music, ancient and modern, in 4 vols. 4to, are proofs of his skill in the first, and in the second he distinguished himself by the "Memoirs of Coucy," 2 vols. 8vo, "An Essay on Ancient and Modern Music," "An Account of Saugnier's Voyages on the Coast of Africa," "Letters upon Switzerland," "History of the South Sea," and other works. b. at Paris, 1734; guillotined, 1794.

BORDEAUX, Henry-Charles-Ferdinand-Mario Dieudonné d'Artois, Duc de, bor'-do, the son of Charles Ferdinand, duc de Berri, who was assassinated in 1820. On the dethronement of Charles X. of France, his son the dauphin, Louis Antoine, renounced his claim to the throne in favour of this prince; but he left France with the royal family in August, 1830. Louis Philippe then ascended the throne, and the duc de Bordeaux took the title of comte de Chambord. The French legitimists designate him as Henry V. He was married, in 1846, to Maria Teresa, daughter of the ex-duke of Modena. Being childless he is the last of the elder branch of the Bourbon family. b. 1820.

BORELLI, Giovanni Alfonso, bo-ras'-le, an eminent Italian professor of mathematics and medicine, who discovered and translated the lost books of Apollonius Pergæus, wrote the first theory of Jupiter's satellites, and endeavoured to apply mathematics to medicine. In 1656 he was called to a professor's chair at Pisa, where he lectured with great success, and wrote much in connection with the sciences he pursued. Being supposed to have favoured a revolt of the Messinians, amongst whom he had gone to live, he was invited by Queen Christina of Sweden to Rome, where she then was. Thither he immediately went, and lived under her patronage until his death. b. at Naples, 1603; d. at Rome, 1679.—The work "De Motu Animalium" is that upon which the medical reputation of Borelli depends.

BORGHESE, Camillo, bor-gas'-zei, a scion of an ancient Italian family, amongst whom have been several cardinals, and other nobles who have played distinguished parts in the public affairs of Italy, married the General Leclerc, Marie Pauline Bonaparte, the sister of Napoleon I. In 1805 he was created a prince of the French empire, and, with the title of duke of Guastalla, became governor-general of the departments beyond the Alps, which embraced those former Italian states, and which were now annexed to France. Subsequently to the fall of the emperor, he fixed his abode at Florence, where, in a palatial structure, he lived in princely splendour. He had another residence at Rome, which he adorned with costly works of art. b. 1775; d. 1833.

BORGIA, Cæsar, bor'-ja-s, a profligate son of Pope Alexander VI., on whose accession he was made archbishop of Valencia and cardinal; but being jealous of his brother John, who was most in favour, he contrived to have him drowned. He also dispatched a number of other persons, to gratify his avarice and revenge. Having renounced his cardinal-was made duke of Valentinois by Louis XII. of France, with whom he entered into a league for the conquest of the Milanese. On the death of his father, he was sent prisoner to Spain, but made his escape, and died fighting as a volunteer in the service of his brother-in-law, the king of Navarre, under the walls of Pampeluna, in 1507.

BORGIA, Lueretia, sister of the above, has been represented as equally profligate with her brother; a charge which is hardly credible, when we consider the characters of those who have been her panegyrist. Among these are the names of Ariosto, Strozzi, Tibaldio, and several historians, who could not all have concurred in commending an embodiment of wickedness. She was thrice married, and left several sons, which may be considered as another argument greatly in her favour. b. at Ferrara, 1523. (See Roscoe's "History of Italy," &c.)

BORLASE, William, bor'-lase, an ingenious antiquary, who in 1730 entered into orders, and two years afterwards obtained the rectory of Ladgvan, and afterwards that of St. Just, in Cornwall. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society; and, having presented a variety of fossils and pieces of antiquity to the university of Oxford, received the thanks of that learned body, and the degree of LL.D. He also gave many curious ores and fossils to the poet Pope for his grotto at Twickenham. b. at St. Just, Cornwall, 1696; d. 1772.—He wrote an essay on Cornish crystals, in the "Philosophical Transactions," "Antiquities of the County of Cornwall," folio, two editions; "Observations on the Scilly Islands," &c.; and "The Natural History of Cornwall," folio; all of them valuable.

БОРРОМЕО, Frederick, bor-ro'-mai-o, cardinal and archbishop of Milan, who founded the Ambrosian Library at Milan. b. at Milan in 1564; d. in 1631. His writings are all theological.

БОРРОМЕО, Charles, cousin of the above, also a cardinal and archbishop of Milan, renowned for his piety and learning. He drew up the famous "Catechism of Trent," and was one of the most influential prelates who attended the Council of Trent. b. 1538; d. 1584.

БОРРОМИНИ, Francis, bor-ro-me'-ni, an eminent architect, who, it was said, was driven mad by the reputation of Bernini, another architect, and stabbed himself. He built the church of La Sapienza at Rome, the college of the Propaganda, and several other elegant structures. b. in the district of Como, 1599; d. 1687.

BORROW, George, bor-ro, an English author, whose singular spirit of adventure led him into the society of the gypsies, not only of England and Ireland, but those of the Spanish peninsula. Many of the scenes through which he has passed are supposed to be given in his works, "The Zineali," "The Bible in Spain," "Lavengro," and "Romany Rye." b. at East Dereham, in Norfolk, 1803.

BOSCAWEN, Edward, bos-ko'-en, a distinguished English admiral, was the second son of Hugh, Viscount Falmouth. He early entered the navy, and was, in 1740, made captain of the Shoreham. He particularly distinguished himself at the taking of Porto Bello and the siege of Cartagena. On his return to England, he married the daughter of William Glanville, Esq., and was chosen M.P. for Truro, in Cornwall. In 1744 he was made captain of the Dreadnought, of 60 guns, and soon after took the Medea, commanded by Captain Hoquart, the first French ship of war captured that year. In 1747 he distinguished himself under Anson, and was in an engagement with the French fleet off Cape Finisterre, where he was wounded in the shoulder by a musket-ball, and when Hoquart again became his prisoner. The same year he was made rear-admiral of the blue, and commander of the land and sea forces employed in an expedition to the East Indies. On his arrival he laid siege to Pondicherry, but was obliged to quit it on account of the monsoon; and the manner in which he effected his retreat added to his fame. He soon afterwards took Madras, and peace being concluded, returned to England, where he was appointed one of the lords commissioners of the Admiralty. In 1755 he sailed to intercept a French squadron bound to North America, of which he took two ships, and Hoquart became his prisoner a third time. For this service he received the thanks of the House of Commons. In 1758 he took Cape Breton and Louisburg, in conjunction with General Amherst. The year following he commanded in the Mediterranean, and while lying at Gibraltar, hearing that the French admiral, M. de la Clue, had passed the Straits, he refitted his ships, and came up with the French fleet, of which he took three ships and burnt two others in Lagos Bay. He once more received the thanks of Parliament, and had an annual pension of £3000 conferred upon him. In 1760 he was appointed general of the marines, with a salary of £3000 a year, which he retained until his death. b. in Cornwall, 1711; d. at Hatchfield Park, near Guildford, 1761.—It was of this admiral that Lord Chatham said, when he proposed expeditions to other commanders, he heard nothing but difficulties; but when he applied to him, these were either set aside or expedients suggested to remove them.

BOSQUET, Marshal, bos'-kai, a French commander, who, in 1829, entered the Polytechnic School, and, in 1833, became a sub-lieutenant in the artillery. In 1835 he went with his regiment to Algeria, where he began to distinguish himself. Between 1836 and 1843 he had passed through the successive ranks of captain, chef-de-bataillon, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel, when, in that year, he was appointed by the republican government general of brigade. In 1854 the emperor Napoleon III. raised him to the rank of general of division, and enrolled him in the staff of the army of Marshal St. Arnaud. He was with the French army in the Crimea, where he greatly distinguished himself, and was wounded in the assault on the Malakoff tower at the siege of Sebastopol. He was made a marshal of France, and in 1859 appointed to a command in the war against Austria. He died February 3, 1861. b. at Pau, in 1810.

BOSSUET, James, bos'-soo-et, a celebrated French preacher, who, in 1669, was made bishop of Condom, at which time he was also appointed tutor to the dauphin, for whom he composed his "Discourse on Universal History," which was printed in 1691. It was from this work that Voltaire conceived his opinion of Bossuet's great eloquence. It is divided into three parts, and Mr. Charles Butler, a critic, says that it scarcely contains a sentence in which there is not some noun or verb conveying an i suggesting a sentiment of the noblest kind. The same year he was made bishop of Meaux. In 1697 he was appointed counsellor of state. Bossuet distinguished himself as a controversialist against the Protestants, and his "Exposition of the Doctrine of the Catholic Church upon Matters of Controversy" was written with so much talent and ingenuity as to draw many persons over to popery. It was translated into several languages, and procured for the author the thanks of the pope. Several able Protestants attacked the bishop, who encountered them with great spirit. B. at Dijon, 1627; B. at Paris, 1704.—His funeral orations are, no doubt, splendid, affecting, and eloquent; but their style is by far too dramatic to suit the tastes of those who view the occasions which call them forth, as being better adapted for a humble expression of sorrow, than for a pompous display of sentiment.

BOSTON, Thomas, bos-ton, a Scottish divine of the early part of the 18th century, whose works are eminently popular with the religious community in his native country, was born in Dunse, Berwickshire, in 1676, and was pastor of the parish of Ettrick during the greatest portion of his life. He was a very voluminous writer, but his "Fourfold State" is the best known of his works, and is universally read and esteemed by the author's countrymen, and, indeed, by the religious world generally, both in Britain and America. B. May 20, 1732.

BOSWELL, James, bos'-wel, the biographer of Dr. Johnson, was the son of Alexander Boswell, of Auchinleck, one of the Scottish justices of session. He was educated at the school and university of Edinburgh, and early distinguished himself by his love of poetry and the belles-lettres. Being, however, rather addicted to pleasure, and wishing to enter into the army, his father, who designed him for his own profession, would not allow him to adopt a military life. At his request he went to London, where he contracted an intimacy with Dr. Johnson and other men of literary eminence. Thence he went to Utrecht and studied the civil law; after which he travelled through Germany and Switzerland. In the latter country he was introduced to Rousseau, and at Ferney visited Voltaire. He next went to Italy, and passed over to Corsica, where, by means of an introductory letter which he received from Rousseau, he formed an intimacy with General Paoli. On his return he published an account of Corsica. About this time he was admitted an advocate at the Scotch bar, and distinguished himself in the famous Douglas cause against the Hamilton family, who laid claim to the property of the late duke of Douglas, in opposition to Mr. Archibald Douglas, the legitimacy of whose birth was disputed. The indolence of his disposition, however, coupled with his fondness for pleasure, were powerful impediments to his advancement in the legal profession; accordingly, he made little progress as a votary of Themis. In 1773 he accompanied Dr. Johnson in a tour through the Highlands and the western isles of Scotland, of which tour he wrote an entertaining account, published in 1784. On the death of his father he removed to London, and was admitted at the English bar, but never attained any considerable practice. By the influence of Lord Lonsdale, however, he was chosen recorder of Carlisle. In 1790 he published a book of high value in biographical literature,—"The Memoirs of Dr. Johnson," in 2 vols. 4to. It is upon this admirable work that the fame of Boswell as an author rests. It has received the commendation of the highest authorities, has given gratification to thousands upon thousands of readers, and presents us with the best portrait of a great man that has ever been painted. B. at Edinburgh, 1740; B. 1795.—It may be considered a somewhat curious fact, that during the more than twenty years of acquaintance which subsisted between Dr. Johnson and Boswell, they had been in each other's company not more than 276 days. This period embraces their tour to the Hebrides, when they were together from the 13th of August to the 22nd of November, 1773. Out of this period one of the most entertaining books that has ever been written was produced,—a book which is the richest storehouse of wit and wisdom of which any language can boast. The great merit of Boswell's "Life of Johnson" consists in this, that the author has recorded the sayings and doings of the great moralist and lexicographer without the slightest varnish or suppression, and this notwithstanding that Boswell himself frequently figures as the subject of Johnson's pungently satirical remarks. He had an intense admiration of his "illustrious friend," as he is never tired of designating his patron, and seems to have taken as marks of favour observations made to him by the doctor, which, in themselves, are anything but complimentary. Indeed, as has been well remarked, Boswell's great work proves him to have been at once the best biographer and the meanest or most obtuse man that ever lived. The work, besides the two editions superintended by the author, has been many times reprinted.

Bothwell

BOSWORTH, Joseph, D.D., F.R.S., &c., bos'-worth, an eminent Anglo-Saxon scholar and philologist, who was reared for the church, in which he officiated for several years, both in England and Scotland; but whose declining health forced him to resign his duties. In 1823 he published his "Elements of Anglo-Saxon Grammar," which brought him into correspondence and acquaintance with some of the leading Anglo-Saxon scholars of the day. In 1838 his "Dictionary of the Anglo-Saxon Language" appeared, of which another edition, in a more compendious form, was published in 1848. After that period he occupied himself in translating several Anglo-Saxon works, and in preparing for publication the Anglo-Saxon and the Gothic gospels in parallel columns. B. in Derbyshire, 1783.

BOTHWELL, James Hepburn, Earl, both'-well, remarkable in the history of Scotland in connection with Mary, queen of Scots, and his supposed share in the murder of Henry Darnley, her husband. When that unfortunate prince was blown up in the house where he slept, in the vicinity of Holyrood palace, suspicion fell strongly upon Bothwell and the queen. Bothwell was tried and acquitted. After this, he seized Mary near Edinburgh, and carried her prisoner to Dunbar Castle, where he first endeavoured, by soothing speeches and protestations of love, to prevail on her to marry him. That she did so at last is certain; but it is said, and seemingly with justice, that she was forced to it by the worst advantages being taken of her. During these iniquitous proceedings, Bothwell procured a divorce from his former wife. Mary soon after created him earl of Orkney. But a confederacy among the lords being formed against him, he retired to the Orkneys, and thence to Denmark, where he died in prison, it is said confessing his own guilt and the queen's innocence of the king's murder. b. in the castle of Malmoe, in 1576.—This is the historical personage chosen by Professor Aytoun for the hero of his poem of "Bothwell." (See AYTOUN.)

BOTTA, Carlo Guiseppe, bot-ta, an Italian, who studied medicine at the university of Turin, and in 1786 took a doctor's degree. He wrote several historical works, and received a pension, with the honour of knighthood, from Charles Albert, king of Sardinia. He wrote a "History of Italy," and a continuation of Guicciardini's history from 1530 down to 1789; upon the merits of which public opinion is divided. He was also the author of a "History of American Independence," which has been highly spoken of in the United States. b. at San Giorio Piedmont, 1766; d. at Paris, 1837.

BOTTA, Paul Emile, son of the above, became French consul at Mosul, and early distinguished himself as a naturalist. After spending some years in Egypt, and making a journey through a portion of Arabia, he settled at Mosul, and in 1843 disintombed an Assyrian palace in the mound of Khorsabad, 14 miles from the seat of his consulship. This was before the discoveries made by Mr. Layard; so that M. Botta may be considered the first who led the way in the discovery of Assyrian remains. b. at Paris, about 1800.

BOUFFLERS, Louis François de, boof-flai, a marshal of France, who early in life entered the army, and in 1689 became colonel of a regiment of dragoons, and distinguished himself in several actions under the gallant Turenne. In 1703, after the battle of Oudenarde, he defended Lille against Prince Eugene, for which he was created a peer. At the battle of Malplaquet, he effected his retreat without losing any of his artillery or soldiers. This was his last public achievement. b. 1644; d. at Fontainebleau, 1711.—When William III. took Namur, he kept Boufflers prisoner, contrary to the terms of the capitulation. The marshal asking the reason of this conduct, was told it was on account of the French having kept the garrison of Dixmude: "Then," said he, "mine ought to be detained rather than myself." "Sir," it was replied, "you are of more value than 10,000 men."

BOUVILLON, Godfrey, boof-lawng, one of the leaders in the first Crusade. He took Antioch and Jerusalem, of which the Christian soldiery proclaimed him the first Latin king. He, however, rejected the title, and contented himself with that of "Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre." In 1099 he defeated the sultan of Egypt at Ascalon. b. about 1060; d. 1100.—The glowing eulogy of Tasso preserves the memory of this warrior fresh in the minds of the lovers of historical romance.

BOULTON, Matthew, bold-ton, an inventor and improver in the mechanical arts. In 1769 he entered into communication with Watt, the improver of the steam-engine; after which the Soho works, near Birmingham, became famous for the mechanical skill displayed in the construction of steam-engines. His coining-machinery was a triumph of its kind, and he, in conjunction with his partner, Watt, greatly contributed to give an impetus to British industry. b. at Birmingham, 1723; d. 1809.—Boulton was of a generous and ardent disposition, and is said to have expended £47,000 in experiments on the steam-engine, before Watt had so far perfected it as to bring any return of profit.

BOU-MAZA, boo-ma'-za, an Arab chief, whose real name was Si Mahomet ben Abdallah. Like Abd-el-Kader, he acquired in early life a saintly reputation, and, declaring himself invulnerable, promised heaven and riches to all who assisted in the expulsion of the French from Africa. In 1845, in connection with Abd-el-Kader, he obtained several advantages over the generals of France, but was subsequently, in 1846, defeated by Colonel (afterwards Marshal) St. Arnaud. Ultimately, on 10th January, 1847, General Herbillon completely routed his forces, and he surrendered in the following April to St. Arnaud. Brought to France, he had a handsome residence assigned to him in Paris, with a pension of 15,000 francs. In 1854 he quitted the French soil, commanded, during the Russian war, a body of Bashli-Bazouks, and was made a colonel in the Turkish service. b. about 1820.—(See ABD-EL-KADER.)

BOURBON, Charles, duke of, constable of France, boor-bawng, was the son of Gilbert, count of Montpensier, and distinguished himself by the various he had chosen to reject. On this he associated with Charles V. and the king of England against his sovereign. The plot, however, was discovered, and he escaped into Italy, where he became lieutenant-general to the emperor Charles, and afterwards his commander-in-chief. b. 1459; killed in an assault upon Rome, 1527.

BOURCHIER, Thomas, boor-sheer, an archbishop of Canterbury, who is said to have introduced the art of printing into England in 1464, by bringing over a compositor from Haarlem at his own expense. A more probable version of the story is, that he assisted Caxton in establishing his printing press at Westminster. b. 1468.

BOURDEILLES, Peter de. (See BRANTOME.)
BOURMONT, Louis Auguste Victor de Chalmes, Marshal Count de, boor-moung, a French general, who, at the age of 15, entered the army, and, under the empire of Napoleon I., rose to be one of his marshals. On the fall of the emperor, he attached himself to the Bourbons, and in 1830 was appointed to the command of the army which was to reduce Algeria under the power of France. In a few weeks he won this extensive colony, but was superseded in his command by General Clauzel, who charged him with having appropriated to his own purposes the treasure taken in one of the captured towns. After this he retired from public life, living in exile in Germany, Holland, and England, as his inclination led him. On the accession of Louis Philippe he was permitted to return to France, when he took up his residence in the castle of Bourmont, in Anjou, where he lived in strict retirement to the time of his death. b. at Paris, 1773; d. 1846.

BOUZAN, Vincent, born, an English poet, usher of Westminster School, whose effusions show a classical taste and a fertile imagination. b. about 1690; d. 1747.

BOURBONNE, Louis Antoine Faavelet de, boor-re-en, in his ninth year entered the military school at Brienne, where he became acquainted with the future emperor, Napoleon I., of France. From being schoolfellows they became acquaintances, and from acquaintances friends. Bourrienne was being educated for the French artillery, but was forced to relinquish the military profession when he found that he could not hold a commission in the French army unless he could give proofs of being of noble lineage. Directing his ambition into another channel, in his twentieth year he was attached to the embassy of the Marquis de Noailles, ambassador of Louis XVI. at the court of the emperor Joseph of Austria. In 1792 L'ourrienne returned to Paris, after two years' study of international law at Warsaw, and a short stay at the Polish court of King Poniatowski. Napoleon was in Paris at this time, and the friendship of the two schoolfellows was renewed. The fortunes of neither of them were very bright, and they used to share the purses of each other, and wander about the streets of Paris without employment. It was at this period that they beheld, on the 20th of June, the attack which was made by the people on the Tuilleries, and which is so spiritedly described in Bourrienne's "Life of Napoleon;" but on the fall of the Bourbons and the rise of Napoleon, Bourrienne became his private secretary, a post which he held from 1796 to 1802, when he was dismissed for some scandal in connection with the house of Coulon, the army contractors. In 1805 he was appointed chargé d'affaires of France for the circle of Lower Saxony, in which office he was charged with peculation, and forced to refund a million of francs. He was now a ruined man. On the fall of Napoleon he attached himself to the Bourbon dynasty, held for a short time the office of commissary of police in Paris, and became a deputy for the department of Yonne in the representative chamber. In 1823 he was compelled to seek refuge in Belgium from his creditors, where he commenced writing his Memoirs of the emperor. This work was published in ten volumes in the course of 1829-30, and created an immense sensation. This was the greatest act of his life. The revolution of 1830 unsettled his reason, when he was put into an hospital for the insane in Caen, Normandy, where he ended his days. B. at Sens, 1760; D. 1834.

Bowditch, Thomas Edward, bou'-ditch, an English traveller who formed one of the exploring band who have helped to render the continent of Africa known to their countrymen by their explorations and writings. He was the son of a Bristol merchant, and was for a short time a partner in his father's house. In 1814, however, he embarked for Cape-Coast Castle, where his uncle, Mr. Hlope Smith, was governor of the settlements belonging to the African Company. Returning to England in 1816, he was appointed the chief of a mission to the king of the Ashantees. The embassy was quite successful, mainly through the energy and talents of young Bowditch; and in 1819 he published an account of it, under the title of "A Mission to Ashantee." He then went to Paris, where he resided about eighteen months, engaged in the study of natural science. In 1822, after having published several works, by which he made some money, he undertook another voyage to Africa, with the view of exploring that continent. He reached, with his wife, the mouth of the Gambia, and there, being seized with fever, died, January 10, 1824. B. at Bristol, 1790.—After his death, Mrs. Bowditch published several works, from materials collected by her husband in his various travels.

Bowditch, Nathaniel, bou'-ditch, an American writer on navigation and physical and mathematical science, born at Salem, Massachusetts, in 1773, was the son of a cooper, and himself a sailor, in a humble position. He educated himself, learning Latin in order that he might read the "Principia" of Newton. Besides many contributions to scientific periodicals and the transactions of learned societies, he published a translation of Laplace's "Mécanique Céleste," with a commentary, which is deemed of considerable value. He latterly held a lucrative situation in connection with fire and life assurance associations in his native place and Boston, and died in March, 1834.

Bowles, Reverend William Lisle, boles, was educated at Oxford, and received several preferments in the Church, and, in 1829, became canon residentiary of Salisbury Cathedral. He is distinguished in the annals of literature, not only by a great many excellent publications but by the "Pope and Bowles controversy," which lasted from 1810 to 1825. This controversy originated in a proposition in which Mr. Bowles thus laid down in his "Essay on the Poetical Character of Pope"—"All images drawn from what is beautiful or sublime in nature are more beautiful and sublime than images drawn from art, and are therefore more poetical; and in like manner, the passions of the human heart, which belong to nature in general, are, per se, more adapted to the higher species of poetry than those which are derived from incidental and transient manners." Both Byron and Campbell entered the lists against him. The proposition of Mr. Bowles, however, in our opinion, is sound. B. at King's Sutton, Northamptonshire, 1762; D. at Salisbury, in 1850. Bowles published, among other works, a collection of sonnets, and is satirized by Byron in the "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers."

Bowring, Sir John, bou'-ring, a various and voluminous writer, who has distinguished himself in the paths of philology, politics, poetry, and as a translator and reviewer. His knowledge of the principal European languages is not only extensive but accurate, which is proved by the translations he has, from time to time, given to the world, of the poetry of different nations. These comprise "Specimens of the Russian Poets," "Batavian Anthology," "Specimens of the Polish Poets," "Ancient Poetry and Romances of Spain," "Specimens of the Poetry of the Magyars," and "Christian Anthology." In 1825 he was appointed to the editorship of the "Westminster Review," in which the exposition of the principles of Jeremy Bentham received a large share of his attention. In 1831-5 he was sent as a commissioner to France, to report on the actual state of commerce between that country and Great Britain. He also visited Switzerland, Italy, and Syria, studying their commercial relations, and reporting upon them to Parliament. In 1835 he became a member of the House of Commons, in which he sat till 1837. In 1841 he was again elected, and kept his seat till 1849. Between 1833 and 1839 he produced a complete edition of the works of Jeremy Bentham, edited by himself, and published at Edinburgh, in 11 volumes. In 1849 he was appointed British consul at Hong-Kong, and superintendent of trade in China. In 1853 he returned to London, and published his "Decimal System," and in 1854 was knighted and appointed governor of Hong-Kong, and her Majesty's Plenipotentiary in China. In 1855 he undertook a special mission to Siam, and concluded a treaty of commerce with that country. In 1859 he retired from the diplomatic service on a pension, but still acts as Envoy from the Hawaiian government to the different European courts. He contributes occasionally to the periodical literature of the day. n. at Exeter, October 17, 1792.

BOWYER, William, bo'-yer, the most learned English printer of whom we have any account. Both his father and grandfather were printers; so that the noble art may be said to have become hereditary in his family. In 1716 he was admitted a sizar of St. John's College, Cambridge, where he remained till 1722. From this period he commenced contributing to various learned works in the way of corrections, annotations, prefaces, &c., whilst, at the same time, he superintended his printing business. In 1763 his celebrated edition of the Greek Testament, with conjectural emendations, appeared. This work has been much commended and been translated into German. It is, however, as an erudite and critically accurate printer that Bowyer is celebrated. n. 1699; p. 1777.

BOYN, Robert, Lord, bo'id, a Scotch nobleman, was the son of Sir Thomas Boyd, of Kilmarnock, who was killed in 1339, in revenge for having murdered Lord Darnley. The son acquired great popularity with King James II. and the people. The former created him a peer by the title of Lord Boyd of Kilmarnock. On the death of that monarch, in 1460, he was appointed justiciary of the kingdom and one of the lords of the regency during the minority of James III. He and his family engrossed almost all the public offices to themselves, and went so far as to carry off the young king from Linlithgow to Edinburgh, where Lord Boyd got himself declared sole regent. He also effected a marriage between the king's sister and his son, afterwards Earl of Arran. In 1469 the king, at the instigation of some of his nobles, called a parliament to examine into the conduct of Boyd, who fled to England. n. at Alnwick, 1470.—The earl of Arran was divorced from his wife, and died in exile at Antwerp, in 1474. The unfortunate Lord Kilmarnock, who suffered in 1476, was a descendant of this house.

BOYDELL, John, boi'-del, an ingenious artist, and magistrate of London, was brought up a land-surveyor under his father; but seeing some landscapes which greatly pleased him, he apprenticed himself to an engraver. In 1746 he published some small landscapes for the use of learners, and the encouragement he received induced him to persevere in engraving and publishing. He also sought out English artists, to whom he was a liberal patron, particularly to Woollett. But Mr. Boydell did not confine himself to prints. He had the honour to establish an English school of historical painting, which received the name of the Shakespeare Gallery. He also presented to the corporation of London some fine pictures for the council chamber in Guildhall. In 1791 he was made lord mayor. By the French revolution, and the consequent war, this worthy man experienced such losses as to be under the necessity of procuring an act of parliament for the disposal of the Shakespeare Gallery, and his pictures and prints, by way of lottery. n. 1719; p. 1804.

Bozzaris

BOYER, Abel, booi'-yai, a French lexicographer and grammarian, who quitted his country on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He went to Geneva, and afterwards visited England, where he taught the French language and compiled a French and English grammar and dictionary, which have gone through numerous editions. n. at Castres, 1664; p. in England, 1729.

BOYLE, Robert, boil, a learned writer and philosopher, the seventh son of Richard, earl of Cork. He early devoted himself to the study of natural science; was frequently present at Oxford, where a philosophical society was held, which afterwards became the famous Royal Society, of which he was one of the earliest members. In 1654 he fixed his residence at this town, for the sake of enjoying the company of his learned friends. Here he remained till 1668, applying himself principally to experimental philosophy, and contriving a more perfect air-pump than that which had hitherto been in use. Natural philosophy, however, was not the only subject which engaged his attention at this period of his life. He cultivated an acquaintance with the learned languages, and devoted so much time to the study of theology and sacred criticism, that, at the restoration of Charles II., he was pressed to enter into orders, with a view of being raised to the episcopacy. A natural diffidence, however, induced him to decline this and every other offer of preferment. Whilst labouring incessantly in the cause of science, he did not neglect the duties of the Christian philanthropist, and particularly exerted himself in advancing designs of charity and schemes of improvement. As a director of the East India Company, he was the principal instrument in procuring their charter; for which he only required, as a return, that they would do something towards propagating Christianity in their settlements. With this view he caused to be printed at Oxford 500 copies of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, in the Malay tongue. He was also at the expense of printing in Arabic, Grotius's "De Veritate," &c. In 1680 he declined the honour of the presidency of the Royal Society. Three years afterwards he was engaged in promoting the propagation of the gospel among the Indians of North America. Two years before his death he was obliged to have recourse to an advertisement to prevent the intrusion of visitors, and thus gained time to perfect some important works, particularly in the department of chemistry. n. at Lismore, in Ireland, 1626; p. in London, 1691, a week after his sister, Lady Ranelagh, with whom he had resided since 1638.—By his will he founded an annual lecture at St. Paul's, on the principal truths of natural and revealed religion. It is said that, from imitating the stammering of other children, he, when young, contracted the habit, which afterwards proved incurable.

BOZZARIS, Mareo, boz'-za'-ris, the Leonidas of modern Greece, was a Souliote, who distinguished himself by his devotion to his country in defending it against the Turks. He fell in the August of 1823, in a night attack upon a body of Albanians, who were advancing with the view of taking Missolonghi, which he had successfully defended for a considerable time. n. about the close of the 18th century, among the mountains of Epirus; fell near Kerpenisi, 20th August, 1823. This Greek hero was buried BRACCIO, Fortebracci, brant'-che-o, called also Braccio da Montone, from the name of his estate, was a native of Perugia, from which he was expelled by the people along with the other nobles of the city, in 1393. He then became a captain of condottiere, rose to a prominent rank among military leaders of the time, took a leading part in the wars in Italy during the first portion of the 15th century, made himself prince of Perugia, which he had reduced to subjection, and was finally defeated near Aquila by Count Caldora, on the 2nd of June, 1424, and died three days afterwards from wounds received in the battle. B. 1363.

BRACCIOLINI, Francis, brant'-che-o-le-ne, an Italian poet, whose poem, entitled "La Cro. e Racquistata," published in 1605, is esteemed next to Tasso's "Jerusalem." B. at Pistoja, 1586; d. 1645.

BRADLEY, James, bräd'-le, an eminent astronomer, who entered the Church, but, in 1721, becoming Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, he resigned his livings. In 1741 he succeeded Dr. Halley as astronomer royal, and, at the same time, the university of Oxford presented him with the degree of D.D. In the fifth year of his office he addressed a letter to the earl of Macclesfield, on the apparent motion of the fixed stars, for which he received the gold medal of the Royal Society. In 1749 he obtained a grant of £1000 to procure instruments for the Greenwich observatory, and subsequently obtained a yearly pension of £250. B. at Sherborne, in Gloucestershire, 1692; d. at Chalford, 1762, and was buried in Minchinhampton.—Bradley was a careful observer, and Newton gave him the character of being the best astronomer in Europe. He discovered the laws of aberration and of nutation. He left behind him, in MS., a vast number of valuable astronomical observations, which were subsequently published, and which are computed at about 80,000 in number.

BRADSHAW, John, bräd'-shaw, a noted English lawyer, who was named "President of the High Court of Justice," which sat in judgment on Charles I. For discharging the duties of this office, the Parliament rewarded him with landed property worth £4,000 a year, and various offices. B. in Cheshire, 1586; d. 1659. At the Restoration, his body, after being hung at Tyburn with the bodies of Cromwell and Ireton, was buried under the gallows. He is usually designated in history "Bradshaw the Regicide."

BRADY, Nicholas, bräi'-de, a divine and poet, who is well known by his version of the Psalms of David, which he executed in conjunction with Mr. Tate, and which is now generally used in churches. B. at Bandon, Ireland, 1659; d. rector of Richmond, in the county of Surrey, 1728.

BRAGANZA, House of, bra-gan'-sa, dates from the commencement of the 15th century, and is now represented in the reigning dynasty of the kingdom of Portugal. Its ancestor was a natural son of King John I., named Alfonso, who was by his father created duke of Braganza and lord of Guimarães. He married Beatriz, daughter and heiress of the count of Barcellos and Ouren, from which union sprang the dukes of Bra-gança. The present line ascended the Portuguese throne in 1844, when that people revolted against the yoke of Spain, and when the then duke of Bragança was proclaimed, and assumed the title of John IV. From that period the crown has continued in the same line. The royal family of Brazil belong to this house.

BRABE, Tycho, bra, a famous astronomer, was descended from a noble Swedish family, settled at Knudstorp, in Denmark, where he studied philosophy and rhetoric, with a view of making the law his profession. The solar eclipse, however, which happened whilst he was at the university of Copenhagen, in 1560, directed his attention to astronomy, which he considered as a divine study, and to which he applied himself with the greatest assiduity. In 1565 he returned home, and in a quarrel with a Danish nobleman lost his nose, which he supplied with an artificial one made of gold, so naturally formed and painted, that the defect was hardly to be perceived. About this time he ardently entered upon the study of chemistry, in hopes of finding the philosopher's stone. After this he travelled for some years, and, on his return to Denmark, resided with his uncle, who furnished him with the means of making celestial observations; and here it was that, in 1572, he discovered a new star in the constellation Cassiopea. Shortly afterwards he incurred the displeasure of his relations by a marriage which was deemed unprudent on account of the humbleness of the connexion; and the quarrel was so great, that the king was obliged to interfere to effect a reconciliation. At the command of his sovereign, Frederick II., he was somewhat reluctantly, on account of his rank, made to read lectures on astronomy at Copenhagen. The king, however, was so delighted with the pursuits of Brabe, that he gave him the Isle of Hven or Hoen, where he laid the foundation of an observatory, to which he gave the name of Uraniberg, or the City of the Heavens. Besides this he had an observatory sunk in the ground, to which he gave the name of Stelberg, or the City of the Stars. The king added to the donation a pension and some lucrative places. In this situation Brabe remained about twenty years; but on the death of the king he lost his pension, and in 1590, in the time of Christian IV., was driven from his country by the united influences of ignorance, envy, and detraction. The emperor Rudolph II. pressed him to come to his dominions, and in 1601 he settled at Prague, with a pension of 3000 ducats. In 1600 he had been joined by the celebrated Kepler, and these illustrious men pursued their studies together until the death of Tycho. B. at Knudstorp, in Denmark, in 1546; d. at Prague, 1601.—He was a man of great genius, but superstitious, being addicted to judicial astrology and attentive to omens. His works show him to have been an accurate observer. The "Rudolphine Tables" and the "Historia Cælestis" are the best of his productions.

BRAMAH, Joseph, bra'-ma, the son of a Yorkshire farmer, who, from being a carpenter and joiner, went to London, and adopted the profession of engineer and machinist. In 1784 he patented the lock which goes by his name, and which is considered one of the most ingenious that has ever been invented. He also made improvements in pumps, f. water-cocks, and the hydraulic press,

His whole life was devoted to mechanical improvements, and his last patent was obtained for discovering a mode of preventing dry-rot in timber, by covering it with a thin coating of Parker's Roman cement. B. at Stainborough, in Yorkshire, 1739; D. in 1814.

BRAMANTE D'URBINO, Lazarus, bram-maw-tai, a celebrated Italian architect, who executed several great works for the popes Alexander VI. and Julius II. His fame, however, rests on his being the architect of St. Peter's, at Rome, of which magnificent cathedral he drew the plans, laid the foundations in 1513, but did not live to see it completed, leaving the execution of it at his death to Michael Angelo Buonarroti. B. at Castle Durante, in the duchy of Urbino, in 1444; D. at Rome, 1514.

BRAY, brân, the son of Llyr, and father of Caradog, or Caractacus, king of Britain, is classed with Prydain and Dynwall, as having consolidated the form of elective monarchy in Britain. When his son was delivered up to the Romans, Bran and his family were carried to Rome, where they embraced the Christian religion, and at their return introduced it among their countrymen. B. about 80 A.D.

BRANDON, Charles. (See STURFOLK, Duke of.)

BRANDT, Sebastian, brant, a German poet, who wrote a number of works, the most celebrated of which is "The Ship of Fools," a burlesque poem, in which he satirizes the writings of his age. It met with great success, and found translators in several countries. B. at Strasburg, 1458; D. 1521. (See BARCLAY, Alexander.)

BRANDT, a Hamburg chemist, who in 1669 accidentally discovered phosphorus, whilst making experiments with urine in search of gold. He received a pension from the elector of Hanover. B. about 1692.

BRANTOME, Lord Abbot of brant-tome, the name given to Peter de Bourdeilles. He was a licentious French writer, who, in fifteen volumes, has given us lively pictures of the times in which he lived, and is distinguished for his vivid descriptions of beauty, courtesy, and knightly prowess. B. at Périgord, 1527; D. at Richemont, 1614.

BRASIDAS, brás-i-dís, a Spartan general, who distinguished himself in the Peloponnesian war, and in 424 B.C. made himself master of Amphipolis. He was wounded in a combat with Cleon, the Athenian general, who was endeavouring to retake this place, and D. 422 B.C.

BRAYO MURILLO, Don Juan, brá-vo moo-reel-go, a modern Spanish statesman, who has been an active participator in the numerous recent changes in the government of his country. He held office in 1836 under the Isturitz ministry, and in 1840, being compromised in a conspiracy formed against the regent Espartero, was obliged to take refuge in France for three years. In 1847 he was minister of justice under the duke of Sotomayor, and afterwards served under Narvaez, as minister of commerce, public works, and finance. When that minister resigned, in 1850, Bravo Murillo remained at the head of affairs; but just as he seemed all-powerful, he, in 1853, lost the favour of the queen, and fell. He has filled various diplomatic posts since 1856. B. 1903.

BRAY, Sir Reginald, brat, an eminent statesman, who assisted in placing Henry VII. upon the throne, and with whom he was in great favour. Besides being a politician, he seems to have possessed a genius for architecture, as Henry the Seventh's chapel at Westminster was built under his direction. D. 1503, and was buried at Windsor.

publishing parochial libraries. He laboured with great zeal in his favourite object of propagating the gospel among the Indians and negroes, and went to America several times to promote it. In 1606 he took the degree of D.D., and in 1706 accepted the living of St. Botolph, Aldgate. B. in Shropshire, 1636; D. 1730. He wrote "Catechetical Lectures," "Bibliotheca Parochialis," and some other religious pieces.

BRAY, Mrs. Anne Eliza, brat, an authoress, is the daughter of John Kempe, Esq., and was married, in 1818, to Charles Stothard, son of the eminent painter, who, having been accidentally killed in 1821, his widow was married, in 1823, to the Rev. Edward Atkins Bray, vicar of Tavistock. Mrs. Bray's works include "Memoirs" of her first husband, published in 1823; "De Foix," a romance, which appeared in 1826, followed by tales entitled "The White Hoods," "The Protestant," "Fitz of Fitzford," "The Talba, or the Moor of Portugal," "Warlike," "Trelawney of Trelawne," "Trials of the Heart," "Henry de Pomeroy," "Courtney of Walreddon," &c. &c., to which must be added, in a different walk, "The Mountains and Lakes of Switzerland," and a "Life of Thomas Stothard, R.A.," beautifully illustrated; together with a sketch entitled "Handel: his Life, Personal and Professional, with some Thoughts on Music," and a variety of other works. In 1857 Mrs. Bray was left a widow for the second time, and in 1859 published "Poetical Remains of Mr. Bray, with a Memoir;" and, in 1860, a selection from his sermons.

BRÉDERODE, Henry, Count, brat-dai-rod, a Dutch patriot, who joined with the counts Egmont and Horn in opposing the tyranny of Cardinal Granvelle, the Spanish governor of the Netherlands. In 1566 he presented to Margaret of Parma, who had succeeded Granvelle, the famous "Request," which gave rise to the resurrection of the "Gueux" or "Beggars." Under the grinding oppression of the Duke of Alva's administration in the Low Countries, he retired to Germany. B. 1532; D. 1569.

BRÉGUET, Abraham Louis, brat-goo-ai, a celebrated French clock and watch mechanician, who, at an early age, went to Paris, and first perfected those continually-going watches which wind themselves. Afterwards, he invented for watches repeating movements and escapements of all kinds, of a delicacy and precision before unknown. Bréguet was a member of the Institute, and of other learned societies; and greatly enriched and extended the science of horology. B. in Switzerland, his parents being French Protestant refugees; D. at Paris, 1823. The bréguet chain takes its name from him.—His grandson, Louis, was one of the first scientific men in France to apply himself to the study of the electric telegraph, and to recognise its immense advantages. B. 1747.

BREITKOPF, John Gottlieb Emmanuel, brat-kopf, an ingenious German printer and letter-founder, who considerably improved the shape of printing types. He also devised a method of printing music, maps, and charts with type.

B. at Leipzig, 1719; d. 1794.—He is the author of a treatise on the "Origin of Printing," and others on the "History of Playing-cards," the "Invention of Paper made from Linen," and the "Invention of Engraving on Wood in Europe."

BREMER, Fredrika, bre'-mer, an eminent Swedish novelist, known to English readers by her novels of "Neighbours," "The President's Daughter," "Life in Dalecarlia," and several other works, mostly translated by Mrs. Mary Howitt. b. at Abo, in Finland, 1802; d. 1865.

BRENNUS, bre'n'-nus, a general of the Gauls, who invaded Italy, 332, b.c., defeated the Romans at the river Allia, and entered their city without opposition. The Romans fled into the Capitol, and left the whole city in the possession of their enemies. The Gauls climbed the Tarpeian rock in the night, and the Capitol would have been taken, had not the Romans been awakened by the cackling of the sacred geese which were kept in the temple of Juno, and incited by the example of Manlius, afterwards surnamed Capitolineus, immediately repelled the enemy. Camillus, who was in banishment, marched to the relief of his country, and so totally destroyed the Gauls, that scarcely one remained to tell the news of their fate.

BREWSTER, Sir David, broo'-ster, a distinguished experimental philosopher, whose discoveries in reference to the properties of light have led to great improvements in the illumination of lighthouses. In 1815 he received the Copley medal for his paper on the "Polarization of Light by Reflection," and in the following year, for his discoveries in physics, received from the Institute of France 1500 francs, which was the half of their prize. In 1816 he invented the kaleidoscope, in 1818 received the Rumford medal of the Royal Society, and in 1830 was presented with the medal of the Royal Society for his further researches on the properties of light. In the same year, with Davy, Herschel, and Babbage, he originated the British Association, the first meeting of which was held at York, in 1831. He was now knighted by William IV., and decorated with the Hanoverian Guelphic order. In 1841 he became principal of St. Leonard's College, at St. Andrew's. In 1849 he was elected president of the British Association, and the same year had the high honour of being chosen, in the place of Berzelius, one of the eight foreign associates of the French Academy of Sciences. He is also member of the Royal Academies of Prussia, Austria, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark; and in 1859 was unanimously chosen principal of the university of Edinburgh. He has received many other honours and decorations from almost all parts of the world. His writings on scientific subjects are very numerous, including the "Memoirs of the Life and Writings of Sir Isaac Newton," "The Martyrs of Science," "Letters on Natural Magic," "More Worlds than One," &c., and for twenty-two years he edited the "Edinburgh Encyclopædia." Of the "Edinburgh Philosophical Journal," he was also one of the editors, as well as of the "Edinburgh Journal of Science." b. at Jedburgh, 1781; d. 1868. Sir David has been twice married; first, to a daughter of the celebrated M^r Pherson, the translator or author of Ossian's poems; and to Jane, daughter of the late Thomas Esq., Scarborough. The question as to whether he was the discoverer of the stereoscope has given rise to considerable con-

BRIDGEWATER, Francis Egerton, duke of, brid'-water, was the youngest son of Sir Ralph, fourth earl, and first duke, of Bridgewater, and succeeded to the title in 1743, on the death of his brother. He has been styled the "Father of British Inland Navigation," being mainly instrumental in the cutting of the first navigable canal in England. This was from Salford, near Manchester, to Worsley, and succeeded so well, that another was executed to pass from the river Worsley, over the Irwell, to Manchester. This canal begins at Worsley Mill, about seven miles from Manchester, and has an aqueduct over the river Irwell, where the canal runs thirty-nine feet above the river, and where the barges pass on the canal, and the vessels in the river sail under them. This aqueduct begins at Barton Bridge, three miles from Worsley, and is carried two hundred yards over a valley. The duke afterwards extended his canal to the Mersey. He spent prodigious sums upon these projects, to accomplish which he lived on the simplest fare, and with scarcely a servant to attend him. By them, however, he ultimately realized an immense fortune. b. 1730; d. 1803. (See B. INDLEY.)

BRIDGEWATER, earl of, Francis Henry Egerton, eighth earl of Bridgewater, ninth Viscount Brackley, and Baron Ellesmere, was the younger son of John, Lord High-ship of Durham, by Lady A. S. Grey, daughter of the Duke of Kent, chamberlain to Queen Anne. He was a person of learning, and published an edition of the "Hippolytus" of Euripides, with scholia, various readings, and critical notes in Latin. He is noticed here chiefly on account of bequeathing £3000 to be applied to the publication of one thousand copies of a work "On the Power, Wisdom, and Goodness of God, as Manifested in the Creation, &c." This bequest elicited a series of separate works, known as the "Bridgewater Treatises," written by some of the most distinguished religious and scientific men of the time. The earl also bequeathed £12,000 to the British Museum, the annual income of which was to be applied to the purchase of MSS., and the taking proper care of them for the use of the public. b. 1759; d. in Paris, 1829.—In his latter years this earl fell into singular eccentricities; among which was a great partiality for canine company, which he carried so far as to dress some of his favourite dogs in the garments of men, and have them at table to dine with him.

BRIENNE, John de, bre'-en, was elected king of Jerusalem in 1210. The emperor Frederick II. married his daughter, having the kingdom of Jerusalem as a dowry. Brienne was afterwards elected emperor of Constantinople, which he defended with great bravery against the Greeks and Bulgarians. On one occasion, says Gibbon, he made a sally at the head of his cavalry, and out of forty-eight squadrons of the enemy, no more than three escaped from the edge of his invincible sword. d. 1237.—A contemporary poet affirms that the deeds of valour which this hero performed outshone those of Hector, Ajax, Roland, Uggier, and Judas Maccabæus. His reign is given at length by Du Cange, in the third book of his "History of Constantinople." His avarice, however, disgraced his other qualities, and hastened the ruin of the empire.

BRIGGS, Henry, brig's, an English clan, who, in 1590, was appointed der in geometry, which he resigned in 1615, on being made Savilian professor at Oxford. B. at Warleywood, near Halifax, Yorkshire, 1556; D. at Oxford, 1630.—He was the first improver of logarithms, after Napier, the original inventor, whom he visited twice, and each time resided with, in Scotland. He published, in 1624, a work of stupendous labour, entitled "Arithmetica Logarithmica," containing logarithms of 30,000 natural numbers. He also wrote some other valuable books on mathematical subjects.

BRIGGS, Henry Perronet, R.A., an eminent English painter, both in history and portraits. The principal of his historical works are "The First Interview between the Spaniards and Peruvians," and "The Ancient Britons instructed by the Romans in the Mechanical Arts." Among his portraits are, Mrs. Siddons, Mrs. Opie, Reverend Sydney Smith, and the Duke of Wellington. B. 1793; D. in London, 1844.—One of his composition-pictures is "Ohello relating his Adventures to Desdemona."

BRIGHAM, Nicholas, brig'-ham, a lawyer and poet, who deserves to be noticed, if for nothing more than his admiration of Chaucer, the father of English poetry. He caused the remains of that poet to be removed to the south transept of Westminster Abbey, where he erected a monument to his memory. B. in Oxfordshire; D. 1559.—He wrote "Memoirs of Eminent Persons," "Memoirs by Way of Diary," "Miscellaneous Poems."

BRIGGS, the Right Honourable John, brite, a manufacturer of Rochdale, in Lancashire, who became an active member of an association called the Anti Corn-Law League, when it was formed in 1833, and, in conjunction with Mr. Cobden, proved himself one of the warmest advocates of the repeal of the corn laws. In 1843 he unsuccessfully contested the representation of the city of Durham; but in the next election which took place, he was returned for that city, and sat for it till 1847, when he was elected member for Manchester. In 1854 he formed one of the deputation who made a journey to Russia for the purpose of persuading the Emperor Nicholas to adopt a peace policy, his advocacy of which for a time impaired his popularity, and, in 1857, he lost his seat for the cotton city. In 1858 he was returned member for Birmingham, and again in the general elections of 1859, 1865, and 1868. In the year last named, when Mr. Gladstone came into power, he accepted office for the first time as President of the Board of Trade. He has always professed a warm admiration for American institutions. B. 1811.

BRILL, Paul, bril, a famous landscape painter, was born at Antwerp in 1568, went to Rome during the pontificate of Gregory XIII., and soon acquired a great reputation there for excellence in his particular department of art. He introduced figures from ancient mythology into many of his works, and it is said that Annibale Caracci sometimes painted these figures for him. Brill's masterpiece is considered to be a large landscape in fresco, in the Sala Clementina, in the Vatican, which was executed in 1602 for Pope Clement VIII.; this picture was sixty-eight feet long, and of considerable height. D. at Rome, 1622.—His brother Matthew was also a landscape painter of some merit, but not equal to Paul. He, however, died at the early age of 34, when his powers were not fully developed.

BRINDLEY, James, brind'-le, an eminent engineer, who, after serving his apprenticeship to the trade of a millwright, and discovering his skill in the erection of several mills, was employed by the duke of Bridgewater on his famous canal from Worsley to Manchester, which he afterwards extended to the Mersey. He was next employed to construct a canal from the Grand Trunk, near Haywood, Staffordshire, to the river Severn, near Bewdley, by which means Bristol obtained a communication with Liverpool. In consequence of the success of his undertakings, his reputation stood very high, and he was engaged in a variety of similar plans in different parts of the kingdom. B. at Thornssett, Derbyshire, 1716; D. at Turnhurst, Staffordshire, 1772. (See BRIDGEWATER.)

BRINVILLIERS, Maria Margaret, marchioness of, brin'-veel'-e-gi, a notorious poisoner. In 1651 she was married to the marquis, and formed an improper attachment to St. Croix, a young cavalry officer. The latter was imprisoned in the Bastille, and there learnt from Exill, an Italian, the composition of poisons, which art he afterwards taught to his mistress. They then commenced a series of poisonings, the first victim being the marquis's father, then his two brothers and his sister, with a view to the ultimate possession of their fortunes. These crimes were not discovered until the death of St. Croix, in 1672, when there were found on him some papers which cast suspicion on the marchioness. She fled, but was arrested at Liège, brought to Paris, and executed, 1676.

BRISSON, John Peter, brées'-so, one of the leading men in the French revolution, the son of a pastry-cook, and bred to the law, which he never followed. An acquaintance with English books gave him a turn for politics; when, for a time, he settled at Boulogne, and edited the "Courrier de l'Europe." On the suppression of this journal, he went to Paris, where he soon afterwards published his "Theory of Criminal Laws," 2 vols. 8vo. He began, also, a book entitled, "A Philosophical Library of Criminal Laws," and wrote a volume on "Truth; or, Meditations on the Means of reaching Truth in all Branches of Human Knowledge." About this time he married Mademoiselle Dupont, who was employed as reader to the daughter of the duke of Orleans. Finding little encouragement in France, however, he went to London, where he conducted a periodical journal called "Universal Correspondence on all that concerns the Happiness of Men in Society." This journal was designed to disseminate in France such political principles as were based on reason. It therefore gave offence to the French government, and was seized and suppressed. On his return to Paris, in 1784, he was sent to the Bastille on the charge of having assisted in the publication of a libel; but obtained his release by the interest of the duke of Orleans, whose ambitious projects on the government he laboured, by his talents, to advance. His political pamphleteering activity forced him to flee from France, when he went to Holland, and thence to America. After a time he again returned to France, and became a warm advocate of republican principles during the revolutionary period. By his exertions he created a party called Brissotines, or Girondists, from the members of the department of Gironde, of which it chiefly consisted. He was, however, adverse to the execution of the king, which he proposed to be deferred till the perfection of the constitution. The ascension of Robespierre to power was the signal for the downfall of Brissot and his party. He and they were denounced and arrested, to expiate upon the scaffold their principles and opinions. B. near Chartres, 1754; guillotined, with twenty other Girondists, October 31, 1793.

BRITANNICUS, brí-tán'-i-kus, son of the emperor Claudius, by his third wife, Messalina. His original name was Tiberius Claudius Germanicus, which was subsequently changed to Britannicus, from the conquests which were made in Britain. B. 42; poisoned by Nero in his fourteenth year.

BRITTON, John, brít'-ton, an architectural, antiquarian, and topographical writer, who, from being an humble compiler of street song-books, rose to attempt greater things, and succeeded in producing a large number of valuable illustrated works, which, at the time of their publication, had the effect, in no small degree, of exciting the public interest in reference to our national antiquities. B. near Chippenham, Wiltshire, 1771; d. 1857.

BROCKLESBY, Richard, brók'-els-be, a physician, who settled in London, acquired considerable wealth, and became acquainted with Dr. Johnson. When the proposal for the increase of the pension of that great man failed, he generously offered him £100 a year for life, which the doctor declined to accept. He next urged him to live with him, that he might have him continually under his care, and finally became "his physician in ordinary, and saw him almost every day." To Mr. Burke he bequeathed in his will £1000; but finding that the affairs of the great statesman were embarrassed, he gave it to him in his lifetime. B. at Minehead, in Somersetshire, 1722; d. 1797. Apart from the pecuniary benevolence of such a man as Brocklesby, it is impossible not to admire the goodness and humanity with which his whole disposition seems to have been imbued. "You write to me," says Dr. Johnson, a few months before his own death—"you write to me with a zeal that animates, and a tenderness that melts me." In presenting Burke with the £1000, he enhances its value a hundred-fold by the kind and handsome manner in which it is done. "That you may long live," he says, "for talent, an ornament to human kind, and for your country, your friends, and family, the same happy man in prosperity, as you have ever approved yourself whilst withdrawn from the sunshine of a court; this, with much more (if anything can be better), is the fervent wish of, my dear Burke, your sincere and ever affectionate, humble servant, RICHARD BROCKLESBY." He published an essay on the "Mortality of Horned Cattle," 8vo, 1746; "Economic and Medical Observations from 1738 to 1763, tending to the Improvement of Medical Hospitals," 8vo, 1764; and some papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

BRODERIP, William John, bród'-e-rip, was for thirty-four years a police magistrate in the metropolis, but is noticed here on account of his merits as a naturalist. He is the author of by far the largest number of papers in the zoological department of the "Penny Cyclopædia," as well as of works entitled "Zoological Recreations," "Leaves from the Note-book of a Naturalist," and numerous papers in the "Quarterly Review." He had a splendid collection of shells, which have been purchased by the British Museum. B. at Bristol, 1757; d. at Richmond, 1830.

Bronte

BRODIE, Sir Benjamin Collins, bart., bród'-i, an eminent physician, whose practice is most extensive. In 1811 he was presented, by the Royal Society, with the Copley medal, for his papers on physiology; and in 1814 produced his "Experiments and Observations on the Influence of the Nerves of the Eighth Pair on the Secretions of the Stomach." His professional progress has been gradual, but sure; and, in 1832, he was appointed sergeant-surgeon to the queen. In 1831 he was created a baronet; and in 1850 received the degree of D.C.L. from the university of Oxford. He is a member of several scientific societies, and has produced various other works connected with his profession. B. at Winterslow, Wiltshire, 1783; d. 1860. His eldest son, Mr. Benjamin Collins Brodie, M.A., F.R.S., is professor of botany in the university of Oxford.

BROGLIE, Victor Maurice, Count de, bró'-lé-ai, a French general, was born of a noble family at Quercy, served with glory in the wars of Louis XIV., and was made a marshal of France. B. 1727.—His son Francis-Marie was also a marshal of France, and distinguished himself greatly in Italy, in the campaigns of 1733 and 1734.—His son, the celebrated Marshal de Broglie, commanded with great glory in the Seven Years' War. He quitted France in 1794, and, after residing in England some time, went to Russia, where he obtained a military rank equal to that which he had held in France.—His son Claude Victor, prince of Broglie, became active on the side of the popular party at the commencement of the French Revolution, and was made maréchal-de-camp. Guillotined 1794.

BROME, Adam de, brome, an English divine, who founded Oriel College, Oxford. Lived in the 14th century.

BROMLEY, William, brom'-le, an eminent English line engraver, was born in the Isle of Wight, in 1769, and was held in high esteem by Sir Thomas Lawrence, Stothard, Fuseli, and Flaxman. B. 1842.—His son John was also an engraver, but in mezzotint, in which style he had few equals. B. 1795; d. 1839, before his father. His principal works are—the "Trial of Lord William Russell," and of "Queen Caroline," after Hayter; "Lady Jane Grey refusing the Crown," after G. B. Leslie; "Monks Preaching at Seville," after J. Lewis; "The Duke of Atholl Hunting in Glen Tilt," after Landseer; and "The Reform Banquet," after Hayden.

BROXTON, Charlotte, brón'-e, was the daughter of the Reverend Patrick Bronte, curate of Haworth, in Yorkshire. She married her father's curate, the Rev. Arthur Bell Nicholls, and, with her two sisters, under the assumed names of Currier, Acton, and Ellis Bell, became widely known to the readers of light literature. Charlotte, as an authoress, was the most successful of the three, and, by the production of her "Jane Eyre," "Shirley," and "Villette," acquired a large reputation. B. 1816; d. a year after her marriage, 1855.—Anne wrote the "Tenant of Wildfield Hall," and, in conjunction with her sister Emily, "Wuthering Heights," and "Agnes Grey." She died, 1848; and Emily, in 1849.—The three sisters also produced, in 1846, a volume of poems.

BROOKE, Sir James, brook, rajah of Sarawak, an enterprising Englishman, who early entered the Indian army, and served in the Burmese war. He was severely wounded at Rungpoor, and soon after quitted the service. On the death of his father, who had been in the East India Company's civil service, he found himself possessed of a large fortune. Having in 1830 made a voyage to the Malay archipelago, he, in with the avowed purpose of destroying the Malay pirates. Landing at Sarawak, a province in the N.E. of Borneo, he gained the affection of Muda Hassim, uncle of the sultan of the island, and having assisted in suppressing a rebellion of the Dyaks, he received the title of rajah of Sarawak,—a title reluctantly confirmed in 1841 by the Bornean sultan. He now devoted all his energies to the extinction of piracy, in which he was very successful. But the sultan having caused Muda Hassim, and other supporters of the English, to be massacred, Sir James, with the assistance of Admiral Cochrane, led an expedition against the capital, defeated the sultan's army, and obtained the cession to England of the island of Labuan, destined by its position to become an important commercial station. On his return to Great Britain, in 1847, the rajah was received with great honours, obtaining the decoration of the Bath, and the title of governor of Labuan, with a salary of £2000 a year. He went back to the East, and came, in 1851, a second time to England, to defend himself against the fierce attack made in the House of Commons upon his pirate-killing propensities. The charges against him were not proved. In February, 1857, at Sarawak, an insurrection of the Chinese population broke out, threatening destruction to all the European settlers, who were obliged to fly; but the outbreak was put down shortly after by Sir James and a body of Dyaks. In 1858 he returned to England, and remained there until 1861, when he again visited Borneo. Shortly after this, an acknowledgment of the independence of Sarawak was obtained from the British government, and a consul appointed there. During the closing years of his life, Sir James Brooke resided at Burrator, in Devon, where he died, June 11, 1868; s. at Bantel, in Bantel, 1803.—He was succeeded by his nephew, Charles, who only survived him a few months.

BROOKS, Henry, an Irish author, who, after a poetical effort on "Universal Beauty," which gained the approbation of Pope, produced his "Gustavus Vasa," which the government would not permit to be acted, on account of the boldness of its language. This opposition increased his fame, and the play had a great sale. The prince of Wales became his friend; but though every prospect of advancement was presented to him, he relinquished all and returned to his native country of Ireland, where he continued the remainder of his days in privacy. He wrote some pieces for the Irish stage, which were successful, and the novels known as the "Fool of Quality," and "Juliet Grenville." s. at Rantavan, Ireland, 1709; n. in Dublin, 1783.

BROOKS, Shirley, brooke, a modern English author, who at first studied for the bar, but relinquished the law to write dramatic pieces and tales, which were received with favour. In 1854 he visited, for the "Morning Chronicle" newspaper, Southern Russia, Turkey, and Egypt.

Brougham

His letters were afterwards collected and published in one volume. s. 1815.

BROOME, William, broom, an English poet, who was employed by Pope in writing notes on the "Iliad," and translating part of the "Odyssey," for which he received £500 and one hundred copies. Afterwards, however, Pope gave him a place in the "Dunelad." In 1728 he was created LL.D., and obtained the rectory of Pulham, in Norfolk, and the vicarage of Eye, in Suffolk. n. in Cheshire; n. 1745.—To Broome Dr. Johnson gives the credit of producing smooth and melodious lines, and a diction select and elegant.

BROSCHI, Carlo, broſ-ke. (See FARINELLI.)

BROUGHAM, Henry, Lord, broo'-ham, or bro'-ham, received his education at the High School and university of his native city of Edinburgh, early distinguishing himself by his mathematical studies. He was designed for the legal profession; but, previous to his settling down as a practitioner, he travelled for some time on the continent, storing his mind with such useful knowledge as came within the scope of his observation. On his return he was admitted a member of the Edinburgh Society of Advocates; and, having made the acquaintance of Horner, Jeffrey, and several other talented young men, a "Speculative Society" was formed, in which Brougham soon distinguished himself as an extemporaneous debater. In 1802 the "Edinburgh Review" was started, and Brougham, after the third number, was admitted as a contributor to its pages. He was at this period only twenty-three years of age; but was fresh and vigorous in his intellect, hale and healthful in his body, and greatly ambitious of literary fame. He had for his coadjutors Horner and Brown, the metaphysician, neither of whom was more than twenty-four, Jeffrey, who was twenty-nine, Sydney Smith, who was thirty-one, and Allen, who was the oldest, yet not more than thirty-two. Brougham, however, was the largest and most versatile contributor; and although the pay was only £10 a sheet, it was soon more than doubled. Whilst he was devoting his energies to the "Review," he was also writing "An Enquiry into the Colonial Policy of the European Powers," which in 1803 was published in Edinburgh in two volumes, and was considered a remarkable work for so young a man to produce. Finding the practice of the Scottish bar but a limited field for such ambition as he had, he went to London, where, in 1807, we find him qualifying himself for the English bar. In 1806 he began to practise as an English barrister at the court of King's Bench, and on the northern circuit. Here he soon became distinguished by his eloquence; and, as an ally of the Whig party, was returned for Camelford to the House of Commons, by the Earl of Darlington, who was the patron of the borough. His maiden speech was delivered on the 5th of March, 1810; and although not remarkable for any quality beyond its general ability and appropriateness, still it was sufficiently striking to fix attention upon the man as likely to prove an able auxiliary to his party. He soon became accustomed to the new arena into which his abilities had called him. He measured the men with whom he had to contend. He took his stand upon the consciousness of the strength and variety of his own intellectual attainments. When he spoke, he delivered himself with a daring vehemence, and an unexampled fluency. There was no hesitation, no confusion, no timidity in his utterance. On rolled the stream of his eloquence, strong from conviction, vehement from passion, and burning with invective as the occasion demanded. He soon stood all but alone in the house, Canning being the only one, in the opposition lists, that dared to oppose him. From 1812 to 1818 he was out of parliament, but in that year was returned for Winchester, again under the patronage of the earl of Darlington. The splendour and versatility of his talents were now universally acknowledged, when, in 1820, he was called upon to undertake the defence of Queen Caroline against her husband, George IV.; and this trial greatly increased his popularity. In 1830 he became lord-chancellor, under the administration of Earl Grey. In 1834 a change of ministry took place, Sir Robert Peel having come into office. In the following year another change occurred, when Lord Melbourne became premier, and Lord John Russell home secretary. From this government Lord Brougham was excluded, but upon what grounds has never been clearly ascertained. From that time his defection, if it can be so called, from the Whigs dates. As an ex-chancellor, he has lived upon his pension of £5000 a year, but by no means the life of an idler, or of one who is weary of well-doing in the affairs of his country. Throughout his whole career he has been on the side of reform, and into whatever question he has entered, he has pursued it with an ardour and a perseverance which could only have been sustained by the most powerful conviction of its necessity. In 1821 he took a prominent part with Dr. Birkbeck in the establishment of literary and scientific institutions throughout the country, and was the principal founder of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge. He has been the unwearied advocate of slave emancipation, and has strenuously laboured in the cause of popular education. Amid the multifarious and exciting duties which devolve upon the legal politician and statesman, he has ever remembered the sweets of literature and the pleasures of science, pursuing them both with the fervour of a devotee. In 1858 his speech at the inauguration of a monument to the memory of Newton, in Lincolnshire, was a masterpiece of its kind; and at the meeting of the British Association, in the same year, he delivered an address, which showed how well he was fitted to digest masses of materials into succinct forms, and to make subservient to his purposes every kind of knowledge, to the acquirement of which a long and industrious life enabled him to devote himself. He has also been active as a law reformer, and during the last few years has chiefly directed his attention to the promotion of social science, in connexion with the association bearing that name. Lord Brougham was married, in 1819, to Mary Anne, daughter of Thomas Edcn, deputy-auditor of Greenwich Hospital, and niece of Lords Auckland and Henley, by whom he had one daughter, who died young. The peerage reverts to Mr. William Brougham and his heirs male. b. at Edinburgh, 1778. d. at Cannes, May 7, 1863.

BRoughton, Lord. (See HOUSE.)

Brown, Robert, brown, the founder of the sect called Brownists, was descended of a good family, and educated at Cambridge. Having formed, about 1580, a religious society at Norwich, he was imprisoned, but by means of treasurer Burleigh, to whom he was related, he obtained his liberty. After a life of difficulties, on account of religious principle and zeal, he ended his days at Northampton gaol, where he had been imprisoned for an assault. b. 1549; d. 1630.

Brown

Brown, Ulysses Maximilian, a field-marshal, of Irish origin, in the Austrian army, who rendered great services. b. at Killybegs, 1705; d. 1767.

Brown, John, in 1797 he defeated the Prussians, who had invaded Bohemia, and won the battle of Loschwitz. He was mortally wounded at the battle of Prague. b. at Killybegs, 1705; d. 1767.

at Cambridge with reputation, and while living at Carlisle on a minor canonry and lectureship, acted bravely as a volunteer against the rebels in 1745. In 1746 he was invited by the Empress of Russia to go to St. Petersburg and organize a system of education; but ill health prevented his accepting the invitation. He mainly devoted himself to literature, and produced several volumes of poems, essays, and plays; but the state of his health and other vexations brought on a fit of insanity, and in Sept. 1766 he cut his throat, and thus miserably perished by his own hand.

Brown, Lancelot, a landscape gardener and architect, styled by Repton "the immortal Brown," but more commonly designated "Capability Brown," from his constantly talking of the capabilities of landscapes for purposes of ornamental gardening, was originally a kitchen gardener, but raised himself to be the great authority on landscape gardening of his day, as well as on the improvement of grounds, and on family architecture. In early life he was engaged by Lord Cobham on the grounds at Stowe, after which he was similarly employed by other persons of distinction. He was high sheriff of Huntingdonshire in 1770, and was universally respected for integrity, intelligence, and amiability of demeanour. It has been said of him, that "he not only realized a handsome fortune, but he graced his acquired position of a gentleman by the manners and feelings of one." His taste in gardening has since been questioned; but the buildings erected by him, which are principally country mansions, are allowed to be models of comfort and convenience. b. in Northumberland, 1715; d. 1783.

Brown, Thomas, M.D., one of the most distinguished of modern metaphysicians, who studied in Edinburgh, and who, in 1806, entered into co-partnership with Dr. Gregory. Dugald Stewart, professor of moral philosophy, being indisposed in the winter of 1808-9, engaged Dr. Brown to read lectures for him in his class. In this capacity his success was so complete that, in 1810, he was induced to resign his practice, and accept the appointment of colleague to Dugald Stewart in the chair of moral philosophy, in the university of Edinburgh. b. at Kirkcubrecht, Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland, 1778; d. at Brompton, London, whither he had removed for his health, 1820.—His lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind were published after his decease, and they have been pronounced masterpieces of their kind. His style is certainly the most captivating that has ever been employed to convey a knowledge of philosophy. He was the author of several poems which are now forgotten, and one of the y— men whose talents contributed to the popularity and establishment of the "Edinburgh Review." (See BROUGHTON.)

Browx, Captain Sir Samuel, R.N., a naval officer, who rose to the rank of commander, but in 1812 accepted a retired captaincy. He devoted much of his time to civil engineering, and may be regarded as the first to introduce the use of chain-cables and suspension-bridges. Telford adopted his principle in constructing the Menai Bridge. In 1821 Captain Brown constructed the Trinity suspension pier at Newhaven, near Edinburgh, and subsequently several other bridges and piers, especially the one at Brighton. He was knighted in 1835. b. in London, 1778; d. 1852.

Browx, Robert, D.C.L., F.R.S., an eminent botanist, was the son of a Scottish Episcopalian clergyman, and educated for the medical profession, accompanying, in 1795, a Scotch fencible regiment to Ireland. His peculiar aptitude for botanical study had, however, already developed itself; and on his friend Sir Joseph Banks's recommendation, he threw up his commission, and, in 1801, embarked as naturalist in the expedition under Captain Flinders, for the survey of the Australian coasts. Thence he returned to England, in 1805, bringing with him nearly 4000 species of plants, a large proportion of which were entirely new to science, and also an inexhaustible store of new ideas in relation to the characters, distribution, and affinities of the singular vegetation which distinguishes the great continent of Australia from every other botanical region. To work out these ideas, both in relation to the plants of New Holland and in their comparison with those of other parts of the world, with wonderful sagacity, with the utmost minuteness of detail, and, at the same time, with the most comprehensive generalization, was the labour of many succeeding years. His memoirs on Asclepiadæ and Proteaceæ, his "Prodromus Floræ Novæ Hollandiæ," vol. i., published in 1810, and his "General Remarks, Geographical and Systematical, on the Botany of Terra Australis," published in 1814, revealed to the scientific world how great a master in botanical science had arisen among us. The natural system of Jus-leu, with important modifications, was adopted by him, and led to its general substitution in place of the Linnaean method. Honours were showered on him from all lands. His illustrious friend Alexander von Humboldt justly called him "Botanicorum facie Princeps;" and after the death of Dryander, in 1810, he received the charge of the noble library and splendid collections of Sir Joseph Banks, who bequeathed to him their enjoyment for life. In 1827 these were, with his assent, transferred to the British Museum, where he became keeper of the botanical department, receiving also a pension of £200 per annum, in recognition of his distinguished merits. b. at Montrose, Dec. 21, 1773; d. in London, June 10, 1858.—Robert Brown was a truthful, amiable, and humorous companion, and possessed of an uprightness of judgment which rendered him an invaluable counsellor. He was for several years president of the Linnaean Society, and was succeeded, as a keeper of the botanical department in the British Museum, by his friend and associate, John J. Bennett.

Brown, John, D.D., an eminent Scottish divine, and professor of exegetical divinity to the United Presbyterian Church in Scotland, was born at Whitburn, Linlithgowshire, in 1781. He was a superior Biblical critic, and published a great many works, principally in exposition of the Scriptures. Among his best works are his "Expository Lectures on the First Epistle of Peter," and "The Law of Christ respecting Civil Obedience." He also published "Discourses and Sayings of Our Lord Jesus Christ," an "Exposition of the Epistle to the Ephesians," "Discourses suited to the Lord's Supper," and other theological works, besides a controversial work on the voluntary church question. He held a very high position in the religious body to which he belonged, and was universally esteemed for his amiable character, and extensive and accurate learning. d. October 13, 1858.—His son, John Brown, M.D., F.R.C.P.E., F.R.S.E., &c., is also well known in the literary world, but his labours are in a different field from those of his father. He has written largely on professional and other subjects, and has published two volumes of essays under the title of "Home Subseivæ," besides contributing to the "North British Review," a religious publication called "Good Words," the "Scotsman" newspaper, and other periodicals. He has written a good deal on "Our Dogs," and, as has been very justly remarked, "has done for them with his pen what Landseer has with his brush." d. 1910.

Browx, General Sir George, entered the army in 1806 as an ensign in the 43rd regiment of foot. In 1807 he was a lieutenant, and took part in the bombardment of Copenhagen. He served throughout the whole of the Peninsular war, from 1808 to 1814, during which he was wounded at Talavera, and led the forlorn hope at the storming of Badajoz. He was, in 1814, made a lieutenant-colonel, and served in the short American war. Rising through the various ranks of his profession, he was made a lieutenant-general in 1851, and in 1854 commanded the light division, which distinguished itself at the battle of the Alma, in the Crimea. On November 5, 1854, he was severely wounded at Inkermann, and was obliged to relinquish his command, and retire for a time to Malta. In the following year he returned to his command, and was created a Knight Commander of the Bath. He had the command-in-chief of the storming party which was unsuccessful in the first attack on the Redan at Sebastopol, and shortly afterwards returned to England. In 1856 he was gazetted "General in the army for distinguished service in the field." In 1861-5 he was commander of the forces in Ireland. b. near Elgin, Scotland, 1790; d. August 27, 1865.

Browne, Sir Thomas, an eminent physician, who having taken his degrees in arts, went to Leyden, where he became an M.D., and in 1642 published his famous book, the "Religio Medici," which excited uncommon attention at home and abroad. In 1636 he settled at Norwich as a physician, and acquired a good practice. In 1646 appeared his book on "Vulgar Errors," in folio. Charles II. honoured him with knighthood in 1671. b. in London, 1605; d. at Norwich, 1682.—His works were printed in one volume, folio, after his death, and Dr. Johnson wrote his life.

Browne, William, an English minor poet, was born of a good family at Tavistock, Devonshire, in 1590. He was tutor to Robert Dormer, the "handsome" earl of Carnarvon, and was afterwards attached to the family of the earl of Pembroke. His works consist principally of eclogues, pastorals, &c.; he was especially happy in describing rural scenery, but his narratives are dull and heavy. His works, in three volumes, were published in a complete form in 1772, and included his "Masque of the Inner Temple," which had previously remained in MS. His death is believed to have occurred in 1645, and it is said he had acquired wealth sufficient to purchase an estate.

Browne, Sir William, an English physician, who left a sum for two prize medals, to be given annually at Cambridge for the best odes; and wrote several ingenious poems, miscellaneous tracts, speeches, and a work entitled "Opuscula." He also translated Dr. Gregory's "Elements of Catoptrics and Dioptrics," from Latin into English, with additions. b. 1692; d. 1774.

Browning, Robert, brown-ing, a distinguished modern English poet. In 1836 he published "Paracelsus," which was favourably received; and in 1837 produced "Strafford," a tragedy, in which Mr. Macready, the actor, personated the hero. His other works are "Sordello,"—"Pippa Passes,"—"The Blot in the Scutcheon,"—"King Victor and King Charles,"—"Dramatic Lyrics,"—"Return of the Druses,"—"Colombo's Birth-day,"—"Dramatic Romances," &c. Of all his writings, perhaps his "Pippa Passes" and "The Blot in the Scutcheon" are the best. His latest work, "The Ring and the Book," appeared in 1868. b. in Camberwell, 1812.

Browning, Elizabeth, originally Miss Barrett, wife of the above, gave early indications of genius, and was educated with the utmost care. At the age of seventeen she published "An Essay of Mind, with other Poems;" and in 1838 appeared her "Seraphim," which was succeeded by "The Romant of the Page," "The Drama of Exile," "Isabel's Child," "Casa Guidi Windows," and several miscellaneous pieces, all of which occupy a high place in our poetical literature. Besides these original works, she had translated the "Prometheus Bound," of Æschylus, and contributed a series of papers to the London "Athenæum" on the Greek Christian poets. In 1856 appeared her "Aurora Leigh," which has many admirers. b. in London, 1806; married, 1816; d. in Florence, in 1861.

Bruce, Robert, brooce, king of Scotland, one of the bravest and wisest of the Scottish monarchs. Through a long series of years he struggled against hardship and danger in endeavouring to recover the independence of his country, which, by the overthrow of the English at the battle of Bannockburn, in 1314, he achieved. This event established his sovereignty over the country, and the remainder of his life was passed in regulating his administration, and consolidating his power. b. 1274; d. in his castle at Cardross, on the shore of the Frith of Clyde, 1329. The heart of Bruce was embalmed, and Sir James Douglas, his old companion in arms, started to carry it to the Holy Land, but was killed in a battle with the Moors on the way. Bruce's remains were interred in the abbey church of Dunfermline.

Bruce, Michael, a Scottish poet, the son of a weaver, died too early to have written much; but his descriptive poem of "Lochleven," based upon the model of Thomson, makes us regret that he was so early taken from us. His "Elegy," however, is his finest poem, describing with the most touching pathos his feelings in anticipation of his own early dissolution. b. at Kinrosswood, Kinross-shire, 1746; d. 1767.

Bruce, James, a celebrated traveller, descended from the royal house of Bruce, and educated first at Ilarrow, and next at Edinburgh, where he studied the law, which profession, however, he did not follow. On leaving Edinburgh he went to London, and entered into partnership with a wine-merchant, whose daughter he married; but after a few months she died, when he went on a journey through Portugal, Spain, France, and the Netherlands. Meanwhile his father dying, he returned to England, and took possession of the paternal estate. In 1761 he dissolved partnership with his father-in-law, and in 1762 was appointed consul-general in Algiers. In the following year he arrived there, but in 1765 was superseded in his office. He now set out upon his travels, and visited Asia Minor, where he made drawings of the ruins of Palmyra and Balbec. In 1768 he departed on his tour to explore the source of the Nile. From Alexandria he went to Cairo, and crossed the desert to the Red Sea, after which he spent a considerable time in Arabia Felix. In 1770 he arrived at Gondar, in Abyssinia, and in that country rendered himself a favourite by his skill in physic and his splendid horsemanship. In the same year he discovered the source of the Abawi, which was then considered the principal stream of the Nile. Having accomplished this object, he returned to Gondar, where he served in the army under the reigning king, and it was with difficulty he obtained leave to quit the country, after residing there two years. He was nearly thirteen months in travelling to Cairo, during which he endured many hardships. He returned to England in 1773, and retired to his seat at Kinnaird, where he again married. In 1790 he published the long-expected history of his travels, in five quarto volumes, which contained much curious information, though the veracity of the author in several instances has been called in question. b. at Kinnaird, Stirlingshire, 1730; d. from a fall down the stairs of his own house, 1794.

Bruce, Charles Louis, Baron von, brook, an Austrian politician, who originally entered a commercial house at Bonn, and afterwards established himself at Trieste, where he married the daughter of a rich merchant. Called to the direction of the Austrian Lloyd's, he displayed great administrative powers, and in 1843 was elected a member of the National Assembly at Frankfort. When the Viennese revolution broke out, he remained faithful to the monarchy, and was subsequently engaged in various measures for the re-establishment of the authority of the emperor of Austria, and for the maintenance of order. In 1855 he was made minister of finance, and held that office when war between Austria and Sardinia was declared in 1859. After the conclusion of the war, serious frauds were discovered in the pay and commissariat departments of the army. To avoid the consequences, although it is not known that he was personally implicated, Baron Bruce committed suicide. b. 1793; d. 1860.

Bruys, Francis Paul, broe-niz, a rear-admiral in the French navy, commanded a fleet which carried the French army to d. in 1793: and in the same year was d.

BRUN, Charles le. (See LEBRUN.)

BRUN, William Marie Anne, Marshal, broon, a law student and journalist, who when the Revolution broke out, took up arms, and served under Dumouriez. He rose rapidly, and in 1795 became a general of brigade under Napoleon I. He was appointed commander-in-chief of the army which invaded Switzerland, after the peace of Campo Formio; and also of that of Italy after the fall of Berne. In 1805 he was made a marshal of the French empire, and in 1807 became governor of the Hanseatic towns, but fell into disgrace for omitting the titles of Napoleon in the text of the convention which procured for France from Sweden the surrender of the island of Rugen. He now went into retirement till the first abdication of Napoleon, when he submitted to Louis XVIII., who gave him the cross of St. Louis. In the "Hundred Days" he joined Napoleon, but, after the battle of Waterloo, proclaimed the king. Leaving his corps and proceeding to Paris, he entered an inn at Avignon, where he was attacked by an infuriated mob, who accused him of having been a terrorist, and taken part in the massacres of 1793. At that time, however, he said he was fighting on the frontiers of his country against the enemy. Nevertheless they immediately shot him, dragged his body through the streets, and threw it into the Rhone. n. at Brives, 1763; killed, 1815.

BRUNEL, Sir Mark Isambard, broo'-nel, discovered from his boyhood a decided predilection for mechanical studies, and seized upon every opportunity of giving them a practical effect. His parents, who were respectable French agriculturists, discountenanced these pursuits; but the force of nature would not be restrained, and after passing some time with the family of a friend of his father, of the name of Carpentier, he was induced to enter the mercantile marine, in which he made several voyages to the West Indies. Whilst employed in this service, he continued to give specimens of his mechanical ingenuity, and actually constructed a pianoforte whilst his ship was lying at Guadaloupe. The French revolution of 1793 drove him from his country, and, landing in New York, he resolved to endeavour to turn his engineering skill to some account. Accordingly he, conjointly with another, surveyed the ground for the canal which now connects the river Hudson at Albany with Lake Champlain. Desirous, however, of returning to Europe, he came to England, where he produced several inventions, and submitted to the government a plan for making block-pulleys for ships by machinery. This was carried into execution in the dockyard at Portsmouth, and proved a wonderful success. Brunel was now a made man: he continued to exercise his talents in constructive works, and in 1825 commenced excavating for the Thames Tunnel. This extraordinary work was opened to the public in 1843, after innumerable obstacles and difficulties had been overcome. This work, though a marvel of engineering skill, has proved an utter failure as a commercial speculation. Brunel, in 1841, had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him. n. at Haqueville, near Rouen, 1769; n. 1849. He was married to an English lady named Sophia Kingdom, and their constancy to each other during long years of separation and difficulties, and their happy companionship in later years, form one of the finest passages in the records of domestic life.

BRUNEL, Isambard Kingdom, son of the above, finished his education at the college of Henri IV. at Caen, in France, and commenced the study of civil engineering under his father. He was the resident engineer of the Thames Tunnel, and was the designer and civil engineer of the Great Western, which was the first steamship built to cross the Atlantic. He was also the constructor of the Great Britain, and the Great Eastern, the huge iron ship built at Millwall in 1857. In 1833 he was appointed engineer to the Great Western Railway, and all the tunnels and works connected with that line and its branches were constructed under his direction. He also superintended the erection of many bridges; among which may be mentioned the old Hungerford suspension bridge across the Thames (recently removed), which had the widest span of any similar structure in England, and the bridge of the Cornwall Railway, crossing the Tamar at Saltash. This latter is supported by a central pier from a depth of 80 feet of water, which is the deepest yet achieved in civil engineering. It was opened in May, 1850, by Prince Albert, after whom it was named, and is one of the greatest undertakings of its kind in the world. n. at Portsmouth, 1806; n. Sept. 15, 1859.

BRUNELLESCHI, Philip, broo'-nail-lais'-ke, an Italian architect, who erected the dome of the cathedral at Florence, which Michael Angelo pronounced a work of uncommon beauty. He was patronized by the Medici family, for whom he built some magnificent structures. He was also an excellent engineer, and skilled in military architecture. n. at Florence, 1377; n. 1444.

BRUNNOW, Ernest Philip, Baron, broon'-no, a modern Russian diplomatist, who assisted at the congress of Laybach and Troppau. After being engaged in various important positions in England, Turkey, Germany, and at his own court, he was sent as ambassador to Great Britain in 1840, and remained in that post till the breaking out of the Russian war in 1854. In 1856 he was at the congress of Paris, and in 1858 returned to London. n. 1797.

BRUNSWICK, House of, one of the oldest German families, deriving its descent from Albert Azo I., margrave of Este, in Italy, who died in 964. Her majesty Queen Alexandrina Victoria is a descendant of one of the branches of this family. Several distinguished commanders have sprung from this house; among whom may be noticed Charles William Ferdinand, who was educated as a soldier, and who, after having fought in many campaigns, was defeated at Jena and Auerstadt, where he was wounded, in October, 1806, and died the following month. His son, William Frederick, fell at Ligny, on June 16, 1815. It is to the gallantry of this prince that Byron, in the third canto of his "Childe Harold," dedicates a stanza in his description of the battle of Waterloo.

BRUTUS, L. Junius, bru'-tus, the son of M. Junius and Tarquinia, second daughter of Tarquin Priscus. His father, with his eldest son, having been murdered by Tarquin the Proud, he was called Brutus on account of his stupidity, which, however, was only feigned. He expelled the Tarquins from Rome, condemned to death his own sons Titus and Tiberius for conspiring against their country, and fell fighting for the liberties of the people, in the year 509 B.C.—His body was brought to Rome, and received as in triumph; a funeral oration was spoken over it, and the Roman matrons showed their grief by mourning a year for the father of the republic.

BRUTUS, M. Junius, the son of Servilia, Cato's sister, and Decimus Junius Brutus, was lineally descended from the above. At the battle of Pharsalia, Cæsar not only spared the life of Brutus, but made him one of his most favoured friends. He, however, forgot the obligation because Cæsar aspired to supreme power. He conspired with many of the most illustrious citizens of Rome against the tyrant, and stabbed him in the senate-house. Antony having taken up arms to avenge Cæsar, Brutus retired into Greece, where he gained himself many friends by his arms, as well as by his powers of persuasion; but he was soon after pursued thither by Antony, whom young Octavius accompanied. A battle was fought at Philippi. Brutus, who commanded the right wing of the republican army, defeated the enemy, and even took the camp of Octavius; but Cassius, who had the care of the left, was overpowered by the persevering valour of Antony; and as he knew not the situation of his friend, and grew desperate, he ordered one of his freedmen to run him through. Brutus deeply deplored his fall, and in the fulness of his grief called him the last of the Romans. In another battle, the wing which Brutus commanded obtained a victory; but the other was defeated, and he found himself surrounded by the soldiers of Antony. He, however, made his escape; but hearing that many of his personal friends had deserted to the conquerors, and that their attempts to seduce his soldiers were incessant and too successful, he at last fell upon his sword, exclaiming, "O virtue, thou art but an empty name; I have worshipped thee as a goddess, but thou art the slave of fortune!" Fell 42 B.C. Brutus is not less celebrated for his literary talents than his valour in the field. When he was in the camp, the greatest part of his time was occupied with reading and writing; and on the day which preceded one of his most bloody battles, while the rest of his army was under continual apprehensions, Brutus calmly spent his hours till the evening in writing an epitome of Polybius. Plutarch mentions, that Cæsar's ghost made its appearance to him in his tent, and told him that he would meet him at Philippi. He married Claudia, whom he afterwards divorced without assigning any reason, for which his conduct was deservedly reprehended, and he immediately took for his second wife, Porcia, the daughter of Cato, who killed herself by swallowing burning coals, when she heard the fate of her husband.—It is said that both Brutus and Cassius fell upon those very swords which they had raised against the life of Julius Cæsar.

BRUTUS, Decimus Junius Albinus, also one of Cæsar's murderers, was distantly related to the above. It was he who prevailed upon the dictator to go to the senate-house, when he seemed doubtful, in consequence of the unfavourable appearance of the omens. He was betrayed into the hands of Antony, and put to death, B.C. 42.

BRUYÈRE, John de la, broo'-gair, a French writer of eminence, whom Bossuet employed as a teacher of history to the duke of Burgundy. He was admitted a member of the French

Buchanan

Academy. B. at Dourdon, in Normandy, B. at Versailles, 1696.—Bruyère's "Characters in the manner of Theophrastus" acquired great popularity, as they were drawn from real persons, and exposed the prevailing follies in a bold yet delicate style. The best editions are those of Amsterdam, 1741, and Paris, 1765.

BRAYNT, William Cullen, bré'-ant, one of the best of the American poets. He was educated for the law: but having early enrolled himself under the banner of the Muses, he abandoned Themis, and devoted himself to the study of literature. This took place in 1825, when, in conjunction with Robert Sands, he founded the "New York Review and Athenæum Magazine." He next began the publication of an annual called the "Talisman," which extended his popularity as a poet. Seeking, however, either a more extended sphere of usefulness or excitement, he resigned all connexion with the Muses, and became editor of the "New York Evening Post." To this paper he has devoted his energies for upwards of thirty years. B. at Cummington, Massachusetts, 1794.—The "Ages" is the longest and the best poem of Mr. Bryant, but his other effusions have very great merit.

BUCER, Martin, boó'-sair, one of the Protestant reformers, who first united with Luther, but afterwards inclined to Zuinglius, though he laboured much to bring the two parties to a union. He came to England in 1549, and was made divinity professor at Cambridge. B. in Alsace, 1491; D. 1551.—In the reign of Mary, his body was taken up and burnt. His writings are very numerous.

BUCHAN, William, buk'-an, a physician, who, after studying medicine at Edinburgh, became physician to the Foundling Hospital at Aekworth, Yorkshire. He continued there till the institution was dissolved, and then returned to Edinburgh, where he practised several years with success. In 1770 he published his popular book, entitled "Domestic Medicine; or, a Treatise on the Cure and Prevention of Diseases," which attained a sale of 80,000 copies during the author's lifetime. He now removed to London, where he obtained considerable practice, which was diminished by the preference he gave to society rather than to business. B. at Ancram, in Roxburghshire, Scotland, 1729; D. 1805. He published two other professional books, which went through three editions.

BUCHANAN, George, bu'-kán'-an, an eminent writer, who embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and was employed by James V. as a tutor to his natural son, the earl of Moray. At the same king's command he attacked the Franciscans in a satirical poem, for which his life being threatened, he fled to England, and thence to France, where he obtained a professorship in the college of Guienne, in Bordeaux, and subsequently held the regency in the college of Cardinal Le Moine, from 1544 to 1547. He next went to Portugal, and became a teacher of philosophy in the university of Coimbra; but expressing some free opinions, he was confined in a monastery, in which he translated the Psalms of David into Latin. This is generally considered to be the finest Latin version of the book of Psalms. In 1551 he obtained his liberty, and after residing some time in France and England, returned to his native country, where he was appointed principal of the college of St. Leonard, in the university of St. Andrews.

This favour he obtained from Queen Mary, which he ill requited by writing a book called a "Detection of her Doings," designed to prejudice the minds of her subjects against her. BUCHANAN, James, president of the United States for the years 1857 to 1861, was bred a lawyer, and at 25 years of age was elected a member of the Legislative Assembly of Pennsylvania, and kept his seat for eleven years. He then entered upon diplomacy, concluded an important commercial treaty with Russia, and was minister plenipotentiary at the court of St. Petersburg till 1853. Returning to America, he gained a seat in Congress, and was subsequently secretary of state under President Polk. In 1853 he was appointed by President Pierce ambassador to England, and remained there till 1856, when, being recalled, he was chosen by the democratic party as their candidate. In the struggle for the presidency, he represented the singular alliance between democratic progress and the retention of the "peculiar institution" of slavery. He beat his most formidable opponent, Colonel Fremont, by 163 votes to 125. b. at Stoney Batter, Pennsylvania, 1791. During his presidency the secession of the Southern States was begun, which led to a civil war between the two divisions of the states, which Buchanan was accused of facilitating by his weakness at the first beginning of the movement.

BUCKINGHAM, George Villiers, Duke of, buk'-ing-ham, the profligate favourite of the pedant king James I., was the son of Sir George Villiers, a knight who had lands in Leicestershire. He rose to the highest offices and honours, and conducted an attack upon the island of Rhé, in which he lost 2000 men, displaying his incapacity for such enterprises, and returned to England discredited both as an admiral and a general, and bringing no praise with him, as Hume says, "but the vulgar one of valour and personal bravery." Being intrusted with the command of a large force to relieve La Rochelle, he went to Portsmouth to superintend the necessary preparations, previous to his departure, when he was stabbed by a half-madman of the name of John Fenton. b. at Brookesley, Leicestershire, 1592; killed at Portsmouth, 1623.

BUCKINGHAM, George Villiers, Duke of, son of the above, a favourite of Charles II., as noted for his wit as his profligacy. He was a man who had made "the whole body of vice" his study, and even had the heartlessness to propose the removal of the wife and queen of his sovereign to a West-Indian plantation, to quiet his apprehensions of her interfering with some of his infamous intrigues. His name contributes a letter in the anagram of the "Cabal" ministry, of which he was a member. b. in London, 1627; d. at Kirkby Moorside, in the house of one of his tenants, Yorkshire, 1688.—This is the nobleman who furnished Pope with a subject for a few satirical lines in one of his moral essays, and also sat for Dryden's portrait of Zimri, in his "Absalom and Achitophel." He himself was an author of considerable wit, and produced several pieces which, in their day, enjoyed some reputation. His "Rehearsal" especially was popular, on account of the severe ridicule which it bestowed upon Dryden, under the character of Bayes, as well as on account of the wit with which it sparkled.

BUCKINGHAM, James Silk, an enterprising traveller, a lecturer, and a social reformer, who, from humble circumstances, rose to represent the world at different times, and established in London the "Oriental Herald," which was the precursor of the "Athenæum," and several other publications. In 1816 he had established a journal in India; but from the freedom of his criticisms upon the administration of public affairs, he was expelled from the presidency of Bengal, and ruined in his fortunes. To make some amends for this treatment, the Honourable East India Company, a few years before his death, allowed him a pension. In 1813 he was the chief agent in establishing the British and Foreign Institute, of which he was appointed secretary, but which preserved a languid existence for three years only. He subsequently became a pensioner on the civil list to the extent of £200 a year. b. at Flushing, near Falmouth, Cornwall, 1786; d. in London, 1855.—His son, Mr. Leicester Buckingham, who was well known in London as a comic author, burlesque writer, and journalist, died in 1867. b. 1825.

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE, John Sheffield, Duke of, buk'-ing-ham-sheer, was the son of Edmund, earl of Mulgrave, and served under Marshal Turenne, and took an active part in the revolution of 1688. In 1703 he was created duke of Normanby and Buckinghamshire. Buckingham House in St James's Park, now the royal palace, was erected by him. b. 1646; d. 1720. He wrote some poems, which in his time were presumed to evince genius, and received the praises of Pope and Dryden.

BUCKLAND, the Very Rev. William, buk'-land, dean of Westminster, and a distinguished geologist and mineralogist. In 1818 he was appointed reader in mineralogy, and in 1818 reader in geology, at the university of Oxford. In 1822 the Royal Society awarded him the Copley medal for "An account of an assemblage of fossil teeth and bones of the elephant, hippopotamus, bear, tiger, hyena, and sixteen other animals, discovered in a cave at Kirkdale, Yorkshire." He published several works in connexion with his favourite science, and it may safely be affirmed that it is to his vigorous exertions more than to those of any other man, that geological science is so far advanced in this country as it is. In 1845 he was made dean of Westminster. He was a member of several scientific societies, and a trustee of the British Museum. b. at Axminster, Devonshire; 1784; d. Aug. 14, 1856.

BUCKLE, Henry Thomas, buk'-el, the son of a merchant of London, was well known for his historical researches, and especially the "History of Civilization," the first volume of which appeared in 1853, and the second in 1861; but these were merely instalments of a great work which the author had designed, but which, unfortunately, he did not live to complete. He was also the author of an "Essay on Liberty," and another on the "Influence of Women." b. at Lee, Kent, Nov. 24, 1822; d. in 1862, at Damascus, whither he had gone to study the language, law, and characteristics of Oriental nations,

OF BIOGRAPHY.

BUCKSTONE, John Baldwin, buk'-ston, a distinguished actor, dramatic author, and theatrical manager, was originally intended for a naval career, was afterwards articled to a solicitor, and at the age of 19 embraced the stage, making his first appearance at Wokingham, Berkshire, in the character of Gabriel in the "Children in the Wood." After playing in the provinces for some time, he appeared at the Surrey Theatre, London, in 1824, in the part of Peter Smirk, in the "Armistice." His success was satisfactory, and, taking to authorship, he played at the Adelphi, in 1823, as Bobby Trot, in his own drama of "Luke the Labourer." About this time he made the acquaintance of Sir Walter Scott, whose commendations stimulated Mr. Buckstone to fresh exertions of his powers of composition. He wrote several pieces for the Haymarket Theatre, which led to his being engaged as leading comedian at that house, of which he has for several years been lessee and manager. He has produced no less than 150 different pieces, nearly all of which have been received with much favour by the public. Among these may be mentioned (for we cannot enumerate the whole), "A Husband at Sight;" "Married Life;" "Single Life;" "A Lesson for Ladies;" "Weak Points;" "Popping the Question;" "Our Mary Anne;" "The Wreck Ashore;" "Victorine;" "The May Queen;" "The Dream at Sea;" "The Irish Lion;" "Last Year;" "Good for Nothing;" "Green Bushes," &c., &c. Mr. Buckstone is one of the most active promoters of the General Theatrical Fund, and of the Dramatic College established near Woking for aged actors. b. near London, in 1802.

BUDGELL, Eustace, budj'-el, an English writer, who received his education at Christchurch, Oxford, whence he removed to the Middle Temple, for the purpose of following the profession of the law. Mr. Addison, to whom he was related, took him to Ireland as one of his clerks, when he was appointed secretary to the earl of Wharton, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland. He wrote several papers for the "Tatler," "Spectator," and "Guardian;" "Lives of the Family of the Boyles;" and translated Theophrastus's "Characters" from the Greek. b. at Exeter, 1635; drowned in the Thames, 1736.

BUFFON, George Louis le Clerc, buj'-fawng, an illustrious French naturalist, was the son of a counsellor of the parliament of Dijon, where he studied for the law. His inclination, however, led him into the paths of science, and he paid much attention to astronomy and geometry. At the age of 20 he made the tour of Italy, after which he visited England, and, in 1735, published some translations from the English. In 1733 he was admitted into the Academy of Sciences, and appointed superintendent of the royal garden and cabinet, which, by his care, were considerably enriched and improved. Profiting by the resources of the establishment over which he presided, he devoted himself entirely to the study of natural history. In 1749 appeared the first part of his great work, "Natural History, General and Particular," which was not completed till 1788, when it amounted to 36 vols. 4to, with illustrations. Several volumes were added by way of supplement. Besides this voluminous work, he translated Hales's "Vegetable Statics," and Newton's "Fluxions," and contributed many papers to the "Memoirs of the Royal Academy." b. at Montbard, Burgundy, 1707; d. 1788.

BUGEAUD DE LA PICONNERIE, Thomas Robert, boozh'-o, duke of Isly, a marshal of France, who, in 1801, entered the army as a private, went through all the campaigns of Napoleon I., and rose to the rank of colonel by his valour in the field. Even after the decisive defeat of the emperor at Waterloo, he held his ground in Savoy; and on the 25th of June, 1815, at L'Hospital-sous-Clonsans, made the last stand against the allies, defeating with 1700 men a body of 8000 Austrians. After Napoleon's abdication, he busied himself with agricultural pursuits. In 1830 he was recalled from his retirement, and under Louis Philippe energetically repressed the insurrections in Paris. In 1836 he was sent to Algeria, where he defeated Abd-el-Kader on the Sikkah, but made a treaty with the Arab chief at Tafna, which unfortunately gave that formidable opponent of France many advantages. In 1840 he was made governor of Algeria, and displayed in that capacity considerable administrative talents. He was incessant in his pursuit of Abd-el-Kader, who was again in arms at the head of a large force; and after several minor successes, General Bugeaud, who was made a marshal in 1843, met the Arab army at Isly, and there gained, with 10,000 men against 40,000, a decisive victory. This battle gave him the title of Duke of Isly. In 1847 he retired, discontented that his plans for colonizing Algeria were thwarted. Summoned to the aid of Louis Philippe on the night of the 23rd and 24th of February, 1848, the command of the army was, a few hours afterwards, taken from him, just as he had adopted decisive measures to save the monarchy. After the election of Louis Napoleon, in the December following, as president of the republic, Bugeaud was taken into favour, and received the command of the army of the Alps, but died soon after. b. at Limoges, 1781; d. at Paris, 1849.

BULL, Dr. John, bool, a famous musician, who in 1591 was created doctor, and appointed organist of the royal chapel. He was the first professor of music in Gresham College. b. at Wells, Somersetshire, 1503; d. at Antwerp, 1623.—He is the reputed composer of the national anthem "God Save the King."

BULL, Ole Bornemann, a Norwegian violinist, whose father destined him for the church. He was educated at the university of Christiania, but made little progress until he had an opportunity of showing his great natural musical talents. He then became an object of enthusiasm with his countrymen, for he was the first musical genius Norway had produced. In 1829 he went to Cassel, to study under Spohr. His first appearance in public was a failure, and for many years he laboured without success. It was not, indeed, until 1851 that his genius was acknowledged, after which time he played to crowded audiences in all the great cities of Europe and America. Failing in his attempt to establish a Scandinavian colony in Pennsylvania, he returned in 1860 to Norway, and opened a theatre in his native town. b. at Bergen, 1810.

BULLER, the Right Hon. Charles, booli'-ler, was the son of a gentleman in the civil service of the East India Company, and was returned M.P. for West Looe, Cornwall, in 1830. In 1832 he became member for Liskeard, for which town he sat until his death. In 1847 he was appointed president of the Poor-Law Commission, and was an extensive contributor to the "Edin."

Bulow, Frederick William, boó'-lo, a distinguished Prussian general, who, in the campaign of 1813, saved Berlin by the victories he gained at Grossbeeren and Dennewitz, and from which latter he obtained the title of Count of Dennewitz. He took a prominent part in the battle of Leipsic, and also in the final defeat and pursuit of the French at Waterloo. B. 1755; D. 1816.—Unlike the majority of military men of high rank of this period, Bulow was remarkable for his refinement and great general knowledge.

BULWER, Sir Henry Lytton Earle, boól'-wer, a privy councillor, a diplomatist, and an author. He has been connected with diplomatic missions to Berlin, Vienna, the Hague, Paris, Brussels, Constantinople, and in 1843 was despatched to Madrid as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary. In 1848 he was dismissed from the Spanish court, on account of his opposition to the arbitrary conduct of the government of that country, but he was supported by his own government, and Spain was, for two years, without a British

In 1851 he was made Knight Grand Cross of the order of the Bath, and, in 1857, succeeded Lord Stratford de Redcliffe as ambassador at Constantinople, a post which he retained until 1863. His chief works are, "France, Social and Literary," and "The Monarchy of the Middle Classes." B. 1804.

BUNSEN, Christian Karl Josias, Chevalier de, boón'-sen, diplomatist, theologian, and philologist, was educated at the university of Göttingen, where he greatly distinguished himself as a classical scholar. He subsequently went to Paris, to study eastern languages under Sylvestre de Sacy, the orientalist, with a view of going to India. Having been introduced to the celebrated Niebuhr, he became his secretary at Rome, but soon obtained a higher position as secretary to the Prussian embassy in the Roman capital. Here he pursued his classical studies with Niebuhr, and, at the same time, took a deep interest in the hieroglyphical researches of Champollion. In 1823 the king of Prussia visited Rome, and soon became aware of the abilities of his secretary of legation. This was the prelude to his rise in the world of diplomacy. When Niebuhr retired from the embassy at Rome, Bunsen was appointed to fill his place. In 1830 he became ambassador to the Swiss confederacy, and, in 1841, was appointed Prussian ambassador to England. Here he remained, esteemed by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, till 1854, when his opinions of Prussian policy relative to the Russian war led either to his resignation or recall. He wrote a great many works; but he is, perhaps, best known in England by the one entitled "Egypt's Place in History." B. at Corbach, in the principality of Waldeck, 1791. D. at Bonn, November 28, 1860.

BUNYAN, John, bun'-yan, one of the most celebrated English writers, was originally a travelling tinker, and, having neither been taught to read nor to write, led a profane kind of life for some years. At length his attention was happily drawn to higher subjects, and he began to study the Scriptures, of which he acquired a great knowledge. In the civil war he took the

On his release from prison, he became teacher of the Baptist congregation at Bedford, often travelling into different parts of England to visit the people of that persuasion, and was consequently called Bishop Bunyan. B. at Elstow, 1628; D. in London, 1688.—His works have often been printed collectively, and, perhaps, are more widely known than those of any other religious writer in the language.

BUOL-SCHAUENSTEIN, Count de, boó'-sh, a modern Austrian diplomatist, was the son of a diplomatist of the same name, and was born in Switzerland in 1797. He represented his sovereign at the court of Turin in 1847, during the agitation which led to the Italian war of 1848, and was afterwards appointed ambassador to London. On the death of Prince Schwartzberg in 1852, he was recalled to Vienna, and named minister of foreign affairs and prime minister of Austria. He was at the head of affairs when war was declared against Sardinia in April, 1859, but resigned in May following, being succeeded by Count Rechberg.

BRONAROTTI. (See MICHAEL ANGELO.)

BROCKHAEDT, John Louis, brook'-hart, a Swiss traveller, who, in 1806, arrived in London with a letter from the celebrated Blumenbach to Sir Joseph Banks. Having succeeded in making an engagement with the African Association to endeavour to penetrate into the interior of Africa from the north, he sailed from Portsmouth in 1809. He passed two years and a half in Syria, and made two journeys through Nubia, which occupied him down to 1814. He next passed a considerable time in Arabia, visited the cities of Mecca and Medina, where he fell ill; but, on recovering, set out for Cairo, where he arrived after an absence of upwards of two years. The plague having broken out in 1816 at Cairo, he departed for the desert of Sinai. In 1817 we find him again in Cairo, where he was taken ill of dysentery, of which he never recovered. B. at Lausanne, Switzerland, 1784; D. at Cairo, 1817.—The works of this traveller comprise "Travels in Nubia," "Travels in Nubia and the Holy Land," "Travels in Arabia," and "Notes on the Bedouens and Wahabees."

BURDETT, Sir Francis, Bart., bur'-des, a distinguished political reformer, who, for nearly the first half of the nineteenth century, filled a large space in the public eye. B. 1770; D. 1844.

BURR, Martin Van, an American statesman and president of the Union, was born at Kinderhook, Columbia county, in the state of New York, on the 5th of December, 1782. Both his parents were of Dutch origin, and he was regarded as one of the few representatives of the unadulterated Knickerbocker stock who first brought industry and civilization to the ancient colony of Manhattan. He acquired the first rudiments of an education in the schools of his native village; at 14 he commenced the study of law, and duly completed his course of legal training. In November, 1803, in the 21st year of his age, he was admitted as an attorney-at-law to the bar of New York, and immediately commenced practice. In 1807 he became a counsellor of the Supreme Court; and in the year following was appointed surrogate of Columbia county. In 1809 he set up business in the city of Hudson, state of New York. In April, 1812, Mr. Van Buren was elected a member of the State senate for the then middle district of New York, and in the following year we find him member of the Court for the Revision of Errors. In 1815 he was appointed Attorney-General of the state. In 1816 he removed to Albany, where he remained till 1819, when he retired to the private practice of his profession till the year 1833. From this year may be reckoned Mr. Van Buren's purely political character. In 1815 he became regent of the university of New York. In 1821 he was elected United States' senator for the state of New York, and in 1823 was governor of that state. On the 12th of March in the same year he accepted the appointment of Secretary of State, tendered him by President Jackson. In 1831 he was in England as United States' minister; but as the senate refused to confirm the appointment, he returned to America in 1832, and became secretary of the treasury. In 1833 he was elected vice-president, with General Jackson as president for the second time. In 1836 Mr. Van Buren was chosen president. In 1856 he retired altogether from public life, and died July 24, 1862.

BURGOYNE, John, bur'-goin', an English general, who, after two severe engagements with the Americans during the War of Independence, was forced to surrender, with his whole army, in 1777, to General Gates, and to sign the capitulation of Saratoga, which decided France to recognise the independence of the United States. On his return to England, he devoted himself to pleasure and the muses; and, amongst other performances, produced the "Maid of the Oaks," "Don Ton," the "Heiress," and the "Lord of the Manor," which had their day of success upon the stage. p. 1792.

BURGOYNE, Sir John Fox, who, entering the army as one of the corps of Royal Engineers, was, in 1800, made a lieutenant, and, in 1803, a captain. In 1845 he received the appointment of inspector-general of fortifications in England, and in 1851 attained the rank of lieutenant-general, and the next year was made a K.C.B. When the Crimean War began in 1854, he was sent to Turkey, and was chief of the engineering department of the British army in the Crimea until replaced by Sir Harry Jones in 1855. On his return he was created a baronet, and promoted to the rank of general. In 1852 he was made a G.C.B., and, in 1865, was appointed Constable of the Tower of London. In 1867 he was promoted to the rank of field-marshal. p. 1792.

BURKE, Edmund, burk, an illustrious writer and statesman, whose father was an attorney, and who received his education under Abraham Shackleton, a Quaker, at Ballymore, near Carlow. His first performance, which brought him prominently into notice, was the essay on the "Sublime and Beautiful," published in 1757. This philosophical piece of criticism, written in a fine and elegant style, procured the author a great reputation, and the esteem of the first literary characters of the age; the principal of whom was Dr. Johnson, who says, "It is an example of true criticism;" although a critic equally acute has dissented from the theory it seeks to establish. In 1758 he suggested to Mr. Dodsley, the bookseller, the plan of the "Annual Register," the historical part of which he wrote for several years. In 1761 he went to Ireland as the companion of his friend Mr. Hamilton, secretary to the earl of Halifax, then lord-lieutenant. On his return, he was made private secretary to the marquis of Rockingham, first lord of the Treasury, who, in 1766, brought him into Parliament for Wendover. He subsequently was returned for Malton, in Yorkshire; and gained great popularity by his introduction of a bill for a reform in the national expenditure, on which he bestowed prodigious labour, but it was unsuccessful. He was a warm opponent of the measures of the governments of Lord Grenville and Lord North in reference to the American colonies, and, had his advice and that of his liberal friends been followed, the secession of the United States from the British crown would long have been delayed, if not altogether prevented. Some of his finest speeches were delivered in the course of the debates on this subject. When matters had gone too far to permit of the retention of the colonies, Burke advocated the recognition of their independence long before the course of events necessitated that measure. When the marquis of Rockingham returned to power, on the resignation of Lord North, in 1782, Mr. Burke obtained the post of paymaster-general of the forces, and a seat in the privy council; but on the death of his patron in the same year, Lord Shelburne became first lord of the Treasury, and Mr. Burke, with several of his friends, resigned their places. The principal acts of his political life after this were the share he took in the impeachment of Warren Hastings for his maladministration in India; his opposition to Mr. Pitt's design of forming a limited regency on the king's illness, in 1783; and the strong part he took against the authors and defenders of the French revolution. In the house he avowed his detestation of the revolutionists with such force that a separation between him and Mr. Fox, and many more of his old friends, took place. In 1790 he published his famous "Reflections on the Revolution in France," which attracted great attention, and produced a surprising effect upon the public mind. After this, he published a variety of pamphlets in support of the positions he had taken up. His zeal on this occasion, as well as his extraordinary talents, recommended him to the royal favour, and he obtained a pension, which gave room for those who had been galled by his arguments to reproach him; and some illiberal animadversions were made upon him in the senate, which drew from him that admirable defence, his "Letter to a noble Lord" (Earl Fitzwilliam), in which he retaliates upon a celebrated duke (duke of Bedford) in a strain of keen irony and dignified remonstrance. Mr. Burke withdrew from Parliament in 1794, leaving his seat for Malton to his son, an accomplished young man, who died shortly after. This melancholy event hastened his own end, as it left him alone, with none "to meet his enemies in the gate." p. in Dublin, 1728; p. at Beaconsfield, 1797.—Mr. Burke was an amiable man, and a faithful friend, charitable and pious. He had a fine taste for the arts, and was fond of gardening and architecture. Dr. Johnson considered him the greatest man!

England, and Fox declared that he was indebted to him for all the fame he possessed. Gibbon said that he admired his eloquence, approved his politics, adored his chivalry, and almost forgave his reverence for church establishments. "That great master of eloquence, Edmund Burke!" exclaims Lord Macaulay, "in aptitude of comprehension and richness of imagination, superior to every orator, ancient or modern."

BURKE, Robert O'Hara, was the leader of an exploring party, three of whom, in 1840, crossed, for the first time, the entire Australian continent from Victoria to the Gulf of Carpentaria, and discovered that the interior, instead of being an arid and barren waste, as had previously been believed, was a well-watered and fertile country, and who, along with two of his companions, named Gray and Wills, perished of starvation on their return. Mr. Burke was born in the county of Galway, Ireland, and was in the fortieth year of his age when he died. He was partly educated at home, and afterwards, for the higher studies, in Belgium. Subsequently he entered the Radetzky regiment of Hungarian hussars, in the Austrian service. Here he displayed great assiduity in military studies, soon came to be regarded as a most efficient cavalry officer, and at an early period obtained a captaincy. Afterwards, we hear of him as holding a command in the Irish mounted constabulary, when he was for some time stationed in Dublin. He subsequently emigrated to Australia, where he arrived in 1853, and held the position of inspector of the colonial police of Victoria, in which he remained, with a short interval, during which he returned to England with the hope of obtaining a commission in the army engaged in the Crimean war, till he undertook the duty of conducting the exploring party into the interior of Australia. The party started on the 10th of August, 1860, came in sight of the sea or the Carpentarian Gulf on about the 11th of February; and on the return march, some months later, Mr. Burke and his two unfortunate companions perished from exhaustion in the wilderness—King, the survivor, being ultimately relieved, and conveyed to Melbourne. p. 1861.

BURKE, Sir John Bernard, genealogist, and author of "Burke's Peerage," "The Landed Gentry," "Family Romance," "Vicissitudes of Great Families," and other works of a similar character, was born in London in 1815, and was educated for the bar. He was appointed Ulster-King-at-arms in 1853, is knight attendant of the order of St. Patrick, and was knighted in 1884. Sir Bernard is a great authority on all subjects connected with genealogy, heraldry, and antiquities.

BURLINGHAM, William Cecil, Lord, bur'-le, a secretary of state under Edward VI. and Elizabeth, and grand treasurer of England. In 1588 parliament was assembled, and, by his advice, a plan of religious reform was laid before it. In this he had a considerable share; and he also took the greatest part in the establishment of the Thirty-nine Articles of faith, which form the basis of the Reformed religion. To him is also due the regulation of the coinage, which had been altered since Henry VIII.'s time. He was created Baron Burlingame in 1571, and in 1588 concluded an advantageous treaty with the Netherlands. p. in Lincolnshire, 1520; p. 1593.—His son, Robert Cecil, minister under Elizabeth and James I., was sent to the court of Henry IV. of France to negotiate a treaty of peace with Spain. He is said to have had a share in the death of the earl of Essex, and was loaded with honours by James I., who created him marquis of Salisbury. p. about 1665; p. 1612.

BURN, Richard, burn, an English divine, and celebrated law-writer, who, on taking orders, obtained the vicarage of Orton, in his native county, and became a justice of the peace. This circumstance led him to form a digest of the common law necessary to be known by magistrates. This work was published at first in 2 vols. 8vo; but its success was such, that every new edition received considerable additions; so that "Burn's Justice" became a standard book. He also compiled the "Ecclesiastical Law," a book of merit, for which he was made chancellor of Carlisle. Dr. Burn likewise wrote part of the history of his native county. He was born at Winton, Westmoreland, 1720; p. at his vicarage, 1785.—His only son, John Burn, was bred to the law, which he did not follow, though calculated to shine in it, as appears from the additions made by him to his father's "Justice of the Peace." p. 1802.

BURNES, Sir Alexander, burns, a Scotch officer, who served with distinction in India, and surveyed the mouths of the Indus and mapped the lower parts of its course. He made a journey by Balk and Bokhara across central India, full of peril, for which he received the gold medal of the Royal Geographical Society, and the royal premium of fifty guineas. The French Geographical Society also awarded him their silver medal. These honours were conferred during a visit to this country in 1833-4. In 1835 he again embarked for India, and having been engaged in several missions of importance, was knighted in 1833. In 1839 he was appointed political resident at Cabul, which office he held until the breaking out of the insurrection in that city, when, with his brother Charles and some others, he was slain. p. at Montrose, 1805; murdered at Cabul, 1841.

BURNET, Gilbert, bur'-net, an eminent divine, who, in 1661, went to Holland, where he studied the Hebrew language, and on his return was ordained and presented to the living of Saltoun. He subsequently became bishop of Salisbury, and is known principally by his "History of the Reformation," and by that of "His own Times." p. at Edinburgh, 1613; p. 1715. He was interred in the church of St. James, Clerkwell. Besides the above, he published an excellent treatise on "Pastoral Care," and several sermons. The "History of his own Times" appeared in 1724, and is very entertaining, though far from being impartial. The bishop possessed many virtues, although somewhat vain and credulous.

BURNET, John, a Scotch engraver and writer on art, who was a student with Wilkie in the Trustees' Academy at Edinburgh, and was first brought into notice by the excellent manner in which he engraved his friend's picture of the "Jew's Harp." His next work was the "Blind Fiddler," which was followed by "The Rent-day," "The Rabbit on the Wall," "The Chelsea Pensioners," and several others. The writings of Mr. Burnet are, a "Practical Treatise on Painting," "Hints on Composition," "On Light and Shade," "On Colour," and several other more elaborate works, which are illustrated by numerous engravings, drawn and BURNETT, Gilbert Thomas, author of the "Outlines of Botany," published in 1833, and a distinguished lecturer on that science, was born in Marylebone, on the 15th of April, 1800. He was originally educated for the medical profession, but adopted the study of botany, of which he was professor at several metropolitan institutions, and was a most fluent, graceful, and successful lecturer. d. 1835, of pulmonary consumption.

BURNBY, Charles, bur'-ne, Mus. Doc., commenced his musical studies at Chester, under Mr. Baker, who was organist of the cathedral of that city. His talents were further developed under the instructions of the celebrated Dr. Arne, in conjunction with whom he subsequently composed the music of three pieces for the theatre of Drury Lane. These were entitled "Alfred," "Robin Hood," and "Queen Mab." He brought forward some other pieces on the stage, and, in 1769, received the degree of Doctor of Music from Oxford university. In 1770 he travelled on the continent to procure materials for his "General History of Music," which appeared in 4 volumes, between 1776 and 1789. He wrote several other works, and contributed most of the musical articles to Rees's Cyclopædia, for which he received £1000. In 1806 he was granted a pension of £300 a-year, and in 1810 was elected a member of the Institute of France. b. at Shrewsbury, 1726; d. at Chelsea College, 1814.

BURNBY, Frances. (See D'ARBLAY, MADAME.)

BURNS, Robert, burns, the national Poet of Scotland, was the son of a small farmer settled in Ayrshire. He received a common education, during the progress of which he was employed in rustic labour. By application, however, he added to his mental acquirements some knowledge of the French language and of mathematics, besides cultivating an acquaintance with a few of the English poets. On the death of his father, he went into partnership with his brother Gilbert in a small farm, in which he was unsuccessful. An illicit amour at the same time rendered his circumstances still more perplexing, and he was about to emigrate to the West Indies, when the publication of a volume of his poems was suggested to him. This appeared in 1786, at Kilmarnock, and had a wonderful success. The poems were in the popular language of his country, and on subjects familiar to the common people. Dr. Blacklock, of Edinburgh, was charmed with the genius exhibited in them, and invited Burns to that city. His reception there was triumphant, and a new edition of his poems produced him £500. He then commenced again as a farmer, and obtained a place in the excise, before which, however, he married the young woman whose affections he had won, and whose personal charms he has celebrated in the beautiful song entitled "Bonnie Jean." The union of his occupations as excise-officer and farmer, however, only served to embarrass him, and at last he settled in Dumfries as an exciseman only. Here his habits of conviviality are alleged to have led him too frequently into excesses, as unworthy of his great genius as they were destructive of that independent manliness of character which he had ever endeavoured to cultivate, maintain, and advocate.

He still continued to write, however, and kept up his correspondence with numerous friends and admirers. Many of his letters are as remarkable for the vigour of their style of composition as for the originality of the sentiments which they contain. b. in the parish of Alloway, near Ayr, 1759; d. 1796.—Byron, whose genius and history in many points have a striking resemblance to those of Burns, declares that the Scottish poet was the "very first of his art." An edition of his poems and letters appeared in 1800, in 4 vols. 8vo, under the management of Dr. Currie, of Liverpool, which produced above £1000 for the benefit of his family. The works of Burns have been many times reprinted, and are universally read in Scotland, and wherever Scotchmen are to be found. Indeed, there is not a cottage in his native land in which Burns's poems do not find a place beside the family Bible; and scarcely a Scotch "lassie" who does not lighten her daily labours by singing his songs. Monuments to his memory also exist in many parts of the country—on the banks of the Doon, Ayrshire, at Edinburgh, Dumfries, Glasgow, and several other places.

BURNITT, Elihu, bur'-rit, an American linguist, whose father was a village shoemaker, and he himself a blacksmith. He had a great facility, however, in the acquirement of languages, and whilst serving his apprenticeship to his trade, he laboured at self-instruction, and made considerable progress in the Latin and French languages. When his term of apprenticeship had expired, he had six months' education at the school of his brother, where he made further advancement in these languages, and also gained some knowledge of the mathematics. On returning to his trade he assiduously pursued his studies, and made himself acquainted with the Hebrew, Greek, Syriac, Spanish, Bohemian, Polish, and Danish languages. In 1842 he translated some of the Icelandic Sagas, and contributed to the "American Eclectic Review" translations from the Samaritan, Arabic, and Hebrew. In 1843 he commenced the study of the Persian, Turkish, and Ethiopic languages, and, in the following year, started a newspaper called the "Christian Citizen." Since then he has edited several journals, and lectured throughout Europe and America, endeavouring to form a "League of Universal Brotherhood," and establish an ocean penny postage. He has also produced several works advocating these schemes, and others of a kindred nature. b. at New Britain, Connecticut, United States, 1811.

BURTON, Robert, bur'-ton, an English writer, who became a student of Christ-church, and was presented first to the vicarage of St. Thomas's, Oxford, and next to the rectory of Segrave, in Leicestershire. Here he wrote his "Anatomy of Melancholy," a work which those who have not read may felicitate themselves in having yet an intellectual feast in store for them. It is the only book that ever took Dr. Johnson two hours out of his bed before he wished to rise. It supplied Sterne with much of his wit, and Byron declares "it is the most amusing and instructive medley of quotations and classical anecdotes he ever perused." d. at Lindley, Leicestershire, 1578; d. at Oxford, in 1640. Burton was a believer in astrology, and it is said that he predicted he would die on or about the day when that event occurred.

THE DICTIONARY

Bunton

BUNTON, John Hill, an historian, biographer, and writer on law, political economy, &c., was born at Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1800, and was educated for the Scottish bar, but scarcely ever practised. He wrote extensively in the "Westminster" and "Edinburgh Reviews," "Blackwood's Magazine," &c.; and is the author of "Life and Correspondence of David Hume," "Lives of Simon Lord Lovat, and Duncan Forbes of Culloden," "Political and Social Economy," "A Manual of the Laws of Scotland," "The Scottish Bankruptcy Laws," "Introduction to the Works of Jeremy Bentham," a "History of Scotland from the Revolution to the Extinction of the Last Jacobite Insurrection;" and is engaged upon an elaborate "History of Scotland from the Earliest Period to the Revolution of 1706." His last published work, which appeared in the present century.

BUNTON, Richard Francis, an officer of the Indian army, skilled in languages, who has travelled through a great part of Arabia and Africa, having accompanied Captain Speke in the journey in which that officer discovered the equatorial African lake, Victoria Nyanza. In 1861 he was appointed consul at Fernando Po; and, in 1864, undertook a mission to the King of Dahomey. In 1867 he was appointed to a consulship in Brazil, and has explored a great part of the interior of that country. b. in Ireland, 1821.—Captain Burton has written accounts of his various travels and missions.

BUSCHETTO, da Dulichio, bosc-ket-to, a Greek architect, who built the cathedral at Pisa, where he died, and had a monument erected to his memory. Lived in the 11th century.

BUTE, John Stuart, Earl of, bute, an English statesman, who was indebted for the honours which were showered upon him rather to the dignity of his manners than the splendour of his talents. "Bute is a fine showy man," said Frederick, Prince of Wales, who died in 1751, "and would make an excellent ambassador in any court where there is no business." On the accession of George III., in 1760, however, he became a privy councillor and groom of the stole. In the following year he was made a secretary of state. In 1763 he became first lord of the Treasury, and was made a knight of the Garter. After effecting the termination of the war by the peace of Paris, he resigned in 1763; so that his administration did not last a year; yet he had managed to render himself so unpopular in that time, that he thus wrote to a friend, stating his reason for drawing his reign of power so soon to a close:—"Single in a cabinet of my own forming, no soul in the House of Lords to support me except two peers (Lords Denbigh and Pomfret), both the secretaries of state silent, and the lord chief justice, whom I brought myself into office, voting for me, yet speaking against me,—the ground I tread upon is so hollow, that I am afraid of not only falling myself, but of involving my royal master in my ruin. It is time for me to retire." b. 1713; d. in London, 1792.

BUTLER, Samuel, but-ler, a celebrated English poet, who for some time resided with Sir Samuel Luke, in Bedfordshire, a gentleman very zealous in behalf of the Covenant and puritanical principles. Here he became acquainted with the characters of the leading men of that party, and formed the plan of his famous poem "Hudibras," the principal person of which was, unquestionably, Sir Samuel. The idea of this inimitable production, which gives so faithful a picture of the cant and hypocrisy of his times, was taken generally from "Don Quixote;" but the humour and the poetry are wholly Butler's; and in these he stands unrivalled. After the Restoration, Butler became secretary to the earl of Carberry, who appointed him steward of the court held at Ludlow Castle. About this time also he married Mrs. Herbert, a lady of family but whose fortune was lost to him by being invested in bad securities. It is said that, although Butler lived in good society he was suffered to die in extreme indigence. b. at Strensham, Worcestershire, 1612; d. in London, 1680, and was buried in St. Paul's church, Covent Garden. In 1721, Alderman Barber, the printer, erected a monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

BUTLER, Joseph, a learned prelate, who, in 1736, was made clerk of the closet to Queen Caroline, who delighted much in his conversation. Two years afterwards he was preferred to the bishopric of Bristol, and, in a short time, was made dean of St. Paul's, on which he resigned the rectory of Stanhope. In 1746 he was appointed clerk of the closet to the king, and, in 1750, elevated to the see of Durham. b. at Wantage, Berkshire, 1692; d. at Bath, 1752.—The great work of Butler is entitled "The Analogy of Religion, Natural and Revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature." This treatise is a masterpiece of reasoning,—clear, profound, simple, yet grand.

BUXTON, Sir Thomas Fowell, bux-ton, the distinguished advocate of the abolition of slavery, was born on the 1st of April, 1786, at Earls Colne, Essex, the residence of his father, Thomas Fowell Buxton, who died while his family were all young. The future philanthropist was educated by Dr. Charles Burney, brother of Madame D'Arbury, at Greenwich, and afterwards at the university of Dublin. He entered Parliament in 1818, for Weymouth, and took a leading part in the debates of the House of Commons on prison discipline, the abolition of lotteries, and the amelioration of the criminal code. In 1823, Mr. Buxton introduced a motion condemning slavery as "repugnant to the principles of the British constitution and Christianity," and in 1833, took a prominent position in the debates on the motion of Mr. Stanley (now Earl of Derby) for the abolition of slavery. In 1837 he lost his seat for Weymouth, having represented the borough for twenty years; and would never afterwards allow himself to be put in nomination for that or any other place. He was made a baronet in 1840; and died in 1845, leaving behind him the reputation of having been one of the principal promoters of the abolition of slavery in the British colonies, as well as that of a most benevolent and generous man. He was tall and commanding in person, and had a singularly fine and pleasing expression of countenance. He was a member of the great brewing firm of Truman, Hanbury, and Buxton, and immensely rich.

BYNG, George, bing, Viscount Torrington, and a brave English admiral, entered the navy early in life, and after passing through different ranks of his profession, was, in 1703, made a rear-admiral. In 1715, George I. created him a baronet. In 1717, an invasion being intended by Sweden, in favour of the Pretender, he was sent into the Baltic, where he remained till that project was abandoned. In 1718 he was appointed commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, where he defeated the Spanish fleet, off Sicily. For this victory he had the honour to receive letters of thanks from George I., the emperor Charles, and the queen of Denmark. It was owing to his exertions that Sicily was saved from the Spaniards, and he displayed as much skill as a politician and negotiator as he did valour and prudence as a commander. In 1721 he was created Viscount Torrington, and knight of the Bath. He was afterwards appointed first lord of the Admiralty, which office he held till his death. B. in Kent, 1683; D. 1733.

Byng, John, an English admiral, son of the above. He served under his father in most of his expeditions, and was always esteemed a good seaman and brave man. He was sent in 1756 to relieve Minorca, then besieged by the French, under the Marquis de la Galissonnière; but after a partial action he was forced to bear away, and the place was taken. On this account the public clamour rose high against the ministry, who had not supplied him with a properly-manned fleet, but who, in order to save themselves, threw a great part of the blame upon Byng, and caused him to be tried by a court-martial. He was sentenced to be shot, though the court recommended him to mercy, which, however, was not granted, and he suffered with great fortitude at Portsmouth, March 14, 1757. B. in Kent, 1704.

Byron, John, bi-ron, an English poet, who wrote the beautiful pastoral to Phoebe in the "Spectator," and the letters in the same work signed "John Shadow." He supported himself chiefly by teaching shorthand, of which he wrote an improved system. In 1724 he was elected fellow of the Royal Society. B. at Kersal, near Manchester, 1691; D. at Manchester, 1763.

Byron, the Hon. John, bi-ron, a distinguished British admiral, and the grandfather of the illustrious poet, sailed round the world in the years 1764, 1765, and 1766, and encountered some severe storms off the coast of Patagonia. In 1769 he was appointed governor of Newfoundland, and in 1778 commanded the fleet destined to serve in the West Indies. B. 1723; D. in London, 1786.—It is in allusion to the sufferings of this seaman in his enterprises, that the poet thus sings in the second canto of his "Don Juan":—

"—His sufferings were comparative
To those related in my grandad's narrative."

Byron, George Gordon, Lord, was the only child of Captain John Byron, of the Guards, and Miss Catherine Gordon, of Gight, in Aberdeenshire. It was in the reign of Henry VIII., on the dissolution of the monasteries, that the church and priory of Newstead, with the lands adjoining, were conferred upon one of his ancestors. The fortunate recipient was "Sir John Byron the Little, with the great beard." The poet was weakly proud of his ancestry, and said that he would rather be the descendant of those Byrons who accompanied William the Conqueror into England than the author of "Childe Harold" and "Manfred." Such is the extent of human folly in its admiration of titles conferred without intellectual distinction! In 1807 he published his "Hours of Idleness," a volume of juvenile effusions, which were severely criticized in the "Edinburgh Review." Two years later appeared his reply, with the title of "English-Bards and Scotch-Reviewers," a satire, which obtained immediate celebrity, although its merit is far inferior to the efforts of both Dryden and Pope in the same path. Byron afterwards calls it himself "a miserable second of misanthropy."

gave the world the fruits of his travels in the first two cantos of "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage." The effect of this poem was electric, and "Childe Harold" became the theme of every tongue. In 1815 he married Miss Anne Isabella, the only daughter of Sir Ralph Milbank, with whom he received £10,000. Dissipation on his part, and, perhaps, an utter absence of congeniality of feeling and sentiment between them, soon parted the poet and his young wife. She returned to her father's in the January of 1818. Ada, afterwards countess of Lovelace, was the only offspring of this unhappy union. In April, 1816, Byron left his country with the avowed intention of never seeing it again. After travelling through a great portion of the continent, he took up his abode in Venice, then at Pisa, and then passed a short time in Genoa. Meanwhile his pen was in continual exercise. Writing had become such a habit with him, that he could not be idle; and the activity as well as the splendour of his genius was such, that nothing could restrain the strength and magnificence of its flight. During this period he produced "The Corsair," "The Giaour," "The Siege of Corinth," "The Bride of Abydos," "Parisina," "Deppo," "Mazeppa," "Manfred," "Cain," a Mystery, "The Lament of Tasso," cantos III. and IV. of "Childe Harold," and many more effusions, as remarkable for the beauty of their diction as the originality by which they are all more or less characterized. He also continued to issue cantos of his "Don Juan," which, notwithstanding its moral defects, is the most wonderful of all his poems. At the end of December, 1823, he sailed for Cephalonia, to take part with the Greeks in the cause of their independence. He reached Missolonghi on January 10, 1824. On February 15, he was seized with a convulsive fit, which rendered him both senseless and speechless for some time. On April 9 he got wet, took cold, and fevered, on the 11th he got worse, on the 14th he was in danger, and on the 19th he died.

"So sinks the day-star in his ocean bed."

Byron was only thirty-six years and three months old. B. in Holles-street, Cavendish-square, London, 1783; D. at Missolonghi, 1824.

C

CABANIS, Pierre-Jean-Georges, ka-ba-ne, a French philosopher, physician, littérateur, and politician, was born at Cosnac in 1757. His education was somewhat desultory, and although he selected medicine as his profession, he never practised it as an art, devoting himself rather to investigations into the theories and principles of medicine. At the beginning of the French revolution, he attached himself to Mirabeau, with whom he was on intimate terms, and whom he aided in carrying out his doctrines. He was also the friend of Condorcet, to whom on the night of his arrest, he administered, at his own request, poison, in order to save him from the scaffold. A collection of Condorcet's works was made by him, and he afterwards became the husband of Marshal Grouchy's sister Charlotte, the sister-in-law of Condorcet. During the Reign of Terror, Cabanis attached himself to one of the Parisian hospitals, where he had opportunities of serving, and often of saving, the victims of the proscription. He was named professor in the central school of health in 1795, in 1796 was elected a member of the Institute, and in 1793 was a representative of the people in the Council of Five Hundred. His health, however, which had always been delicate, broke down; he had several attacks of apoplexy, one of which carried him off in May, 1805, in his 52nd year. His writings are very numerous, and on a variety of subjects; but it is by his medical works, and especially the "Traité du Physique et du Morale de l'Homme" that he is best known, and which has run through several editions. In early life, Cabanis enjoyed the friendship of Madame Helvetius, and at her house met Furgot, Diderot, D'Alembert, Condillae, &c.

CABARRUS, Francisco, Count de, káb'-ár-roo, an eminent Spanish financier, began life as a merchant, was afterwards director of a bank, was employed in the public service by Charles III. and IV., and, finally, was appointed minister of finance under Joseph Bonaparte, which office he held till his death. b. 1752; d. 1810.

CABEL, Adrian van der, ka'-bail, an eminent Dutch painter, whose landscapes and cattle are held in high estimation. b. at Ryswick, 1631; d. 1695.

CABESTAN, or CABESTAING, William de, ka'-bes ta, a Provençal poet, whose fate was remarkable. He served the wife of Raymond de Rousillon, and became so great a favourite of that lady as to excite the jealousy of her husband, who killed him, and tore out his heart. The barbarian caused this signal of his cruelty to be dressed and served up to his wife. After she had eaten it, he informed her what it was, on which she died of grief and horror. Lived in the 12th and the 13th century.—This shocking incident has frequently been made the subject of ballads and legendary tales.

CABET, Etienne, ka'-bai, a leader of the French Communists, was trained to the bar, but failing to obtain sufficient practice, adopted the profession of a littérateur, and for several years conducted "The Journal of Jurisprudence." His ultra-democratic principles, however, led him into difficulties, and in 1834 he was condemned to two years' imprisonment for some strictures upon the conduct of the king. In 1842 he published his "Voyage en Icarie," in which he unfolded his socialist views, and found many to embrace them. He obtained a grant of land in Texas, and in 1847 a goodly number of his followers embarked for this land of promise, which their own fervid imaginations had too fondly pictured to themselves. It was soon found, however, that the new Canaan was not filled with milk and honey, and they were compelled to quit the country. They wandered through the United States, and hearing of the city of Nauvoo, which had been abandoned by the Mormons, on the banks of the Mississippi, Cabet took possession of it. In 1850 he returned to Paris, but Louis Napoleon's coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1852, caused him to again repair to America. b. at Dijon, 1788; d. at St. Louis, Missouri, 1856.

CABOCHU, Simon, ka'b'-oozh, one of the chiefs of the butchers of Paris during their adherence to the duke of Burgundy, in the wars between him and the Armagnacs, in the beginning of the 15th century. Cabochu is believed to have perished when the power of the butchers was destroyed through the agency of William Cîrassé, a carpenter.

CABOT, Sebastian, káb'-ot, a celebrated navigator, whose father was likewise a navigator and a mathematician, and with whom, before he was twenty, he made several voyages. In 1497 Newfoundland is said to have been discovered, and the coasts of Labrador and Florida visited by the Cabots. In 1512 Sebastian entered the service of Ferdinand of Spain, and was planning a voyage by the north-west passage to Asia in 1515, which was cut short by Ferdinand's death in 1516. He commanded an expedition to Labrador sent out by Henry VIII. in 1517, which was a failure; then re-entered the Spanish service, and explored the coasts of Brazil and La Plata, holding a commission as pilot-major of Spain till 1543, when he returned to England, and, as some say, settled in his native city. Edward VI., to whom he was introduced by the duke of Somerset, the lord protector, delighted in his conversation, and allowed him a pension of £166 13s. 4d., as grand pilot of England. A new company, called Merchant Adventurers, had been formed, and Sebastian was placed at the head of it. By his means a voyage was made to the north in 1552, and a trade commenced with Russia, which gave rise to the Russian Company. b. at Bristol, 1477; d. 1557.—In "Hæckluyt's Collection" are his instructions for the direction of a voyage to Cathay. He was the first who noticed the variation of the compass, and wrote "Navigazione nelle Parti Settentrionali," Venice, 1533, folio.

CABRAL, or CABREIRA, Pedro Alvares, ka'-bral, a Portuguese navigator, who, in 1500, commanded the fleet sent to the East Indies by Emanuel, king of Portugal. In this voyage he accidentally discovered Brazil, being driven by a storm on its coast, where he landed, and called the spot Santa Cruz. Thence he crossed to the coast of Africa, and afterwards proceeded to Calicut, where he engaged in a war with the Zamorin, whom he forced to comply with his terms. In 1501 he returned to Portugal richly laden, after which his history ceases to have any interest. b. about 1526.

CABREIRA, Don Ramon, ka'-brair'-a, one of the most prominent Carlist leaders in the recent history of Spain, first became known to fame in 1834. In that year he concerted measures with Don Carlos for the promotion of his cause, to advance which he committed cruelties to a degree far beyond such as we have been accustomed to see exercised by the most stern of partisan chiefs. The opposite party, or the upholders of Queen Christina, were incensed to ungovernable wrath against him; and as they were unable to lay their hands on him, they seized his mother, and sentenced her to be shot. The sentence was carried into effect, when Cabrera commanded the wives of thirty officers to be massacred, and the war became one of the most atrocious kind. He continued it with success for several years. The political changes which subsequently took place drove him, in 1840, to seek refuge in France; but in 1848 he returned to recommence the war in Spain. In 1849 he was forced to fly to France again, after which he came to England, where he married, and removed to Naples. The last time he was publicly heard of was as having instigated an attempt at insurrection made by General Ortega, in April, 1860, but which was entirely abortive. b. at Tortosa, 1810.

CABRILLO, Juan Rodriguez, kab'-ril-lo, a Portuguese navigator, who, while in the service of Spain, discovered the islands of Santa Cruz, Santa Rosa, and San Bernardo. d. on the last named island about 1543.

CACCIA, Guglielmo, kawt'-che-a, a celebrated Piedmontese artist, and the best painter of his time, in fresco. His finest efforts in fresco are shown in the church of Sant' Antonio Abate, at Milan, and in San Paolo, at Novara. In San Gaudenzio, at Novara, is to be seen his "Descent from the Cross," which is considered his master-piece, in oil. b. at Montabone, near Casale, in 1568; d. 1625.—Caccia was usually called Moncalvo, from the place where he resided. He had two daughters, who excelled in painting, the elder of whom, Orsola, was the founder of the Conservatorio delle Orsoline, or Ursulines, in Moncalvo. Her paintings are marked with a flower. Those of Francesca, the younger daughter, were indicated by a bird.

CACCINI, Giulio, kawt'-che-ne, an Italian musician, one of the earliest composers who introduced a musical element into the drama. b. at Rome about 1546; died about 1610.

CADÉ, John, kaid, an Irishman, commonly called "Jack Cade," who, in 1450, headed an insurrection in Kent, and on the 17th of June, with many followers, encamped at Blackheath. He assumed the name of Mortimer, and gave out that he was the rightful heir to the throne, pretending that he was a bastard relation of the duke of York. He defeated a detachment of the king's forces which had been brought against him at Sevenoaks, and re-encamped on Blackheath. On the 1st of July he entered London, and with his sword struck the old London stone and exclaimed, "Now is Mortimer lord of this city." His followers, on the third day after his entrance, began to plunder the city, and he himself, it is said, robbed the very house in which he had dined. Measures were now taken to expel the rebels, and a pardon offered to those who would return to their homes. This had the desired effect. The followers of Cade melted away, and he fled on horseback to Lewes, in Sussex. Here he was killed by one Alexander Iden, on the 11th of July, and his head transported to London, and stuck upon the old bridge.—Lived in the 15th century. For a humorous scene suggested by the adventure of "Jack Cade," we refer the reader to the second scene in Act 4, of the Second Part of Shakspeare's "King Henry VI."

CABELL, William, kai'-del, an eminent London bookseller and publisher, was born at Bristol, in 1742, afterwards became partner of Mr. Andrew Millar, of London, whom he succeeded as sole partner in 1767. He was associated with Strahan, the printer, and produced works by Johnson, Hume, Robinson, Warburton, Blackstone, Gibbon, and other eminent authors. d. 1802.

CADMUS, kad'-mus, son of Agenor, king of Phœnicia, is believed to have been the first to introduce the use of letters into Greece from Phœnicia. d. about 1432 B.C.

Cadoudal

CADMUS, the Milesian, was the first Greek who wrote history in prose. He composed the history of Ionia, which is lost. Lived in the 6th century B.C.

CADOC, commonly called the Wise, kai'-dok, a bard, and the first who collected the British proverbs together. There are some churches dedicated to him in South Wales. Flourished in the 6th century.

CADOGAN, William, ka-dug'-an, the first earl of Cadogan, was trained to a military life, and rose, by merit, to the rank of brigadier-general, in which capacity he greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Blenheim, fought 1704. He took part in most of the battles in which the duke of Marlborough gained his renown; and succeeded that great general as commander-in-chief, and master of the ordnance. d. 1726.

CADOGAN, Henry, a British military officer, who gained great distinction in the Peninsular war. He was lieutenant-colonel of the 71st light infantry, which he mainly raised in Glasgow, and the greater part of whom, when enlisted, were little more than boys. At the head of this regiment he took part in most of the leading engagements in the Spanish campaigns of Wellington. He carried the heights of La Puebla, in the battle of Vittoria, with his own regiment and a battalion of general Walker's brigade, but was mortally wounded in the charge, and died before the conclusion of the engagement, which he continued to watch with the utmost enthusiasm until the moment of his death. He was highly commended by Lord Wellington for his conduct on this occasion, and a monument, portraying the scene of his death, was erected to his memory in St. Paul's, at the public expense. Colonel Cadogan was the first who introduced the game of cricket into Scotland, at which he was in the habit of playing with his young soldiers, with the view of rendering them active and agile in their movements. His was a daring, fiery, and intrepid spirit, and he had the happy knack of inspiring his men by some pithy allusion to scenes or circumstances familiar to them at home. It is told of him, for instance, that being on one occasion like to be worsted in an attack on the French posted in a Spanish town, the main street of which bore a resemblance to the great east-end thoroughfare of Glasgow, he called upon his men to "drive the villains down the Gallowgate"—an allusion to their native haunt, most of the 71st having been born in the street named or its neighbourhood. The effect was electrical: with a cheer, they charged, and, at the point of the bayonet, carried all before them.

CADAMOSTO, Luigi, kaw-da-mos'-to, a Venetian navigator, engaged in the service of the king of Portugal. In 1455 he sailed to the Canary Islands, and thence to the coast of Africa, where, it is said, he discovered the Cape Verde Islands. b. 1432; d. at Venice, 1480. He left an account of his voyages, which was afterwards published.

CADOUDAL, Georges, ka-doo'-dal, a distinguished Chouan chief, who, after vainly endeavouring to restore the Bourbons, made his peace, in 1800, with general Brune, dispersed his troops, and went to London. Having declared a strong personal hatred to the First Consul of France, he was accused by the French government of being the planner of the infernal machine with which the assassination of General

Bonaparte was attempted. About the same time the count d'Artois, afterwards Charles X., gave him, with his own hand, the cordon rouge, in the king's name. In 1802 he united himself with Pichegru to overthrow the French government, and, in the following year, made his way secretly to Paris, where he lay concealed for six months, waiting the dénouement of events that would enable him to carry out his design. Meanwhile, the police of Paris were on his track, and on the 4th of March, 1804, he was taken in a cabriolet near the Luxembourg. In the struggle which ensued at his capture, he wounded one man and killed another. n. 1771, near Auray, Lower Brittany; d. on the scaffold, 1804. The character of this resolute chief was highly estimated by Napoleon I. "In my hands," said he, "Cadoudal would have done great things."

CADWALADRY, kād-wāl-a-dīr, son of Cadwallan ab Cadvan, succeeded to the nominal sovereignty of Britain in 600; but, disheartened with the progress of the Saxons, he went to Rome in 636, where he died in 703. With him ceased the title of king of the Britons.

CADWALADRY CESAIR, a Welsh poet, many of whose pieces yet remain in manuscript. There was another of the same name and age, whose works are to be met with, but unpublished. Both flourished in the 16th century.

CADWALLON, kād-wāl-lon, prince of North Wales, who, being defeated by Edwin, king of Northumberland, went to Ireland in 620, and remained there several years. On his return he assumed the title of king of the Britons, which he supported through a series of years of continual warfare against the Saxons. He was a great patron of the bards, and in his youth had been admitted among them. He died in 680, and was succeeded by his son, Cadwaladry.

CADWGAN, kād-gan, son of Bleddyn ab Cynvyn, became prince of a part of Powys in 1073, and, for some time, had part of South Wales. In 1107 he gave a banquet at Aberteivi, which almost ruined him, on account of his son Owain being captivated with the charms of Nest, the wife of Gerald, whom he carried off. In consequence of this, both he and his father were obliged to fly to Ireland. He returned the year after, but was assassinated by his nephew in 1110.

CÆCILIUS, or Cæcilins, stātus, se-sil'-e-us, a Roman slave, who yet was a poet, and writer of comedies. He is, indeed, called by Cicero the first of comic poets; and he is also mentioned with commendation by Varro, Horace, and others. He is said to have written about forty dramas, of which, however, only a few lines have been preserved in quotations. d. about 163 b.c.

CÆDMON, seed'-mon, the reputed father of English song, and the first metrical author in our vernacular language. His composition is a kind of religious hymn, celebrating the praises of the Creator, and is preserved in the translation of Dede by Alfred. Besides this there is a long Saxon poem attributed to him, but upon doubtful authority. It is supposed to be a later production, and was published by the Society of Antiquaries, in 8vo, 1832. It consists of a paraphrase of some parts of the Scriptures. Flourished in the 7th century, and died about 680.

CÆSALPINUS, Andreas, se-sal'-pe-noos, a distinguished Italian naturalist, who is said to have been the first to hint at the circulation of the blood. His favourite study, however, was botany, on which he wrote extensively. He had an excellently-arranged herbarium, which is still preserved in the museum of natural history at Florence. b. at Aresz, 1519; d. 1603.

CÆSAR, Caius Julius, se-zar, was descended from the Julian family, and lost his father when young. He married the daughter of Cinna, and was designed for the priesthood to Jupiter, but was deprived who was Cinna's inveterate enemy. Sylla carried his revenge so far as to confiscate the property of Cæsar, and even issued a proscription against him, when he retired from the capital and went to reside with Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. On the death of Sylla he was recalled to Rome, when he distinguished himself as an orator in impeaching Dolabella for misgovernment in the affairs of Greece. He now joined the party of Marius, and united with Cicero in promoting the Manilian law, which gained him the friendship of Pompey. The first dignity he obtained was that of military tribune, after which he served the offices of quaestor and ædile. In these offices his profusion procured him great popularity, but at the sacrifice of his fortune, which was much embarrassed by them. On the death of his wife Cornelia, he married Pompeia, from whom he obtained a divorce, on account of her receiving Clodius into her house at the time of celebrating the rites of the Bona Dea. He did not, however, prosecute Clodius; and when asked why he had dismissed Pompeia, his answer was, that "Cæsar's wife should be above suspicion." On the expiration of his prætorship he was appointed governor of the farther Spain, where he realized sufficient property to pay his debts, which are said to have amounted to a million and a half sterling. He now formed the "first triumvirate" with Pompey and Crassus; the former of whom married his daughter Julia, and he himself married Calpurnia, daughter of L. Calpurnius Piso, and shortly afterwards set out for Gaul. Here he distinguished himself as a military commander, and, in the fourth year of his government, crossed over to Britain, but did little more than reconnoitre the coast. On his next expedition he entered the Thames, and ravaged a great part of the country, taking several of the inhabitants as hostages. Having completely reduced Gaul to the condition of a Roman province, and acquired prodigious wealth, Pompey became jealous of him, and the senate deprived him of his government. This being considered by him as a declaration of war, he crossed the Rubicon, a small river which parted Cisalpine Gaul from Italy, with a determination of revenging himself upon his enemies. His army was zealously attached to him, and success attended him everywhere on his march. Rome was filled with fear and confusion. Pompey and the magistrates withdrew on his approach, when Cæsar entered the metropolis without his troops, in an affected style of moderation; yet he seized the public treasury, which enabled him to complete the subjugation of the people. The civil war which had begun, now raged with fury throughout the empire. Cæsar, however, by himself or his lieutenants, was everywhere triumphant, except in his blockade of Dyrrachium, where Pompey gained an advantage, and whence he retired to Macedonia, followed by that general, whom he defeated on the plains of Pharsalia. He next embarked for Alexandria, where the head of Pompey being brought to him, he burst into tears, and caused it to be solemnly interred. Here he entered into a war with Ptolemy, in which the famous Alexandrian library, containing 400,000 volumes, was accidentally destroyed. This war was attended with various success, but Caesar's good fortune prevailed; the Egyptians were defeated, and Ptolemy was drowned. On the news of the death of Pompey, the Roman senate proclaimed Caesar consul for five years, and created him dictator; thus placing the executive power in his hands. He next conquered Pharnaces, the son of Mithridates the Great, in Asia Minor; on which occasion he wrote his well-known laconic letter, "Veni, vidi, vici,"—"I came, I saw, I conquered." After settling the affairs of Greece, he proceeded to Rome, where he showed his clemency, by pardoning all who had conspired against him in his absence. He next made an expedition into Africa, in the course of which he displayed his usual address in quelling a mutiny which had broken out in his favourite legion. In this war he defeated Scipio, Labienus, and Juba, and drove Cato to the extremity of putting himself to death at Utica. On his return to Rome he behaved with great liberality to the people, and enacted several good laws. Among other reforms which he introduced was that of the calendar, which bears the name of the Julian calendar. The two sons of Pompey having excited a revolt in Spain, Caesar marched against them, and after a bloody battle succeeded in completing the subjugation of that country. His return to Rome was crowned with a triumph. He now assumed the imperial dignity, which roused the jealousy of several of his friends, who joined with the republicans in a conspiracy against his life. It is recorded of him, that a soothsayer bade him beware of the ides of March, and that his wife, Calpurnia, was so apprehensive that danger awaited him, as to dissuade him from going to meet the senate. The remonstrances, however, of Decimus Brutus, one of the conspirators, overruled his reluctance, and Caesar went to the senate-house, where he was assassinated, 43 B.C. B. 100 B.C.—Thus fell Julius Caesar, one of the greatest men of antiquity. His talents were of the first order; and he might have shone as an orator if he had devoted himself to that profession, as Cicero himself acknowledges. His literary powers appear to great advantage in his Commentaries, written in the true spirit of historical dignity and faithfulness. Some of his epistles are extant among those of Cicero.

CÆSARIUS, se-zo'-re-us, a celebrated French bishop, who, in 472, was appointed to the see of Arles, and was distinguished by his labours to restore the discipline of the clergy, his efforts to accomplish which led to his being charged with treachery to the king, and also to his temporary banishment. He presided over several councils, the most remarkable of which was held at Orange, in 529, when Pelagianism was formally condemned. Several of his homilies are preserved among the sermons of St. Augustine, and in Baluze's "Bibliotheca Patrum," B. 470; D. 544.

CAFFA, Melchior, kawf'-fa, an able sculptor and designer. He adorned many churches at Rome with his works, which occasioned him to be compared to the celebrated Bernini. B. at Malta. 1631; D. at Rome, 1687.

CAFFA, Philip Joseph, kaf'-fe-o, a Benedictione of the congregation of St. Maur, who wrote, in conjunction with Grenier, the "History of Picardy," and an essay towards a "History of Music," &c.; but his principal work is the "Genealogical Treasure," full of curious researches. B. at Valenciennes, 1712; D. at St. Germain des Près, 1777.

CAGLIARI. (See VERONESE, Paul.)

CAGLIOSTRO, kaf'-yo-stro, a famous impostor, whose real name was Joseph Balsamo; but he assumed the name of Cagliostro, besides other aliases. He left his native country and went to Rome, where he married a young woman as full of deception as himself. His first adventure was the cheating a goldsmith of Palermo out of a considerable sum, under the pretence of discovering to him some hidden treasure. On this occasion he was obliged to quit Sicily. At Messina he became acquainted with a Greek, named Althotas, who pretended to a knowledge of chemistry. With him he visited the Archipelago and Egypt, and, on their return, touched at Malta, where they worked in the laboratory of the grand master, Pinto. Here Althotas died, and Balsamo, going to Naples, assumed the title of Marquis Pellegrini. He now visited some other countries of Europe, and, in France, called himself the Count de Cagliostro; but being implicated with the Cardinal Rohan in the affair of the diamond necklace purchased for the Queen Marie Antoinette, he was sent to the Bastille. In England he met with greater success, pretending to wonderful skill in medicine, and to a knowledge of the occult sciences. At last he returned to Italy, and was seized at Rome, where he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and died in the castle of St. Leon, near Rome, 1795. B. at Palermo, 1743.—Balsamo's deceptions were mostly played upon the opulent and noble, whose credulity he excited by pretensions the most extravagant, and, in several cases, the most impious.

CAGNOLA, Luigi, Marquis, kaw'-yo'-la, an eminent Italian architect, who was intended for the profession of the law, but whose tastes led him to devote himself to quite an opposite kind of study. In 1812 he was engaged by the government of Milan to check the progressive ruin of the sixteen Corinthian columns which form the chief remains of the ancient baths of Maximian. Previous to this, however, he had signalized himself by several designs. In 1807 the first stone was laid of the Arco della Pace, a beautiful and lofty bridge, built of white marble, to celebrate the marriage of the viceroy, Eugene Beauharnais, with the Princess Amelia of Bavaria, in 1808. Political changes put a stop, for some time, to the progress of this work; but it was finally completed by Francis I. of Austria. With the exception of the Arco de l'Etoile at Paris, it is the most magnificent structure of the kind of which modern times can boast. A great many other works, evincing a high order of genius and taste, were executed by Cagnola, who also held some official post in the civil government at Milan. B. at Milan, 1762; D. 1833.

CAGNOLI, Antonio, kaw'-yo'-le, a distinguished Italian astronomer and philosopher, was born at Zante in 1743, where his father held an office under the republic of Verona. Cagnoli was at first attached to the diplomatic service of his country, but devoting himself to astronomy, he erected an observatory, first in the house where he resided in Paris, and afterwards at Verona.

Cahusac

When the French took that town in 1797, his observatory was seriously damaged; but for this he was indemnified by Napoleon, and settled in Modena, where he filled the chair of mathematics in the military school. b. at Verona in 1816. He wrote several valuable works, the most important of which is a treatise on "Plain and Spherical Trigonometry," which was first published in Paris in 1786, and again in 1808. He likewise published "Meteorological Observations," and several papers in the Transactions of the Italian Society, one of which, on the form of the earth, is deserving of attention.

CAHUSAC, Louis de, ka-hoo'-sak, a French writer, who, in 1736, produced his tragedy of "Pharamond," which obtained great success. He was made secretary to the count de Clermont. b. at Montauban, 1700; d. at Paris, 1750.

CAIL, John Francis, kail, a clever French mechanic and engineer, whose factories on the Quai de Billy, Paris, and at Chaillot, Valenciennes, Douai, Brussels, and Amsterdam, have acquired a world-wide celebrity for the excellence of the motive machinery constructed in them. M. Cail is the manufacturer of all the machines used in the various Dutch colonies for the purification of the sugar grown therein, and the locomotive engines used on many of the French and Dutch railways. b. at Douai about 1804.

CAILLE. (See LA CAILLE, Nicholas Louis de.) CAILLEMONT, kail'-mont, an officer who came to England with William III., and served with distinction in Ireland under Schomberg. He made an attack on Charlemont fort, then considered impregnable, but which he so damaged that it was surrendered shortly afterwards. Fell in the battle of the Boyne, 1690, almost at the same moment as the duke of Schomberg.

CAILLET, Guillaume, kail'-lai, nick-named "Jacques Bonhomme," the leader of the Jaquerie, or peasant insurgents, who, in 1353, maddened by want and degradation, rose upon the nobles in the south of France, whose castles they stormed, and committed the most terrible excesses. Troops were sent against them from Bohemia and the Low Countries, and they were finally destroyed by Charles the Bad, king of Navarre, who took prisoner Caillet, the "King of the Jaquerie," as he was called, crowned him with a red-hot iron trivet, and then beheaded him. b. 1359.

CAILLAUD, Frederick, kail'-le-o, a celebrated French geologist, who spent a considerable portion of his time in travelling. After visiting Holland, Italy, Greece, Turkey, and Sicily, he passed into Egypt, and, under the auspices of Mehemet Ali, explored a portion of the Nile. Travelling from Edfon to the Red Sea, he found on Mount Zabarah, the emerald-mines which had been worked in the reigns of the Ptolemies, and was enabled, by his own exertions, to transmit to the pasha ten pounds weight of the precious stones which he found in the vast excavations of the mountain. He visited Thebes, and returned to Paris in 1819; but, before the close of the same year, he once more set out for Egypt, to prosecute his travels. He now visited the remains of the temple of Ammon, other oases in the desert, and subsequently discovered Assour, above the confluence of the Taccasse with the Nile. In 1822 he returned to Paris, and afterwards took up his residence in Nantes. The results of his travels and discoveries have been given to the world in various volumes. b. at Nantes, 1787.

CAIRD, James, kaird, an able writer on agriculture, author of "High Farming," "English Agriculture," &c., was born at Stranraer, in the year 1816, and educated in Edinburgh. He first came into notice by his writings in the "Times" newspaper, when engaged as "agricultural commissioner" by that paper. In 1857 he was elected to the House of Commons for the borough of Dartmouth; and subsequently for Stirling. He is considered a very high authority on all matters connected with the theory and practice of agriculture.

CAIRD, Rev. John, M.A., an eloquent and extremely popular preacher of the Church of Scotland, was born in Greenock in 1823, his father being an engineer in that town. He was educated in Glasgow, and settled as minister at the parish of Errol, Perthshire, in 1850; and is now one of the ministers of Glasgow. In 1855 he happened to preach before the Queen and the late Prince Consort, and the sermon so struck these illustrious persons, that her Majesty ordered it to be printed, which was done under the title of "Religion in Common Life," and produced a very great impression. Mr. Caird enjoys the reputation of being perhaps the most eloquent preacher in the kingdom.

CAIRNS, Rev. John, D.D., kairns, a distinguished minister of the United Presbyterian Church in Scotland, was born of humble but respectable parents, and owes his present position entirely to his talents and unwearied industry. After having passed the usual period of training, he was ordained minister of the Golden Square congregation, Berwick, in the year 1845. Here he has ever since remained, notwithstanding that tempting offers have from time to time been made to him by other congregations. He some years since received the degree of D.D., and is justly regarded as one of the brightest ornaments, not merely of his own denomination, but of the ministerial body of Scotland generally. Dr. Cairns is a voluminous author, the most prominent of his works being, "Translation of Elijah," "German Philosophy and Christian Ethics," "Infallibility of the Bible," several sermons, "Lives of the late Dr. John Brown of Edinburgh, of Dr. Henderson of Galashiels, of Dr. George Wilson," &c. He has also contributed valuable papers to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," "Macmillan's Magazine," the "British Quarterly Review," and other leading periodicals. b. in the parish of Ayton, Berwickshire, August 23, 1818.

CAIRNS, the Rt. Hon. Hugh M'Calmont, Lord, a lawyer of brilliant talent and great debating power, was born at Cultra, in the county of Down, Ireland, in 1810. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and after keeping his terms at the Middle Temple, was called to the bar in 1844. He represented Belfast from 1852 to 1866, having served as solicitor-general under Lord Derby in 1859, when he was knighted. On Lord Derby's return to power in 1866 he became attorney-general, and in 1867 he was made lord-chancellor, and raised to the peerage as Baron Cairns of Garmoyle.

CARIUS, or KAY, John, kai'-us, a physician, who was educated at Gonville-hall, Cambridge, but took his degree of M.D. at Padua, in 1541, where he was Greek lecturer and reader in physics. On his return to England, he was appointed physician to Edward VI., and continued to serve Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth in the same capacity. b. at Norwich, 1510; d. at Cambridge, 1573. He left his estate for erecting Gonville-hall into a college, now called Gonville and Caius, and wrote the "History of Cambridge," and some medical works, which do honour to his learning.

CALAMY, Edmund, kal'-am-e, a celebrated Nonconformist divine, was a native of London, where he was born in 1600. After studying at Cambridge, he was domestic chaplain to the bishop of Ely and vicar of Swaffham Prior, Cambridgeshire. He afterwards held a lectureship at Bury St. Edmunds for ten years. On the publication of Bishop Wren's articles he declared his protest, and left the diocese. He subsequently joined the Presbyterian party, and in 1639 was chosen pastor of a congregation in Aldermanbury, London, where he long enjoyed great popularity as a preacher. He took an active part in the Restoration, being one of the deputation which went to Holland to congratulate Charles II., and was appointed one of the king's chaplains, an office which he held till the passing of the act of uniformity compelled him to resign. He died in 1666. Calamy was reckoned an accomplished theologian, and published several sermons and controversial papers, besides being one of the authors of an answer to Bishop Hall's "Divine Right of Episcopacy." Several of his sons and grandsons were likewise divines, and, with the exception of his son Benjamin, who succeeded him in St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, were all attached to the Nonconformist party.

CALANUS, ka-lai'-nus, a celebrated Indian philosopher, one of the sect of the Gymnosophists. He followed Alexander in his Indian expedition, and having fallen ill in his 83rd year, ordered a pile to be raised, upon which he mounted, decked with flowers and garlands, in the presence of the whole Macedonian army. An officer asking him if he had nothing to say to Alexander, "No," answered he, "I shall meet him again in three months in Babylon." Alexander died within the time. b. about 406 B.C.; d. 323 B.C.

CALAS, John, ka'-la, a Protestant merchant of Toulouse, who was accused, in 1761, of strangling his eldest son, Mark Antony, on account of his having secretly embraced the Roman Catholic religion. The young man was of an impatient and gloomy disposition, and in a fit of melancholy had hanged himself. His unfortunate father was put to the torture to make him confess, and finally, without any evidence, was broken on the wheel, declaring his innocence to the last. The widow and children found a friend in the philosopher Voltaire, and, through his talent and energy, the proceedings were considered in the council in 1765, when Calas was pronounced innocent. b. 1693; suffered 1763.

CALCAGNI, Cello, kaw'-kan-ye'-ne, a learned Italian, who served in the imperial army some time, and was employed in several embassies and other honourable commissions. At last he became professor of belles-lettres at Ferrara, and wrote several works, particularly on the Roman antiquities, which show great erudition. He also asserted the motion of the earth; before Copernicus published his system. b. at Ferrara, 1479; d. 1511.

CALCAR, John van, kal'-kar, an eminent painter, a disciple of Titian. His pictures are hardly to be distinguished from those of his master.

CALCEOLARI, kal'-se-o-lar-ri, and Sculptors" are by him.

CALCEOLARI kal'-se-o-lar-re, a famous Italian apothecary and botanist, who flourished about the middle of the 16th century, was a native of Verona, and wrote some works on his favourite science, which were published in Venice under the title of "Iter Baldi Montis." The beautiful flower known as the calceolaria was so named in honour of him.

CALDARA, Antonio, kal'-dar-ya, a musician, who after acquiring some fame as a composer in Italy, went to Austria, where he wrote and brought out a vast number of operas, 68 at least, some of which were set to poems of Zeno and Metastasio. On the failure of his "Temistocle," he was very greatly disgusted, wrote no more for the stage, resigned an appointment he held at the imperial court, and hastened to Italy, where he died in his native city of Venice in 1763. b. 1678.

CALDERARI, Ottone, kal'-dar-ri, a nobleman and eminent architect of Vienna, which he has enriched with many handsome edifices in the Palladian style, but who has been strangely neglected, few writers giving him credit for the works he has executed. He was born in 1730, and died in 1803.—His style is characterized by simplicity and elegance; and he possessed a true knowledge of the principles on which Græco-Italian architecture depends. One writer calls him the "immortal Calderari," and others have characterized him as the "Palladio of the eighteenth century;" but still his merits have not been so universally acknowledged, at least in England, as they deserve.

CALDEBON DE LA BARCA, Don Pedro, kal'-dar-one, a celebrated Spanish scholar, priest, and dramatic writer, who wrote his first piece at the age of fourteen. He was a private soldier at twenty-five, but continued to write dramas with great success. Philip IV. recognizing his great talents, called him to the court, bestowed on him his patronage, and provided the necessary funds for the representation of his plays. He subsequently entered the church, and became canon of Toledo. His plays were printed at Madrid, in 9 vols. 4to, in 1689. b. at Madrid, 1600; d. 1681.

CALDER, Sir Robert, kal'-der, a British admiral, who is principally known from his indecisive and unfortunate action with the Franco-Spanish fleet under Villeneuve, off Cape Finisterre. Calder was the son of Sir James Calder, of Minster, Morayshire, N.B., and was born in Park-place, London, on the 2nd of July, 1745. He entered the navy at the age of fourteen, and after passing through the subordinate grades, was made post-captain in August, 1780. In 1796, Sir John Jervis appointed Calder to the post of captain of the fleet then under his command, and in that capacity he was present in the famous battle of St. Vincent, on February 14, 1797, which procured for Jervis the title of earl of St. Vincent. Calder carried home the despatches, and was knighted by George III., March 3, 1797; in the following year was made a baronet, and, in 1799, was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. In 1801 Calder followed the French fleet under Gantheaume to the West Indies, but did not succeed in overtaking it. After commanding for some time the squadron blockading the Port of Ferrol, he was ordered to the westward of Cape Finisterre to intercept Villeneuve's fleet of French and Spanish ships on its return from the West Indies; and, on the 22nd of July, 1805, the enemy's fleet, consisting of twenty ships of the line, a fifty-gun ship, and seven frigates, was despatched on the lee bow. Calder's force consisted of only fifteen ships of the line and two frigates; but he had the weather gauge (although this has been denied), and the difference in force was not such as would have influenced the majority of British admirals at the time. An engagement ensued, under a bad system of tactics on Calder's part, which lasted till 9 p.m., and resulted in the capture of only two of the enemy's ships. Calder declined to renew the action next day, though he might have done so, thereby allowing the enemy to retire unmolested, and on his return to England was tried by court-martial, and severely reprimanded for want of judgment, though he was acquitted of cowardice or disaffection. Great dissatisfaction was felt by the public at Sir Robert's conduct; but after a time a reaction set in, he was thought not to have been so much to blame, popular feeling was soothed by Nelson's great victory at Trafalgar, and in 1810 Sir Robert Calder was again employed as port-admiral at Plymouth, a command which he retained for three years. D. 1819, at the age of 74.

CALEB, or KHALED, kal'-led, one of the bravest of Mohammed's captains. He had at first taken part against him, and had contributed to the victory of Ohud, where the prophet had been defeated. In 630, however (the 8th year of the Hegira), he embraced the new religion, and was chiefly instrumental in the conquest of Syria, Mohammed conferring on him the title of the Sword of God. D. 642.

CALENTIUS, Elisius, kaw'-len'-she-us, an Italian writer, who was tutor to the son of Ferdinand II., king of Naples. B. in Apulia, about 1450; D. 1503.—He is known to fame by his poem of "The Battle between the Frogs and Mice," in imitation of Homer, which was printed in 1738, at Rouen.

CALEPINO, OF DA CALEPIO, Ambrose, kaw'-lai-pe'-no, a learned Italian, descended from a noble family. He embraced the monastic habit of the Augustines, and spent all his life in the compilation of a dictionary of the Latin, Italian, and other languages. The first edition of this appeared in 1503, and became very famous; and, after passing through a great number of editions, swelled, in 1681, to two volumes folio. B. at Bergamo, 1435; D. blind in 1511.

CALHOUN, John Caldwell, kal'-hoon, a distinguished American statesman, who, during a period of forty years, rendered faithful services to the Union, in the various capacities of representative, secretary of war, vice-president, and senator. B. in Abbeville district, South Carolina, 1782; D. at Washington, 1850.—The works of this statesman were published in 1853-4, in 6 vols. 8vo.

CALIDASA, ka'-le-da'-sa, a much-admired Indian poet. Tradition pronounces him one of the nine gems who lived in the court of King Vicramaditya. He wrote several poems, which display a remarkable genius. His "Sacuntala" was translated by Sir William Jones, and was the first work which made his name known to Europeans. It is doubtful when this poet lived, some placing him a century before and others a century after the Christian era.

CALIGULA, C., ka'-lig'-u-la, a Roman emperor, who received this surname from his wearing in the camp the caliga, a kind of buskin in use among the common soldiers. He was the son of Germanicus, by Agrippina, and grandson to Tiberius. During the first eight months of his reign, Rome was governed with mildness; but he soon displayed his true character, and became proud, wanton, and cruel. He built a temple to himself, and ordered an effigy of his head to be placed on the images of the gods, while he wished to imitate the thunders and powers of Jupiter. The statues of all great men were removed, and he appeared in public places in the most indecent manner, encouraged roguery, himself committed the worst of crimes, and established public places of prostitution. He often amused himself with putting innocent people to death, and attempted to famish Rome by a monopoly of corn. He was pleased with the greatest disasters which befell his subjects, and often wished the Romans had but one head, that he might strike it off at a blow. Wild beasts were constantly fed in his palace with human victims; and, as if to insult the feelings and the dignity of fallen Rome, a favourite horse was made high priest and consul, and kept in marble apartments, adorned with the most valuable trappings and pearls which the Roman empire could furnish. In consequence of his numerous acts of tyranny, a conspiracy was formed against him, and he was murdered, 41 A.D. B. 12 A.D.—It has been said that Caligula wrote a treatise on rhetoric; but his estimate of learning may be rather obtained from his attempts to destroy the writings of Homer and Virgil.

CALIPPUS, ka'-lip'-pus, a mathematician of Cyzicus, famous for having corrected the cycle or period of nineteen years, invented by Meton, for the purpose of showing the correspondence in point of time between the revolutions of the sun and moon, and which is sometimes called the Calippic period. Lived 330 B.C.

CALIXTUS I., ka'-lit'-tus, pope and saint, succeeded Zephyrinus in 218, and suffered martyrdom in 222.

CALIXTUS II. was the son of the count of Burgundy, and became archbishop of Vienna in 1083, and pope in 1119. D. 1124.

CALIXTUS III. was a native of Xativa, in Spain, and elected pope in 1455. D. 1459.—His character was respectable for learning, moderation, and piety.

CALLCOTT, Sir Augustus Wall, R.A., kal'-cot, an eminent landscape-painter, and brother of the illustrious musical composer. In 1810 he was elected a member of the Royal Academy, Returning from Market," "Waiting for the Passage-Boat," and several others, which are generally known from their having been engraved. He also executed several marine subjects, and, in 1833, exhibited his beautiful picture called "Harvest in the Highlands," which was engraved by Wilmore for the subscribers to the Art Union for 1856. In 1837 he exhibited "Raffaello and the Fornarina," and, in 1840, "Milton dictating to his daughters,"

This was a failure. Indeed, Callcott was not calculated to excel in figure-painting, of which, perhaps, he himself was fully aware, as he allowed Sir E. Landseer to paint the figures in his "Harvest in the Highlands." In landscape, however, he was great; and, by his friends, has been called the English Claude. B. at Kensington, 1779; D. in the same place, 1811. He was knighted by Queen Victoria in 1837.

CALLCOTT, John Wall, one of the most distinguished composers in the British school of music. In 1785, when only nineteen years of age, he carried off three out of the four gold medals offered as prizes by the Catch Club. Among his compositions in this competition, was his fine piece, "Oh, sovereign of the willing soul!" In 1790 he became musical doctor of Oxford; and, in 1805, produced his "Musical Grammar." Subsequently, his mind gave way under excess of study, and the excitement which musical composition often creates; not, however, until he had produced an immense number of original and highly-esteemed works. B. at Kensington, 1766; D. 1821.—He left many MS. volumes, intended as materials for a comprehensive musical dictionary.

CALLICRATIDAS, kāl-li-kra't-i-das, a Spartan general, who succeeded Lysander in the command of the Lacedæmonian fleet. He took Methymna, and blockaded Conon, in Mitylene, but was conquered and killed the same year by the Athenians, at Arginusæ. Lived in the 5th century B.C., and died 406 B.C.

CALLIMACHUS, kāl-lim'-ā-kus, a Greek poet and historian, who had the charge of the library of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He was tutor of Apollonius, the author of the "Argonautics." B. at Cyrene, and flourished in the 3rd century B.C., dying about 240 B.C.

CALLIMACHUS, an architect, who invented the capital so much admired in the Corinthian order of Grecian architecture. The occasion of the discovery is said to have been thus:—A plant of acanthus being placed upon the tomb of a Corinthian lady, spread its leaves over the basket in so graceful a manner, that the architect adopted it as a suitable ornament for his pillars. Lived in the 6th century B.C.

CALLINICUS, kāl-lin'-i-kus, an ancient architect, who invented the Greek fire, and communicated his secret to the emperor Constantine III., Pogonatus, who used it to burn the Sarsen fleet at Cyzius, in 673. B. at Heliopolis, Egypt.—The knowledge of this composition was afterwards lost; but a Frenchman, in Louis XV.'s reign, again discovered it; and the king, in 1766, bought the secret, in order to bury so fruitful a knowledge in oblivion.

CALLINUS, kāl-li-nus, an orator of Ephesus, the author of some admirable elegiac poetry. Flourished about the 7th century B.C.

CALLISTHENES, kāl-lis'-the-nes, a Greek philosopher, disciple and relative of Aristotle, who followed Alexander in his Asiatic expedition. He refused to acknowledge the alleged divinity of this hero, and even had the misfortune to displease him by his raileries. He was afterwards accused of conspiracy, and confined, it is said, in an iron cage. Put to death at Cariste, in Bactriana, 323 B.C. B. 365 B.C.—None of his writings are extant.

CALLISTRATUS, kāl-is'-trā-tus, a Roman jurist, one of those of whose writings Justinian made use in compiling his "Digest." Lived in the reign of Septimius Severus, who died A.D. 211, and of his son Antoninus.

CALLOT, kal'-ot, a French engraver, painter, and engraver. He learnt his art from his father, whether he went against the wishes of his family, who were noble. He acquired a great reputation, and his engravings are highly valued. B. at Nancy, 1593; D. at Florence, 1635.—After the taking of his birthplace by Louis XII., in 1633, he refused to commemorate the event with his graver. Callot's works show his great genius in the representation of popular and grotesque subjects, and in caricaturing the vices and follies of mankind.

CALMET, Augustin, kāl'-met (Fr. kal'-mai), a learned and laborious French Benedictine, who wrote a "Literary Commentary upon all the Books of the Scripture," 23 vols. 4to; a "History of the Old and New Testament," 4 vols. 4to; an "Historical, Critical, and Chronological Dictionary of the Bible," a "Universal History," 15 vols. 4to; and other learned works. B. in Lorraine, 1672; D. abbot of Senoué, 1757.

CALMO, Andrea, kāl'-mo, a clever but somewhat indecent dramatist, whose plays—of which he wrote five, besides other pieces—had a great success in Venice, which they owed very much to the skilful and humorous use of Venetian dialects, and not a little to the loose morals which pervaded them. B. 1510; D. 1571.

CALOGERA, Angelo, kāl'-o-jai'-a, a Benedictine monk, who made a catalogue of the proceedings of all the learned societies of Italy, which was of great service to historical and other writers. He also translated "Telemachus," was a very learned man, and his correspondence with the literati of the time is very voluminous, and contains much useful information. Lived as a kind of hermit in an island between Venice and Murano, in the convent of St. Michael. B. at Padua, 1699; D. 1768.

CALOMARDE, Francisco Tadeo, kāl'-o-mar'-dai, the leading Spanish minister for ten years under Ferdinand VII., studied for the law, and, through his marriage with the daughter of Baltran, physician to Godoy, the favourite of Ferdinand, he was immediately brought into prominent notice. He has the blame of most of the tyrannical measures which passed in Spain between 1823 and 1833, although, no doubt, many of them belong to Ferdinand, whose malignant passions stimulated him to the adoption of absolutist principles in their sternest form. On the expected death of Ferdinand, he paid his court to Don Carlos; but his attentions were too precipitate, and he was forced to flee his country in disgrace. He made his escape in disguise to France, but returned to Spain on the death of the king. He then offered his services to Don Carlos, but they were rejected, when he returned to France, where he passed the remainder of his life, principally at Toulouse. B. at Villé, in Lower Aragon, 1775; D. at Toulouse, 1842.

CALONNE, Charles Alexander de, kal'-lon, a French statesman, who, in 1783, became comptroller general of the finances, and found not a single crown in the treasury. In this office he continued till 1787. During this period he maintained the public credit with a punctuality till then unknown in the payments of the royal treasury, though he found it drained to the lowest ebb. He laboured with unwearied assiduity to restore the equilibrium between the annual income and expenditure, and to provide a supply for the emergencies of the state, without increasing the burthens of the people. For this purpose he advised the king to revive the ancient usage of convening national assemblies of the "notables," to whom he proposed the bold project of suppressing the pecuniary privileges and exemptions of the nobility, clergy, and magistracy. This measure alarmed those powerful bodies, and M. de Clugny found it necessary to retire to England, where he wrote two elegant defences of himself,—his "Requête au Roi," and "Réponse à l'Écrit de M. Necker." He subsequently returned to Paris, but did not long survive that event. n. at Douay, 1734; p. at Paris, 1802.—Besides the above, he wrote several other works; among which was his essay entitled "De l'État de la France présent et à venir," 1790, 8vo, in which he predicted the disasters which afterwards befell his unhappy country.

CALPURNIA, kāl-pur'-ne-ā, a daughter of L. Piso, and the last wife of Julius Cæsar. The night previous to her husband's murder, she dreamed that the roof of her house had fallen, and that he had been stabbed in her arms. On that account she attempted, but in vain, to detain him at home. Lived in the first century n.c.—It is to Calpurnia that Shakspeare makes Cæsar say, when she would dissuade him from going to the Capitol,—

"Towards die many times before their deaths;
The valiant never taste of death but once."

CALVART, Denis, kāl'-var, a Flemish painter, who opened a school for artists at Bologna, where he had amongst his pupils Guido, Albano, and Domenichino. b. at Antwerp, 1555; p. at Bologna, 1619.

CALVERT, Sir George, the first Lord Baltimore, kāl'-vert, the secretary of Robert Cecil, minister of James I., and, in 1619, secretary of state. He became a Roman Catholic in 1624, and soon after was created Baron Baltimore on resigning office. He visited America in 1628, and on his return obtained a grant of land, and founded the colony of Maryland shortly before his death in 1632. n. about 1582.

CALVI, Fortunato, kāl'-re, a native of Padua, where he was born in 1518, was educated at the military college of Gratz, and then entered the Austrian army, in which he was an officer at the outbreak of the revolution of 1848. Being imbued with republican opinions, he at once resigned, went to Venice, engaged in the service of that republic as a colonel, and took an active share in the siege. On the fall of Venice, he escaped. In 1853, he undertook to head a revolt organized by Mazzini in Cadore, but was betrayed by a Tyrolean guide, carried a prisoner to Mantua, where he was tried before a tribunal whose legality was questionable, condemned to be hanged, and, on the 4th of July, 1855, suffered with calmness and dignity. On being told that he might have a pardon if he would throw himself on the emperor's clemency, he answered—"No; my love of life is not so intense as my hatred of the Austrians: do your worst."

CALVIN, John, kāl'-vin, an eminent reformer, the founder of the religious sect called Calvinists, was educated at Paris, under Corderius, with a view to the church. Two benefices were procured for him, but he had become dissatisfied with the tenets of the Church of Rome, and changed his opinions with respect to the ecclesiastical state. He was now induced to study the law, in which he made considerable progress; but his open avowal of the Protestant faith rendered his stay in France dangerous, and he retired to Bale, where he published, in 1782, his "Institution of the Christian religion," which was translated into several languages. In the following year he settled at Geneva, as minister and professor of divinity, having Farel for his colleague. Both he and Farel, however, were in a short time compelled to leave Geneva, for refusing to administer the sacrament indiscriminately to the people. Calvin now went to Strasburg, where he officiated in a French church of his own establishment, and was also chosen professor of divinity. The divines of this town appointed him their deputy at the Diet of Worms. In the meantime, the citizens of Geneva requested his return to their city, and after repeated solicitations, he, in 1541, complied, and resided there, actively engaged both as a writer and a preacher, until his death. b. at Noyon, Picardy, 1509; p. 1564.—The moral disposition of Calvin was estimable, and whatever may be thought of the creed he professed and promulgated, there can be no doubt as to the greatness of his character. Of his unparalleled industry, Dr. Hoyle says,—“It may be the truest object of admiration, how one lean, worn, spent, and wearied body could hold out. He read, every week of the year through, three divinity lectures; every other week, over and above, he preached every day; so that (as Erasmus said of Chrysostom), ‘I know not whether more to admire his constancy, or theirs that heard him.’ Some have reckoned his yearly lectures to be 136, and his yearly sermons 236. Every Thursday he sat in the presbytery; every Friday, when the ministers met to consult upon difficult texts, he made as good as a lecture. Besides all this, there was scarce a day that exercised him not in answering, either by word of mouth or writing, the doubts and questions of different churches and pastors, yea, sometimes more at once, so that he might say with Paul, ‘the care of all churches lieth upon me.’ Scarcely a year wherein, over and above all these former employments, some great volume in folio, or other, came not forth.” His works were published in 9 vols. fol., at Amsterdam, 1671.

CALVISTUS, Sethus, kāl'-vis'-e-us, a learned chronologer, whose principal work is the "Opus Chronologicum," the last edition of which was that of Frankfort, in 1835. Scaliger speaks highly of it. b. in Thuringia, 1556; p. 1615.

CAMBACÈRES, Jean Jacques, kam-bas'-a-rai, came prominently into notice during the first great revolution in France. He commenced life as a lawyer, and by his talents succeeded in attracting the notice of the Convention, who employed him in various official situations. In the discussion on the conduct of Louis XVI. he declared the monarch guilty, but disputed the authority of the Convention to judge him; he, therefore, voted only for his provisional arrest, and his death in case of a hostile invasion. The management of foreign affairs was for some time committed to his hands, and when Napoleon was made First Consul, Cambacères was chosen Second. When Bonaparte rose to the throne, Cambacères became a great favourite, and had several honours conferred upon him. Subsequently he was created duke of Parma, and appointed to the presidency of the Chamber of Peers. Devotedly attached to Napoleon, he adhered to him throughout his reign. On his final fall, he was banished from France, but was afterwards permitted to return to Paris. B. at Montpelier, 1753; D. at Paris, 1824.

CAMBERT, Robert, kam'-beir, a French musician, who was the first to exhibit operas in France; but being rivalled by Lulli, he went, in 1672, to England, where he became master of the king's band. B. 1629; D. 1677.

CAMBIASO, Luca, kawm'-be-n'-so, sometimes called Luchetto of Genoa, a distinguished Italian painter in fresco and oil. After becoming eminent in Genoa, he went to Spain, where he was commissioned by Philip II. to paint for the Escorial; accordingly, he executed several works, among which is an immense fresco of Paradise, crowded with figures, on the ceiling of the choir of the church of San Lorenzo. This, however, is considered both stiff and formal in its execution. He also painted in oil for the Escorial, "John the Baptist preaching in the Wilderness," which is esteemed as the best of his Spanish works. The best of his Genoese works are "The Martyrdom of St. George," in the church of San Giorgio; and "The Rape of the Sabines," at Terralva, near Genoa. B. near Genoa, 1527; D. at the Escorial, Spain, 1535.

CAMBI-S-VELLERON, Joseph Louis Dominic, Marquis de, kam'-be-vel'-le-rang, a learned French nobleman, who diligently collected a library, which was among the largest and most select in his country. He published—1. A Catalogue Raisonné of the MSS. in his cabinet, 2 vols. 8vo, a curious work; 2. "Mémoires historiques de la Vie de Roger de Saint-Lary de Bellegarde," 1767, 12mo; and gathered materials for a history of his native province. B. at Avignon, 1708; D. 1772.

CAMBINI, Giovanni Giuseppe, kawm'-be'-ne, a musical composer, was born at Leghorn, in 1746, and early showed a deep attachment to music, his favourite instrument being the violin, on which, however, he was not very great as a performer, but his extensive knowledge of music made him a valuable assistant in concerted pieces. He wrote a vast number of pieces for instrumental performance, besides a great many operas, ballets, &c. A singular incident occurred to him when young, which being somewhat similar to that introduced by Byron in "Don Juan," may, perhaps, have suggested the story of the kidnapping and sale of the musical troupe which the poet narrates. Cambini had formed an attachment with a young lady of Leghorn, but who, like himself, was residing in Naples, and they were on their way home to be married, when captured by a corsair, carried to Barbary, and sold as slaves. Cambini was purchased by a Venetian merchant, who gave him his liberty, but what became of the lady does not appear. He died in the hospital of Mécène about 1826.

CAMBRAY, Baptiste, kam'-bray, a peasant of France, who was the inventor of the linen fabric called cambric, but of whose history nothing is known.

CAMBRIDGE, George Wm. Frederiek Charles, Duke of, kam'-bridj, first cousin to Queen Victoria, early entered the army, and in 1837 was a colonel of infantry, and successively commanded a regiment of dragoons and the Scots Fusiliers. In 1852 he was appointed inspector-general of the army, and in 1854 became lieutenant-general, with the command of a division, with which he proceeded to the Crimea. He fought at the battles of Alma and Inkermann, and in 1858 returned to England. On the death of Lord Hardinge, in 1856, he became commander-in-chief of the British forces. In 1857 he was presented by the citizens of London with a sword of honour, accompanied with the freedom of the city. B. at Hanover, 1819.

CAMBYSES, kam-bi'-sees, king of Persia, was the son of Cyrus the Great, whom he succeeded 529 B.C. He conquered the Egyptians, killed their god Apis, and plundered their temples. Cambyses afterwards sent an army of 50,000 men to destroy the temple of Jupiter Ammon; but they were lost in the deserts of Libya. In his Ethiopian war he was not more successful, a horrible famine reducing his soldiers to live on one another. He died of a small wound he had given himself with his sword as he mounted on horseback, 521 B.C.—All historians represent this monarch as a furious tyrant; he caused his brother Smerdis to be killed, and also his sister Meroë and her husband.

CAMDEN, William, kam'-den, a learned antiquary, who, in 1558, published, in elegant Latin, "The History of the Ancient Inhabitants of Britain; their Origin, Manners, and Laws." A third edition of this work appeared in 1590, at which time the author had a prebend in Salisbury Cathedral, but without being in orders. In 1593 he became head master of Westminster School, and, next year, published an enlarged edition of his "Britannia." In 1597 he printed his Greek Grammar for the use of Westminster School, and, the same year, was made Clarendon king-at-arms. Three years later his "Catalogue of the Monuments in Westminster Abbey" appeared, and also a new impression of his "Britannia." In 1603 he published at Frankfurt "A Collection of our Ancient Historians," in Latin; and, in the following year, his "Remains concerning Britain," in 4to. In 1615 he printed his "Annals of Queen Elizabeth." B. in London, 1551; D. at Chiselhurst, in Kent, 1623, his remains being interred in Westminster Abbey.—He founded a history professorship at Oxford, and bequeathed all his books and papers to Sir Robert Cotton.

CAMDEN, Charles Pratt, earl of, was a younger son of Sir John Pratt, chief justice of the court of King's Bench in the reign of George I. He was trained to the law, and, in 1738, was called to the bar. For several years he had little success; but, in 1752, he was engaged as junior counsel in defence of Owen, a bookseller, who had been prosecuted by the attorney-general for publishing a libel upon the House of Commons. In this case he greatly contributed to the success of his client in gaining a favourable verdict. From that time his fortune and fame were fixed. In 1757 he was made attorney-general, and, almost immediately, was returned member of parliament for Downton, a borough, now disfranchised, in Wiltshire. In 1761 he was raised to the bench as lord chief justice; and, in 1765, was created a peer, with the title of Baron Camden, of Camden Place, in the county of Kent. On the breaking up of the Rockingham administration, in 1766, he became lord chancellor. It was as a judge in the court of Chancery, however, that he earned the praise of his countrymen. Only one of his decisions was reversed, and that reversal, Lord Eldon said, was probably wrong. B. 1714; D. 1794.

CAMERARIUS, Joachim, kam'-e-rari'-us, a learned German writer, who embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and formed a friendship with Melancthon, whose life he wrote. On the establishment of a college at Nuremberg, he was made professor of belles-lettres, and afterwards removed to Leipsic to superintend the university of that city. He aided Melancthon in drawing up the famous "Confession of Augsburg," wrote some good books, and translated a great number of the Greek authors. n. at Bamberg, 1500; p. at Leipsic, 1574.—His son Joachim devoted himself chiefly to medicine and botany, on which last subject he wrote some pieces. p. 1534; p. at Nuremberg, 1598.

CAMERON, Rev. Richard, kam-er-on, the founder of a sect known in the religious history of Scotland as the Cameronsians, was one of the boldest opponents of the measures of Charles II., and, with twenty others, in 1690, entered armed into the town of Sanquhar, Dumfriesshire, and at the market cross renounced his allegiance, and pronounced Charles a tyrant and a traitor to the civil and religious principles of the people. His party kept in arms for a month in the hill districts of Ayrshire and Nithsdale; but in a skirmish with the king's troops they were defeated at Airdsmoss, where Cameron was slain. Fell July 20, 1680.—A monument marks the spot where this event occurred.

CAMERON, Sir Evan, chief of the Scottish clan of that name, and lord of Lochiel, was remarkable for his personal prowess and high sense of honour and integrity. He took part with the Stuarts against the government of William III., and joined the famous Graham of Claverhouse, under whom he fought at Killiecrankie, where Graham was killed, and to Cameron's judicious counsels and calmness the completeness of the victory on that occasion was mainly due. He afterwards submitted to the government, and died in retirement in 1719. He is styled by Macaulay the "Ulysses of the Highlands."—His grandson, Donald, who succeeded him in the chieftainship of the clan, was regarded as the bean-ideal of a Highland chief, and was called the "gentle Lochiel," by which title he is still affectionately remembered in the Highlands. On the landing of Prince Charles Edward, in 1745, Lochiel was the first to join his standard, and he took a leading part in the rebellion till the suppression of the revolt, after the fatal battle of Culloden, where he was severely wounded. He captured the city of Edinburgh without losing a single life; and his clan mainly contributed to the gaining of the battle of Prestonpans. After the defeat at Culloden he escaped along with the prince to France, where he was appointed to the command of a regiment in the French service, and where he died in 1748.—His brother, Dr. Archibald Cameron, who had also escaped to France, returned in 1763, when he was captured, tried, and executed, being the last who suffered for the unhappy affair of 1745-46.

CAMERON, John, a learned biblical scholar, was a native of Scotland, having been born in Glasgow in 1680, but who spent the greater part of his life in France. He was an admirable Greek scholar, being able to speak that language as fluently as the learned men of his time could Latin. In 1822 he was appointed professor of the Glasgow university, but did not long retain the office, having retired to France the following year. He became professor of divinity at Montauban in 1824, but having made enemies by opposing the civil war, he was assaulted and desperately wounded, by an unknown assassin, and after lingering for some time, died of the injuries he had received in 1825. He wrote "Theological Lectures," which, with a memoir of the author, were published in 1826. He was a man of a restless and obstinate disposition, very pugnacious, and more showy and disputations than solid in his attainments.

CAMERON, Charles Duncan, an officer of the British army, who was appointed consul for Abyssinia in 1860. He was put in irons by Theodore, the emperor of that country, in 1862, and kept a close prisoner until he was released by the expeditionary force under Sir Robert, now Lord Napier, in 1863. His great sufferings having rendered him a cripple for life, he was awarded a pension of £350 per annum. n. 1827.

CAMILLUS, Marcus Furius, kai-mil-lus, an illustrious Roman, who obtained four triumphs, and was five times dictator. This great man, whose virtues were equal to his talents, was prosecuted on a charge of peculation, on which he went into voluntary banishment. While he was absent, Brennus, at the head of an army of Gauls, took Rome, and besieged the senate in the Capitol. Camillus, forgetting his wrongs, flew to the relief of his country, defeated the barbarian, and was created dictator. p. of the plague, 365 B.C.

CAMOENS, Lewis, kam-o-ens, the most celebrated poet of Portugal, who entered the army, and served with great reputation in Africa against the Moors. Soon after his return to Portugal, he engaged in an expedition to the East Indies, where he wrote a great part of his famous poem entitled the "Lusiad." On his passage home he suffered shipwreck, but preserved the MS. of his poem, which was published in 1569. p. at Lisbon, 1525; p. 1579.—The people at Macao are still proud of showing a cave where Camoens amused himself in writing his "Lusiad." It has been translated into English both by Sir Richard Fanshawe and Mr. Mickle.

CAMOU, General, ku'-moo, a military commander, who, at the head of the voltigeurs of the French Guard, distinguished himself at the battle of Magenta, against the Austrians, June 4, 1859. B. 1792.

CAMPAN, Madam, kam'-pong, in her fifteenth year was appointed reader to the daughters of Louis XV. of France, and in 1770 married, and became first lady of the bedchamber to Marie Antoinette, the dauphiness. With this princess she remained till the Revolution parted them, when she opened a boarding-school at St. Germain-en-Laye. She subsequently became superintendent of the establishment at Ecouen, founded by Napoleon I. for the daughters and sisters of the officers of the Legion of Honour. This establishment was, after the Restoration, suppressed, when she retired to Mantos, where she passed the remainder of her days, enjoying a reputation for many virtues and accomplishments. B. 1752; p. at Mantos, 1822.—She wrote "Memoirs of the Private Life of Marie Antoinette," and "Historical Anecdotes of the Reigns of Louis XV. and XVI."

tion, and procured him many enemies. In 1599 he was seized at Naples, and committed to prison on suspicion of being engaged in a conspiracy against the Spaniards, who were then masters of his country. He was imprisoned 27 years, and was several times tortured, five times brought to trial, and finally sent to Rome at the request of the pope. In 1634 he went from Italy to France, where Cardinal Richelieu allowed him a pension. B. at Stilo, Calabria, 1563; D. at Paris, 1639. His principal works are "Prodromus Philosophiæ Instaurandæ," "Exordium Metaphysicæ Novæ," "De Sensu Rerum et Magia," and "De Monarchiâ Hispanicâ Discursus."

CAMPANO, John Antonio, kam-paw'-no, a learned Italian, who was originally a shepherd-boy. In this capacity he attracted the notice of a priest, who took him home, and gave him a liberal education. Acquiring considerable knowledge of the Greek language, he subsequently became professor of rhetoric at Perugia. Pius II. made him a bishop, and sent him to the congress at Ratisbon. Sixtus IV. appointed him governor of Citta da Castello; but Campano, having resisted an arbitrary act of his against the inhabitants, incurred the pope's displeasure; on which he withdrew to his bishopric of Terrano, where he died. B. in Campania, 1429; D. 1477.—He wrote the history of Fortebracci Braccio, a famous commander; several moral and political treatises, letters, orations, and Latin poems; all of which were published together in 1707 and 1731, at Leipsic.

CAMPANUS, John, kam-pai'-nus, of Novara, sometimes called Novaresc Campano, an Italian mathematician, the first translator of Euclid from the Arabic, flourished about the 13th century; some authorities say before this. Although his works, which consisted of writings on astronomy and geometry principally, are long exploded, yet he deserves praise, as one of those studious men who, though few, laboured zealously at the exact sciences, and did their best to extend the knowledge of them.

CAMPBELL, John, Lord, kam'-bel, was the second son of the Rev. Dr. George Campbell, minister of Cupar, Fifeshire. He received his education at the university of St. Andrew's, and in 1800 was entered a student at Lincoln's Inn, London. In 1806 he was called to the bar, and in 1827 became a bencher. In 1830 he was elected member of parliament for Stafford, and in 1832 was appointed solicitor-general. In 1834 he was attorney-general, and in 1841 became lord chancellor of Ireland, when he was raised to the peerage as Baron Campbell. The same year he resigned the Irish chancellorship, and in 1846 became chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In 1850 he attained the position due to his industry, and became lord chief justice of the court of Queen's Bench, with a salary of £8000 a year. In June, 1859, he was appointed, under the Palmerston administration, lord chancellor. As a member of parliament he represented, first, Stafford, then Dudley, and then Edinburgh; for which he sat till 1841. In 1846 he produced his "Lives of the Lord Chancellors, &c.," and in 1849 the "Lives of the Chief Justices,"—works which, in a literary point of view, added to his reputation. B. near Cupar, Scotland, 1779; D. 1861.

CAMPBELL, John, an ingenious Scotch writer, who in his fifth year was brought to Windsor, and never after visited his native country. He was designed for the law, but renounced that profession on the expiration of his clerkship, and devoted himself to literature. His first performance was the "Military History of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough," in 2 vols. folio, published in 1738. This work was well received, and occasioned the author to be employed in writing the "Universal History," of which the cosmogony is known to be his. While he was engaged in this work, he published several books, the principal of which was the "Lives of the Admirals," 4 vols. 8vo; a performance of great merit. In 1743 he published a curious tract, entitled "Hermippus redivivus; or, the Sage's Triumph over Old Age and the Grave." The year following appeared his improved edition of Harris's collection of Voyages and Travels, 2 vols. folio. He next engaged in that great undertaking the "Biographia Britannica," which began to be published in numbers in 1745, and was completed in seven volumes folio. In 1750 he published his "Present State of Europe," which went through six editions; and in 1754, the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of LL.D. He wrote a vindication of the peace in 1763, for which he was appointed king's agent for the province of Georgia. His greatest work, in the composition of which he spent many years, is his "Political Survey of Britain," which appeared in 2 vols. 4to, 1774, and abounds in speculative projects and political schemes. He wrote, besides, a great number of pamphlets and anonymous books, and contributed to a variety of compilations. B. at Edinburgh, 1708; D. 1775.

CAMPBELL, Rev. George, an eminent Scotch divine, who in 1759 was appointed principal of Marischal College, Aberdeen. In 1763 he answered Hume's "Essay on Miracles;" and subsequently had the degree of D.D. conferred on him by King's College, Aberdeen. In 1771 he was appointed professor of divinity, and in 1776 published his "Philosophy of Rhetoric," which, with the exception of Whately's, is, perhaps, the ablest work on the subject. Campbell undoubtedly possessed a highly philosophical mind, of great depth, acuteness, and critical power. He wrote several other works of a theological kind. B. at Aberdeen, 1719; D. 1796.—Some years previous to his death he had resigned his professorship, when King George III. granted him a pension of £300 a year.

CAMPBELL, Thomas, one of the most chaste of modern poets, was the youngest of a family consisting of ten sons and daughters. After passing through the university of Glasgow, in which he excelled as a Greek scholar, he went to Edinburgh, where, in 1799, he published his "Pleasures of Hope," which Byron, who ought to be a judge, pronounced to be "one of the most beautiful didactic poems in the language." It, however, has some of the faults of a juvenile performance, notwithstanding the splendour of its diction, and the fervour with which it is throughout imbued. The profits arising from this performance enabled him to visit the continent. During this tour he had a view from a distance of the battle of Hohenlinden, which he afterwards celebrated in his epic poem of that name. On his return to Edinburgh he continued to write, but in 1808 removed to London, where he began to pursue literature as a profession. In 1806 he received from the Fox ministry a pension of £200 a year, which he enjoyed for life. In 1809 he published his "Gertrude of Wyoming," which Lord Jeffrey pronounced "a polished and pathetic poem in the old style of English pathos and poetry." It is unquestionably superior to the "Pleasures of Ilooe" in purity of diction, and, in every other quality, its equal. In 1820 he became the editor of the "New Monthly Magazine," which post he held till 1830. In 1824 appeared his "Theodoric," a poem of great sweetness though deficient in power. In 1831 he established the "Metropolitan Magazine," which he managed only a short time. In 1842 he published his "Pilgrim of Glencoe," which did no raise his poetical character above the point it already had attained. During his intervals of repose from severer duties, he occasionally produced smaller effusions, which, from their strength and beauty, have long kept possession of the popular mind. His lyrics are, perhaps, the noblest bursts of poetical feeling, fervour, and enthusiasm, that have ever flashed from any poet. b. at Glasgow, 1777; d. at Boulogne, 1844.—Campbell also wrote several prose biographies and other works. He was elected twice to the lord rectorship of Glasgow University, and took an active part in forming the London University, now University College, which he indeed claimed the merit of originating. His body rests in Westminster Abbey, where, near the centre of the Poets' Corner, there is a marble statue of him by Marshall.

CAMPBELL, Rev. John, a Scotch clergyman, who took an active part in almost every Christian work. In 1804 he was appointed pastor of the Independent church at Kingsland, and greatly assisted in the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. In 1812 he made a voyage to Africa, for the purpose of visiting the stations of the London Missionary Society, and returned in 1814. He revisited that country in 1819-21. Of these voyages he published accounts, and founded the "Youth's Magazine," of which he acted as editor for eighteen years. He also published numerous works of a religious tendency. b. at Edinburgh, 1766; d. 1840.

CAMPBELL, Sir Alexander, a lieutenant-general in the British army, who aided in the defence of Gibraltar, and assisted in the destruction of the enemy's floating batteries. After serving abroad nearly twenty years, principally in the East, where he was present at the siege of Seringapatam, and all the grand conflicts from 1793 to 1808, he returned in the latter year to England. Shortly afterwards he went to the Peninsula, where, in 1809, at the battle of Talavera, he commanded the right wing, and was dangerously wounded. Recovering from this he again fought at 1810, and was commander-in-chief of Madras. b. in Perthshire, 1759; d. at Fort St. George, 1824.

CAMPBELL, Lords of Argyll. (See ARGYLE, Lords of.)

CAMPBELL, Sir Colin, Baron Clyde, of Lucknow, G.C.B., and Knight of the Order of the Star of India, &c., was born in Glasgow, and entered the army in 1808. He served with distinction in the Peninsular war, under Sir John Moore and the Duke of Wellington. He led the storming party at the siege of St. Sebastian, for which he received the silver medal; was in the expedition to the United States in 1814 and 1815: in 1842 he commanded the 98th regiment at the attack on Chusan in China, for his conduct on which occasion he was mentioned with commendation in the despatches; in the campaign in the Punjab, in 1848-49, he acted as brigadier-general, and defeated the Sikhs at Ramnuggur, on the 22nd of November, 1848, and on other occasions did good service during the same war, especially at Chillianwallah and Goojerat, in the former of which battles he was wounded. On the breaking out of the war with Russia in 1854, he was appointed to the command of the Highlanders, which, with the Guards' brigade, made up the first division of the army, and was commanded by the duke of Cambridge. In the battle of the Alma, Sir Colin and his Highlanders acted a conspicuous part, and contributed materially to the success of the day; and when the English and French armies took up their position before Sebastopol, to Sir Colin and the 93rd Highlanders, and some other troops, was assigned the task of guarding the approaches to the harbour of Balaklava, through which the British obtained their supplies. The Russians made an attempt to force this position on the 25th of October, in great force, and having seized some redoubts garrisoned by Turkish troops, whom they easily drove in, advanced upon the position held by the 93rd Highlanders. A strong body of cavalry was ordered by the Russians to charge; Sir Colin drew up the Highlanders in line, instead of in squares, as is usual when infantry are to repulse a cavalry charge, and two deadly volleys were poured into the Russian horse, which recoiled, scattered and defeated. The daring manœuvre which opposed the "thin red line" to the charge of cavalry, and the result which justified it, were the theme of conversation by the entire western armies for some time afterwards. Sir Colin was not again called into active conflict with the enemy during the war, or, though after the unsuccessful attack on the Sedan, on the 8th of Sept. 1855, Sir Colin was told that he must take it with his Highlanders before morning, and had made all his arrangements for the assault; ere morning came the Russians had evacuated it, and retired into the town of Sebastopol, from which they were shortly afterwards dislodged. On his return to England, Sir Colin was appointed inspector-general of infantry; and on the breaking out of the rebellion in India, in 1857, was appointed to the command of the troops in that country. He immediately proceeded to his post, and took such wise and able measures as speedily led to the suppression of the rebellion, the capture of Lucknow, the last and most important stronghold of the rebels, having been accomplished by the army under Sir Colin's immediate command. In this gallant enterprise many officers won immortal fame, and the army generally displayed the most undaunted bravery. Sir Colin remained in India for some time after the suppression of the rebellion, assisting Lord Canning in the settlement of the country. For his services in India on this occasion, he was thanked by both Houses of Parliament, was raised to the House of Peers by the title of Baron Clyde, and has the high distinction of being considered not only the most popular, but also the most able and experienced general in the British army. b. 1863.

throughout the wars in Mysore and with Tippoo Sultan, from 1789 to 1801, when he returned to England, and in 1803 went to Portugal, and did good service under both Moore and Wellington, having been present at most of the great battles and sieges in the Peninsula, till the conclusion of the war. After this he commanded a division of the Portuguese army for a year or two. In 1820 he went to India, and was entrusted with the command of the British troops in the Burmese war, and captured Rangoon on the 10th of May, 1823, in twenty minutes after the landing of the troops. A number of severe engagements followed, in all of which the Burmese were defeated, and peace was dictated by the British. For these services Sir Archibald received the thanks of Parliament, and a pension of £1000 a year. He returned to England in 1829, and was created a baronet in 1831. In 1839 he was appointed to command the forces in Bombay, but ill health shortly afterwards compelled him to resign. n. in Edinburgh, in 1843.—Sir John Campbell, the son of the above, was also an officer in the British army, and fell at Sebastopol, in the first attack on the Redan, June 18, 1855. He held the rank of general, was a brave and gallant officer, and universally and deservedly esteemed in the army. n. 1807.

CAMPBELL, Sir Neil, an officer in the British army, who, after serving with distinction in the West Indies and in the Peninsula, was, in 1813, attached as British commissioner to the Russian army, and in that capacity accompanied it to Paris, in 1814. In April of that year he was appointed to attend Napoleon to Elba, and it was during his temporary absence that the emperor escaped on the 26th of February, 1815. Sir Neil was appointed to prosecute Park's discoveries in Africa, towards the close of 1815; and in 1826, was named governor of Sierra Leone, to the noxious climate of which he fell a victim on the 14th of August, 1827. n. about 1770.

CAMPEGGIO, Lorenzo, kam'-paij'-e-o, a cardinal, who was originally a professor of civil law at Bologna, and had married; but losing his wife, entered the church, and was made a bishop. Leo X. created him a cardinal while he was nuncio at the imperial court. In 1519 he was sent legate to England, to collect the tithes for the war against the Turks; and, while there, he was nominated bishop of Salisbury. In 1524 he was sent into Germany, as the delegate of the pope, to oppose the progress of Lutheranism, in which he met with no success. The subject of the separation between Henry VIII. and Katharine of Aragon brought him once more to England; but he was so unsuccessful in his mission, that he incurred the blame of all parties. He was recalled in 1529, and the pope sent him again to Germany, where he attended the diet of Augsburg. n. at Bologna, 1474; n. at Rome, 1539. He was a learned man, and the friend of Erasmus and other eminent scholars. Some of his letters are in a collection printed at Bale, in 1550.—He had a brother, called Thomas, who was also a bishop. He published several works on the canon law, and died in 1564.

CAMPER, Peter, käm'-per, an eminent German physician and naturalist, who studied under Boerhaave, Muschenbroek, Gravesande, and other great men in Leyden university. Having lost his parents at the age of twenty-six, he visited England, France, and Germany, where he cultivated the acquaintance of men of letters. At Berlin he met with a flattering reception from Frederick* the Great. To the study of medicine he united that of many other sciences, and cultivated a taste for the fine arts. He designed, painted, and modelled with exactness and elegance; but he excelled in the study of philosophy and natural history. His works on these subjects were published in a collected form at Paris, in 3 vols. with plates, in 1803, under the title, "Ouvres qui ont pour objet l'Histoire Naturelle, la Physiologie et l'Anatomie comparée." He pointed out the difference of the facial angle in man and beast. n. at Leyden, 1722; n. 1789.

CAMPHTYSEN, Dirk, kamp'-hoo'-sen, an eminent painter, whose landscapes and moonlight-pieces are extremely beautiful. n. at Goreum, 1686; n. 1626.

CAMPET, kam'-pe, a distinguished family of Italian painters, who flourished in Cremona in the 16th century. Their names were—Giulio, the master of the others, Antonio, Vincenzio, and Bernardino. Antonio was an architect as well as a painter; and the whole family were distinguished for eminent talent in conception and care in execution. They exercised a large influence on the character of art in their day, the period during which they laboured embracing little short of a hundred years.

CAMPIAN, Edmund, kam'-pe-an, an ingenious and learned writer in defence of the Papacy, was born in London, in 1540. He was educated at Oxford, went abroad, and being admitted into the order of Jesuits, he taught philosophy in a newly-founded college of the order at Prague. He came to England in 1590, and having attracted by his writings the attention of Walsingham, was apprehended in Berkshire, and brought to the Tower of London with a placard on his hat, bearing the inscription, "Edward Campian, a most pernicious Jesuit." Charged with being concerned in a plot against the life of Queen Elizabeth, he was condemned for high treason, and hanged at Tyburn, December 1, 1581. He was author of a history of Ireland, which country he had visited in 1563, besides other books, which have obtained for him the reputation of an able writer, but a zealous and determined vindicator of the papal cause.

CAMPISTRON, Jean Gilbert de, kam'-pees'-trawng, a French poet, who, at an early age, went to Paris, and there was fortunate enough to acquire the friendship, and receive the advice of, the poet Racine. Through him he became secretary to the duke of Vendôme. His plays possess many beauties, and are formed on the model of those of Racine. n. at Toulouse, 1656; n. 1723.—He also wrote some operas, of which the best known is "Acis and Galatea."

CAMPO-BASSO, Nicholas, kam'-po-baw'-so, a famous leader of Italian mercenaries, at the end of the 15th century, and still more notorious for treachery and unfaithfulness. In the contest for the Neapolitan throne, he at first supported the house of Anjou, but afterwards went over to their opponent, Charles the Bold of Burgundy, whom, in turn, he deserted during the siege of Nancy, in 1477, having joined Ferrand, duke of Lorraine, who had gone to raise the siege, just before the armies engaged in battle. The consequence was, that the Burgundians were totally defeated, and Charles himself slain. The body was found next day stripped, it is believed by Campo-Basso and his followers.

CAMUS, François Joseph de, kam'-moos, an eminent and ingenious French mechanician, w. born of a noble family in Loraine, in 1672, and was admitted a member of the Academy of Science in 1716. He made many curious inventions in connexion with clocks, astronomical instruments, &c. He came to England in the hope of obtaining advantage from his inventions—a pursuit in which he had previously failed in Holland—but was still unfortunate, and died in great poverty, in 1733. His most important work is a "Treatise on Moving Forces for the Practice of Arts and Trades, with a description of twenty-three new and useful Machines," which was published in Paris in 1722.

CANAL, or Canaletto (incorrectly Canaletti), Antonio, kam'-al-ait'-to, a famous Italian artist, was born in 1697, at Venice, where his father was a scene painter at the theatre. He assisted his father for some years, then went to Rome, where he made many sketches of that city and its environs; his principal works, however, relate to his native town, of which he painted a vast number of views. He spent about two years in England, and made a drawing of the interior of King's College Chapel, Cambridge, which is distinguished by all his peculiar excellences in perspective and accuracy of detail. His works are very numerous, and may be found in almost every gallery in Europe, though it is probable that many pieces attributed to him are spurious, the productions of his pupils and imitators. He was remarkable for the accuracy of his details in drawing and for the harmony of his colours; and to obtain the former result he is said to have made use of the camera obscura. D. 1768.

CANDLISH, Robert Smith, D.D., kän'-dlish, one of the most eminent ministers of the Free Church of Scotland, was educated for the ministry of the established Church, and held the parochial charge of St. George's Church, Edinburgh. At the disruption of the Establishment in 1843, Dr. Candlish took a leading part, and assisted, with other eminent clergymen, to form the Free Church. He afterwards became the pastor of Free St. George's, in the Lothian-road, Edinburgh. He published numerous pamphlets and sermons, besides an "Exposition of the Book of Genesis," "Examination of Mr. Maurice's Theological Essays," and other works. In 1861 he was made moderator of the Free Church Assembly. B. 1807.

CANGA ARGUELLES, José, kam'-ga ar-gau-yais, a Spanish author and statesman. In 1823 he became an exile in England, where he produced a "Dictionary of Finance," and "Observations on the History of the Peninsular War." These are his most important works, although he is the writer of several others. After passing seven years in London, he suddenly became an apologist for the measures of Ferdinand, and was permitted to return to his country. He subsequently became a member of the Cortes for the third time. B. in the Asturias, 1770; D. 1843.

CANGÉ, Charles du Fresne du. (See DUCANGÉ.)

CANGIAGO, or CAMBISI, Ludovico, kam'-ja-aw'-go, a Genoese painter, who executed some admirable works in Italy and Spain. B. 1527; D. 1585.

CANNING, the Right Honourable George, kän'-ning, was, on the paternal side, of Irish extraction. His father came to London, entered himself of the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar. Meeting with little practice, he abandoned the law for literature, but being unable to maintain himself in this new vocation, became a wine-merchant, in which capacity he failed, and died of a broken heart. His mother became an actress, and married an actor. He also dying, she was now married to a Mr. Hunn, a linen-draper of Exeter, and lived long enough to see her son attain the eminence to which his distinguished abilities entitled him. George was educated first at Hyde Abbey School, Winchester, then at Eton, and then at Oxford, where he was recognized as a high-class man. He then entered Lincoln's Inn, to follow the law as a profession, but being introduced by Mr. Pitt to the House of Commons, he abandoned the bar, and devoted himself wholly to the study of politics. This was in 1793. In 1796 he was appointed under secretary of state, and in 1800 received a fortune of £100,000 by his marriage with Joanna, the daughter of General Scott. In 1804 he was appointed treasurer of the navy; and in 1807, a year after the death of Pitt, he was appointed, for the second time, secretary of state for foreign affairs. In 1809 he fought a duel with Lord Castlereagh; and in 1812 became member for Liverpool, which again elected him in 1814, 1818, and 1820. In 1816 he became president of the Board of Control, and in 1822 was named governor-general of India, and was about to embark for that country, when Lord Castlereagh, then Marquis of Londonderry, committed suicide. This circumstance led to Mr. Canning's relinquishing his appointment, and again accepting that of secretary of state for foreign affairs. In 1827 he became premier, the great object of a long and arduous political life. The last time he spoke in parliament, was on the 29th of June, 1827. B. in London, 1770; D. at the villa of the duke of Devonshire, Chiswick, 1827.—Mr. Canning had great oratorical ability, with considerable poetical power, and much brilliancy of wit. He was a firm supporter of the cause of Catholic emancipation, and the main promoter of the independence of Greece.

CANNING, Charles John, Earl, was the second son of the Right Honourable George Canning, and on the death of his mother, in 1837, became Viscount Canning. In 1841 he was appointed secretary of state for foreign affairs, and under Sir Robert Peel became commissioner of woods and forests, and afterwards postmaster-general. In 1856 he succeeded Lord Dalhousie as governor-general of India, which appointment he held throughout the whole of the mutiny of the sepoys of 1857, 1858, and part of 1859. For his conduct during this trying period he was, in 1859, created an earl. B. 1812.—He returned to England in 1862, being succeeded in India by Lord Elgin, and died a few days after his arrival, on June 17th, 1862.

CANO, Alonzo, ka'-no, is called the Michael Angelo of Spain, from the greatness of his talents in painting, statuary, and architecture. He studied architecture under his father, sculpture under Pacheco of Seville, and painting under Juan del Castillo. His two colossal statues of St. Peter and St. Paul were considered very fine, and many foreign artists came to copy them. He was soon taken notice of by Philip IV., and created first royal architect, king's painter, and instructor to the prince Don Balthazar Carlos. He adorned the palaces and churches with elegant pieces, both in sculpture and painting; but a singular misfortune occurred while he was in the full career of glory. Coming home one evening, he found his house robbed, his wife murdered, and his Italian man-servant fled. Notwithstanding the strong presumption against this man, the magistrates fastened their suspicion on Cano, who was known to be of a jealous temper. Fearful of the consequences he fled; but afterwards returned to Madrid, where he was racked to extort confession. He endured the torture without uttering a word to criminate himself, when the king caused him to be delivered, and took him again into favour. After this he entered the church as an asylum from further prosecution, but still continued his professional pursuits. In his last moments, when the priest held up to him a crucifix wretchedly executed, he told him to take it away, for it was so badly done that he could not bear the sight of it. B. at Granada, 1600; D. 1676.

CANO, John Sebastian del, the first seaman who sailed round the globe. He accompanied Magellan to the East Indies, and, after the death of that famous navigator, sailed to the isles of Sunda, and doubled, after many attempts, the Cape of Good Hope. He returned to Spain in 1522, after a voyage of more than three years. B. in Biscay; D. 1526.—There was also a Diego Cano, or Cam, a Portuguese navigator, who, in 1484, discovered the kingdom of Congo.

CANONICA, Luigi della, kaw-non-e-ka, an Italian architect, the contemporary of Cagnola, executed many important public and private works in Milan, among the principal of which are the amphitheatre, a vast structure of 800 by 400 feet; the interior of the Orsini palace; the Casa Canonica, and the Ré and Carcano theatres. He also built theatres at Brescia and Mantua, and designed one for Parma, which was erected from his plans after his death, which took place in 1834. He left a considerable fortune, and made several munificent bequests for the promotion of general and artistic education. B. 1762.

CANOVA, Antonio, kaw-no'-va, the eminent Italian sculptor, who, at fourteen years of age, was received into the studio of Bernardi Torretti at Venice, and subsequently into that of Ferrari. His first imaginative group was "Orpheus and Eurydice;" his next, "Dædalus and Icarus," which immediately brought him prominently into notice. Through the interest of Faliero, a senator of Venice, he was enabled to exhibit this work among the leading artists of Rome; and their judgment was so satisfactory that it stimulated him to higher efforts in his beautiful art. He returned to Venice for a short time, but afterwards went back to Rome, with a pension of 300 ducats, settled by his own government upon him for three years. He now produced his "Theseus and the Minotaur," and gave such strong evidences of a graceful yet simple talent, that he was chosen to execute the monument of Ganganelli (Pope Clement XIV.), for the church of the SS. Apostoli at Rome. This exquisite performance was exhibited in 1787, and at once raised him to the highest rank in his profession. He next executed Rezzonico's (Clement XIII.) monument, which, if possible, surpassed the other. This work is in St. Peter's, at Rome. His fame being now established, he employed himself in the production of imaginative subjects. His genius was classical, yet in the highest degree pure and natural. "The Graces," "Cupid and Psyche," "Endymion," "Statues of Nymphs," "Hercutinguished. Besides such works, he executed a large number of monumental groups, as well as portrait statues; among which we may mention his Napoleon I., and Letitia, the mother of that emperor. After his fame may be said to have travelled to the ends of the earth, he visited England, where he was highly gratified with his reception. The object of this visit was chiefly to see the Elgin marbles, the sight of which, he said, was sufficient to recompense him for his journey from Rome. On his return to Rome he received a patent of nobility, with the title of marquis of Ischia, which he never assumed, but, to the last, had his cards engraved with plain Antonio Canova. B. at Possagno, a village in the Venetian territory, 1757; D. at Venice, 1822.

CANROBERT, Francois Certain, kaw-ro-bair, a French marshal, who was educated at the military school of St. Cyr, and, in 1828, entered the army as a sub-lieutenant. In 1835 he accompanied his regiment to Algeria, and took part in the expedition to Mascara in the following year under Marshal Clausel. In 1837 he, on entering the breach at the storming of Constantine, was severely wounded, and afterwards received the decoration of the Legion of Honour. In 1847 he became lieutenant-colonel, and was soon afterwards appointed to the command of a regiment of Zouaves. In 1860 he was made a brigadier-general, in 1852 aide-de-camp to Napoleon III., and, in 1853, a general of division. In 1854 he had the command of the first division of the army of the Crimea, under Marshal St. Arnaud; and, at the battle of the Alma, was slightly wounded by the splinter of a shell. On the death of St. Arnaud, he attained to the chief command; but the rising star of Bosquet burned with greater brilliancy in the eyes of the French. On the 5th of November he was wounded at Inkermann, and had his horse shot under him. The siege of Sebastopol, however, languished; dissatisfaction with the leaders of the allied army began to be expressed; and Canrobert, in 1855, resigned the command. He did not, however, leave the Crimea, but resumed the leadership of his old division, and continued to serve with his usual zeal under the orders of Marshal Pélissier, who had succeeded him. If this was done voluntarily, we cannot sufficiently admire the excellent temper which could submit to what most men, in his position, would have felt to be a galling humiliation. Ill health compelled him to quit the Crimea and return to Paris, where, on the birth of an heir to the imperial throne, in 1856, he was created a marshal. In 1859 he was appointed to the command of a division destined to operate against the Austrians in Piedmont; and at the battle of Magenta, fought on the 4th of June, shared in the honours of that field with General MacMahon. B. at Saint Céré (Lot) 1800.

of intrigues against him in the court after the death of the latter, Cantacuzene was elected emperor by the troops under his command assumed the purple, and was crowned at Adrianople in 1341. It was five years, however, before he was able to enter Constantinople when a compromise was effected, and he was recognised as joint emperor with John Palæologus. But this arrangement did not last; new wars broke out; in 1354 he was compelled to abdicate, and retired to a monastery. He then assumed the name of Josephus Christodialis, and wrote a "History of the Byzantine Empire" from 1320 to 1360, "which is ranked as one of the "Byzantine Histories," and also a vindication of Christianity against Jews and Mohammedans. He is said to have lived for more than 100 years, but the date of his death is uncertain. B. about 1295.—There were two or three subsequent emperors of the same name, who derived, or affected to derive, their descent and claims from the above, but of whom nothing remarkable is recorded.

CANTARINI, Simon, kān'-law-re'-ne, called the "Pezarese," a disciple of Guido, whose paintings are often taken for those of his master. B. 1611; D. at Verona, 1643.

CANTEMIŖ, Demetrius, kān't'-e-mir, a Moldavian prince, of Tartar extraction. Early in life he served the grand seignior, who appointed him governor of Moldavia, which he surrendered to Peter the Great, and obtained from him the title of prince. B. 1673; D. 1723. He wrote a "History of the Rise and Fall of the Ottoman Empire," in Latin; "The System of the Mohammedan Religion;" "The Present State of Moldavia," &c.

CANTEMIŖ, Antiochus, son of the preceding, was educated at St. Petersburg. He was raised to several important offices, and sent ambassador to Paris and London. B. 1709; D. 1744.—He wrote poems in the Russian language, and translated Anacreon and other authors.

CANTON, John, kān'-ton, an experimental philosopher, who, after obtaining a common education, was apprenticed to the trade of broadcloth-weaving. His leisure hours were he devoted to the study of natural philosophy, and his place in the electric, and other particulars. This was fixed against the front of his father's house, and so pleased many gentlemen of the neighbourhood, that he found, by access to their libraries, great helps in his favourite pursuits. In 1739 he went to London, and was engaged as assistant to Mr. Watkins, master of an academy in Spitalfields, whom he afterwards succeeded. About 1746 he made some discoveries in electricity, and in 1750 presented to the Royal Society a method of making artificial magnets, for which he was elected a member, and received the gold medal. In 1751 he was honoured with the degree of M.A. by the University of Aberdeen, and chosen one of the council of the Royal Society. His communications to that learned body, upon astronomical and philosophical subjects, were numerous and important, but he never published any separate work. B. at Stroud, Gloucestershire, 1718; D. 1772.

CANTÙ, Cesare, kaw'n'-too, an Italian historian, whose liberal opinions drew upon him, in 1835, vengeance from the Austrian government, which condemned him to a year's imprisonment.

, and has also been translated into English. He has written several other works, among which we may notice his "Reformation in Italy, and its Antecedents," his latest work, published in 1867. In poetry and poetic criticism he has, likewise, exercised his pen. B. at Brivio, near Milan, 1805.

CANUTE, or KNUT, kān'-ute, "the Great of Denmark and England, succeeded his Sweyn in the former kingdom about 1014. Coming to England in consequence of his reign in Denmark southern coast, where he was ravaged him divide the kingdom into three parts, murder or obtained the states, committing the people by the espousal of Ethelred's widow. He then put to death Edric and several of the English nobles who had basely deserted their sovereign. He likewise levied heavy taxes, particularly on inhabitants of London, but distributed them with an even hand, and showed no partiality to the Danes in preference to the English. The king of Sweden having attacked Denmark, embarked on an expedition against him, and slew the Swedish monarch in battle. Great as was his power, he did not suffer it to inflame him with vanity. He returned to England where it is said some of his flatterers praised him beyond the limits of even parasitical adulation. Shocked at the extravagance of his courtiers, whilst at Southampton, he caused a obelisk to be placed on the seashore. In this he saw himself, and commanding the waves not approach nearer, calmly awaited his mandate to be obeyed. The heedless tide, however, rolled nearer, until it touched his royal feet. "So said he to his flatterers, "how regardless of power are these waves;" and bade them remember that no one should be called sovereign but the Great Being whom the waters and winds alike obey. He subsequently made pilgrimage to Rome, and on his return found the monasteries of St. Bennet, at Holme, and St. Edmund's Bury. D. 1035.

CANUTE III. (See HARDICANUTE).

CANUTE IV., called the Pious, king of Denmark, succeeded his brother Harold in 1080. He undertook an expedition to England, which failed. He made such extraordinary grants of land to the Church, that it excited his subjects to rise against him, and he was slain in a tumult, 1087. On this account he was canonized by Pope Alexander III. in 1164. There were some other princes of the same name, but their history contains nothing of importance.

CAPEFIGUE, Baptiste Honoré Raymond, kāp'-feeg, a French historian and periodical writer, who studied for the law; but becoming a contributor to the newspapers in Paris, adopted literature as a profession. For a time he was editor of the "Quotidienne," and subsequently devoted the energies of his pen to the columns of most of the Parisian leading papers; besides writing for the "Revue des Deux Mondes." Whilst supporting himself by this means, he also was labouring in the mine of history, and has produced upwards of one hundred volumes, most of which have relation to some period the annals of his own country. n. at Marseilles, 1812.

CAPEL, Arthur, Lord, kaï-pel, an English nobleman, who, in the parliament of 1640, voted for the attainder of the earl of Strafford, a measure which he afterwards sincerely repented. Finding that the Parliament went farther against the king than he wished, he began to oppose their violent measures, for which he was created Lord Capel of Hadham. In the war which followed, his zeal in the royal cause induced the Parliament to confiscate his estates. In 1648 he, with the earl of Norwich and Sir Charles Lucas, defended Colchester against the Parliament forces, but was obliged at last to surrender, upon promise of quarter. He was, however, committed to the Tower, whence he made his escape, but being soon taken, was tried and executed, March 9, 1649.

CAPELL, Edward, an editor of Shakspeare, who obtained the place of deputy-inspector of plays, with a salary of £200 a year. He spent 20 years on his edition of Shakspeare; but his comments are rather suggestive than solid. His style is obscure, pedantic, and crippled; so much so that it drew from Dr. Johnson the remark that "the man should have come to me, and I would have endowed his purpose with words; as it is, he doth gabble monstrously." He wrote and edited other works, but with as little ability as he did those of Shakspeare. n. near Bury St. Edmund's, 1713; d. 1751.

CAPPELEN, Goderd Alexander Gerard Philip, Baron Van der, ka-pel-len, governor-general of the Dutch East Indies, was, in 1809, appointed minister of internal affairs under King Louis Bonaparte, with whom, in 1811, he went to his retreat at Gratz, in Styria. On the emancipation of Holland from the French yoke, Capellen was, in 1814, made governor-general of the Dutch East Indies; but he did not set out for the scene of his administration till after the battle of Waterloo, when he proceeded to Java. In 1826 he was recalled in disgrace, notwithstanding the many excellent reforms which he effected and vindicated his conduct in the eyes of his countrymen. He rose once more into favour, and was appointed ambassador to England on the occasion of the coronation of Queen Victoria. n. at Utrecht, 1773; d. at his seat at Vollenhoven, 1848.

CAPELLO, Bianca, kaw-pel'-lo, a Venetian lady, who, from the mistress became the wife of Francis, son of the grand duke Cosmo de Medici. She possessed considerable talents for intrigue, and deceived her lover, who was desirous of offspring, by pretending that she had had a child born her. She and her husband died within a few days of each other, in 1587, not without strong suspicion of being poisoned by the cardinal Ferdinand, brother of Francis. n. at Venice, about 1542.

CAPET, Hugues, ka'-pai, the founder of the Capet dynasty of French princes, of whom very little is known. He is said to have been of plebeian origin, and to have usurped the throne in 937. n. about 939; d. 996.—On the accession of the house of Bourbon, the name of Capet was either given to them or taken by them, and all the processes in the trial of Louis XVI. were made against Louis Capet.

CAPO D'ISTRIA, Count of, ka'-po-dees'-tre-a, a Greek, who began life as a student of medicine, but who entered the service of Russia, and was attached to the embassy at Vienna. In 1813 he became the plenipotentiary of Russia to Switzerland, and gained the favour of the Swiss by advocating the restoration of all the territory which the French had taken from them, and of Russia in the arrangement of the final treaty of peace with France. For the next ten or twelve years he laboured to undermine Turkey; and, on the separation of Greece from that power, he was, after the battle of Navarino, in 1828, installed president of the Greek government. In this capacity, however, he acquired little credit, being constantly at variance with the people over whom he presided. n. in Corfu, 1759; assassinated at Napoli di Romania, 1831.

CAPOZZOLI, Domenico, Patrizio, and Donato, karp-odz-o-le, three brothers, who, sprung from a noble family of the province of Salerno, Naples, became leaders of Italian Carbonari, and from 1821 to 1823, at the head of the support, they were compelled to take to the Calabrian mountains; and the king having sent against them Cattaro, the chief of the police, at the head of a strong force, they were defeated, their adherents massacred in great numbers, and themselves compelled to flee to Leghorn, where they arrived after enduring semistarvation in an open boat on the sea. Their retreat in the hills was discovered by a Neapolitan police spy, who, pretending to be a compatriot, induced them to return to Cilento, where they were betrayed to the authorities, captured after a desperate resistance, carried in chains to Salerno, and beheaded on the 17th of June, 1829, bravely meeting death and praying for their country to the last moment.

CAPPERONIER, Claude, kap'-er-on'-e-ri, the son of a tanner, educated himself, with the help of his uncle, who was a Benedictine monk, till he became one of the most learned men of his time, was appointed professor of Greek in the College of France, and assisted in preparing new editions of the classics. b. 1671; d. 1741.—His nephew Jean, whom he educated, succeeded to his Greek professorship, and was also distinguished for sound and accurate scholarship. b. 1716; d. 1775.

CARACALLA, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, kar'-a-kal'-la, a Roman emperor, who, with Geta his brother, succeeded his father Severus; but, desirous of reigning alone, he slew his brother whilst in the arms of his mother. After gaining over the soldiers, he wantedon in cruelty, and married his mother-in-law. After a reign of six years, marked by acts of the utmost cruelty and extravagance, he was murdered at Edessa by his successor, Macrinus, in 217. b. 188.

CARACCI. (See CARACCI.)

CARACCIOLLO, Francesco, Prince, kaw-rat'-che-o-lo, a Neapolitan admiral, was in the British service for some years, and commanded a squadron before Toulon. Meeting with a cold reception on his return home, he became alienated from the Neapolitan court, and, on the flight of the royal family to Palermo, and the capture of Naples by the French in 1799, Caracciolo entered the service of the government formed in the country, and called the Parthenopean republic. A few months later the Neapolitan citadels were captured by Cardinal Ruffo and the crew of the British ship Seahorse, the patriots capitulating on condition of having their lives spared. Nelson, however, annulled the treaty, and delivered the captives up to the vengeance of the court. Caractacoli was tried by court-martial, composed of Neapolitan officers, on board the British flag-ship, and condemned to be hanged, which sentence, by Nelson's orders, was carried out the same night, the body of the venerable Prince being cast into the sea, into which, it was said, it would not sink. This unhappy transaction has left the only stain on the otherwise brilliant career of the greatest of British admirals. B. 1749; D. 1799.

CARACTACUS, or CARADOC, kā-rīk-ta-kus, a British king, celebrated for his magnanimous deportment when brought before the emperor Claudius, in 51. He had been betrayed by Carismandua. Claudius was so touched on the occasion as to take him into his favour, and to give him his liberty. There were some other British princes of the same name.

CARADOC, kā-r-a-doc, a British historian, who wrote the "Chronicle of Wales" from 6 to his own time. Of this work several copies remain. D. 1156. One copy of his chronicle has been continued to 1196, and another to 1290. They are all in MS.

CARAFÀ, Michele, kaw-ra'-fà, a distinguished musical composer, born at Naples in 1787, son of the Prince de Colobrano, joined the army and served in Murat's hussars, was made equerry to that dashing warlike king, and took part in the French expedition into Russia in 1812, after his return from which he was made chevalier of the Legion of Honour. He subsequently devoted himself to the study of music, and in 1814, an opera by him called "Il Vascello l'Occidente," was produced at the Fondo theatre at Naples. This was followed in rapid succession by a vast number of operas, which were produced, some at Naples, some at Rome, some at Venice, but the greater number in Paris. The success of these operas was varied, but on the whole good, especially in France. He has also written other descriptions of music, such as overtures, a mass, a requiem, a Stabat Mater, several orchestral and piano-forte pieces, &c. He is a member of the Institut des Beaux Arts, is principal of the Gymnase Militaire, which latter appointment gives him a large influence in regulating the adoption of new military music.

CARDAN, Jerome, kaw-r'-dan, a celebrated Italian physician, who, in 1552, went to Scotland, and cured the archbishop of St. Andrews of an asthma which had baffled the skill of numerous physicians. He was next admitted to the court of Edward VI., and cast the nativity of that prince. Thence he rambled through various countries, and at Bologna was committed to prison. On recovering his liberty he went to Rome, where he ended his days. B. at Pavia, 1501; D. at Rome, 1576.—As a physician he was empirical, and in philosophy fanciful and extravagant, but in mathematical knowledge he was eminent. He was so addicted to astrology, that, having foretold the time of his own death, it is said he starved himself to prove the truth of his prediction. His works were printed at Lyons in 1663, in 10 vols. folio.

CARA-MUSTAPHA, kā-ra-moos-tā-fa, a Turkish general under Mohammed IV., after rising from an obscure position to that of grand equerry, was in 1676 appointed grand vizier. His pride, avarice, and cruelty made him very obnoxious; and at the siege of Vienna in 1683, he was so anxious to prevent the sack of the city by the Turkish soldiers, lest the treasures it contained should not fall entirely into his own hands, that he obstinately refused to make the assault, and thus allowed John Sobieski to come up to the relief of the city, when the Turks were utterly defeated and driven back upon their own territory. Cara-Mustapha was arrested for this crime, and, by order of the Sultan, put to death at Belgrade, Dec. 26, 1683. B. 1634.

CARAUSIUS, kā-rā'-se-us, a Roman captain, a native of Belgic Gaul, whom Maximian employed to defend the coasts of Gaul against the piratical Franks and Saxons. Here he acquired so much wealth by his prizes, as to excite the jealousy of the emperor. Carausius, foreseeing the results of this, sailed for Britain, where, in 286, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor by the Roman legions. He now maintained a formidable fleet, and was enabled to resist all attempts to expel him, the Romans being obliged to acknowledge his independence in a treaty. Assassinated by Allectus, one of his principal officers, 294.

CARAVAGGIO, Polidoro da, kaw-r-a-vad'-ja-o, an eminent painter, born at Caravaggio in 1493, but whose family name was Caldara, was employed as a labourer in the Vatican at Rome, when Raffaele was painting the loggia and stanze there, and, from watching the progress of the work, imbibed a love for painting, which being observed by one of the assistants named Maturino, he gave Polidoro lessons in drawing, of which he profited in so remarkable a manner as to soon attract the attention of Raffaele, who encouraged him and gave him work to execute. Maturino and his former pupil worked for several years together, till the sack of Rome by Bourbon in 1527, compelled them to flee, and Polidoro went first to Naples and afterwards to Messina, where he painted a number of altar-pieces and other works. Having amassed a considerable fortune, he was preparing to return to Rome, in 1543, when he was murdered, at the instigation of his servant, on the night previous to his intended departure, for the sake of the money he had provided for the journey. The wretch's crime was afterwards discovered, and he was put to death after having been cruelly tortured.

CARAVAGGIO, Michael Angelo da, by which name Michael Angelo Merigi is usually called, was originally a mason's labourer, but succeeded in establishing himself in Milan and Venice as a portrait-painter, and also executed some historical pictures. He then went to Rome, where he was at first employed by the Cavaliere d'Arpino in painting the accessories of his pictures; but after a time Michael Angelo succeeded in obtaining an independent position, and speedily acquired great fame in Rome. His reputation, however, was not lasting: his style was more distinguished for force and novelty than for true artistic properties; he was idle, capricious, ostentatious, and of an irritable and domineering temper. The result was that his fall was as sudden as his rise had been rapid. Having killed a person with whom he had a dispute while playing tennis, he had to flee to Naples, then to Malta, where a fresh quarrel caused him to be put into prison. He made his escape, however, and wandered about from place to place till, falling sick at Porto Ercole, he died after a few days' illness, in 1609, aged forty years only. B. at Caravaggio, in the Milanese, in 1569. He revolutionized art for a time, and founded a new school, the adherents of which were called "Naturalisti," from their rendering everything set before them with rigid exactness, and without the smallest admixture of idealism—a rule which has in some measure been again revived by the pre-Raphaelites of the present day.

CARDIGAN, James Thomas Brudenell, earl of, kar-di-gan, entered the army in his 27th year, and in 1830 became a lieutenant-colonel of hussars. The death of his father brought him into possession of a large fortune, and he devoted a considerable sum to the service of his regiment. In 1841 he was tried and acquitted by the House of Lords for having fought a duel, in which he had wounded his adversary. In 1854 he commanded the 11th hussars, and, in the same year, was appointed a major-general of the light cavalry despatched to serve in the Crimea. — On the 26th October he led the celebrated charge at Balaklava against upwards of 5000 Russian cavalry. In 1855 he was created a K.C.B. for his services, and, shortly afterwards, a commander of the Legion of Honour, by Napoleon III. He was inspector-general of cavalry in the British army from 1855 to 1860. B. 1797; p. 1868.

CARDWELL, the Rt. Hon. Edward, kar-d-wel, a talented English statesman, who took a double first-class at Oxford in 1835, and was called to the bar in 1838. In the year 1842 he was elected member for Clitheroe, and in 1847 and 1853 represented Liverpool and Oxford successively. His principles attaching him to the policy of Sir Robert Peel, he held the office of Secretary to the Treasury in 1845-46. Under the administration of Lord John Russell, 1852, he was president of the Board of Trade, which he resigned on the accession of the ministry of Lord Palmerston, in 1855. In 1852 he was made a privy councillor, and, under the administration of Lord Palmerston, in 1859, was appointed secretary for Ireland, which office he exchanged in 1861 for that of Chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. This he retained till 1864, when he became Secretary of State for the colonies, holding the same office under Earl Russell until the fall of his ministry in 1866. In December, 1868, he again accepted office under Mr. Gladstone, taking the post of Secretary of War. B. 1813.

CARREME, Marie Antoine, ka-rain', a celebrated French cook, who, abandoned by his parents when quite a child, filled the commonest situations in the kitchen. By his study and labour, however, he raised the culinary art almost to a science, and made his name celebrated at all the courts of Europe. He wrote several works, in which he laid down the principles of his art. The chief of these is "The Art of Cookery in the 19th Century." B. at Paris, 1784; p. 1833.

CAREW, George, ka-roo', a learned English nobleman, who entered upon a military life, and served with reputation in Ireland and at Cadiz. James I. made him governor of Guernsey, and created him Lord Carew of Clopton. He afterwards became master-general of the ordnance, and a privy councillor. Charles I. created him earl of Totnes. B. in Devonshire, 1597; p. 1629.—He wrote a "History of the Wars in Ireland," printed in 1633, folio.

CAREW, Thomas, an English poet, educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford. He was appointed gentleman of the privy chamber, and sewer (taster) in ordinary to Charles I. B. in Gloucestershire, 1559; p. 1639. His masque entitled "Cælum Britannicum" was performed before the king and nobility at Whitehall, 1633; and the beautiful airiness of his effusions places him equal, if not superior, to Waller.

CAREW, Richard, an English topographer, known by his "Survey of Cornwall," printed first in 1602, 4to, again in 1723, and lastly in 1769. Of this county he was, in 1536, appointed high sheriff. B. at Anthony, Cornwall, 1535; p. 1620.

CAREW, Bampfylde Moore, "king of the beggars," an Englishman of roving habits, was the son of a clergyman. He became acquainted with some gipsies located in the neighbourhood of his native town, and was so fascinated by the romantic carelessness of their mode of life, that he abandoned his friends and linked himself to the fortunes of this strange people. The explicit into which his adoption of their wandering habits led him, have been related with a kind of incredible wonder. He would impose upon the same company three or four times a day under different disguises, and with new tales of distress. Sometimes he was a distressed clergyman, ruined because he could not take the oaths; at others, a Quaker, who had met with severe losses in trade. Now a shipwrecked mariner; and the same day, a blacksmith, whose house and family had perished by fire. Proteus would hardly seem to have been a greater adept in the variety of his changes, and he had a method of enticing away people's dogs, for which he was twice transported from Exeter to America, but made his escape. On one of these occasions he travelled from Virginia through the woods, and swam across the Delaware upon a horse, with only a handkerchief for a bridle. He was a man of strong memory and pleasing address, and could assume the manners of a gentleman with as much ease as those of any other character. The fraternity to which he belonged elected him their king; and he remained faithful to them to the last. B. at Bickley, Devonshire, 1693; p. about 1770.

CAREY, Henry, kair'-e, an eminent English musician, who wrote and composed several excellent songs, pastorals, &c., mostly of a comic character, the best of which is "Bally in our Alley." He was likewise the author of a number of farces, some poems, &c.; and a claim was set up by his son that he had composed the national anthem. This pretension, however, was absurd, as the anthem is known to be a much older production. D. suddenly, October 4, 1743; some say he committed suicide, but this is doubtful, as the newspapers of the time make no mention of the fact, although they record the suddenness of his death.—His son, George Saville Carey, inherited a considerable share of his father's talent, and had an intense passion for the stage, on which, however, he was not successful. He wrote and delivered lectures, and was the author of some farces, sketches, &c. He was by profession a printer; but his restless and unsettled disposition prevented his succeeding in business; he was always in difficulties, and died in poverty in 1807, aged 64, having been born on the day his father died. See *of G. CAREY, William, a distinguished English orientalist, who, in 1793, went to India for the purpose of disseminating the principles of Christianity. His labours were originally mostly confined to Bengal, and, in 1801, he became professor of Sanscrit in Calcutta. He acquired a great facility in many of the eastern dialects, and published of them several grammars and dictionaries, which have been the means of greatly extending the knowledge of the Oriental languages. b. at Paulersbury, Northamptonshire, 1761; d. at Serampore, 1834.

CAREY, Alice, an American authoress, who has acquired a wide popularity by her contributions to light literature. In 1850, in conjunction with her sister, she published a volume of poems, which were much admired, and in the following year appeared her romance of "Cloverbrook," which immediately brought her prominently into notice. Her next work was "Hagar," which was followed by several other performances, by no means inferior to their predecessors. b. near Cincinnati, in Ohio, 1822.—Her sister Phoebe is believed to be joint-authoress of several of Miss Carey's works.

CAZZISIMI, Jacques, kaw-ree-ze-me, a clever Italian composer, who, at the beginning of the 17th century, effected a great reformation in the modern music of Italy. In 1619 he was appointed master of the pontifical chapel, and introduced into the church instrumental accompaniments. He composed masses, oratorios, motets, and cantatas, of which the most remarkable are "Jephtha's Sacrifice" and "Solomon's Judgment." b. at Marino, near Rome, about 1604; d. 1674.

CABLEN, Emilie, kay-len', a Swedish novelist, whose works have procured for her both an English and an American reputation. She is the authoress of a great many novels, most of them, if not all, illustrative of Swedish scenery and character. Her best known in England is "The Rose of Tistelön," which appeared in an English dress in 1844, and which has been followed by several other performances in the same manner, and with various success. The rapidity with which her productions have succeeded each other has, by some, been considered to have a damaging effect on her reputation; but to this opinion we demur. Even a bare enumeration of the titles of her performances, however, would occupy a considerable space. b. at Strömstad, Bohusland, 1807.

CARLETON, Sir Guy, kayl'-ton, a British general, who distinguished himself during the American war of independence as commander of the British troops in Canada, was sprung from an ancient family in the north of England, which afterwards removed to Ireland, and was born at Strabane, Tyrone, in 1724. He entered the Guards as a subaltern, and continued in that corps till 1743, when he obtained the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 72nd Regiment; and, in 1758, accompanied General Amherst to America, and distinguished himself at the siege of Quebec in the following year. He acted as brigadier-general at the siege of Bellisle, where he was wounded; in 1762 he attained the rank of colonel in the army, and was present at the siege of the Moro Castle, Havannah, soon after, when he was again wounded. He attained the rank of major-general in 1772, and in the succeeding year was named governor of Quebec. When the American war broke out in 1775, he had full scope for the display of his abilities. The American congress resolved on the invasion of Canada, on which service they sent General Montgomery, who pushed the war with such vigour, that he captured the fort of St. John's, compelled Carleton to evacuate Montreal, and proceeded to invest Quebec. Here Sir Guy determined to make a stand, and on being summoned by Montgomery and Arnold to surrender, treating the demand with contempt, refusing to hold any communication whatever with the so-called rebels. The American leaders made an attempt to take Quebec by assault, but failed in the attempt. Montgomery was killed, and Arnold was under the necessity of abandoning the siege. Carleton was now, from having received reinforcements from Europe, in a position to act on the offensive, and pushed on to Lake Champlain, when a naval engagement took place on the 11th of October, which, although not decisive, induced Arnold to retreat to Crown Point, where he was overtaken by Carleton, defeated, and forced to evacuate Canada. General Carleton was made a knight of the Bath in July, 1776, and in the following year had organized an expedition to co-operate with the principal British force advancing from New York; but the chief command having been conferred on General Burgoyne, Sir Guy resigned in disgust, and after aiding Burgoyne to take the field in an efficient manner, returned to England. In August, 1777, he was made lieutenant-general, and in 1781 succeeded Sir Henry Clinton as commander-in-chief in America, which position he held to the conclusion of the war, and superintended the final evacuation of New York in 1783. He was once more appointed governor of the British North American colonies in 1786; and was next year raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Dorchester. After continuing in America for several years, ably discharging the duties of his extensive governorship, he finally returned to England, and died in 1803; his grandson succeeding to his titles and estates.

Carli

CARLETON, William, an Irish romance-writer of considerable genius and power. The first work which fixed the attention of the public upon him was his "Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry," which was published in 1832, and received by the general public with great favour. This was followed by several other works, which fully sustained the reputation he had already received, as one of the happiest delineators of Irish character. In 1840 appeared his "Fawn of Spring Vale;" in 1845, "Valentine McClutchy;" and in 1847, the "Black Prophet," in which some of the appalling features connected with the famine of 1846 are graphically depicted. These were followed by "Rody the Rover," the "Tithe Proctor," "The Clarionet," and "Willy Reilly," which came out in 1855. For his services to the national literature, Mr. Carleton enjoys a pension from government. b. at Clogher, in Tyrone, 1793.

CARLI, Gian Rinaldo, kaw'-le, an Italian, who, when 24 years of age, was appointed to a new professorial chair of astronomy and navigation in Padua. He subsequently was made president of the new council of commerce at Milan. In 1769 he became the privy councillor of Joseph II., and induced that sovereign to abolish the tribunal of the Inquisition, which had existed in Milan for centuries. b. at Capo d'Istria, 1720; d. 1795.—Carli wrote many works on archæology and other subjects; among which we may mention his "History of the Coins and Currency," and on "The Institution of the Mint of Italy."

CARLINGFORD, Theobald Taaffe, earl of, kar'-ling-ford, took an active share in the affairs of Ireland during the civil war, was proscribed by Cromwell, but afterwards reinstated at the Restoration, and in June, 1662, was created earl of Carlingford, with a grant of £4000 a year. b. 1677.

CARLISLE, Sir Anthony, kar'-lisle, an eminent surgeon, who, after finishing his studies in York, where, for some time, he had received instructions from Mr. Green, the founder of the hospital in that city, went to London, and, in 1793, was appointed surgeon to Westminster Hospital. He now rose rapidly in his profession, and became surgeon extraordinary to George IV. when Prince Regent, who knighted him on the first levée he held after his accession to the throne. In 1808 he became professor of anatomy in the Royal Academy, an appointment which he held for sixteen years. His contributions to medical literature were varied and extensive. He was the first to point out the fact that water might be decomposed by the galvanic battery. b. near Durham, 1768; d. in London, 1840.

CARLISLE, Frederick Howard, fifth earl of, distinguished both as a statesman and a poet, was lord-lieutenant of Ireland, having been appointed to that office in 1780, and was for several years a leader, both in the debates and in gay and fashionable life. He was one of Lord Byron's guardians, and his poetical reputation suffered severely from the onslaught made upon him in the "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," for which, however, Byron made an atonement in the fourth canto of "Childe Harold." Lord Carlisle, besides fugitive pieces, was author of two tragedies, "The Father's Revenge," and "Bellamere." He was born in 1748; and died in 1826.

CARLISLE, George William Frederick Howard, earl of, formerly well known as Viscount Morpeth, was born in 1802. After being engaged in the public service in the diplomatic branch for some years, he was chosen to represent Yorkshire in Parliament, was Irish secretary for several years, then chief commissioner of woods and forests, and in 1859 was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, where he enjoyed a high degree of personal popularity. He was a cultivated and refined gentleman, had an honorable reputation as a scholar, a man of letters, a traveller, and, as an orator, took a leading and respectable part in the debates in the House of Commons while a member of that assembly. The Carlisle family is a branch of the old and honourable race who for many centuries have been earls and dukes of Norfolk. b. 1864.

CARLOMAN, kar'-lo-man, the eldest son of Charles Martel, whom he succeeded as king of Austrasia in 741. He and his brother Pepin united in defending their dominions against the encroachments of their neighbours, and defeated the Germans in 743. Carloman then entered Saxony, took its duke prisoner, and after several successful expeditions, became a monk of the order of St. Benedict. He assembled a famous council in 743, the acts of which bear his name. Lived in the 8th century.—There were three others of the same name; the first was the younger brother of Charlemagne, with whom he had some contention about the kingdom, but, on his death, in 771, left him in full possession.—The second was the son of Louis II., whom he succeeded in 879, in conjunction with his brother Louis III. On the death of the latter he was declared sole king of France, and was killed while hunting, by a wild boar, in 884.—The third Carloman was the fourth son of Charles the Bald, a turbulent priest, who was accused of conspiring against the king, and had his eyes put out. b. about 876.

CARLOS, Doñ, kar'-ios, son of Philip II., king of Spain, was deformed in his person, and so perverse in his temper, that he endeavoured to kill his tutor for gently reproving him. A match was negotiated between him and the Princess Elizabeth of France, but Philip, becoming a widower, married her himself. He was then desirous of marrying his cousin, Anne of Austria; but being crossed by his father, he endeavoured to excite discontent among the nobles. For this he was arrested, and condemned to death. Shortly afterwards he was found dead in prison, not without suspicions of violence. b. 1548; d. 1568.

CARLOS, Don, Count de Molina, was the second son of Charles IV. of Spain. He was educated by Catholic priests, and was little heard of until the accession of his brother, Ferdinand VII., when he was sent to meet Bonaparte, who had announced his intention of paying a visit to the Spanish sovereign in his own dominions. Don Carlos, however, was made a prisoner, and his brother Ferdinand was soon compelled to abdicate all claims to the Spanish kingdom, in favour of his ally, the emperor of the French. Both the brothers were kept prisoners till 1812, when they were restored to liberty, and Ferdinand once more ascended the Spanish throne. Don Carlos now plotted, in conjunction with the absolutist party, against his brother, and in 1825 shared in an insurrectionary movement in Catalonia. In 1830 a daughter, Isabella, was born to Ferdinand, and she was declared heir to the throne of Spain by the Cortes, which set aside the Salic law in her favour. In 1833, however, this law was restored by Ferdinand, when so ill as to be in expectation of death, and from an apprehension of the evils which would arise to his people from the exclusion of Don Carlos from the throne. He, however, recovered, when the evidences that were to secure the succession of Don Carlos were destroyed, and Isabella, on the death of her father, ascended the throne. A civil war now commenced between the Carlists and the adherents of Isabella. For five years the country was desolated by the most savage cruelties that ever marked the progress of a civil conflict. It terminated in favour of Isabella, and, in 1839, Don Carlos took refuge in France. In 1848 he formally relinquished his claim to the crown, and in 1847 went to live at Trieste, where he spent the remainder of his days. b. 1758; d. 1855.

CARLYLE, Alexander, D.D., kar'-lile, a well-known Scottish clergyman of the established church, in the politics of which he espoused the views of the moderate party, of which he was long a leader. He was minister of Inveresk, near Edinburgh; and was distinguished for his singularly imposing personal appearance, his resemblance to the Jupiter Tonans in the capitol at Rome having procured him the title of "Jupiter Carlyle." He left a volume of "Memoirs of his Own Time" in MS., which has recently been published, and is extremely interesting. b. 1721; d. 1805.

THE DICTIONARY

Carlyle

CARLYLE, Thomas, a writer of great power and originality, who, after passing through the university of Edinburgh, with a view to entering the Scottish Church, abandoned that intention, and prepared to devote himself to a literary life. In 1823 he was tutor to Charles Bulwer, who became distinguished in the political history of his country; and whilst acting in that capacity, he occupied his leisure in translating from the German. The works which he produced between his 26th and 32nd years were "A Life of Schiller," "Legendre's Geometry," to which he prefixed an Essay on Proportion; the "Wilhelm Meister" of Goethe, and "Specimens of German Romance," all of which were received with approbation by those who were best qualified to judge of the difficulties with which he had to contend, in imbuing his translations with the true spirit of the originals which he had chosen to render into an English dress. He had now made himself well known in the world of letters, and became a contributor to the "Edinburgh Review," in which he wrote many masterly critical articles. Among these may be noticed his "Essay on Burns" and on "German Literature." In 1833-4 appeared his "Sartor Resartus" in "Fraser's Magazine." From that time he commanded a large circle of admirers, and afterwards produced many works of sterling merit. In 1837 he delivered a course of lectures on "German Literature" in Willis's Rooms, in London, which he followed up by lecturing on other subjects, down to 1840, when he lectured on "Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History." This, we believe, was the most popular of his courses. In 1845 appeared "Oliver Cromwell's Letters and Speeches," which added considerably to his reputation. In 1850 he published the "Latter-Day Pamphlets," which were more remarkable for the singularity of their style than the soundness of their doctrines. In 1851 appeared his "Life of John Sterling." His latest work is a "History of the Life and Times of Frederick the Great." He was elected Rector of Edinburgh University in 1865. b. near Ecclefechan, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, 1795.

CARMAGNOLA, Francesco, kaw'-ma-no-la, a celebrated Italian general, who, having begun life as a swineherd, enlisted as a private soldier in the army of Philip Maria Visconti, duke of Milan, and having exhibited high military qualities, was raised by the duke to the dignity of commander-in-chief of his forces, a promotion which he amply justified, for he secured several important victories, and added largely to the duke's territory. Besides recovering Lombardy, Carmagnola won Brescia, Bergamo, Piacenza, and other cities, to the dominion of Visconti, who in return created him duke of Castelnovo, and loaded him with riches and favour. Becoming jealous, however, of the very greatness he had created, Philip, in 1424, deprived Carmagnola of his command, refused to listen to a defence, and confiscated his estates. The indignant soldier repaired to Venice, offered his services to the senate, by whom they were accepted. Carmagnola led an army against his old master, whom he repeatedly defeated, deprived him of the provinces he had previously gained for him, and in 1428 compelled him to sue for peace. A new war broke out between Philip and the Venetians in 1431, when Carmagnola was again placed in command of the troops of the republic; but not being so successful as formerly, he was suspected of treachery, invited to Venice to confer with the senate, received with great distinction, and then arrested, charged with treason, tortured, and beheaded on the 5th of May, 1432. b. in Piedmont about 1390.

CARMICHAEL, Richard, M.R.I.A., kar-mi'-kel, a very eminent surgeon in Dublin, where he was born in 1779, his father being Mr. Hugh Carmichael, solicitor, of that city. Having graduated in the school of the Irish College of Surgeons, Mr. Carmichael served for some time in the Wexford militia, and then settled as a practitioner in Dublin, where he soon became distinguished for his attention to cancerous diseases, his position as surgeon to St. George's Hospital giving him peculiar opportunities of studying that class of maladies. In 1810 he published a paper on scrofula, and in the same year was appointed one of the surgeons to the Lock Hospital, his observations in which led him to issue a work on the use and abuse of mercury, which has greatly influenced the use of that mineral ever since. In 1826 he founded the Richmond, since called the Carmichael Medical School, his coadjutors in the work being Dr. Robert Adams and Mr. M'Dowall. Mr. Carmichael published altogether thirty-one different works, mostly on scrofula, cancer, and other skin diseases. He held many important official appointments, was a member of the Medical Academy of France, and of other learned bodies; and left by his will many bequests to the medical institutions of his native city. He was drowned on the 8th of June, 1849, while endeavouring to cross the Strand, a rapid stream near Dublin, on horseback.

CARNARVON, the Rt. Hon. Henry Howard Molyneux Herbert, Earl of, kar-nar'-von, a rising statesman of sound Conservative principles, who became High Steward of the University of Oxford in 1859, in which year he served under Lord Derby as under-secretary of state for the Colonies. In June, 1866, he again took office under Lord Derby as secretary of state for the Colonies, but resigned in 1867, disapproving of the Reform Bill introduced by Mr. Disraeli. b. 1831.

CARNOT, Lazare Nicholas Marguerite, kar'-no, a French engineer, who entered the army in 1771, and became war minister to Napoleon I. As a member of the Convention, he voted for the death of the king, and in 1793 became a member of the Committee of Public Safety. The most successful period of the republic, in a military sense, was during the time that he had the organization of its military affairs. It was accordingly said of him that he had "organized victory." In 1797 he was forced into exile, from being suspected of having become favourable to royalty; but on Napoleon becoming first consul, he was recalled. He was then appointed minister of war, but was deprived of that office, with all his other posts, for voting against the consulate for life. After the Russian campaign, he again offered his services to Napoleon, and received the command of Antwerp, which he kept till the abdication of 1814. On the return of Napoleon from Elba, he was once more appointed minister of war, but on the fall of the emperor, he retired, first to Warsaw and then to Magdeburg, where he passed the remainder of his days. b. at Nolay, in Burgundy, 1753; d. at Magdeburg, 1823. As a writer, Carnot is favourably known by his "Essai sur les Machines en Général;" his "Geometry of Position," and several other scientific treatises.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Carolan

His son, Hippolite Carnot, was minister of Public Instruction in the republic of 1843, in which capacity he issued a circular recommending that the departments should send only uneducated rustics to represent them in the chambers. He refused to acknowledge Louis Napoleon, has retired from political life, and is occupied with some important historical works, as well as memoirs of his father. B. 1801.

CAROLAN, Turlough O', kar'-o-lan, a celebrated Irish bard, who to the power of poetry joined that of musical composition, and has been called the "Orpheus of the Green Isle." He was blind, and is said to have traversed the country, mounted on a good horse, with a servant behind him, and to have had the doors of every dwelling he came to readily opened to him, whether the denizens were rich or poor. He composed a vast number of tunes, one harper having, at a meeting in Belfast in 1792, repeated upwards of 100 of Carolan's pieces, although he had never heard or seen him, and believed that there were a vast number more. He was born in 1670, and died in 1738.

CAROLINE, Amelia Elizabeth, wife of George IV. (See GEORGE IV.)

CARPENTER, William Benjamin, M.D., kar'-pen-ter, one of the most eminent physiologists of modern times, passed his examination at the Royal College of Surgeons and Apothecaries' Society in 1835, and subsequently pursued his studies in the university of Edinburgh. Whilst there he made himself popular by the publication of several scientific treatises, and, in 1839, published his "Principles of General and Comparative Physiology," &c., which at once drew upon him the attention of the most distinguished physiologists of the day. He now went to reside in Bristol, where he became lecturer on medical jurisprudence, and produced several other works in connexion with his profession. Indeed, his contributions to physiological science have been of the most important kind, and have been very extensive. A bare enumeration of their titles would occupy a considerable space, and his works would form, in themselves, a large encyclopædia. He became lecturer on medical jurisprudence in University College, London, as well as an examiner in physiology and comparative anatomy. He was also lecturer on general anatomy and physiology at the London Hospital School of Medicine, and in 1841 was admitted a Fellow of the Royal Society. In 1849 he gained the prize of 100 guineas for his essay on "Alcoholic Liquors," which was published in 1850. B. 1813.

CARRI, Ugo da, karr'-pe, an artist, who discovered the secret of painting in chiaroscuro, with two pieces of boxwood, one of which marked the outlines and shadows, and the other impressed any colour laid upon it. In this manner he executed several prints after great pictures; among which we may notice "David killing Goliath" and the "Massacre of the Innocents." B. in Rome, about 1486; D. about 1530.

CARPINI, John de Plano, karr'-pe-ne, a Dominican friar, who, in 1245, formed one of an embassy from Pope Innocent IV. to the descendants of Genghis Khan. The object was to induce them to turn their arms against the Turks and Saracens, instead of invading Europe. There is great obscurity as to the exact place of his birth; but it is supposed that he was born in the kingdom of Naples, about 1210.

CARR, John, kar, an English architect, who gained considerable celebrity in his native county of York, where, and in the adjoining counties, he erected a number of stately mansions. He was twice lord mayor of York, and died worth, it is said, £150,000. B. at Horbury, near Wakefield, 1721; D. at his residence, Askam Hall, Yorkshire, 1807.

CARR, Robert. (See SOMERSET, Duke of.)

CARRA, Jean Louis, karr'-ra, a French political revolutionist, distinguished for his violence in the first great revolution. He joined the party of Brissot, and fell with his leader. B. at Pont-de-Vesle, 1743; guillotined, 1793.

CARRACCI, or CARACCI, Luigi, karr'-rat'-che, the founder of a famous school of painting at Bologna, was the son of a butcher, who gave him an indifferent education; but his taste for drawing was so strong that he was induced to become a disciple of Prospero Fontana. He afterwards pursued his studies in the academy of Passignano, at Florence, and improved himself by visiting the principal cities in Italy. On his return to Bologna his merits became conjunction with them, that school and style of painting which has rendered their names celebrated throughout the civilized world. Luigi was great in landscapes as well as in figure

St. Mary Magdalene, at Bologna.—Speaking of this artist, Sir Joshua Reynolds says:—"His breadth of light and shadow, the simplicity of his colouring, and the solemn effect of that twilight that seems diffused over his pictures, is better suited to the grave and dignified subjects he generally treated than the more artificial brilliancy of sunshine which enlightens the pictures of Titian." Many of his pictures have been engraved, and some by himself.

CARRACCI, Augustin, the elder of the two cousins of Luigi, was the son of a tailor at Cremona. He was placed in the school of Fontana, and afterwards under Passerotti, whilst at the same time he studied the art of engraving, which acted detrimentally on his powers as a painter. Having painted his celebrated picture of Jerome, its success roused the jealousy of his brother Annibal, and caused a separation between them, although they were both engaged in producing important works for the palazzi Magnani and Zampieri. Augustin, for a time, led a free course of life, but at last the contemplation of a Madonna of his own painting struck him with remorse, and he retired to a convent, where he passed the remainder of his days. B. at Bologna, 1557; D. 1602.—He was an accomplished scholar, and as an engraver ranks among the first artists of Italy.

CARRACCI, Annibal, younger brother of the above, studied under his cousin Luigi, by whom he was sent to Rome, where he worked for the pope. He invented a manner so excellent that both Luigi and Augustin adopted it. The Farnese gallery immortalized his name, though he received only the petty sum of 300 crowns of gold (about £200 sterling) for the labour of eight years. B. at Bologna, 1560; D. 1609.—With the death of these three Carracci, the period which may be designated as the golden age of Italian painting closed.—Antony Carracci, a natural son of Augustin, was a pupil of Annibal, and painted some fine pieces in fresco at Rome. b. 1553; d. 1618.

CARRERA, Rafael, kar-re-ra, a person who, born of mean parents in the city of Guatemala, passed his early life as a cattle-driver and drummer-boy; but, in 1837, headed an insurrection against the government, and after a struggle of several years succeeded in creating Guatemala into an independent republic, of which he was twice elected president. Carrera is a wonderful man, considering the disadvantages under which he has had to labour in his career, and has shown singular activity, tact, and ability. After being associated with all sorts of politicians, he settled down into moderate and conservative opinions; and has done great service to his country. b. 1814.

CARRÉL, Armand Nicholas, kar'-rail, the principal editor of the French "National" newspaper, and a distinguished political writer. Opposed alike to the extremities of absolutism in royalty or democracy, he attained a high position as a French journalist; but, being led into a quarrel with Emile de Girardin, editor of the "Presse," a fatal duel was the consequence. b. at Rouen, 1800; d. of a pistol shot at St. Mandé, 1836.

CARRIER, John Baptist, kur'-re-ai, one of the most ferocious of the French revolutionists, who became deputy of the department of Cantal, in the national convention. In 1793 he was despatched on a mission to the departments in the west, where the civil war was raging. The cruelties of Carrier at Nantes recalled to mind the times of Nero. He caused to be constructed covered barges, in which he sunk 100 persons at once. He also invented those horrible executions which went by the name of "republican marriages," and which consisted in fastening together, by the neck, a man and woman, who were then thrown into the Loire. By his means 15,000 individuals are said to have perished, and the water of the Loire was so polluted with dead bodies, that it was prohibited to be drunk. On the fall of the party called the Mountain, he was tried before the revolutionary tribunal, which condemned him to the scaffold. b. at Aurillac, 1756; guillotined 1794.

CARRERRA, Rosa Alba, karr'-re-air'-a, known also as ROSALBA, an Italian female painter, who learnt the rudiments of the art from her father. She was afterwards placed under an eminent artist, and her progress was so great that her full-length portraits became famous throughout Italy. She went to Paris, and in 1720 was admitted a member of the Academy of Painting. After executing portraits of the royal family of France, she proceeded to Vienna, where she received distinguished honours. b. at Venice, 1672; d. blind, 1757. Her miniatures are very highly esteemed.

CARRIÈRES, Francis de, karr'-re-air'-ai a French Franciscan friar, born in Provence in the early part of the 17th century, who wrote a Commentary on the Bible in Latin, and a "Chronological History of the Popes of Rome."

CARRINGTON, Noel Thomas, kar'-ring-ton, an English poet, formerly an apprentice in the dockyard at Devonport. His principal poems are, "The Banks of the Tamar," and "Dartmoor." b. at Plymouth, 1777; d. at Bath, 1830.

CARSTARES, William, kar'-stair, a Scottish ecclesiastical, who devoted himself much more to secular than to religious affairs, having taken an active part in all the intrigues connected with the transfer of the English crown from the hands of James II. to those of the prince of Orange. He was the son of the Rev. John Carstares, minister of the High Church, Glasgow, and was born at Cathcart, near that city, in 1640. During the latter portion of the reign of Charles II. William Carstares resided in Holland, studying at Utrecht. Becoming acquainted with the pensionary Fagel, he was by him introduced to the prince of Orange, who, finding him able, intelligent, self-reliant, and well acquainted with the political state of Britain, and especially of Scotland, employed him in the communications which ultimately led to his being invited to the throne. Carstares was in the secrets of the Argyle and Monmouth parties, was suspected, apprehended in Kent, and sent to Scotland, where torture was applied in order to obtain information, but without effect. His sufferings at this time induced him, at a subsequent period, to take an active part in abolishing the use of torture in legal proceedings in Scotland. Returning to Holland, he was well received by William, and on that prince ascending the English throne, Carstares was entrusted with a large share in the government of Scotland, and was mainly instrumental in effecting a reconciliation between the king and the Scottish Presbyterians, whose pertinacious adherence to the principle of spiritual independence had caused a breach with the sovereign. The political divine was popularly known as "Cardinal Carstares," and was courted and caressed by the needy nobles and gentlemen who had a few years before applied the "thumbscrew" to him in the council-chamber at Holyrood. Even after William's death, the talents and experience of Carstares secured him a large share of influence in Scottish affairs. He was chosen principal of the University of Edinburgh in 1704; and died in 1715, leaving behind him the reputation of having been one of the most sagacious, able, and bold politicians of the age.

CARSTENS, Asmus Jacob, kars'-tens, a Danish painter, was the son of a miller, and had his mother for his first instructor in drawing. In 1789 he went to Berlin, where he was named professor of drawing, and in 1793 to Rome, where he died in 1798. b. near Schleswig, 1754. Amongst his best paintings are "The Death of Achilles" and the "Fall of the Angels."

CARTE, Thomas, kart, an English historian, who entered the church, and published a defence of Charles I., in the matter of the Irish massacre. On the accession of George I. he refused the oaths, but afterwards became secretary to Bishop Atterbury. When that prelate was committed to the Tower, a reward of £1000 was offered for apprehending Carte, who escaped to France, where he remained till Queen Caroline obtained permission for him to return to England. In 1736 he published his "Life of James, Duke of Ormond," in 3 vols. folio. Soon after this, he issued proposals for a History of England. He met with great encouragement, and this work, completed in four volumes, has been highly praised. His MSS. are in the Bodleian library. Besides those mentioned, he published a "Collection of Original Letters and Papers relating to the Affairs of England," in 2 vols. 8vo; a "History of the Revolutions of Portugal," and some other pieces. b. at Clifton, Warwickshire, 1686; d. 1754.

CARTEAUX, Jean François, kar'-to, a French brigadier-general, who entered the service as a private, and rose from rank to rank, until he received the command of a brigade. His principal achievement was the taking of Toulon in 1793, then held by the British. Here he was ably seconded by Napoleon Bonaparte, at that time a simple artillery captain. B. 1751; d. 1813.

CARTER, Elizabeth, kar'-ter, an English lady, who became an excellent Greek and Latin scholar, besides acquiring a knowledge of the German, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Arabic, and Hebrew. She executed several translations, and contributed a paper to the "Rambler" of Dr. Johnson. It was of her attainments in Greek that the distinguished lexicographer said, "that he understood that language better than any one he had ever known, except Elizabeth Carter." B. at Deal, Kent, 1717; d. 1806.

CARTER, Thomas, a distinguished Irish musician and composer of vocal music. Amongst many others, he composed the melodies, "Oh, Nannie! wilt thou gang wi' me?" and "Stand to your guns, my hearts of oak." B. about 1769; d. 1804.

CARTERET, Sir George, kar'-te-ret, a brave and faithful loyalist, who adhered to the fortunes of Charles I. and II. in all their adversities. He was a native of Jersey, of which he was appointed governor in 1626, and there, and in the neighbouring counties, made himself active in the royal cause. Charles II. took refuge with Sir George in Jersey for some time, but a fleet under Blake compelled him to flee to Holland in 1651. He was rewarded at the Restoration with some high offices, and was about to be created a baron when he died, in 1679. B. 1599.

CARTERET, John. (See GRAYVILLE, Earl of.)

CARTERET, Philip, a distinguished naval officer, who, in conjunction with Captain Wallis, in 1766, commanded an expedition to the South Seas. Dr. Hawksworth, in his Introduction to his narrative of Cook's voyages, gives an account of their discoveries. Lived in the 18th century.

CARTIER, or QUARTIER, James, kar'-te-ai, a French navigator, employed by Francis I. in exploring the coast of North America, where, in 1534, he effected the discovery of Canada. B. at St. Malo, 1494.

CARTISMANDUA, kar'-tis-maw'-du-a, a queen of the Brigantes, in Britain, who has gained an unenviable fame by her treachery in betraying to the Romans the unfortunate Caractacus. She put away her lawful husband, Venutius, and took, in his room, his armour-bearer, Vellelocatus. On this, her subjects revolted, which induced her to call to her assistance the Romans, who made themselves thereby masters of the country. Lived in the 1st century. (See CARACTACUS.)

CARTOUCHE, Louis Dominique, kar'-toosh', the most famous robber of modern times, was the son of a Parisian artisan. Whilst very young he displayed his thieving propensities, and was expelled from the school where he had been placed. He then joined a band of robbers who infested Normandy, and soon was made their chief. He afterwards brought his accomplices to Paris, and there daily performed extraordinary feats of robbery, displaying great audacity, courage, and strength. For a long time the officers of justice sought him in vain; but, after many wonderful escapes, he was at length taken in 1721, and broken on the wheel. B. about 1693.—His life has formed the subject of numerous books, and he has been often represented on the stage.

CARTWRIGHT, Thomas, kar'-rite, an eminent Puritan divine, who was a fellow of Trinity College, and also professor of divinity at Cambridge, but getting into controversy with Whitgift and others, he was, when Whitgift became chancellor, in 1571, deprived of his professorship as well as his fellowship, and had to retire to the continent, where he made the acquaintance of Buzi and other eminent scholars. Returning to England, he got into fresh trouble in a controversy with his old opponent, Whitgift, and was once more compelled to go abroad. After this time he was constantly engaged in controversial writing, was twice committed to prison, and died on 27th December, 1633. James VI. of Scotland (afterwards James I. of England) greatly admired him, and offered him a professorship at St. Andrew's, which, however, he declined. B. 1536.

CARTWRIGHT, William, a minor poet of the 17th century, was the son of a gentleman of decayed fortunes who kept an inn at Cirencester. William was educated at Westminster and Oxford, was one of the council of war named by the university, in which he became junior proctor, and reader in metaphysics in 1643. He was the intimate friend of Ben Jonson, who, when he was very young, said of him, "My son Cartwright writes all like a man." He died of a malignant fever which raged at Oxford in 1643, being only 32 years of age, having been born in 1611. A collection of his "Comedies, Tragi-Comedies, and other Poems," was published in 1647, and again in 1651. His plays, especially that entitled "The Ordinary," possess considerable merit.

CARTWRIGHT, Edmund, the inventor of the power-loom for weaving, was educated for the church, and first held the living of Brampton, near Chesterfield, and afterwards that of Goadby-Marwood, in Leicestershire. He had published several poetical effusions, besides contributing to the "Monthly Review," when his attention was accidentally drawn to the subject of mechanical weaving. Accordingly, in the April of 1785, his first power-loom was put in motion; and, although its introduction was much opposed both by the manufacturers and their workmen, it gradually rose into importance, until it has become one of the greatest of the mechanical forces of Great Britain. In 1809 Parliament granted him £10,000 for "the good service he had rendered the public by his invention of weaving." B. at Marnham, Notts, 1743; d. 1823.

CARTWRIGHT, John, known as Major Cartwright, a brother of Edmund, in early life entered the navy, and served at the capture of Cherbourg, and in some other engagements. When the American war broke out, he refused to act against the colonists, in consequence of his notions on constitutional government making him regard the course pursued by the home government as unjustifiable. He stated his opinions in a work entitled "Letters on American Independence;" to those opinions he adhered through life, being always the advocate of political liberty, and was one of the originators of the Constitutional Reform

Society in 1750. He is generally regarded by the more radical party as the father and earliest and most consistent advocate of their principles. A commission in the Notts Militia, as major, obtained in 1775, furnished him with the title by which he was so well known. He was born at Marnham, in 1744, and died in 1821. A statue to his memory was erected in Barton Crescent, London.

CARUS, Marcus Anrellus, kai'-na, a Roman emperor, prefect of the praetorians under Probus, on whose death, in 282, he was elected emperor by the soldiers. He defeated the Sarmatians in Illyria, conquered Mesopotamia, the towns of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and died, it is said, by a lightning-stroke, at the latter town, 283.

CARAJAZ, Francis de, kar'-vick-az, a Spanish captain, who served in America, and contributed greatly to the success of Vaca de Castro, governor of Peru, over the young Almagro. He subsequently joined his fortunes to those of Gonzalvo Pizarro, and was taken with him, and hanged as a traitor, at Cuzco, in 1513.

CARYL, John, kar'-er, the first governor of New Plymouth, North America, arrived there in the Mayflower, 11th November, 1620, and after assisting in making the necessary arrangements for settling the colony, and agreeing to a constitution or compact for the government, began exploring party to fix the site of a settlement, and was elected governor of Plymouth, but died in April, 1621, to the great grief of his companions.

CARY, Rev. Henry Francis, kai'-re, was born in 1772, at Birmingham, and in 1797, published an "Irregular Ode to General Elliot;" in 1798 a collection of "Odes and Sonnets;" in 1797, having previously taken his degree of M.A. at Oxford, he was appointed by the Marquis of Anlessey to the vicarage of Bromley Abbots, Staffordshire, and in the same year published an "Ode to Kosciusko." While at Oxford, Mr. Cary had devoted much attention to the study of French, Italian, and English literature, besides giving due care to the acquisition of a knowledge of Greek and Latin, and soon began to turn this study to account. In 1805, a translation in blank verse of the "Inferno," by him, was published; and, in 1814, in the same species of composition, his version of the "Divina Commedia." This work was some time out before it attracted much attention, but was brought into notice by Coleridge, and went through four editions during the author's life. Cary subsequently produced translations in verse of the "Birds" of Aristophanes, the "Odes" of Pindar, a series of "Lives, in continuation of Johnson's "Lives of Early French Poets," besides editions of the works of Milton, Pope, Thomson, Cowper, and Young. He was appointed assistant librarian of the British Museum, which office he shortly afterwards resigned. A pension of £200 a year was subsequently conferred upon him, which he enjoyed till his death in 1844. He was buried in the Poet's Corner of Westminster Abbey.

CARY, Lott, a negro clergyman, and one of the founders of the coloured colony of Liberia, was born a slave, in Virginia, in 1780. Having acquired some education, he became a baptist preacher at Richmond, where he was employed in a tobacco warehouse; and, being much esteemed, many presents were made to him, and he was enabled to purchase the freedom of himself and two of his children. He still continued his avocations at Richmond, both secular and clerical, received a good salary, and became the owner of a small farm. When the African Colonization Society began operations, he emigrated to Africa; in 1824 took an active part in the organization of the colony; in 1826, the government devolved upon him, which he administered with great success till 28th November, 1828, when he was killed by an explosion while manufacturing cartridges to defend the little community against a threatened attack of the native tribes.

CARYL, John, kar'-il, a poet and dramatist of the 17th and beginning of the 18th century, acted as secretary to Mary, queen of James II., and was knighted by that unfortunate monarch, whose fortunes he appears to have followed in exile, and by whom the honorary titles of earl Caryl and baron Dartford were conferred upon him. He subsequently returned to England, and was on intimate terms with Pope, who dedicated to him the "Rape of the Lock." Caryl was the author of two plays, "The English Princess; or the Death of Richard III.," "Sir Salomon; or the Cautious Coxcomb," a translation of the Psalms from the Vulgate, and other pieces. The dates of his birth and death are unknown; he was, however, living so late as 1717.

CASA, John della, kaw'-sa, an Italian prelate, who, in 1544, was created archbishop of Benevento, and, the same year, was sent nuncio to Venice, where he displayed great diplomatic abilities. He was in disgrace under Julius III., on account of his connexion with Cardinal Farnese; but was restored to favour by Paul IV., who made him secretary of state. B. at Florence 1503; d. 1556. He is accounted one of the most elegant of the Italian writers, and his Latin poetry is very fine. His principal performance is the "Galateo; or, Art of Living in the World;" besides which, he wrote some beautiful Italian poems, the Lives of Cardinals Contarini and Bembo, and other works, collected at Venice, in 5 vols. 4to, 1728.

CASABLANCA, Louis, ka'-sa-be-an'-ka, a distinguished captain in the French navy, who represented Corsica in the National Convention, and was also a member of the Council of Five Hundred. In Napoleon's expedition to Egypt, he commanded the Orient, a 120-gun ship; and, in 1793, at the battle of the Nile, perished with his son, a youth of ten years, who, though seeing the vessel about to sink, would not abandon his dying parent. B. about 1755.

CASANOVA, James, kaw'-san'-o-va, a famous adventurer, of Venetian extraction, who visited different countries of Europe in various capacities. He was at once a schoolmaster, soldier, musician, chemist, writer, and politician; and displayed, in these various callings, a great amount of talent, accompanied, necessarily, by equal chicanery. He was imprisoned at Vienna, and ultimately died there, 1803; b. at Venice, 1725. He left, besides other books, a History of his Captivity, and his Memoirs, which have been translated into French.—His brother Francis was a painter of battle-pieces.

CASATRON, Isaac, ka'-sa'-baw-na, a learned Swiss divine and critic, who, at the age of 23, was chosen professor of Greek at Geneva, and subsequently at Montpellier and Paris. In 1536 he married a daughter of Henry Stephens, a learned printer, by whom he had twenty children. In 1600 he was appointed one of the Protestant judges in the controversy between Du Perron and Du Plessis Mornay, and decided against the latter. Three years later, he became head librarian to Henry IV. of France, and on the death of that monarch removed to England, where James I. settled upon him a considerable pension, and made him a prebendary of Westminster, and also of Canterbury. In this country he passed the remainder of his days, a rigid adherent to the principles of Protestantism. b. at Geneva, 1559; d. 1614, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Casaubon was the author of many learned works; among which we may notice his "De Libertate Ecclesiastica," suppressed by Henry IV. as offensive to the Pope; "De Rebus Sacris et Ecclesiasticis," "A Criticism on Baronius," and his editions of several of the Greek and Latin classics.

CASAUBON, Meric, son of the above, was made a prebendary of Canterbury, and held two livings in Kent, of which he was deprived in the civil war. Cromwell made him large offers to induce him to write the history of the war, but he steadily refused to comply. He also refused to accept an invitation from Christina, queen of Sweden, to superintend the universities in her kingdom. At the Restoration he recovered his preferments. b. at Geneva, 1599; d. 1671.—His most remarkable work is a treatise on "Credulity and Incredulity," wherein he maintains the existence of witches.

CASIMIR I., kaz-i-mee, king of Poland, surnamed the Peaceful, son of Miecislau, whom he succeeded in 1024. The Poles revolting under the regency of his mother, he went to Paris, and became a monk. The Poles, a prey to internal dissensions, induced Pope Benedict IX. to allow him to return to his kingdom and to marry. Accordingly, he espoused a daughter of the grand-duke of Russia, and afterwards governed his kingdom with great wisdom. d. 1058.

CASIMIR II., king of Poland, surnamed the Just, was the younger son of Boleslaus III. When his brother Miecislau was, on account of his tyranny, deposed in 1177, the Poles conferred the crown on Casimir. He was an upright, generous prince. b. 1117; d. 1194.

CASIMIR III., the Great, succeeded Ladislaus IV. in 1333. He defeated John, king of Bohemia, and conquered a part of Russia. He united to his warlike qualities the attributes of a great king; maintained peace, founded several churches and hospitals, and built numerous fortresses. He is said, however, to have been a man of strong passions, which he frequently indulged to excess. b. 1300; d. 1370.—In his reign privileges were bestowed on the Jews, which they ever continued to enjoy; these were granted at the request of a Jewess named Esther, one of his favourites.

CASIMIR IV. was grand-duke of Lithuania, and ascended the throne of Poland 1445. He defeated the Teutonic knights, and made war with varied success against the king of Hungary and the Tartars. d. 1492.

CASIMIR V., John, son of Sigismund III., succeeded to the throne of Poland on the death of Ladislaus VII.; obtaining permission to marry his brother's widow. Defeated at first by Charles Gustavus of Sweden, he subsequently, with the aid of the emperor Leopold, was victorious, and, in 1660, concluded the treaty of Oliva with his successor. Shortly after, his troops, under Sobieski, defeated the Tartars. The cares of government, and the loss of his wife in 1667, induced him to resign the crown, and retire to France, where he died in 1672. b. 1600.

CASINI, kass-ee'-e, a learned Oriental scholar, who took orders at Rome, and taught the Eastern languages in that city. In 1715 he repaired to Madrid, where he was made a member of the Academy of History, interpreter to the king, and head librarian of the Escorial. From 1750 to 1770 this industrious man laboured at the compilation of a description and analysis of all the Arabian MSS. contained in the library of the Escorial, the richest in Europe in works of that kind. This esteemed production was published at Madrid, 2 vols. folio, the second containing most interesting accounts of the battles of the Moors and Christians in the Peninsula. b. at Tripoli, Syria, 1710; d. at Madrid, 1791.

CASLOW, William, kass'-lon, a distinguished letter-founder, was originally occupied in engraving ornaments on gun-barrels, and in the manufacturing of bookbinders' tools; but after-country residence at Litchamere, b. (which was country then) in 1768. d. in Shropshire, 1832.

CASS, Lewis, kass, an American politician, who, in the war between England and the United States, in 1812, made an incursion into Canada, and was taken prisoner. When peace was concluded, he was appointed governor of Michigan, and organized that vast territory, making treaties with the Indian tribes, by which three millions of acres were added to the state. Under the presidency of General Jackson, in 1831, he was secretary for war, and four years afterwards, was sent to Paris as envoy extraordinary. Here he remained seven years, and whilst engaged in this mission, published his "Views on the Subject of the Limitation of the Northern Frontiers of the Union," and protested against the adhesion of M. Guizot to the doctrine of the "right of visit." The treaty concluded in 1842, between England and the United States, not meeting his approval, he resigned, and returned to America. In the Senate he voted for the Fugitive Slave Law, and in 1857 was made secretary of state under President Buchanan. b. 1782.

CASSANDER, kass-sander, the son of Antipater, took possession of the kingly power in Macedonia on the death of his father. He caused the death of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, and also of his son, the young Alexander. Joining his forces to those of Seleucus, Ptolemy, and Lysimachus, he defeated Antigonus at the battle of Ipsus, 301 b.c., the latter monarch falling on the field, and the four conquerors dividing between them Alexander's empire into the great kingdoms of Macedonia, Thrace, Egypt, and Syria. (See ANTIGONUS, &c.)

CASSIANI, Julian, kass-ee-an'-e, one of the best lyrical poets of Italy, was born at Modena in 1713, and became successively professor of Poetry in the Nobles' College of his native city, and of Eloquence in the University. His works, both in poetry and prose, were published by one of his pupils. d. 1778.

CASSINI, Giovanni Dominic, kass-ee'-ne, a celebrated Italian astronomer, was educated among the Jesuits at Genoa, and succeeded, in 1650, Cavallieri, as professor of astronomy at Bologna. He here gained so great a reputation that both the pope and the senate of Bologna intrusted him with several scientific and political missions. In 1669 Colbert induced him to visit France. He was there naturalized, and became a member of the Academy of Sciences. n. at Fer'naldo, in Nice, 1625; n. at Paris, 1712. Cassini discovered several of Jupiter's and Saturn's satellites, and determined the rotation of Jupiter, Mars, and Venus. He published a "Theory of Jupiter's Satellites," remarkable for its correctness, and assisted in the measurement of the meridian line of Paris. He left behind him a great number of astronomical memoirs and observations.

CASSINI, James, son of the above, at 17, was admitted to the Academy of Sciences, and enriched science with many valuable discoveries. In 1729 he published a book on the figure of the earth, in which he maintained, in opposition to Newton, that it was an oblong spheroid. To determine this, the French king sent two companies of mathematicians, one towards the polar circle, and the other to the equator, to measure a degree, the result of which was a decided refutation of Cassini's opinion. n. at Paris, 1667; n. 1756.

CASSINI DE THURY, CÉSAR FRANÇOIS, son of the above, evinced, at a very early age, great talents for astronomy, and was received into the Academy of Sciences at 22. He was employed many years in perfecting a general map of France, and in continuing the trigonometrical survey of that country. The former was composed of 180 sheets, and gave a most complete representation of the country, on a scale of a line to 6 feet. CÉSAR FRANÇOIS was unable to finish it; but it was at length concluded by his son, who presented it, in 1789, to the National Assembly. He published a great number of papers in the "Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences." n. at Paris, 1714; n. 1784.—He was succeeded in his office by his only son, Count John DOMINIQUE Cassini. n. 1748; n. 1845.

CASSIODORUS, Marcus Aurelius, kā-si-o-dor'-us, an Italian of great talents, who was appointed by Theodoric, king of the Goths, governor of Sicily, and filled some of the highest offices in Rome, but afterwards retired to a monastery in Calabria. He was celebrated as a chronologist and historian, and is said to have devoted himself also to mechanical pursuits, and invented water-clocks, sun-dials, and lamps. n. in Calabria, about 481; n. 577.

CASSIUS, Caius, kāsh'-e-us, a Roman general, one of CÉSAR's murderers. During the civil wars between Pompey and CÉSAR, he followed the fortunes of the former. After the decisive battle of Pharsalia, he was, however, spared by the conqueror. Returning to Rome, he married Junia, the sister of Brutus, and in conjunction with the latter, formed a conspiracy against the emperor. After the death of their victim, 44 B.C., Cassius received Africa as his reward, but found himself unable to maintain himself there, in consequence of the influence of CÉSAR's friends. Passing into the East he levied numerous troops, and joined Brutus in Macedonia. On the plains of Philippi, where Anthony and Octavius met them, the left of the army, under Cassius, was defeated by Antony's troops, which neutralized the success which Brutus was achieving on the right. Fearing to fall into the enemy's hands, he ordered one of his freedmen to run him through, and perished, by the very sword which had given a wound to CÉSAR, 42 B.C. His body was honoured with a magnificent funeral by his friend Brutus, who declared over him that he deserved to be called "the last of the Romans." If he was brave, he was equally learned. Some of his letters are still extant among Cicero's epistles. He was often too rash and too violent, and many of the wrong steps which Brutus took are to be ascribed to the prevailing advice of Cassius. Shakspeare describes him as having "a lean and hungry look," and makes CÉSAR say,—

— "He reads much;

He is a great observer, and he looks Quite through the deeds of men; he loves no plays,

As thou dost, Antony; he hears no music; Seldom he smiles; and smiles in such a sort, As if he mock'd himself, and scorn'd his spirit,

That could be moved to smile at anything."

The day after CÉSAR's murder he dined at the house of Antony, who asked him whether he had then a dagger concealed in his bosom. "Yes," replied he, "if you aspire to tyranny."—There were many other Romans of this name, in whose lives there is nothing very remarkable.

i. kis-si-ve-law'-nus, a British chief, who was invested with the supreme command of the forces of the island, to oppose Julius CÉSAR during his invasion of Britain, 54 B.C.

CASTAGNO, Andrea del, kaws-tan'-no, a Tuscan painter, who worked first in fresco, but afterwards learned the art of painting in oil from Domenico Veneziano. His repayment for this was to assassinate his friend. Unsuspected, he pursued his calling, and produced some fine pictures, the principal of which is the "Execution of the Conspirators against the Medici," now in the Hall of Justice at Florence. n. about 1400; n. about 1480.—Stung with remorse, he on his death-bed confessed, amidst universal execration, the atrocious crime of which he had been guilty, and was in consequence called the "Infamous."

CASTAÑOS, Francis Xavier de, kas-ta-yo, duke de Baylen, the most distinguished of the Spanish generals who figured in the Peninsular war from 1807 till the expulsion of the French by Wellington. Castaños commanded the Spanish army which defeated Dupont at Baylen in 1808; but, in the same year, was beaten by Napoleon at Tudela. He subsequently acted in concert with Wellington, and commanded the Spanish division which accompanied the latter into France in 1815. After the settlement of affairs in the Peninsula, consequent on the downfall of Bonaparte, Castaños occupied several important positions in the government, and died in Sept. 1853, ten days after Wellington had breathed his last. n. about 1758.

CASTELNAU, Pierre de, kas-aîl'-no, archdeacon of Maguelone, was sent, at the commencement of the 13th century, by Innocent III. into the south of France as legate extraordinary, in order to search out the heretic Albigenses, and deliver them over to the secular arm. He met with a determined resistance, and was at last slain in the territory of Raymond, count of Toulouse. This murder led to the excommu-

CASTELLANE, Esprit Victor Boniface, kas-tel-lan, marshal of France and senator, born in Paris, March 21, 1788. His father was a deputy to the States-General in 1789. The future Marshal entered the army, when 16 years of age, in 1804, as a private, and in 1806 was a sub-lieutenant of dragoons in the army of Italy. The following year he became lieutenant, and went to Spain with Count Loban as aide-de-camp. At Burgos, he took a piece of cannon at the head of his company. Eckmühl, Ratisbon, Essling, and Wagram all witnessed the brilliant valour of Lieutenant Castellane. "Intrepid young man!" was the exclamation of the Emperor, when he gave him the cross on the field of Wagram. After such a compliment, pronounced publicly in presence of the bravest of the brave, young Castellane was certain to pass through fire to gain all his grades at the point of the sword. In 1810 he was a captain, and he again accompanied Count Loban as aide-de-camp in the Russian expedition of 1812. Having been promoted at Moscow to the rank of chef d'escadron, he was next aide-de-camp to the Count de Narbonne in the same campaign. During the retreat, at the head of 25 lancers of the Imperial Guard, he started from Kroiskoi, crossed a vast extent of country occupied by the Russian troops, and found means, in the midst of countless dangers, to carry important orders from the Emperor to Colonel Bourmont. At the Beresina he excited the admiration of all his companions in arms by his energy and coolness. At the restoration in 1815, M. Castellane was at first neglected, but towards the end of that year he was charged with organizing the hussars of the Bas-Rhin (5th Regiment), and obtained other military employments. In 1831-32 he commanded the department of the Haute-Saône. His gallant conduct at the siege of Antwerp procured him the rank of lieutenant-general. In 1837 he was raised to the peerage, after good service in Algeria. He was in command of the military division of Rouen when the Revolution of 1848 broke out. His firmness under very trying circumstances saved his division entire, and not a man was wanting when he handed it over to his successor. After 1852 he held the chief command at Lyons, and fully justified the Emperor's confidence, and his own motto of "Honos ab armis." At different dates he received the baton of a marshal, was made a senator, grand cross of the Legion of Honour, and was decorated with most of the orders of Europe. d. September, 1862.

CASTIGLIONE, Duode, kawst'-tel-le-o'-nai. (See AVGEREAU, Marshal.)

CASTIGLIONE, Giovanni Benedetto, called by the French Le Benedette, and at Mantua Il Grechetto. He is one of the most eminent of the Genoese painters and etchers. In animal and pastoral painting especially he excelled. His chef-d'œuvre is the "Nativity of the Saviour," in the church of San Luca, Genoa. b. at Genoa, 1616; d. at Mantua, 1670.

CASTIGLIONE, Balthazar, an Italian writer and politician, who, after serving with great bravery in a military capacity, was employed by the duke of Urbino in state affairs, and sent ambassador to several courts. He was also engaged in the same service by Pope Clement VII., and became nuncio at the court of Charles V., who held him in high estimation. b. at Mantua, 1478; d. at Toledo, 1529. His greatest work is "Il Cortigiano," or "The Courtier," written in an elegant style, and abounding with good rules and reflections.

CASTIGLIONE, Count Carlo Ottavio, an eminent Grecian philologist, numismatist, and biblical scholar, who has written some learned works on the dates of the cities of Barbary the names of which appear on Arabian coins. He has also, in conjunction with cardinal Mai, superintended the publication of several MSS. versions of the Bible, particularly the fragments of the Gothic translation found in the Ambrosian library, which embrace portions of the Old Testament, and several of the Pauline epistles, all of which are of great value, in consequence of the remarks, glossaries, and excursions which accompany them. These MSS. were edited and published at different periods, between 1819 and 1839. b. at Milan, in 1795.

CASTILHO, Antonio Feliciano de, kas-tel'-yo, one of the most distinguished modern Portuguese poets, who early discovered his genius, and first came into notice by the publication of a meritorious imitation of Ovid, entitled "Letters from Echo to Narcissus." He has written much poetry with various success, and was the founder of a magazine which had a considerable circulation. b. at Lisbon, 1800.

CASTLEBAGH, Lord. (See LONDONDERRY, Marquis of.)

viceroy of the Indies, allied to the royal family of his country. In 1545 he was appointed to the government of the East, and gained several considerable victories over the natives. As honest as brave, he died poor, and was buried at the public expense. It is said that once, wanting to raise a loan to assist commerce, he offered his "moustaches" as a security; the lenders, however, were satisfied with his word. b. at Lisbon, 1500; d. at Goa, India, 1548.

CASTRO, Vaca de, priest and judge-royal of Valladolid, was sent by Charles V. to Peru, in 1540, to suppress the various contending factions, and to regulate the interior administration of the province. On his arrival he learnt the assassination of Pizarro, and Almagro's usurpation. Marching an army against the latter, he defeated, and executed him with his accomplices. This done, he endeavoured to ameliorate the lot of the Indians by wise regulations, but fell into disgrace on this account, 1544. d. in Spain, 1558.

CASTRUCCIO, Castracani, kawst'-troot'-che-o, a distinguished Italian soldier, who was designed for the church. In his youth the quarrels of the Guelphs and Ghibelines were distracting Italy, and he, as one of the latter party, was driven out of Pavia. After serving with distinction in Lombardy, he went to England, and entered the army of Edward I.; but was forced to quit the country, having killed a nobleman in a duel. He then became a soldier under Philip the Fair of France, and subsequently returned to Italy, where the Ghibelines of Lucca made him their chief. He had here much to combat, both in the jealousies of his friends and the strength of his enemies; but ultimately succeeded in overcoming all difficulties. In 1320 he was proclaimed duke of Lucca, and was recognised by the emperor Louis of Bavaria. b. at Lucca, 1294; d. 1328. His life has been written by Machiavelli.

Catalani

CATALANI, Angelica, kut-gu-lar-ne, the celebrated vocalist, was born at Sinigaglia, in the vicinity of Rome, in 1753. When only a child, her fine voice attracted attention, and she was placed in the convent of St. Lucia, at Gubbio, for instruction; and, while there, so excited the people by her singing in the choir, that they could not repress a burst of applause, which could only be avoided by disallowing her taking part in the services. When only 15 years of age, she appeared upon the stage in Venice with marked success; she next went to Portugal, where new laurels awaited her, and where she married M. Valabreque, an attaché of the French embassy—an union which, originating in a romantic feeling of preference on each side at first sight, was one of unbroken happiness. Catalani afterwards went to Madrid, Paris, and London: in the latter of which cities she made her first appearance in December, 1806, in the opera of "Semiramide," creating a sensation altogether unexampled in opera performances in England. During the following season, she is said to have realized upwards of £10,000 by her performances in the opera and at concerts. She was made directress of the Théâtre Italien, Paris, by Louis XVIII., during the first restoration, with a subvention of 150,000 francs; and again after the final fall of Napoleon. She subsequently visited Germany, Russia, and returned to London in 1821, where her popularity continued, though her powers were believed to have become somewhat impaired. She continued her professional exertions till 1827, when she retired to an estate she had bought near Florence, where she devoted herself to the education of her children and the encouragement of musical study; having, with the latter view, established an academy in the capital of Tuscany. Madame Catalani was distinguished by her charity and benevolence, as well as by her extraordinary vocal powers; and frequently, besides liberal contributions in money, gave to charitable purposes the still more valuable aid of her performances. D. at Paris, of cholera, in 1849.

CATESBY, Mark, F.R.S., kates'-be, an English naturalist, who from 1712 to 1728 occupied himself in collecting specimens of natural history in Virginia, Carolina, Florida, and the Bahama Isles. Returning to England, he published, in 2 vols. folio, with beautiful coloured plates, the Natural History of those countries. He was also the author of other works. B. 1690; D. 1740. Gronovius designated a genus of plants Catesbia after him.

CATESBY, Robert, instigator of the Gunpowder Plot. (See JAMES I.)

CATHARINE, kath'-ar-ine, the daughter of Charles VI. of France, and wife of Henry V., king of England. After the death of that prince, she married Owen Tudor, by whom she had a son called Edmund, who became the father of Henry VII. B. 1401; D. 1438. For the manner in which this lady, according to Shakspeare, was wooed and won by "Harry of England," the reader is referred to the fifth act of "Henry V."

CATHARINE I., empress of Russia, from being born of poor Livonian parents, became the wife of a Swedish dragoon, who was killed at the taking of Marienburg by the Russians. She then became the mistress of General Bauer, and subsequently obtained a situation in the family of Prince Menschikoff, who was fascinated by her beauty. She now attracted the notice of the Czar, Peter the Great, who made her his mistress, and, in 1711, his wife. At his death he left her the throne. In 1725 she was proclaimed empress, and continued to execute the great designs which had been left unfinished by her husband. B. in Livonia, 1683; D. 1727. (See PETER THE GREAT.)

CATHARINE II., empress of Russia, was the daughter of the prince of Anhalt Zerbst. Her original name was Sophia Augusta, but on her marriage, in 1745, with the grand-duke of Russia, afterwards Peter III., she was baptized according to the formulary of the Greek church, and named Catharine Alexievna. She bore her husband two children: Paul, who succeeded her, and Anne, who died an infant. On the death of the empress Elizabeth, in 1761, Peter came to the throne, and soon discovered his intention of disinheriting his son and divorcing Catharine. She, however, anticipated his designs, and formed a conspiracy against him. Accordingly, she gained over the nobility and the army, and on June 27, 1762, Peter, after signing a renunciation of his crown, was sent prisoner to the palace of Ropseha. Between the prisons and the graves of princes the distance is short. On the 17th of July, Alexis Orloff, the empress's favourite, with some other conspirators, strangled Peter, who, the empress gave out, had died of colic. She did not take any measures against the assassins, and in the following September was crowned at Moscow. The regulations adopted at the beginning of her reign were in the manner and spirit of Peter the Great. She affected to rule by clemency, and laboured to win the hearts of her subjects by acts of liberality. She also avoided foreign war till she had settled the tranquillity of the empire. Fond of literature and the arts, she gave unbounded encouragement to their introduction to her dominions, and held a correspondence with the most eminent literary characters in Europe. In 1761 she caused her favourite, Poniatowski, to be crowned king of Poland, under the name of Stanislaus Augustus. She also caused a liberal code of laws to be enacted, in which the practice of torture was abolished; attended to the subject of education, and took means to diffuse knowledge among all classes of her subjects. She encouraged medical discovery by submitting, herself, to inoculation, and in every way laboured for the enlightenment of her people. In 1768, Catharine's arbitrary interference in the affairs of Poland induced Turkey to declare war against Russia; the result of which was the first partition of Poland, between Catharine, Joseph II. of Austria, and Frederick of Prussia, in 1772. More than one-third of that kingdom was then shared by the three powers, Russia taking the larger portion of Livonia and Lithuania. In 1774 the peace of Kainardji was concluded, and Azof and Taganrog were annexed to Russia, and the Crimea made independent of Turkey. Peace being restored, the empress devoted her attention to public improvements and to political engagements. In 1780 she formed, with the other northern states, the famed armed neutrality, the object of which was to protect the Baltic trade from the belligerent powers. In 1782 she founded a Roman Catholic archbishopric in her dominions, for her subjects of that persuasion. About the same time she created a new military order by the title of St. Vladimir. In 1785 she seized on the Crimea and Kuban, which so alarmed the Porte, that war became almost inevitable: but the accession of Germany as an ally to Russia stopped the preparations, and the Turks yielded to the aggression. In 1787 Catharine travelled through her new territory with a magnificent retinue, and at Cherson had an interview with the emperor Joseph II. Immediately after this, war again broke out between Russia and the Porte, in which the former was assisted by Germany and the latter by Sweden. Hostilities were carried on with great fury. Oczakow was stormed by the Russians, and a prodigious carnage ensued; Ismail was also taken by Suwarrow in the same manner, and the Turks were, in general, everywhere unsuccessful. In 1792 peace was concluded, when, by the treaty of Yassi, the Porte ceded to Catharine the important fortress of Oczakow, and the frontiers of Russia were extended to the Dniester. Shortly after, the attention of Catharine was drawn to the state of Poland, where a spirit of revolt had broken out, and the people seemed determined to shake off a foreign yoke. A Russian army was immediately despatched to that province, and decided the fate of Poland by the massacre of the inhabitants of Warsaw. That kingdom was again partitioned between Russia, Germany, and Prussia, when the whole of Lithuania, Volhynia, and Podolia were given to Russia. This is historically called the second partition of Poland, and took place in 1793. In 1795 the third and last partition of Poland was effected, when Russia had the greater part of what remained of that kingdom. Courland was next annexed by Catharine to her empire, after which her life was suddenly terminated by a fit of apoplexy. b. 1729; d. 1796. The passions of this woman were as gross as her mental and governing powers were great.

CATHARINE OF ARAGON. (See HENRY VIII.)
LEINE DE MEDICI, kät'-er-ine de med-e-
... of France, was the daughter of Lorenzo de Medici, duke of Urbino. In 1533 she married the second son of Francis I., afterwards Henry II. After the death of her husband and that of her eldest son, Francis II., she possessed herself of the regency of the kingdom during the minority of her second son, Charles IX. Chicane and dissimulation distinguished her government. Exciting the civil war between the Catholics and Huguenots, she resolved on the destruction of the latter, after having feigned to favour them for a time, and will be ever infamous as the principal instigator of the horrible massacre of St. Bartholomew, in 1572. Subsequently, she quarrelled with her son, Charles IX.; and finally lost her power at court, in the reign of Henry III. of France. b. at Florence, 1519; d. at Blois, 1589.—Notwithstanding her evil propensities, Catharine possessed the love of literature and the arts which distinguished the Medici family. By her orders the palace of the Tuileries, the Château of Monceaux, &c., were built. She was, it is said, a strong believer in astrology.

CATHARINE PARR. (See HENRY VIII.)

CATHARINE OF SIENA, se-ai-na, a saint in the Romish calendar, was a dyer's daughter, and entered, at the age of twenty, into the institution of the Dominican sisters. There, it is asserted, revelations were made to her which soon rendered her famous. She played an important part in the schism in the Church which broke out in 1373, between Popes Urban VI. and Clement VII., Catharine declaring for the former. She wrote some treatises on devotion, letters, and poetical pieces, which have been described as remarkable for the elegance and purity of their style. This, however, is somewhat doubtful. b. at Siena, 1347; d. ennobled by her austere penances, 1384. Mr. Augustus Trollope, in his "Decade of Italian Women," published in 1850, presents a interesting account of Catharine of Siena.—There were, at Bologna and Genoa, two other saints of this name, celebrated for their piety and mystical writings. The former lived in the 15th, the latter in the 16th century.

CATHECART, William Schaw, kät'-kört, tenth baron (in the Scottish peerage), and first earl of, a distinguished British general, was born in 1755, and, after studying for the bar, went into the army, which he joined in 1777. His first services were in the American war of independence; he was next engaged in Sir David Sacke's expedition to Holland in 1795; in 1805 he was sent as ambassador to St. Petersburg; in the command of the British contingent, he was present at the battle of Austerlitz, after which he returned home, and for a time held the command of the forces in Scotland. In 1807, he commanded, with entire success, the expedition into the Baltic to seize the Danish fleet, services on which occasion he was raised British peerage, and received the thanks of both houses of Parliament. He now resumed his duties as commander of the troops in Scotland, which he continued to discharge till 1813, when he was again sent on a diplomatic mission to Russia, and has been said to have suggested the burning of Moscow, which led to the utter failure of Napoleon's Russian campaign. On the retreat of the French, Lord Cathcart accompanied the Russian army into Germany, and was present in the campaigns of 1813-14, up to the occupation of Paris in the latter year. In the year 1814, he was created an earl; and died in 1849, aged eighty-seven.

CATCAERT, the Honourable Sir George, K.C.B., third son of the preceding, entered the army in 1810, and served with distinction throughout the campaigns of Germany, in 1813, and of France, in 1814. At Quatre-Bras and Waterloo he acted in the capacity of aide-de-camp to the duke of Wellington, and continued on his staff till the army of occupation was withdrawn from France. In 1818 he accompanied his grace to the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, to Verona in 1822, and to Prussia in 1826. He subsequently served with success in Canada; and, in 1852, was appointed governor of the Cape of Good Hope, where he brought the Caffir war to a successful termination. In 1853 he was appointed adjutant-general, and, the following year, received the command of the fourth division of the army destined to operate in the Crimea. At the battle of the Alma, his division, with the cavalry, was held in reserve; but at Inkermann he bore a distinguished part, and fell, mortally wounded, in the thickest of the fight. b. 1794; killed at Inkermann, November 5, 1854.

CATTILINA, L. Sergius, kät'-ä-H'-na (CATHLINE), born of a noble Roman family, squandered his fortune in debaucheries and extravagance. Being refused the consulship, he conspired, with many of the most illustrious of the Romans, to extirpate the senate and set Rome on fire. This conspiracy was timely discovered by the consul Cicero, who, in the full senate, crushed Catiline with his eloquence, and forced him to unmask himself. Catiline then retired to Gaul, where his partisans were assembling an army. Petreius, the lieutenant of Antonius, Cicero's colleague, attacked his ill-disciplined troops, and routed them, Catiline himself falling, 62 B.C.—Sallust has written an excellent account of this conspiracy.

CATINAT, Nicholas, ka'te-na, an illustrious French marshal, who, in 1690, defeated the duke of Savoy at the battle of Staffarde, in Piedmont. He took the fortress of Ath, in Flanders, in 1697; and in 1701 had the command of the army in Italy against Prince Eugene; but the want of funds and provisions paralysed his efforts; and meeting with several disasters, he was forced to retreat. These checks brought him into disgrace, to which he submitted with great philosophy, living contentedly in retirement. B. at Paris, 1637; D. on his estate of St. Gratian, 1712.

CATO, Marcus Porcius Cisseus, ka'to, an illustrious Roman, surnamed the Elder, or the Censor, who served in the army at the age of seventeen, and distinguished himself alike by his valour and his temperance, never drinking anything but water, and always contenting himself with the plainest food. By the interest of his friend Valerius Flaccus, he was appointed military tribune in Sicily, and afterwards became quaestor in Africa under Scipio, where he displayed strict economy in the expenditure of the public money. After passing through other employments, he was chosen consul, 195 B.C., in which station he had Valerius Flaccus for his colleague. He conducted the war in Further Spain with great success, and, on his arrival at Rome, was honoured with a triumph. Eight years afterwards, he was elected censor, and exercised the functions of that office with a stringency which passed into a proverb: and a statue was erected to him with a laudatory inscription. In his latter years, fearing the rivalry of Carthage, he always concluded his speeches in the senate with the expression, "Delenda est Carthago,"—Carthage must be destroyed. B. at Tusculum, 234 B.C.; D. 149 B.C.—He wrote a history of Roman affairs, of which only a few fragments remain; but a treatise of his on husbandry is extant, bearing the name of "De Re Rustica."

CATO, Marcus Porcius, surnamed Uticensis, was the great-grandson of the preceding, and at an early age manifested that inflexibility of disposition which marked the whole of his public conduct in after life. He adopted the doctrines of the Stoics, and was extremely austere and frugal in his habits. He served in the army with his brother Cæpio against Spartacus, and displayed so much valour and prudence as to obtain the commission of tribune in the army sent to Macedonia. In his civil character he served first the office of quaestor, and by his uprightness in administering justice gained great popularity, and rendered his name proverbial for integrity. He gave his support to Cicero, when that great man was consul, and publicly honoured him with the title of "father of his country." Penetrating the ambitious designs then contemplated by Cæsar, he opposed him to the utmost of his power, and was afterwards sent to Asia to announce to Ptolemy, king of Cyprus, the decree which deprived that sovereign of his dominions. This resulted in Ptolemy's poisoning himself, and Cato seizing the royal treasure for the republic. He supported Pompey against Cæsar, whose designs he considered as dangerous to Roman liberty; but the civil war which ensued filled him with grief. After the battle of Pharsalia, he retired to Africa, where he had thought Pompey had fled, and endured, with his troops, great hardships in marching across the desert to join Scipio at Utica, with whom he had some contest about the mode of carrying on the war. Cato also gave offence to that general by sparing those inhabitants of Utica who were attached to Cæsar. When that conqueror came before the place, Cato retired to his chamber, and after reading Plato's "Phædo," or "Dialogue on the Immortality of the Soul," fell upon his sword, 46 B.C. B. about 94 B.C.—When Cæsar arrived, he said, "Cato, I envy thee thy death, since thou didst envy me the glory of saving thy life." The principal events in the life of this great Roman furnished Addison with a theme for his celebrated tragedy of "Cato."—There are others of the name of Cato in Roman history.

CATS, Jacob, kats, an eminent Dutch poet, who rose to represent his country twice at two very dissimilar courts in England—Charles the First's and Oliver Cromwell's. He was knighted by Charles in 1627, but was unsuccessful in his mission with the Protector. After he returned to his country, he retired from public life, and in a rural retreat, near the Hague, betook himself to the cultivation of the Muses. Here he composed his "Country Life," a poem full of good precepts of wisdom and virtue, but having little pretensions to any very lofty flights of the imagination. He was long a favourite with his countrymen, who still affectionately style him "Vader Cats,"—"Father Cats." B. in Zealand, 1577; D. near the Hague, 1680.

CATERMOLLE, George, kæt-ter-mole, one of the most original and expressive of the English school of water-colour painters. Though dealing mostly with imaginative or demi-historical subjects, his genius found ample scope in the manner in which he treated them, whilst his style is entirely his own. Scenes from Shakspeare's plays and the novels of Sir Walter Scott he conceived and executed with an originality which few have equalled. He is, therefore, quite free from the charge of being an imitator, and merited the high position which his poetic feeling and artistic execution enabled him to attain. Subsequently he painted chiefly in oil. B. at Dickleburgh, Norfolk, 1800.

CATULLUS, Valerius, kæt-ul-lus, a Latin poet, whose compositions, though elegant, are the offspring of a too luxuriant imagination. He had the boldness to satirize Cæsar, but the emperor soon gained the poet's heart by his liberality. Catullus was the first Roman who imitated with success the Greek writers, and introduced their numbers among the Latins. B. at Verona, 87 B.C.; D. 47 B.C. The effusions of this poet are said to have been lost till the 15th century, when, in 1425, a copy was accidentally found in a granary, and transmitted to his native city.

CATULUS, Q. Lutatius, kæt-u-lus, a Roman consul, who commanded the fleet during the first Punic war against the Carthaginians, and destroyed their navy under Hamilcar, near the Ægates, sinking fifty and taking sixty-six of their ships. This decisive victory put an end to the war, about 242 B.C.

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Cauchy

CAUCHY, Augustin Louis, ko'she, an eminent French mathematician, who, after passing through the Polytechnic School, and attracting considerable notice by his talents, was appointed engineer for the port of Cherbourg. He was a large contributor to mathematical science. His loyalty to the Bourbon dynasty he suffered greatly to stand in the way of his pecuniary interests, and rather than take the oath of allegiance to Louis Philippe, he resigned his public employments. The republican government of 1848 absolved him from taking any oath, and he took a professor's chair at the Sorbonne. Louis Napoleon also pursued the same course, demanding no oath either from him or the astronomer Arago. Independently of his scientific pursuits, he applied himself to the cultivation of the muses, and produced several poems of considerable merit. b. at Paris, 1789; d. 1857.

CAULAINCOURT, Armand Augustin Louis de, ko'-lin-koor, duke of Vicenza, a French military officer and diplomatist, who took part in most of the wars of the French revolution, and attracted the attention of Napoleon I., who successively made him grand equerry, general of division, and duke of Vicenza. In 1807 he was sent as ambassador to Russia, and succeeded in gaining the friendship and esteem of the emperor Alexander. Returning to France in 1811, he accompanied the expedition to Moscow, and, subsequently, was Napoleon's companion when he left the army for Paris. After the reverses of the Russian campaign, he was sent on various missions to the courts of Napoleon's allies, and ever showed himself devoted to the interests of the emperor and his dynasty. From 1837 to 1840 he published, under the title of "Souvenirs of the Duke of Vicenza," interesting memorials of the empire. b. at Caulaincourt, Somme, 1772; d. 1857.—His brother, Auguste Jean Gabriel, was a general in the French army, serving on the Rhine, at Marengo, in Spain, and Portugal. He was finally killed at the battle of the Moskwa, 1812. b. 1777.

CAUSSIDIERE, Marc, ko-sid'-e-air, a French politician, born of a family of humble artisans, took an active part with the revolutionists of 1834, in Lyons and St. Etienne. He was taken prisoner and sent to Mount St. Michel, where he was confined till 1837, when he was released by the amnesty granted by the minister Molé. In 1848, when his party triumphed, he was appointed prefect of police, in which capacity he acted with great firmness, and had the glory of extracting order from disorder. He was one of the firmest defenders of the rights of property throughout the insurrectionary movements of the time. For the inactivity which he showed on the 15th of May, he was accused before the National Assembly; but he not only defended himself, but justified his conduct. After the days of June, he was again accused, and, by a vote of the Assembly, condemned on the night of the 25-26th of August. He immediately took refuge in London, where he published his memoirs, in which a full explanation of his conduct will be found. After this he relinquished politics and entered on a mercantile life. b. at Lyons, 1809; d. 1861.

CAVALIGNAC, Louis Eugène, ka'-vün-yak, a French general and statesman, entered the Polytechnic School in 1820, at eighteen years of age, and, in 1823, as a captain of engineers, served in the Morca. The revolution of 1830 found him one of its firmest adherents. A warm republican and fearless in the expression of his opinions, it was found necessary to give him employment abroad. Accordingly, in 1832 he was sent to join the army of Africa. Here he distinguished himself in various skirmishes and battles, and, in 1838, he was appointed to the command of the garrison in the citadel of Tiersen. In this post he continued to extend his fame for determination and valor. Soon afterwards, he had the command of a battalion in the infantry of the line. In 1840 we find him holding a lieutenant-colonelcy in the Zouaves, with whom he had served before; and in the following year he was made a colonel; but, subsequently, he again entered the line, and greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Isly. In this conflict he commanded the vanguard under general Bugeaud, and, for his conduct, was in 1844 created a maréchal-de-camp. In 1846, at the head of 6000 men, he drove Abd-el-Kader before him; and, in the following year, succeeded Lamoricière in the government of Oran. In 1848 he was appointed governor-general of Algeria, and, two months afterwards, was invited by Lamartine to Paris, where he promptly suppressed the insurrection of June, and stamped his character for great decision and military ability. On this occasion he became dictator, and defeated the anarchists after a general slaughter of 500 individuals. On the achievement of this feat, he resigned the dictatorship, and was appointed president of the council by the National Assembly. He next came forward as a candidate for the office of president of the republic, and was supported by nearly 1,450,000 votes. On December 2, 1851, he was arrested; but, shortly afterwards, was set at large, and permitted to live undisturbed in France, although he abstained from giving his support to the government of Napoleon III. In 1857 he was elected, with M. Carnot, a member of the Legislative Assembly, by the fourth arrondissement of Paris; but both refused to take the oath to the emperor. Cavaignac died suddenly, a few weeks after. b. at Paris, 1802; d. 1857.—He was buried at Paris, and all agreed in regretting, in the death of the ex-dictator, an honest, worthy citizen.

Cavalieri

CAVALIER, Jean, ka-val'-e-ai, one of the principal leaders of the Comisards, or Protestants of Cevennes, when forced into rebellion against Louis XIV., by the persecutions of the Catholics. He defeated the best generals that came against him, and compelled Marshal de Villars to make a treaty with him. He was then taken into the king's service as colonel of a regiment; but being apprehensive that some design was formed against him, he entered into the service of England, and commanded, with his usual skill, a regiment of French refugees at the battle of Almanza, in Spain. He was afterwards appointed governor of Guernsey and Jersey, where he spent the remainder of his days. b. in the Cevennes, 1679; d. 1740. The marvellous defence of the Cevennes against the best regular troops of France has been often used as a proof of the great deeds which may be done by bodies of riflemen, voluntarily enrolled and acting on their own soil.

CAVALIERI, Buonaventura, kaw-val'-e-air-e, an Italian friar, who, from being a disciple of Galileo, became a mathematical professor at Bologna. He wrote several treatises upon his favourite science, of which he was the first to attempt the generalization. n. at Milan, 1598; d. 1617.

THE DICTIONARY

CAVALLINI, Pietro, kaw-ral-le-ne, a distinguished artist, who assisted his master, Giotto, in the famous mosaic in the porch of St. Peter's at Rome. Some of his own mosaics are to be seen in the basilica of San Paolo; but we know of no remains of his paintings. The last of these were consumed in the fire of 1824, when the old basilica of San Paolo was nearly entirely destroyed. Some of his frescoes still exist at Orvieto, Florence, and Assisi. It is conjectured that he was the architect of the shrine of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey. b. about 1280; d. about 1365.

CAVALLO, Tiberius, kaw-ral'-lo, an eminent electrician, who began his manhood as a merchant, and ended it as a natural philosopher. His performances were not characterized by originality, so much as by the industry they displayed, and the unflinching energy with which he laboured to illustrate electricity and magnetism. b. at Naples, 1749; d. in London, 1809.

CAVE, William, käie, a distinguished English divine, who wrote a great number of works of a religious tendency, and others with a view to illustrate ecclesiastical history. He is remembered chiefly by his "Primitive Christianity," "Lives of the Apostles and Martyrs," and his "Historia Literaria." b. at Pickwell, Leicestershire, 1637; d. at Windsor, 1713.

CAVE, Edward, a London bookseller, who was originally a clerk in the excise, but afterwards went to London, where he apprenticed himself to a printer. On the expiration of his time he obtained a place in the Post-office, but still continued at intervals to follow his business. He corrected the "Gradus ad Parnassum," and wrote for the newspapers. On being dismissed from his place for resisting abuses in the privilege of franking, he started the "Gentleman's Magazine," which had great success, and to which Dr. Johnson, the future lexicographer, was a contributor. Indeed, Cave is to be remembered chiefly on account of his being the early patron and friend of the immortal doctor, who wrote his biography. b. at Newton, in Warwickshire, 1691; d. in London, 1754.

CAVENDISH, Henry, käv'-en-dish, was the younger son of Lord Charles Cavendish, and the first to lay the foundation of the modern form which the science of chemistry has taken. His philosophical researches have been followed by the most important results; and it is said that he supplied Lavoisier with the materials for his system. Sir Humphry Davy observed, shortly after Cavendish's death, that "his processes were all of a finished nature, perfected by the hand of a master; they required no correction; and though many of them were performed in the very infancy of chemical science, yet their accuracy and their beauty have remained unimpaired amidst the progress of discovery." b. at Nice, 1731; d. 1810. This philosopher was of so singular and retiring a disposition, that he could hardly bear the presence of strangers. He was never married; indeed, it is doubtful whether he ever spoke to a woman. At all events, Lord Brougham says of him, that "he used to order his dinner daily by a note, which he left at a certain hour on the hall table, whence the house-keeper was to take it." It is also said, that if a female servant showed herself to him, she was immediately dismissed. He died worth upwards of £1,000,000 sterling.

CAVENDISH, Margaret, the eccentric daughter of Sir Charles Lucas, and wife of William Cavendish, duke of Newcastle. After the Restoration, she passed the greater part of her time in literary composition, holding the belief that she was one of the greatest geniuses that ever wielded a pen. She also believed the same of her husband, who, very singularly, entertained a similar opinion of her. The best-known works of the duchess are some plays, which will hardly carry her name down to a very distant posterity. b. in Essex about 1620; d. 1678.

CAVENDISH, or CANDISH, Thomas, an enterprising English navigator, who, about 1583, fitted out "a stout bark" of 120 tons, and proceeded to Virginia and the West Indies. By this expedition his fortune was not increased; but on his return he assumed the manners of a courtier, and became one of the gallants of the court of Queen Elizabeth. The mode of life which he then led still further impaired his fortune, when he undertook another voyage to endeavour to repair the evil which extravagance and dissipation had wrought upon his funds. For this expedition he fitted out three small vessels of 40, 60, and 120 tons; and with a total crew of about 125 men, set sail from Plymouth, on July 21, 1586. He crossed the Atlantic, passed through the Straits of Magellan, and, entering the Pacific, reached the scene where he had intended to recruit his finances. His object was to plunder the Spaniards, with whom England was then at war, and who were, according to the notions of the times, considered fair game for the buccaneering propensities of any English gentleman who had the courage to attack them. Accordingly, Cavendish commenced his career of pillage; fought, captured, burned, and sunk wherever he could; and, after great success, circumnavigated the globe, and arrived at Plymouth in September, 1588. He was now rich enough to appear again at Court, and was knighted by the queen. In three years, however, he was again reduced in circumstances, when he once more looked to the New World to replenish his coffers. Another expedition was fitted out, but in the manner of a joint-stock concern. It met with no success; and Cavendish, a disappointed and brokenhearted man, ended his days whilst on his passage back from this ill-starred enterprise. b. in Suffolk, 1564; d. at sea, 1593.

CAVENDISH, Lord Frederick, a field-marshal in the English service, entered early on a military life. In 1758 he was in the action of St. Cast, on the coast of France, and was taken prisoner. The duke d'Aiguillon, who commanded the French army, politely offered the British officers permission to return to England on their paroles. They all accepted this offer except Lord Frederick, who gave as his reason for not doing so, that he was a member of parliament. "And what has that to do with it?" inquired the duke. "Why, sir," replied Lord Frederick, "whilst I am attending to my parliamentary duties I should vote for the supplies for carrying on the war, which might be considered as a breach of my parole." "Pooh, pooh!" said the duke, "we should as soon think of restraining you from getting a child, lest, when it came to maturity, it should conquer France." b. 1729; d. at Twickenham, 1803. This officer was one of the six who, at the beginning of the

CAVENDISH. (See BENTINCK, Lord W. G.)
CAVOUR, Camillo, Count de, ku-voor, a noble Sardinian statesman, whose father amassed a considerable fortune by speculation, and was created a count by Charles Albert. In 1847, when the principles of reform became prevalent in the states, Count Cavour took a leading share in examining the economical questions of the day; but, in the following year, did not play a very important part in the struggle between his country and Austria. After the disaster of Novara, he entered, in 1849, the Chamber of Deputies, succeeding Santa Rosa as minister of commerce and agriculture. In 1851 he became minister of finance, and, by his abilities, re-established the financial equilibrium, which, by the wars of Charles Albert, had been deranged. He now took the government of Great Britain for his model, and laboured to organize a similar free-trade system for his country, but met with many difficulties in the attempt. In 1852 he became

Sardinian affairs. The great question which occupied his attention after 1849, was the establishment of the union and independence of the Italian states; and, regardless of the threats of Austria, he pursued his object with unswerving constancy. Relying on the active assistance of the emperor of the French, the liberal sympathies of western Europe, and the national sentiment expressed by the elections of 1857, he persevered in his course, which may be considered to have tended greatly to precipitate the war with Austria in 1859. On the sudden termination of this war, in July of the same year, the count retired from the high position which he had filled with so much energy. He was shortly afterwards recalled to power, however, and had a large share in accomplishing several most important events. During the brief period which intervened between his recall to power and his death, the great aim of his life, the unification of Italy, made astonishing progress. Tuscany, Modena, Parma, and the Papal Legations united themselves to Piedmont, and in 1860 the successful expedition of Garibaldi to Sicily and Naples, having relieved that portion of the country of the Bourbons, a vote by universal suffrage was taken, which resulted in an almost unanimous declaration of the people's desire to be united to the other parts of the peninsula which already owned the sway of Victor Emmanuel, and in a parliament representing the whole of the king's states, the title of king of Italy was solemnly conferred upon the representative of the house of Savoy. To the accomplishment of all these events Cavour contributed in a large degree; but he was concerned in another transaction which has been regarded as of a much more questionable kind. In 1860 the provinces of Nice and Savoy were ceded by the Piedmontese government to France, and it then came to light that this cession was the price agreed upon for the assistance of France against Austria. This transaction has been severely condemned even by the warmest admirers of Cavour, and will, perhaps with justice, be regarded as the one stain upon his otherwise honourable and patriotic career. It is but fair, however, to state, that he himself regarded the cession of Nice and Savoy in the light of a submission to a small evil in order to accomplish a great good. It is, perhaps, impossible to over-estimate the importance of Cavour's loss to Italy; the national calamity was at once felt to be irreparable when his death was announced, and a cry of grief and mourning went up from the whole land. b. at Turin, 1810; d. 1861.

CARTON, William, kar'-ton, the first English printer, who, at the age of 15, was apprenticed to a mercer, and on the death of his master, went to the continent, as agent of the M. m. c. Company. During his residence in Flanders he acquired a knowledge of the new invention of Chess, which was succeeded by other works. He printed in the Almanary in Westminster; and whilst the literary pilgrim directs his footsteps to the Poets' Corner in Westminster Abbey, to recall the effusions which received expression from the immortal dust which lies entombed in that sacred office, let him remember, that it is to the enterprising spirit of William Carton that he is indebted for the introduction to this country of the sublime art, which gives him so much mental enjoyment. b. in Kent, about 1410; d. 1491.

CEBES, se'-bes, a Greek philosopher, and disciple of Socrates. The "Pinax," or "Picture of Human Life," is generally attributed to him. It is usually printed with the "Enchiridion" of Epictetus. b. at Thebes, and lived in the 5th century B.C.

CECILIA, St., se-sil'-a, the reputed patroness of music, a native of Rome, was distinguished for piety, and made a vow of virginity, notwithstanding her parents contracted her to a nobleman named Valerian, a heathen, whom, however, she converted, and induced to respect her vow. They were subjected to martyrdom for their faith. The reputation of Cecilia, as the patroness of music and the inventor of the organ, is founded on a book known as "St. Cecilia's Arts," the authenticity of which is doubted, and on the ascriptions of the early Italian poets. The celebration of her birthday—the 22nd of November—began to be observed about 1683. Many odes have been composed for the occasion, the most celebrated of which is the well known one by Dryden. St. Cecilia flourished in the 2nd and beginning of the 3rd century A.D.

CECIL, Robert. (See BENTLEY.)

CECIL, Robert Arthur. (See SALTERS.)

CECROPS, se'-krops, the founder of Athens, who led a colony to Attica about the 16th century B.C., and divided the country into twelve communities, of which Athens afterwards became the capital. He established the tribunal of the Areopagus, extended the worship of Minerva and Jupiter, introduced agriculture, and the rites of marriage and burial. Athens was originally called Cecropia, in honour of Cecrops, and the word is often used for Attica, the Athenians being also called Cecropidae. b. at Sais, Egypt; lived in the 16th century B.C.

CELAKOWSKY, Frantisek Ladislav, sel'-a-kov'-ske, a modern Bohemian poet and philologist, who, besides some original effusions, produced a translation of Sir W. Scott's "Lady of the Lake," into a kind of Ossianic prose, which does not seem to have had the effect of inspiring his countrymen with a very exalted idea of the poetical qualities of the Scottish minstrel. He subsequently became the editor of the leading newspaper at Prague, and also professor of the Bohemian language in that university. These situations he afterwards lost on account of an article which he wrote against the severities exercised by the emperor Nicholas of Russia upon the insurgent Poles in 1831. In 1842 he obtained a professorship of Slavonian literature in Breslau, where he remained for several years. In 1849 he returned to Prague, mentally shattered, through misfortunes and domestic calamities, which he did not long survive. n. at Strakonitz, 60 miles from Prague, 1799; n. at Prague, 1852.—In 1833 Sir John Bowring dedicated to Celakowsky his volume of "Czechian Anthology."

Celestine

CELESTINE I., sel'-es-teen, a pope and saint, succeeded Boniface I. in 422. He condemned the doctrine of Nestorius in a council held at Rome, in 430. n. 432.—CELESTINE II. was elected in 1143, on the death of Innocent II., and sat in the chair only five months.—CELESTINE III. succeeded Clement III. in 1191. He claimed the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and gave the latter to Frederick, the son of the emperor Henry VI., on condition of his paying a tribute to the Holy See. n. 1198.—CELESTINE IV. died in 1241, eighteen days after his election.—CELESTINE V., a Benedictine monk, founded a new order called the Celestines, which was suppressed in France in 1778. Confusing himself to his cell, he spent a life of constant devotion, which led to his being elected pope, in 1294. Cardinal Cajetan prevailed upon him to resign the chair, and was afterwards elected in his stead, by the name of Boniface VIII. He then caused the credulous Celestine to be imprisoned in a castle, where he died, 1296. Clement V. canonized him in 1313.

CELLARIUS, Christopher, cel-lair'-e-us, a German professor of philosophy and Oriental languages at Jena, attracted the attention of Frederick I., elector of Brandenburg, and first king of Prussia, who gave him the professorship of history and rhetoric in the university of Halle, Saxony. In this tranquil position he passed the greater part of his life, and produced several works of great merit. Among these may be noticed his "Atlas Cælestis," and his "Notitia Orbis Antiquæ." n. at Smalkald, 1638; n. at Halle, 1707. His real name was Keller.

CELLINI, Benvenuto, chel-le'-ne, a famous Florentine artist, who served an apprenticeship to a jeweller and goldsmith, and, at the same time, applied himself to the study of drawing, engraving, and music. He was appointed by Clement VII. his goldsmith and musician. Being of a very turbulent disposition, he was frequently engaged in quarrels, in one of which he so severely wounded his antagonist that he was forced to make his escape from Florence to Rome, in the disguise of a friar. Here he distinguished himself by his courage in defending the citadel against the constable Bourbon, whom he said he killed as he attempted to scale the city walls. He also defended the castle of St. Angelo, and the prince of Orange, he declares, was killed by the ball which was shot from a cannon he had directed. After this, he was employed to engrave stamps for the mint, and the coins and medals which he executed are very beautiful. On the death of Clement VII. in 1534, he returned to Florence, whence he went to France, where he was patronized by Francis I., but soon quitting that country, revisited Rome, where he was confined a long time in the castle of St. Angelo, on the charge of having robbed the fortress of a considerable treasure when he had the care of it. He escaped, but was retaken, and suffered great hardships, till released by the mediation of Cardinal Ferrara. He then revisited France, where he executed some fine works of sculpture, and cast large figures in metal, which gained him a high reputation. After staying there five years, he returned to his own country, and was employed by the grand duke Cosmo de Medici, who gave him a studio, where he commenced his great work, "Perseus," which was not finished for some time afterwards. The success of this performance was so great, that, in gratitude, he went on a pilgrimage to Valombrosa and Camaldoli. He now contested the palm of glory with Bandinelli for a design of Neptune. Cellini's work being pronounced the best, caused the death of the rival sculptor, through grief. His fame was now firmly established, and he spent the remainder of his days in Florence. n. at Florence, 1500; n. 1570. Cellini worked equally well in marble and metal, and wrote a treatise on the goldsmith's art, and another on sculpture and the casting of metals. He also wrote his own life, which has been translated into English by W. Roscoe, and presents us with a tolerably accurate picture of the manners of the 16th century.

CELSIUS, (Olaus, sel'-se-ous, a Swedish botanist, theologian, and orientalist. He was the professor of theology and the eastern languages at Upsal, and, by command of Charles XI., visited the principal states of Europe, to compile an account of the plants mentioned in the Bible. He wrote a number of works, the principal of which are "Hierobotanicon," being dissertations on the plants of the Scriptures, and "De Lingua Novi Testamenti Originali." n. 1670; n. 1766. Celsius is regarded as the founder of natural history in Sweden. He was the first master and patron of Linnæus, the great botanist, who gave to a new genus of plants the name of Celsia.—His father, Magnus Nicolaus, was a distinguished naturalist and mathematician; and the son of Olaus, Andrew, was eminent as an astronomer. Both were professors at Upsal.

CELSUS, Aurelius Cornelius, sel'-sus, a celebrated Roman physician, who lived in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. Nothing is known with certainty of his personal history, but he is supposed to have practised medicine at Rome. He appears to have understood the sciences of rhetoric, agriculture, and military tactics, as well as medicine, and compiled a kind of cyclopædia, treating on those various subjects, with great ability and success. Only one work of his has come down to the moderns, called "De Medicinâ," consisting of eight books, and it is considered the most precious work of its kind which the Romans have left us. Celsus was styled the Hippocrates of the Latins, and is universally admired for his extensive erudition and the purity of his language. Several editions of his "De Medicinâ" have been published, and a good English translation by Dr. Grieve appeared in 1756.

CENCI, Francesco, sen'-che, a Roman noble, the son of a treasurer of the apostolic chamber under Pope Pius V., was a most profligate person, having plunged into the lowest depths of infamy, and was only saved from an ignominious end by his gold, with which he corrupted the judges. He had four sons and one daughter, the celebrated Beatrice Cenci, all of whom he treated with the most abominable cruelty. He is even accused of having assassinated his two elder sons. Revolting at the horrible scenes she had passed through, Beatrice, in concert with two of her brothers, and Lucretia, her mother, accomplished the death of the hated Francesco. Accused and found guilty of the murder, all perished on the scaffold, in the year 1599, except the younger brother, that sentence having been passed on them by Clement VIII. This terrible event made a profound impression on the people of Rome, and for many ages the name of Beatrice Cenci was preserved in the popular airs. The death of the Cenci has been the subject of many paintings, of which the most celebrated is in the Colonna palace, Rome, and was for a long time attributed to Guido Reni. The life of Beatrice has also been dramatized by Shelley.

CENLIVRE, Susannah, sen-le-ver, an English actress and dramatic writer, whose performances are marked by considerable elegance and vivacity, though not altogether free from a charge of indelicacy. Among her best plays are "A Bold Stroke for a Wife," "The Busybody," and "The Wonder." B. is presumed in Ireland, 1680; D. in London, 1725.

CERDIC, ser'-dik, a Saxon chief, who, in the first year of the 6th century, invaded England, and after an obstinate resistance from the Britons, sustaining many defeats, yet winning more victories, established, about 539, the kingdom of Wessex. At his death, in 534, he possessed the Isle of Wight and the present counties of Hants, Dorset, Wilts, and Berks, and was succeeded by his son Cynric.

CERVANTES DE SAavedra, Miguel, ser-van'-tees, a distinguished Spanish novelist, the author of "Don Quixote," who from early years discovered a strong predilection for literature, but whose necessities forced him to seek for a livelihood by some other means than by that which, at best, is considered to be one of a most precarious kind. Consequently, he entered the service of Cardinal Acquaviva, of Rome, as a page, but subsequently entered the navy, and lost an arm at the famous battle of Lepanto, in 1571. This misfortune did not prevent him joining the troops of the king of Spain at Naples; but in returning to Spain by sea, he was made prisoner by pirates, who took him to Algiers, where, for five years, he was kept as a slave. After this period he was ransomed, when he went to Madrid. Here he settled, got married, and, in the course of about ten years, published about thirty dramas. The prolific Lope de Vega, however, was at that time at the head of the Spanish drama, to whom, therefore, he resigned the palm of superiority, and directing his genius into a kindred channel, he produced the immortal novel of "Don Quixote." Inimitable in its wit and humour as this work is, it was at first received with comparative indifference. Ultimately, however, it met with the greatest applause, although the author reaped few or none of the emoluments which might have been expected from it. He was compelled to continue to struggle on in the shades of poverty, sustained only by the consciousness of being gifted with such talents as fall to the lot of few to possess. B. at Alcalá de Henares, New Castile, 1547; D. 1616.

CESARI Giuseppe, sai-zur-re, called the Caravagere d'Arpino, a famous Italian painter, was the son of an obscure artist, who executed votive tablets for the images of saints, and while employed in a menial capacity by the painters occupied in decorating the loggia of the Vatican, he, when only thirteen years of age, painted some figures by stealth, which led to his introduction to Pope Gregory XIII., with whom, as well as with four of his successors, Sixtus V., Clement VIII., Paul V., and Urban VIII., he became a great favourite. Though not essentially a great artist, Cesari was extremely popular for more than half a century—keeping his ground against the efforts of both Annibal Caracci and Michael Angelo Caravaggio; and received decorations from the Pope, from Henry IV. of France, &c. His works are very numerous, both in oil and fresco; the principal being the series in illustration of Roman history in the Campitoline, which Cesari undertook to finish in four years, but which occupied him for upwards of forty years—at least he did not complete them till after the lapse of that time. His designs are generally spirited, but the execution is very imperfect. B. about 1563; D. 1620.

CESAROTTI, Melchior, sai-zur-rot'-fe, an Italian poet, and professor of rhetoric, Greek, and Hebrew in the university of Padua. In 1702 he translated the poems of the Scottish Ossian into Italian blank verse, and declared that he preferred the fitful flights of Ossian the Scot to the steady and sustained grandeur of Homer the Greek. He also translated the "Iliad" into Italian; but the performance was rather a caricature than what it professed to be, and brought upon the head of Cesarotti a considerable amount of ridicule. Besides these, he produced some critical and philosophical works, which have a higher claim to respect than his poetical translations of the poets we have named. He was a great admirer of Napoleon, and wrote a poem called "Prouca," a poor work, which aimed at exhibiting that personage as the envoy of the Almighty. Whether the emperor was pleased with this performance, we have no means of knowing; but as he was a great admirer of Cesarotti's Ossian, he created him a knight of the Iron Crown, and gave him a pension. B. at Padua, 1730; D. 1803.—Besides the above, Cesarotti translated the works of several of the Greek writers of antiquity.

CESPEDES, Paul de, ses-pai'-dais, an eminent Spanish painter, whose picture of the "Last Supper," in the cathedral of Cordova, is greatly admired. He wrote a learned book on ancient and modern art, was a linguist and poet, and practised sculpture as well as architecture. B. at Cordova, 1539; D. 1609, and was buried in the cathedral of his native city.

CHABRIAS, Kai'-bre-as, an Athenian general, famous for his many naval victories. From 338 to 376 B.C. he defeated, in several engagements, the Spartans, who were commanded by Agesilaus, and took a prominent part in the war in Egypt. D. at the siege of Chios, fighting on his ship, 357 B.C.—Cornelius Nepos has written his life.

CHABANNES, sha-ban', the name of a distinguished family of Limousin, in France, many members of which figured prominently in the history of their country. The most famous of the family were:—1. Jacques de Chabannes, lord of La P.lee (n. 1400, d. 1451) and Antoine de Chabannes, (n. 1411, d. 1485), who both took a prominent part in the wars between the English and French in the 15th century, and aided Joan of Arc at the siege of Orleans, and in freeing the country from English domination. 2. Jacques de Chabannes, an eminent soldier of the 16th century, took a distinguished part in the wars of the French against the Spaniards under the famous Gonsalvo, and afterwards in the campaigns of Charles VIII., Louis XII., and Francis I. in Italy, where he mainly contributed to win the battles of Ravenna, in 1512, and of Marignano in 1515; but was killed at the fatal disaster at Pavia, in 1525. He was alike famous for his bravery, military skill, and fidelity to his sovereign and country. 3. Jean de Chabannes, brother of the last-mentioned, was also an eminent leader, and so remarkable for his valour, that he was surnamed the "Young Lion." He took Alviano, the Venetian general, prisoner, at the battle of Agnadell, and enacted a prominent part in the field of Marignano; but was mortally wounded, in 1524, during the retreat of Rebec.

THE

CHABOT, François, ska'-bo, one of the most infamous of the French revolutionists, was originally a Capuchin monk, but having imbibed atheistical ideas, he threw himself into the revolutionary movement, siding with the most extreme democrats, and either proposing or promoting the worst atrocities perpetrated during the Reign of Terror. He was who made use of the irreverent and blasphemous expression that "citizen Jesus Christ was the first sans-culotte in the world." He affected great austerity of manner, wore the coarsest clothes, and was always filthy and squalid in his person. Being at last detected in a conspiracy, he attempted suicide by swallowing corrosive sublimate, but did not succeed, and was guillotined, April 5, 1794. n. 1790.

CHADWICK, Edwin, chad'-wik, a modern social reformer, who, in 1834, was appointed secretary to the board of the Poor Law Commission. In 1842 he completed a report "On the General Sanitary Condition of the Labouring Classes in Great Britain," and in 1847 was appointed to the Metropolitan Sanitary Commission. The following year he became a member of the General Board of Health, and in 1853 received a retiring pension for the labour of a long series of years devoted to the advocacy of questions, by the practical application of which the social comforts of the community at large were greatly improved. Whilst labouring as commissioner to the General Board of Health, the honour of Companion of the Bath was conferred upon him. n. at Manchester, 1801.

CHALMERS, George, chal'-mers, an eminent antiquary and general writer, was a native of Moray, in Scotland, where he was born in 1742. He studied law at Edinburgh, and then emigrated to America, but on the breaking out of the revolutionary war, he came back to England, and was appointed clerk to the Board of Trade, a situation which he continued to hold till his death in 1825. He was a very voluminous writer, and was the author of a great many works, principally lives of distinguished personages. His most important work, however, the "Caledonia," a topographical and historical account of Scotland, from the invasion of the Romans to the present period, exhibiting vast research, was left unfinished at his death.

CHALMERS, Alexander, received a Scottish classical education, and settled in London as a literary man. He was employed by the most eminent booksellers and printers of his time, edited a great variety of works, and contributed largely to periodical literature. n. at Aberdeen, 1759; d. in London, 1831.—Amongst other works, Mr. Chalmers edited the "General Biographical Dictionary," 32 vols.; "The British speare, in 9 vols.

CHALMERS, Reverend Dr. Thomas, one of the most distinguished modern Scottish divines. In 1808 he was appointed to the living of Kilmany, in Fifeshire, where, in conjunction with his clerical duties, he, for twelve years, devoted himself to the study of mathematical and chemical science. In 1809 he became a contributor to the "Edinburgh Encyclopedia," then under the editorship of Sir David Brewster; and other periodicals, among which were the "Christian Instructor" and "Eclectic Review." In 1815 he was called to the Tron Church of Glasgow, where he officiated for eight years. He was already, however, a man of note; and in the following year the degree of D.D. was conferred upon him by the university of Glasgow. His eloquence now excited a national interest. "It reminds me more of what one reads of as the effect of the eloquence of Demosthenes, than anything I ever heard," says Lord Jeffrey, whose opinion has been echoed by Canning, Wilberforce, Hazlitt, Hall, and others. It was his extraordinary union of thought and imagination which struck us as being the secret of his power over assembled multitudes; and to this union he added the force of an earnest delivery, at once grand and impressive. In 1816 he began his "Astronomical Discourses," which created an unprecedented excitement amongst all who heard them. He was immediately raised to the apex of popularity, for which he had to pay the usual penalty, as may be gathered from the following passage:—"A popularity," says he, "which rifles home of its sweets, and, by elevating a man above his fellows, places him in a region of desolation, where he stands, a conspicuous mark for the shafts of malice, envy, and detraction;—a popularity which, with its head among storms and its feet on the treacherous quicksands, has nothing to lull the agonies of its tottering existence but the hosannas of a drivelling generation." He now devoted himself to what we would call organizing Christianity among the people; and in this was so successful, that he created a new era in the parish in which he officiated as pastor. He removed from the Tron Church to St. John's, where Edward Irving was for some time his assistant; and perhaps no two such extraordinary men ever before officiated to one and the same congregation as ministers of the gospel. In 1823, when at the very zenith of his fame, Dr. Chalmers resigned his charge, and accepted the chair of moral philosophy in the university of St. Andrews. In this capacity his emoluments were much less, but his duties were better suited to his tastes, for his health was already somewhat shaken. Here he remained for five years, when, in 1828, he was appointed to the divinity chair of the university of Edinburgh. He officiated here for fifteen years, till, in 1843, the disruption in the Church of Scotland called him to another sphere of action. Then, at the head of 400 clergymen, he seceded from the establishment, and instituted the "Free Church," and became principal and professor of divinity in the new college founded by its adherents. In this position he continued during the remainder of his days, imparting Christian life and moral strength to all who came within the scope of his influence. b. at Anstruther, Fifeshire, 1780; d. at Edinburgh, 1847.—Dr. Chalmers was emphatically a great man, working for the good of his species with untiring energy and assiduity. His writings are numerous, and all of a religious tendency. Perhaps his best-known work is his Bridge-water treatise "On the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man."

CHALONER, Sir Thomas, chal'-on-er, a distinguished statesman and diplomatist of the 16th century, who, after serving Henry VIII. in a mission to Charles V., was the first ambassador appointed by queen Elizabeth when she came to the crown, having been sent by her upon a mission to the emperor, and afterwards to the court of Spain, where he remained from 1561 to 1564. He was an able writer, especially of Latin verse; and while resident in Spain wrote his great work, "On the Right Ordering of the English Republic." He died in 1565, aged about 60.—His son, Sir Thomas the younger, was born in 1559, and was principally educated by his father's friend, Lord Burleigh. He studied at Oxford, then travelled for several years, and became famous for his knowledge of natural philosophy. He discovered alum mines near Whitby about the year 1600, which were the first ever worked in England. Having gone to Scotland towards the end of Elizabeth's reign, he became a great favourite with king James, whom he accompanied to England, and by whom he was appointed tutor to prince Henry. Chaloner wrote a work on the nature and medicinal virtues of nitre. He died in 1615.—Two of his sons, Thomas and John, were members of the Long Parliament, and among the judges of Charles I.

CHAMBERS, David, cham'-bers, a Scotchman who united in his own person both ecclesiastical and legal functions, having taken orders and been inducted to the ministry of the parish of Suddie, and also made chancellor of the diocese of Ross. His legal knowledge recommended him to Mary Queen of Scots, who raised him to the bench in 1564, by the honorary title of Lord Ormond, in which capacity he aided in the compilation of the collection of statutes known as the "Black Acts." He was implicated in the murder of Darnley, and had to fly from the country. He now passed several years in Spain and France, where he wrote some works, one of which is a vindication of the female right of succession to thrones. He finally returned to Scotland, and was reinstated on the bench by king James, which would seem to imply that he had at least satisfied that monarch that he was innocent of his father's death. b. in Ross-shire, 1530; d. 1592. He bore the character of being a learned, able, but unscrupulous man.

CHAMBERS, Ephraim, the compiler of an extensive cyclopædia, who, while an apprentice to Mr. Senex, a globe-maker in London, formed the plan of his dictionary. This design occu-pled his whole attention, and some of the articles are said to have been written by him whilst standing behind the counter. The first edition appeared in 1723, in 2 vols. folio. The next year he was chosen F.R.S. In 1733 a new edition was published, with additions; a third in the following year; a fourth in 1741; and a fifth in 1746. It was afterwards continued by Mr. Scott and Dr. Hill, and subsequently enlarged by Dr. Rees. Besides this work, he was engaged in translating and abridging the "History of the Academy of Sciences of Paris." He also translated the "Jesuits' Perspective." b. at Kendal, Westmoreland; d. in London, 1740.—Chambers may be considered the originator of all the encyclopædias which afterwards appeared in England, as well as on the continent.

CHAMBERS, Sir William, F.R.S., F.R.A.S., a celebrated English architect, surveyor-general of the Board of Works, treasurer of the Royal Academy, and knight of the Polar Star in Sweden, was descended of an ancient Scotch family. At the age of eighteen he was appointed supercargo to the Swedish East-India Company, and brought from China the Asiatic style of ornament, which became so fashionable in England, at one time, under the patronage of king George III. He then settled in England as an architect, and erected some magnificent mansions in various parts of the kingdom. His principal work, however, is Somerset House, which will prove a lasting monument of his taste. He was very successful in his staircases and designs for interior ornaments. b. at Stockholm, of English parents, 1726; d. 1798, leaving a large fortune.—He wrote a treatise on civil architecture, which is deemed valuable.

CHAMBERS, George, an English marine painter, who, in his tenth year, was sent to sea as a cabin-boy. Whilst serving his apprenticeship, he discovered his imitative genius by making rough sketches of sea scenes for the amusement of his brother sailors. These attracted the notice of the captain of the ship, who had sufficient appreciation of their merit to induce him to cancel the indentures of Chambers, and allow him to follow a profession for which he seemed by nature to have been designed. Accordingly, he worked his way to Whitby, where, in order to get an acquaintance with colours, he apprenticed himself to an old woman who kept a painter's shop. At the same time he worked as a house-painter, then took lessons of a drawing-master, and finally began to paint small marine pieces, which met with a ready sale. Three years after this he worked his passage to London as a seaman, where, after some difficulty, he became a painter of ships. He now attracted the attention of a Mr. Horner, who employed him on a panorama of London, which was exhibited at the Colosseum. He was next engaged to paint for the Pavilion Theatre, where he received the patronage of Vice-Admiral Lord Mark Kerr, who introduced him to William IV. and Queen Adelaide. His fortune was now made, and he became marine painter to their majesties. b. at Whitby, Yorkshire; d. in London, 1840.

CHAMBERS, William and Robert, two eminent modern Scotch publishers, whose practical good sense and high moral rectitude of taste have been directed to the elevation of the people, through the means of their numerous publications. In accordance with the design of this work, Robert has the highest claim to our notice, as it is to him that the public debt of gratitude is due for much of the literary ability which has characterized the publications emanating from their establishment. At the age of sixteen he commenced, on very limited means, as a bookseller in Edinburgh, and subsequently contributed some popular works to "Constable's Miscellany." These were marked by considerable ability, and in 1832 led him, with his brother William, who was also following the trade of a bookseller, to unite in the establishment of "Chambers's Edinburgh Journal." The success of this periodical was complete, and it largely helped to exalt the intellectual tastes of its readers, both in England and Scotland, but more especially in the latter. Independently of his contributions to his "Journal," Robert wrote "Traditions of Edinburgh," a "History of the Rebellion of 1745-46," a work, in our opinion, of great merit; "Popular Rhymes of Scotland," and "The Life and Works of Burns," of whom he is an enthusiastic admirer, and to whose family he has been of great service. He has also devoted much of his time to scientific pursuits, and deserved well of his age for the unwearied efforts he has made, in conjunction with his brother, to shed the placid beams of a light and agreeable literature throughout the length and breadth of the land. B. both in Peebles, William, 1800; Robert, 1802.

CHAMBOED, Count de. (See BORDEAUX, Duc de.)

CHAMBRAY, Georges, Marquis de, sham'-brai, a French general and historian, who, entering the artillery, served in the German campaigns of 1806-9. He rose to the rank of captain, but in the Russian campaign fell sick at Wilna, and was taken by the Russians, and transported into the Ukraine. After the fall of Napoleon, he returned to France, and in 1825 became colonel-director of the artillery at Perpignan. In 1829, on account of bad health, he was permitted to retire from the service with the honorary title of maréchal-de-camp. B. at Paris, 1783; D. 1850.—In his retirement, the marquis wrote a history of the Russian expedition, which, in 2 vols., appeared in 1833. This work passed through several editions, and was recognized as a production of considerable merit. He also wrote some other works upon military tactics.

CHAMFORD, Sébastien Roch Nicholas, sham'-for, a French writer, who became connected with the "Revue Encyclopédique." His Éloges of Molière and Fontenelle procured him prizes from the French Academy, and that of Marseilles. He next compiled a "French Vocabulary," and a "Dictionary of Dramatic Anecdotes." The latter work led him to dramatic composition, and his tragedy of "Mustapha" was very successful. He was honoured with the patronage of the Prince de Condé, Madame Helvétius, and Madame Elizabeth. At the breaking out of the French revolution, he, at first, supported its principles, but afterwards became shocked at its outrages. Being a friend of Mirabeau, he assisted him in many of his works. He suffered imprisonment under Robespierre, and the horrors he witnessed had such an effect on his mind that he attempted to destroy himself. B. in Auvergne 1741; D. from the effects of his wounds, 1794.—His works have been printed in 4 vols. 8vo.

CHAMBERS, Frederick, cha'-meer, a modern English writer of naval tales, who entered the navy in 1809, and distinguished himself in the American war of 1812, and attained the rank of captain. In 1833 he quitted the service. The best known of his works are "Ben Brace," the "Arethusa," "Life of a Sailor," and "Tom Bowling." B. in London, 1796.

CHAMILLY, Noël Bouton, Comte de, sha'-me-le, a marshal of France in the reign of Louis XIV., who greatly distinguished himself in the defence of Grave, 1677. The siege of this place occupied 93 days, and cost William, Prince of Orange, 16,000 men. The count, however, is better known as the receiver of the charming epistles known as the "Portuguese Love-Letters," written to him, when in Portugal under Schomberg, by a nun, who had conceived a violent passion for him. These he had the bad taste to show to his friends, and on returning to France, to publish. B. 1636; D. 1715.

CHAMISSO, Adelbert von, sha'-mees'-so, a German poet, traveller, and naturalist, of French extraction, the author of "Peter Schlemil." The misfortunes brought upon his family by the first revolution, drove them from France, and in 1796 they took up their residence in Berlin. Adelbert became one of the pages of the queen of Prussia, who had him educated with great care, and made well acquainted with German literature. In 1798 he entered the Prussian army, and soon after commenced writing poetry in German, and from 1804 to 1806 was one of the editors of the "Muses-Almanach." In 1810 he returned to France, where his family had again settled, and recovered the greater portion of their property; but his mind having become thoroughly Germanized, he returned to that country, and devoted himself to the study of the natural sciences. In 1813 he wrote, for the amusement of the children of a friend, a little book called "Peter Schlemil," containing the story of a man who lost his shadow, which was translated into English, and most other European languages. In 1815 Chamisso accompanied an exploring expedition round the world, in the capacity of naturalist, and after an absence of three years, returned, and appended a supplement to the work of Kotzebue, who wrote an account of the expedition. He now took up his abode at Berlin, and became the inspector of the Botanical Gardens of that city. Here he remained to the end of his life, cultivating poetry and botany, and living in the esteem of many friends. B. at the château of Boncourt, Champagne, 1781; D. at Berlin, 1838.—His ballads and legends are considered among the best effusions of their kind in German literature.

CHAMPIONNET, Jean Etienne, sham'-pe-on'-ai, a French general of the revolutionary epoch, who, after suppressing the rising of the Girondists, and serving on the Rhine and in Flanders, was, in 1798, appointed to command the army at Rome, where he came in contact with General Mack, at the head of 60,000 Neapolitans, while Championnet had only 13,000 French to oppose to him. He, at first, evacuated Rome, but soon succeeded in defeating, and ultimately compelling Mack to surrender. He then retook Rome, captured Capua, Gaëta, and at length, on January 23, 1799, Naples itself, and proceeded to organise the Parthenopean Republic. Disagreeing with the conduct of the Directory, he refused to execute their orders, and was arrested and imprisoned. The revolution of the 30th Prairial restored him to liberty, and the command of the army of the Alps: but the coup d'état of Bonaparte on 19th Brumaire, being in violence of Championnet's republican principles, he demanded his recall, and retired into private life. b. 1762; d. 1800.

CHAMPLAIN, Samuel de, sham'-plā, a French naval officer, who founded Quebec, and became the first governor-general of Canada. Lake Champlain was named after him. b. at Le Brouage, 1570; d. 1635. He was the author of "Travels in New France, or Canada," 4to.

CHAMPMELE, Mary-Desmares de, sham-mail'-ai, a French actress, who was at first a strolling player, and afterwards appeared at Paris, where she had uncommon success. She received instructions from Racine in the performance of tragedy. b. at Rouen, 1644; d. 1693.—Her husband was also an actor and a dramatic writer. He died in 1701, and his works were published in 1742, 2 vols. 12mo.

CHAMPOLLION, Jean Jacques, sham-pol'-le-awng, from being professor of Greek literature in Grenoble, became in 1849, keeper of the library in the palace of Fontainebleau, and in 1856 librarian to the emperor Napoleon III. He has written several scientific, chronological, and antiquarian works, and in 1819 received the prize of the Academy of Inscriptions. He also wrote a work entitled "The Tournaments of King René," of which only 200 copies were printed, and which is very expensive. He was also a considerable contributor to periodical literature. b. at Figeac, 1775; d. 1867.

CHAMPOLLION, Jean François, a younger brother of the above, distinguished himself as an archaeologist. In 1825 he accompanied a party of savans to Egypt, where important discoveries were made relative to the manners and customs of the ancient inhabitants of that country. Among his numerous works, we may mention his "Pantheon Egyptian," and his "Précis du Systeme Hiéroglyphique des Anciens Egyptiens." b. at Figeac, 1790; d. at Paris, 1832.

CHANCELLOR, Richard, chan'-sel-lor, an English navigator, who had a command under Sir Hugh Willoughby in the unfortunate voyage undertaken under the direction of Sebastian Cabot to discover a N.E. passage to China. Parting company with Sir Hugh, who perished on the coast of Lapland, Chancellor discovered the port of Archangel, Russia, and had an audience of the czar of Muscovy, Ivan IV., who received him graciously, giving permission to the English to trade with his subjects. This was the foundation of the Russian Company. On Chancellor's arrival in England, a company was incorporated, by whom he was sent again to Russia; but in returning, he was unfortunately lost on the coast of Norway, in 1556.

CHANDLER, Richard, chand'-ler, an eminent English scholar and antiquary, who published, in 1763, a magnificent edition of the "Marmora Oxoniensia." Commissioned to examine the monuments of antiquity, he, from 1764 to 1766, visited Asia Minor and Greece, bringing back to England a vast amount of valuable materials. He published, during the succeeding years, the result of his travels and researches, some of which have been translated into French. b. at Elson, Hants, 1738; d. 1810.

CHANDLER, Samuel, D.D., an eminent dissenting divine, and author of a variety of works in vindication of Christianity against the attacks of deists, atheists, and other opponents, a man of an amiable and exemplary character, was born in 1693, at Hungerford, and studied mainly at Gloucester, where Butler, author of the "Analogy," Seeker, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, and other eminent men, were fellow-students with him. He officiated as minister of the Presbyterian congregation in the Old Jewry, London, for forty years, and during that period most of his works were written. d. 1768.

CHANDOS, Sir John, shan'-dor, a celebrated English captain in the reign of Edward III. He was appointed lieutenant-general of the English possessions in France; and, at the battle of Auray, in 1364, took Duguesclin prisoner. When Edward III. erected Aquitaine into a principality for his son, the Black Prince, Chandos became the prince's constable. He was present at the battle of Poitiers, 1356; and was killed, bravely fighting, at the battle of Lussac, 1369. Chandos was a chivalric soldier, and was held in equal esteem by his adversaries and friends.

CHANGARNIER, Nicolas-Anne-Théodule, shangar-ne-ai, a French general, once the confidant, and, in a measure, the rival, of Napoleon III., before the elevation of the latter to the throne. In 1815, he entered the army as a private, and in 1821 accompanied the Duke of Angoulême to Spain, where he distinguished himself both by his courage and capacity. After the revolution of 1830, he went with the rank of captain to Algeria, where he greatly increased his renown, and became a chef-de-bataillon. His coolness and intrepidity, in the first unsuccessful attack on Constantine, were the forerunners of greater fame and honour to him; for at Mansourah, on the 24th November, 1836, with only 300 men, he defeated 6000 of the enemy. In 1838 he was made a colonel, and in 1841 he was wounded at the head of his brigade in an affair with Abd-el-Kader, in which, as usual, he distinguished himself by his bravery. In 1843 he had the rank of lieutenant-general conferred on him; and, after serving a period of thirteen years, returned to France. In 1847 the duke d'Aumale became governor of Algeria, and induced Changarnier to accept the command of the army in that province. In the following year the duke was forced to quit Algeria, when the government was provisionally handed over to General Cavaignac, and Changarnier once more returned to France. He was now appointed governor-general of Algeria, in the place of Cavaignac, who was recalled to Paris; and on the election of Louis Napoleon to the presidency of the republic, he was made commander of the first military division, with the whole of the military command of Paris. His influence, however, was now too great to be viewed with ease by Napoleon, who stripped him of his command, and reduced him to the condition of a private citizen. After the coup d'état of December 2, 1851, he was exiled, and afterwards lived mostly at Brussels. b. at Autun, 1793.

CHANNING, William Ellery, chan'-ning, an eminent Unitarian minister of the United States, who, in 1803, became pastor of the Federal-street congregation in Boston. As a preacher, he was remarkable for the polished grace with which he adorned his style, and the love of pure and lofty morality with which his sentiments were imbued. His writings are animated by the same spirit, and have justly obtained for him a considerable celebrity wherever the English language is spoken. His "Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton," and his "Remarks on the Life and Character of Napoleon Bonaparte," are the two perform-

CHANTREY, Sir Francis, chant'-re, an eminent English sculptor, who was designed by his father, a Derbyshire farmer, for the law, but who preferred the precarious pursuits of an artist, and was, accordingly, bound three years to a carver in Sheffield. Whilst serving his apprenticeship, he became a modeller in clay, and, in this capacity, subsequently tried his fortune successively in Dublin, Edinburgh, and London. In the last-named city he was taken by the hand by Nollekens, who greatly smoothed his path to fame and fortune. His abilities as a monumental sculptor were great; and, being universally acknowledged, he was uniformly successful in his career. In 1819 he was elected a member of the Royal Academy, and, in the following year, paid a visit to Italy. In 1837 he was knighted by Queen Victoria. n. at Norton, Derbyshire, 1732; n. 1841.—Chantrey had little of the poetry of his art. He therefore prudently confined himself within the limits of what it was in his power to achieve. One of his best statues is that of Pitt, in Hanover-square, London; another, that of Canning, in Westminster Abbey.

CHAPELAIN, John, shap'-lā, a French poet, who wrote "La Pucelle" (the Maid of Orleans), which, at first, was received with immense favour. It passed through six editions in eighteen months, but was subsequently neglected. Besides the above, he produced some other effusions, and had a fate unusual with his order,—that of dying very rich, having himself amassed his fortune. n. at Paris, 1595; n. 1674.

CHAPMAN, George, chāp'-man, an English poet, who was well versed in the Latin and Greek languages, and translated Homer's "Iliad" and "Odyssey" into English. This work, if less elegant than Pope's, is more faithful; and Pope is said to have been greatly indebted to it in his own translations of the immortal Greek bard. He also wrote many dramatic pieces. n. 1657; n. in London, 1631.

CHAPPEL, William, F.S.A., chap'-el, a distinguished writer on the history and antiquities of English music, was indeed to undertake his researches by the common notion that the English were not a musical people, and had no national music. In contravention of this idea, he published a "Collection of National English Airs," issued in parts between 1839 and 1840; and, between 1845 and 1859, "Popular Music of the Olden Time." He was also the founder of the Percy and Musical Antiquarian Societies, both of which issued a variety of works bearing upon the musical and poetic history of England. Mr. Chappell has done much to vindicate the English people from the reproach of being devoid of musical genius. n. 1800.

CHAPTAL, Jean Antoine, shap'-tal, a distinguished French chemist, who, in 1793, became manager of the salt-petre manufactory at Paris, and one of the first professors of the Polytechnic School. In 1801, during the consulate of Napoleon I., he became minister of the Interior; but, in three years, retired from this post, to devote himself to pursuits more in accordance with his tastes. In this spirit he directed his attention to the manufacturing interests of his country, instituted chambers of commerce, and established councils of arts and manufactures. From time to time, he gave to the public the results of his studies and investigations, and, by every means in his power, endeavoured to improve and extend the manufactures of France. His chemical works are numerous and highly appreciated, and he was one of the founders of the Society of Encouragement, over which he presided for many years. n. at Nozaret, 1756; n. at Paris, 1832.—At the time of his death, Chaptal was a peer of France and a grand officer of the Legion of Honour.

CHARDIN, Sir John, shar'-dā, a French traveller, who went to the East to endeavour to advance "his fortunes and estate." He twice visited Persia, remaining several years each time, between 1664 and 1677, and making himself acquainted with the manners and customs of the country. On his return, he visited London, where, in 1681, he settled as a jeweller to the court and nobility. He was knighted by Charles II., and married on the same day; and, in the following year, became a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1686 a folio volume of his travels appeared, and has been translated into several languages. n. at Paris, 1643; n. at Turnham Green, and buried at Chiswick, 1713.—Chardin was a painstaking traveller, knew Ispahan better than he did Paris, and spoke the Persian language like a native.

CHARES, ka'-rees, an Athenian general of rather questionable character, but considerable ability, who flourished between 400 and 333 B.C.—There was also a sculptor of this name, who is famous for the celebrated colossus of Rhodes, which was executed by him, but destroyed by an earthquake, 227 B.C.

CHARETTE DE LA CONTRE, Francis Athanasius de, sha-ret' kon-tre', a French royalist, and leader of that party in La Vendée. He had been a lieutenant in the navy; headed an army of Bretons, and in a great many battles fought with varied success. At length he was wounded, taken prisoner, and carried to Nantes, where he expiated with his life the crime (or virtue) of defending to the last the cause of proscribed royalty. n. 1761; shot, 1793.

CHARLEMAGNE. (See SOVS. of France, p. 253.)

CHARLEMONT, baron, viscount, and earl of, sharl'-mont. This title has been borne by three members of the same family, all of whom have made themselves famous in the history of their country. 1.—Tobias Caulfield, the first lord, born in 1565, was sprung from an old family in Oxfordshire, and after seeing service at sea under the celebrated Martin Frobisher, and also under Howard of Effingham, he exchanged into the army, and acted under Essex and other commanders in Belgium and France, and, whether at sea or on land, always distinguishing himself and gaining honours and position. In 1593 he went to Ireland, and in the wars against Tyrone secured not only fame but fortune, as he obtained large grants of the lands of the rebel chieftain. In 1615 he was named one of the council of Munster; and in 1620 was ennobled by the title of Lord Caulfield of Charlemont—the latter being a fort built to overawe Tyrone's country, and of which Sir Tobias was governor. n. 1627. 2.—William Caulfield, or Viscount Charlemont, was the grand-nephew of Sir Tobias, and took a prominent part in the wars connected with the revolution of 1688. He was attainted, and his estates confiscated by the Parliament of James II., but was restored on the accession of William III. He subsequently went to Spain, and served with much distinction under the great earl of Peterborough. He attained the rank of major-general, and was governor of the counties of Armagh and Tyrone. 3.—James Caulfield, earl of Charlemont, was distinguished for his literary, philosophic, and general accomplishments, but is more especially famous for his patriotism, and his connexion with the celebrated Irish volunteers of 1783. The great Irish volunteer movement had its origin in Belfast, where a company was formed to protect the coast from the depredations of the French and American fleets; and the example was followed in the towns in the north Armagh corps, and in November, 1783, when the National Volunteer Convention met in Dublin, his lordship was elected president, and in that capacity was of essential service both in forwarding the legitimate purposes of the association, and in preventing so powerful a body being used for sinister and dangerous objects. During the stormy and eventful political events of the period, his lordship exercised a large and most beneficial influence—more so, perhaps, than any other man of the time, and was mainly instrumental in obtaining several valuable reforms in the Government, and also in maintaining good relations between the latter and the volunteers. Though offered high honours and advantages he declined all, preferring to maintain untainted the purity and disinterested patriotism of his character. After the subsidence of the volunteer movement, Lord Charlemont, although in infirm health, continued to take a share in political occurrences, and strenuously resisted the legislative union of England and Ireland; but, almost in the midst of the struggle, his constitution gave way, and he died on the 4th of August, 1790. His genius was inferior to that of many men of even the most brilliant talents of the age to acquire. He was born in 1725; and was made an earl in 1783.

CHARLES. This name has been borne by a great number of monarchs, and in almost every country. To avoid confusion, they are arranged under the names of the countries they governed.—

I.—SOVEREIGNS OF ENGLAND, ETC.

CHARLES I., king of England, was the third son of James I., by Anne, daughter of the king of Denmark. On the accession of his father to the English throne, he was created duke of York and Cornwall. The death of his brother Prince Henry, in 1612, left him her-apparent to the throne (James's second son, Robert, having died in infancy), but he was not created Prince of Wales till the month of November, 1616. In 1623, at the suggestion of the duke of Buckingham, and accompanied by him, he undertook a journey to Spain, for the purpose of personally paying his addresses to the Infanta. This contemplated match was, however, broken off, and shortly after his accession to the throne, in 1625, he married Henrietta Maria, youngest daughter of Henry IV. of France. Previous to his accession, the struggle between the popular and the monarchical principles of the constitution had commenced; but they had not assumed the definite form into which the resolute spirit of the times so soon afterwards moulded them. Charles was engaged in a war with Spain, and found it necessary to summon a parliament to grant him supplies. Nothing, however, was more remote from the minds of the representatives of the people than the intention of complying with the demands of the king. Accordingly, they were dismissed, and several parliaments were similarly served, until the meeting of the Long Parliament, which was the fifth of the reign, and which was assembled in 1640. Meanwhile, a foolish war with France had been terminated, and also that with Spain; the duke of Buckingham had been assassinated, and in 1637 John Hampden had been tried and condemned for refusing to be assessed for ship-money. Scotland had risen in insurrection, and the first act of the Long Parliament was to enter into an alliance with the insurgents. It then proceeded to strip the crown of all its objectionable prerogatives, impeached, and subsequently executed Strafford, the minister of Charles, and committed Archbishop Laud to the Tower. It also brought in a bill called the Militia Bill, which was to transfer all the military power of the kingdom into their own hands, and to which the king would not give his assent. This was followed by the battle of Edgehill, fought on the 23rd October, 1642, and which was the first blood drawn in the civil war. Hostilities having thus commenced, the royal arms were, for some time, successful, particularly in the west; but the battle of Marston Moor, in July, 1644, and that of Newbury, were ruinous to the king's cause. A treaty was entered into at Uxbridge, but the parliament insisting upon the abolition of episcopacy, which Charles would not yield, hostilities were renewed, when the battle of Naseby, fought on the 14th of June, 1645, proved fatal to the royal cause. The king now threw himself on the protection of the Scots, who ultimately gave him up to the commissioners of the English parliament, from whom he was forcibly taken by Cornet Joyce and carried to the army, then lying at Tripplow Heath. Thence he was sent to Hampton Court, where he was treated with some respect, as the parliament and army were at variance, the former being mostly Presbyterian, and the latter Independents. Intending to quit the kingdom, he shortly afterwards effected his escape, and sought refuge with the parliamentary forces at Oxford, where he was a prisoner, and confined in Whitehall. The army now determined to bring him to trial, in which the House of Commons concurred. Accordingly, he was, on the 20th January, 1649, brought to trial in Westminster Hall, and behaved with great dignity, refusing to acknowledge the authority of his judges, who had constituted themselves into a High Court of Justice. During his trial, he was forced to submit to many indignities, which he bore with patience and resignation. The trial lasted some days, when, on the 27th, sentence of death was pronounced upon him. Three days only were allowed to intervene between his condemnation and his execution, which were spent in affectionate interviews with his children, whom he exhorted to steadfastness in the Protestant religion, as reformed in the Church of England, and in recommending his successor to forgive his enemies. On the scaffold before the Banqueting-house at Whitehall, he was beheaded by a masked executioner, Jan. 30, 1649. b. at Dunfermline, Scotland, 1600.—In his domestic character, few sovereigns have equalled Charles I. He was naturally possessed of a fine genius, and was one of the most powerful and elegant writers of the English language. The celebrated "Eikon Basilike" is now generally allowed not to be a production of his, although many believe that he was quite equal to its composition. Of the fine arts he was a liberal patron, and, but for the evil counsels by which he suffered himself to be guided, might have escaped the untimely end to which he was brought by the offended judgment of a people determined to be free. He was the father of Charles II. and James II.

CHARLES II., king of England, was the second son of the above, an elder brother, Charles James, having died on the day of his birth. Having served with the royal army till after the battle of Naseby, Charles then left the country, and in 1649 joined his mother at Paris, whence he proceeded to the Hague, where he received the news of the fate of his father. In Scotland he was, at Edinburgh, proclaimed king on the 2nd February, 1649, and again on the 15th July, 1650, after he had arrived in that country. He had already been obliged to take the covenant imposed by the Presbyterians, when, on the 1st January, 1651, he was crowned at Scone. Cromwell, however, was by this time "up and doing," and had made himself master of the greater part of Scotland, when Charles determined on marching southward into England. He was proclaimed king at Carlisle, of which city he took possession. He next proceeded to Worcester, where Cromwell put an end to his enterprise by defeating his army, on the 3rd of September, 1651. His escape, after this battle, was almost miraculous. Hid in the thick branches of a large oak in Boscobel wood, he avoided his pursuers, who came under the tree where he was. After wandering from one place to another in various disguises, he reached Shoreham, in Sussex, whence he embarked on the 15th of October, and arrived safe at Fescamp, in Normandy. Thence he proceeded to Paris, and finally to Bruges and Brussels, at which he mostly resided until the death of Cromwell, in September, 1658. On the 23rd of May, 1660, he embarked from the Hague for London, where he arrived on the 29th of the same month, and was received with the most joyous acclamations. General Monk was the chief instrument of this restoration, and therefore shared in the royal favour. One of the first acts of Charles, on coming to the throne, was to sell Dunkirk, in order to supply his extravagances. In 1665 he declared war against Holland, which produced a confederacy between that country, France, and Denmark. A Dutch fleet sailed up the Medway, and destroyed several ships. To add to the national calamities, the plague, in 1665, swept away a vast number of the inhabitants of London, and, in the following year, a large proportion of the city was laid in ruins by fire. In 1667 peace was concluded with the Dutch, and, shortly afterwards, the great Lord Clarendon was sent into exile. About 1670 was formed the famous ministry called the Cabal, from the initial letters of the names of the five persons who composed it. At this time Charles became a pensionary of France, and entered into a new war against Holland, which terminated in 1674. In 1678 the peace of Nimeguen was concluded.

Charles Edward

The same year was remarkable as being that in which the pretended discovery of a popish plot was made, when, on the evidence of Oates and Bedloe, several eminent persons were put to death. In the parliament of 1679 the famous Habeas Corpus act was passed; and, in the following year, the contest between the court and popular party gave rise to the famous distinctions of Whig and Tory. A new parliament met at Oxford in 1681, but it was soon dissolved. From this time Charles assembled no more parliaments, and governed in the most arbitrary manner. The charters of the corporations were called in and altered, so as to make them dependent on the crown. These proceedings caused a conspiracy, called the Rye-house plot, to be formed against him, and Lord William Russell and Algernon Sidney were executed for their supposed concern in it, 1683.—b. 1630; d. of apoplexy, 1685.—In his last moments the "merry monarch" received the sacrament from a Catholic priest, although he had professed Protestantism, whilst his libertinism was of the most open and audacious kind. progeny, whose descendants now enjoy in England some of the titular dukedoms which he conferred upon them.

CHARLES EDWARD, of the Stuart family, called the "Young Pretender," was the grandson of James II. of England. In 1745 he landed in the Highlands of Scotland, and published a manifesto setting forth the claims of his father to the English throne. Being aided by several Highland chiefs and their followers, he made a successful descent upon the Lowlands, and entered Edinburgh. Here he caused his father to be proclaimed; on which General Cope hastened towards the capital, but was met and defeated by Charles at Preston Pans. Instead of making a proper use of this victory, by pushing into England, Charles returned to Edinburgh, wasting his time in an idle parade of royalty. Being joined, however, by Lords Kilmarnock, Cromarty, Balmerino, and other discontented chiefs, he marched as far as Manchester; but hearing that the king was about to take the field, he returned to Scotland, where he defeated the English forces under Hawley at Falkirk. In the mean time the duke of Cumberland advanced to Edinburgh, and thence to Aberdeen, the Pretender retreating before him. At last the two armies met on the moor of Culloden, near Inverness, when, after an obstinate conflict, in which the Highlanders displayed signal courage, the royal army was victorious, and the Scotch fled, leaving three thousand of their number dead on the field. Charles, after wandering about in different disguises, chiefly among the Hebrides, effected his escape to France, and thus ended all hopes of this unfortunate family ever recovering the crown of their ancestors. b. at Rome, 1720; d. at Florence, 1788. He married the Princess Holberg-Gedern, who afterwards secretly married Count Alfieri, the poet. His brother, Henry Benedict, Cardinal York, suffered so much from the ravages of the French in Italy, as to excite the compassion of the English, and his case being made known to George III., he settled upon the venerable representative of an illustrious house a considerable pension. CHARLES VI., the second son of the emperor Leopold I., was declared king of Spain by his father in 1704, and crowned emperor in 1711. He made peace with France in 1714, and two years afterwards declared war against the Turks, in which his general, Prince Eugene, obtained several victories; among which was that of Peterwardein, and the taking of Belgrade. These successes forced the Turks to make peace, which resulted in the treaty of Passarowitz, in 1718, by which large portions of Servia and Temeswar were ceded to Austria. An alliance was now entered into between the emperor, France, Great Britain, and Holland, against Spain; the consequence of which was the wresting of Sardinia and Sicily from that power, and the erecting of the former into a monarchy, under the duke of Savoy. He afterwards entered into a war against his former allies, and by the peace of Vienna, in 1735, lost Naples and Sicily. B. 1685; D. at Vienna, 1740.—He was the last male of the line of the Austrian Hapsburgs.

CHARLES VII. was elector of Bavaria, and owed his crown to France and Prussia, in 1742. He had, however, a powerful rival in Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary, whose right was supported by Great Britain and Sardinia, and who finally succeeded to the empire. The struggle between these princes is known in history as the "War of the Austrian Succession." D. 1745.

SOVEREIGNS OF FRANCE.

CHARLES MARTEL, mayor of the palace under Chilperic II. and Thierry IV., kings of France, was the natural son of Pepin d'Héristal, duke of Austrasia, of which he was proclaimed duke in 715. As mayor of the palace, he possessed the whole regal power, which he administered with great success, and gained many victories, the principal of which was over the Saracen general Abdalrahman, between Tours and Poitiers, in 732. (See ABDALRAHMAN.) It was in consequence of this victory that he was called Martel, or the hammer. On the death of Thierry, in 736, no successor was appointed, and Charles conducted the government as duke of the Franks. D. at Crécy, 741, dividing his kingdom between his sons Carloman and Pepin.—The latter became the first king of France of the Carlovingian race, which name was taken from the founder, Charles Martel.

CHARLEMAGNE, or Charles the Great, sharl-e-main, king of France, and founder of the Germanic empire, or Empire of the West, was the son of Pepin, and grandson of Charles Martel. He succeeded his brother Carloman, king of France, in 771. The greater part of his reign was spent in war. In 774 he conquered the Lombards, and assumed the crown of Lombardy. In 778 he made some conquests in Spain, but at Roncesvalles, where Roland, the hero of continental romance, fell, his vanguard was defeated. After defeating the Saxons and putting an end to the monarchy of the Lombards, he was in 800 crowned emperor of the West by Pope Leo III. B. in the castle of CHARLES I., called the Bald, is generally placed by French writers as their first king, although Charlemagne is unquestionably entitled to that eminence: were this given to him, however, an irreconcilable discrepancy would take place in the numerical priority of the reigns of their sovereigns; consequently, Charles the Bald is called the first. He was crowned in 810, and elected emperor of the West by the people of Rome in 875. It is supposed he died of poison, at a place called Brös, on Mount Cenis, in the Alps, 877. n. a Frankfort-on-the-Main, 823.

CHARLES II., or the Fat, was the nephew of the preceding monarch. He was a feeble and treacherous prince, whom his subjects compelled to resign the crown in favour of his nephew Arnolph, an illegitimate son of the king of Bavaria and Italy. n. 832; d. at the castle of Indinze, Suabia, 833.

CHARLES III., or the Simple, was crowned at Rheims in 893, and on the death of Louis IV., king of Germany, was elected emperor; but his power was greatly reduced by the usurpation of his nobles, and the encroachments of the Normans. His minister and favourite, Haganon, gave such offence to the nobles, that they revolted and drove him from his kingdom, which was seized by Robert, duke of France, who was crowned by the archbishop of Rheims in 923. The same year a battle was fought between the two monarchs, in which Robert was slain; but his son, Hugh the Great, defeated Charles, who fled for refuge to the count of Vermandois. His wife, a sister of Athelstan, king of England, took shelter with her son Louis in that country, and he remained a prisoner during the remainder of his days. n. 879; d. 929.

CHARLES IV., or the Handsome, third son of Philip the Fair, obtained the crown of France in 1322. In his reign a fierce war raged between him and Edward II. of England, who had married Isabella, the sister of Charles. The war resulted in the cession of Guienne to Edward. In 1373 Charles visited Toulouse, when the people of that city tried to revive the ancient Provençal poetry, and instituted an annual meeting of poets at the floral games, which was continued down to the Revolution. n. 1328.—With this sovereign the elder branch of the line of Capet terminated, and was succeeded by the younger; viz., that of Valois.

CHARLES V., called the Wise, was the eldest son of John II., and the first prince who bore the title of dauphin. His father was the king who, in 1358, was taken prisoner by Edward the Black Prince at the battle of Poitiers. He succeeded to the crown on the death of his brother in 1364. By his prudence and valour he restored the commerce and agriculture of his country, and gained several advantages over the English. Bertrand Duguesclin and Oliver de Clisson were amongst his most famous generals. n. 1380.—The Royal Library of Paris was founded by this prince, and the Bastille was erected by him.

CHARLES VI., the Well-beloved, son of the above, was crowned in 1380. His reign was unfortunate, owing to the quarrels of his uncles for power during his minority, and the contentions of the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy during the later years of his reign, the king's mind being clouded with insanity. Henry V. of England took advantage of these disputes to invade France. His great victory at Agincourt gave him possession of Normandy, and, allying himself with the Burgundian party, he disinherited the dauphin, married Catharine, the daughter of the French king, and was crowned king of France in 1421. n. 1369; d. 1422. (See HENRY V. of England.)

CHARLES VII., called the Victorious, was crowned in 1423, and by his activity drove out the invaders from all their possessions except Calais. In effecting this, Jeanne Darc, the Maid of Orleans, may be considered to have greatly assisted, as the tide of fortune turned against the English after her appearance at Orleans. n. at Bourges, 1401.—The Greek language was first taught in the University of Paris during the reign of this prince. Charles was an amorous monarch, and the beautiful and talented Agnes Sorel was for many years his mistress. His last days were embittered by the ambition of his son, the cruel Louis XI., and, fearing to be poisoned by him, he starved himself to death.

CHARLES VIII., called the Affable, was the son of Louis XI., and ascended the throne in 1483, at the age of 13. He conquered Naples after a short war of five months, but lost that kingdom as quickly as he had won it. In 1495, at about ten miles from Piacenza, on his return to France, he obtained a great victory over the Italians, though their army numbered 40,000 strong, against 9000 of his troops. n. 1493.

CHARLES IX. succeeded to the throne in 1560, on the death of his brother, Francis II. He was the son of Henry II., and his mother was Catharine de Medici, who was, in effect, the reigning sovereign. She, however, abused the power she possessed, and caused great discontent among the king's Protestant subjects, who revolted from her authority. This resulted in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, one of the blackest deeds on record, and which must for ever stain with infamy the memory of Charles. Shortly after this event, he died, in his 24th year, smitten by the terrors of an evil conscience. n. 1550; d. 1574.—The remorse which Charles felt on account of the massacre of St. Bartholomew seems to have been as deep as it was sincere. "That miserable day," says Sully, "was, without ceasing, present to his mind; and he showed by his transports of grief, and by his terrors, how great was his repentance." (See CATHARINE DE MEDICI, COLIGNY, &c.)

CHARLES X. was the brother of Louis XVIII., and, after a variety of fortune, caused by the French revolution, was proclaimed king in September, 1824. On his accession to the throne, he endeavoured to make himself popular; but there was a strong party against him, who were intimate with his character, and therefore had little faith in the sincerity by which any of his more liberal acts were professedly governed. In 1827 a bill was brought in regarding the "police of the press," which was nothing less than the offensive re-establishment of a censorship over all pamphlets of less than 21 sheets. It was, also, otherwise extremely oppressive upon the editors and proprietors of newspapers. The bill was, after a lively debate, withdrawn; but it left a deep impression on the minds of the Parisians. Accordingly, at a grand review, at which the king soon afterwards appeared, he was saluted with "Down with the ministers!" "Down with the Jesuits!" from all classes of the people. The king, however, was rather irritated than disconcerted or dismayed, by this demonstration, and sternly told some of the most clamorous, that he "had come there for homage, and not to be taught lessons;" and then disbanded the troops. Shortly afterwards, the House was dissolved, and in the January of 1823, a new ministry formed. Several other ministries enjoyed short reigns up to 1830, when the chambers opened in March, with Prince Polignac at the head of the administration. In reply to the speech from the throne, the king was told that his ministry had not the confidence of the representatives of the nation, and the chambers were prorogued first of all, and then a dissolution was proclaimed and new elections made. But in the spring of this year, discontents had increased among the people, and on the 25th July the liberty of the press was suspended. Several other oppressive measures accompanied this, which were energetically protested against, and which roused the mass of the people to take up arms. On July 27, the first encounter took place between the people and the soldiery. On the following day, the fighting became general, and the next, Marmont, who was at the head of the Guards, evacuated Paris. On the 30th, the duke of Orleans was proclaimed lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and on the 2nd of August, Charles abdicated in favour of the duke of Bordeaux, and set out for Cherbourg. The claims of the duke, however, were not recognised by the chambers, and the duke of Orleans (Louis Philippe) was chosen to reign in his stead. Charles sailed for England, and eventually took up his abode at Holyrood Palace, in Edinburgh, where, 20 years before, he had sought and found an asylum. He subsequently removed to Prague, in Bohemia; thence to Goritz, in Styria; and there, in the château of Grafenberg, he was attacked by cholera, which carried him off. B. at Versailles, 1757; D. at Goritz, 1836.

SOVEREIGNS OF SPAIN.

CHARLES I. of Spain. (See CHARLES V. of Germany.)

CHARLES II., the son of Philip IV., succeeded to the throne in 1665. He married twice, but never had any issue. By his will he constituted Philip of France, duke of Anjou, his heir, which, after his death, led to the contest known in history as the "War of the Spanish Succession." B. 1661; D. 1700.

CHARLES III., son of Philip V., on the death of his brother Ferdinand exchanged his kingdom of Sicily for the Spanish dominions. He was a virtuous man, and possessed of considerable administrative abilities. CHARLES X., or GUSTAVUS, king of Sweden, the son of John Casimir, count palatine of the Rhine, ascended the throne of Sweden on the abdication of Christian I. He turned his arms with success against the Poles, and gained, in 1655, the famous battle of Warsaw, which lasted three days, besides taking a great number of their principal places. The Poles, owing to their assistance Russia, Holland, and Denmark, obliged the king of Sweden to conclude a peace. War, however, soon broke out again, and after taking Kronenbourg, Charles laid siege to Copenhagen; but, his navy being defeated, he was obliged to return to his country. B. at Upsal, 1622; D. 1660.

CHARLES XI. was the son and successor of the above. On his accession, in 1694, a peace was concluded with Denmark; but, in 1674, the latter power declared war against him, and he lost several places, which were restored at the peace of Nimeguen, in 1674. He was a good prince, and gave much of his attention to the regulation of the internal affairs of his kingdom. B. 1655; D. 1697.

CHARLES XII., son and successor of the preceding, had, from his childhood, an ambition to imitate the actions of Alexander the Great. He mounted the throne in 1697, being then only fifteen, and, at his coronation, snatched the crown from the hands of the archbishop of Upsal, and placed it on his own head. His youth presented a favourable opportunity to Russia, Denmark, and Poland to enter into an alliance against him, with a view of dismembering his kingdom. The young hero, undaunted by this confederacy, attacked each in turn, beginning with Denmark, whom he compelled to sue for peace. In 1700 he decisively defeated the Russians at Narva, although the odds against him were 80,000 to 8000. His next enterprise was against Poland, and, after several battles, he de-throned Augustus in 1707, and placed Stanislaus upon the throne. Charles was now at the head of 60,000 men, when he formed the resolution of humbling Peter the Great. At first he obtained some signal advantages, and was joined by Mazeppa, the hetman or chief of the Cossacks, in his attempt to overthrow the Czar. After suffering the horrors of a winter campaign in the Ukraine, he laid siege to the town of Pultowa, to the relief of which Peter came at the head of 70,000 men. On the 8th of July, 1709, a general battle was fought, in which Charles was completely defeated, and fled, leaving 9,000 men upon the field. He himself was wounded in the leg, and had to be carried off in a litter. He sought an asylum in Turkey, where he was entertained by the grand seignior, who provided for him a residence at Bender. Here his conduct was so violent, that he was ordered to leave the Turkish territories, which he refused to do. On this, the grand seignior directed that he should be forced away; but Charles, with his retinue, formed an encampment, and resisted the attack of the janizaries till superiority of numbers obliged him to take shelter in his house. Thence he sallied out, sword in hand; but being entangled by his long spurs, fell, and was taken prisoner. He was still treated with respect, and after being kept as a prisoner for ten months, he requested leave to return to his dominions, which was readily granted. On arriving in Sweden he was received with universal joy, but found his kingdom reduced to a state of great wretchedness. Getting together an army, in 1716 he invaded Norway, but after penetrating to Christiana, was obliged to return to Sweden.

He resumed the attack in the winter of 1718, but was killed by a cannon-shot at the siege of Frederickshall, on the 11th of December in the same year. B. at Stockholm, 1682; fell, 1718.—Charles was liberal, active, and firm; but rash, obstinate, and cruel. He was never intimidated even in the midst of the greatest dangers. At the battle of Narva he had several horses shot under him, and as he was mounting upon a fresh one, he said, "These people find me exercise." When he was besieged at Stralsund, a bomb fell into the house while he was dictating to his secretary, who immediately dropped the pen in a fright. "What is the matter?" said Charles. "Oh, the bomb!" answered the secretary. "The bomb!" said the king, "what have we to do with the bomb? go on."

CHARLES XIV., whose real name was Jean Baptiste Jules Bernadotte, enlisted in a regiment of the French royal marines in 1780, and served two years in Corsica. In 1790, when the revolution began, he was at Marseilles, and when the war broke out with Austria and Prussia, he was despatched to the Rhine, and, under General Custine, soon distinguished himself. He became chief of brigade, and afterwards general of division, under Kleber and Jourdan. In 1797, with 20,000 men, he reinforced General Bonaparte in Italy, and took a chief part in the passage of the Tagliamento. Soon after this he was chosen by Bonaparte to present to the Directory the standards which had been taken from the Austrians, and, on his return to headquarters, advised Bonaparte to sign the treaty of Campo-Formio. Being offended at the conduct of Napoleon, who, when he left Italy, took from him one half of his troops, he resigned his command, and was appointed ambassador at Vienna, where he did not hoist the tricoloured flag above his hotel until ordered by the Directory. When this was done, it created a riot, soon after which Bernadotte left for Paris, where, in 1798, he married Eugénie Clary, the younger sister of the wife of Joseph Bonaparte. In the following year he was appointed minister-at-war; but on the return of Bonaparte from Egypt, he was without employment. When Napoleon became first consul, Bernadotte had command of the Army in the West; and when the emperorship was assumed, he was made a marshal, and stationed at Hanover, with the command of the army. Here he repressed irregularities, provided for his soldiers without plundering the people, and laid the foundation of that high character for honour, humanity, and justice, which, at a future day, materially influenced his election to the throne of Sweden. In 1805 he left Hanover to join Napoleon against Austria, and at the battle of Austerlitz broke the centre of the Russians. In the following year he was created Prince of Pontecorvo, which Napoleon designated as the immediate fief of the imperial crown. In the war against Prussia he fought with his usual success, and in 1808 was ordered against Denmark. On the 5th and 6th of July, 1809, he fought against the Austrians at Wag-lam, after which he demanded permission to retire, and obtained it. He had had high words with Napoleon, who, at that battle, had deprived him of his reserve division, and not treated him well. He returned to Paris, but was soon again employed, and notwithstanding several quarrels between him and the emperor, neither of whom seems ever to have quite understood the other, he, in 1810, accepted the governor-generalship of the Roman states. By this time, Gustavus IV., king of Sweden, had, on account of incapacity, been forced to abdicate his crown, and he and his descendants were, by the Swedish States, declared excluded from the throne for ever. The uncle of this sovereign assumed the reins of government as Charles XIII., but was childless; and the States chose Augustus of Holstein-Augustenburg to be heir to the throne. This prince, however, died in 1810, and Charles XIII. proposed Bernadotte to the Swedish diet, as a proper person to be appointed prince-royal of Sweden. The choice was unanimously approved, on condition of his accepting the Communion of Augsburg, which he did, and, on the 2nd November, 1810, entered Stockholm amid the acclamations of the people and the salutes of artillery. On the 5th he addressed the king and the assembled States, and concluded with this excellent passage: "Brought up in the camp, I have been familiar with war, and am acquainted with all its calamities. No conquest can console a country for the blood of its children, shed in foreign wars. It is not the physical dimensions of a country that constitute its strength. This lies rather in the wisdom of its laws, the greatness of its commerce, the industry of its people, and the national spirit by which it is animated. Sweden has lately suffered greatly; but the honour of her name is unsullied. She is still a land sufficient to supply our wants, and we have iron to defend ourselves." In defence of the rights of the country of his adoption, he was soon called upon to take up arms against Napoleon, and from 1812 to the fall of that great man, he was actively engaged in the principal wars and events which occupied the attention of continental Europe. In 1814 Sweden and Norway were united under Charles XIII., and Bernadotte approved as the prince-royal. In 1818 Charles XIII. died, when Bernadotte was proclaimed king of Norway and Sweden, under the title of Charles XIV. He was, in the May of that year, crowned at Stockholm by the archbishop of Upsal, and subsequently at Drontheim by the bishop of Aggerhuys. Having now attained the summit of human ambition, he directed his attention to the development of the resources of his adopted country, and after a long reign of unusual prosperity, he passed quietly from this world, after playing no ordinary part in it, having completed his eightieth year. B. at Pan, in the Bearn, 1764; D. 1844, and was succeeded by his son, Oscar I.

SOVEREIGNS OF NAPLES AND THE TWO SICILIES.

CHARLES I., count of Aragon, and king of Naples, was the son of Louis VIII. of France. He married the daughter of the count of Provence, and thereby inherited that country. He accompanied his brother Louis to Egypt in 1248, and both were made prisoners at Damietta at the same time. On his return, he defeated Manfred, the usurper of the Sicilian crown, assumed the title of king of Naples, and put to death Conradin, duke of Snabia, and the duke of Austria, whom he had taken prisoners. After this he laid the prince of Tunis under tribute, and suppressed the Ghibelines. In 1276 the title of king of Jerusalem was conferred on him, after which he meditated an expedition against Constantinople. His arbitrary conduct to the Sicilians caused them to conspire against him, headed by Giovanni de Procida. On Easter Monday, 1282, all the French who could be found in Palermo were massacred at the hour of Vespers; and this event is known in history as the "Sicilian Vespers." Sicily was thus lost to Charles, its inhabitants choosing Peter III. of Aragon for their king. n. 1220; p. 1285.

CHARLES II., called the Lame, the son and successor of the above, was, at the time of his father's death, a prisoner in the hands of the Sicilians, who would have put him to death but for the intercession of Constantia, queen of Peter of Aragon. He recovered his liberty in 1288, on condition of renouncing his claim to the Sicilian crown; but being absolved from this condition by the pope, he made several unsuccessful attempts to gain possession of Sicily. n. 1309.

CHARLES III., of Durazzo, was the great-grandson of the preceding, and, by his marriage with Margaret, niece of Joan, queen of Naples, obtained that kingdom from the pope, on the excommunication of Joan in 1380. He put Joan to death, and afterwards quarrelled with the pope, who excommunicated him in his turn. Charles then claimed the crown of Hungary, but fell in attempting to conquer it. n. 1386.

DUKES OF SAVOY AND KINGS OF SARDINIA.

CHARLES I., duke of Savoy, succeeded his brother, Philibert I., in 1482, being then only 14 years of age. He died at the age of 21, having achieved nothing remarkable, although the surname of the "Warrior" was given to him. He was educated at the court of Louis XI. of France. n. 1468; p. 1459.

CHARLES II., duke of Savoy, son of the above, was only 9 months old at the death of his father, and died at the age of 8 years.

CHARLES III., duke of Savoy, called the Good, succeeded Philibert II., his brother, in 1504. He had a long but unfortunate reign. He was of a versatile disposition, wavering between Francis I., his nephew, and Charles V., his brother-in-law, and was consequently mistrusted and punished by both. n. of chagrin, at Vercelli, 1553.

CHARLES EMMANUEL I., duke of Savoy, called the Great, governed from 1580 to 1630. Taking advantage of the troubles of France, he possessed himself of the marquisate of Saluzzo, and caused himself to be acknowledged by the "leaguers" count of Provence, in 1590. But Henry IV. subsequently succeeded in taking Savoy and a portion of Piedmont. Of a boundless ambition, the duke laid claims to the empire, after the death of Matthias, then to the kingdom of Cyprus and the principality of Macedonia. He died of grief, from not being able to accomplish his projects, in 1630.

CHARLES EMMANUEL II., duke of Savoy, son of Victor Amadeus I., succeeded his brother Francis in 1638, under the regency of his mother, Christina of France, daughter of Henry IV. of France. In his reign commerce and the arts flourished. n. 1634; p. 1675.

CHARLES EMMANUEL III., 2nd king of Sardinia of the house of Savoy, was the son of Victor Amadeus II., and, in 1730, mounted the throne, on the abdication of his father. In 1733 he united himself to France and Spain, who desired to weaken Austria; and at the head of the allied forces conquered the Milanese, defeated the imperialists at Guastalla, and obtained, as a reward, Novara and some fiefs of the empire. In 1742, the promise of an addition to his dominions determined him to take part with the queen of Hungary against France and Spain. He possessed himself of Modena and Mirandola, after evincing great military abilities. He lost, however, in 1744, at Coni, 5000 men, and subsequently busied himself with the internal affairs of his kingdom. n. 1701; p. 1773.

CHARLES EMMANUEL IV., 4th king of Sardinia, was the son of Victor Amadeus III., and succeeded his father in 1796, just as France had seized the greater portion of his dominions. Mixed up in the misfortunes of the Bourbons, with whom he was connected, Charles Emmanuel vainly exerted himself to suppress the revolutionary elements in his kingdom. He was forced to cede to the French republic his continental possessions, and, in 1798, retired to the island of Sardinia. In 1802 he abdicated in favour of his brother Victor Emmanuel, and repaired to Rome, where he died, 1819.

CHARLES FELIX, became king of Sardinia in 1821, on the forced abdication of his brother, Victor Emmanuel. He suppressed rebellion, introduced order into his kingdom, and compiled a military code. n. 1765; p. 1831, without children, leaving the crown to Charles Albert, the prince of Carignano.

CHARLES ALBERT, king of Sardinia, was the son of Charles Emmanuel, prince of Carignano. Educated in France, he early imbibed liberal ideas and a desire for the independence of Italy. In 1821 he commanded the Sardinian artillery, on the breaking out of the insurrection in that year. Victor Emmanuel, when he abdicated, nominated him regent till the arrival of the new king, Charles Felix (see above). An Austrian intervention, however, obliged him to retire, and, exiled in Tuscany, he continued there for some time, in disgrace, a victim to the resentment of the Carbonari, who thought he had betrayed them. In 1829, however, he was appointed viceroy of Sardinia, and in 1831 was called to the throne, in default of heirs to Charles Felix. He now ardently devoted himself to administrative reform in the various departments of law, commerce, and the army. In 1848, the year which witnessed revolutions in nearly all the kingdoms of Europe, he gave his subjects a liberal constitution, and openly embraced the cause of Italian independence and unity. n. of force of arms the insurgents of ly, Venetia, Parma, Placentia, and Modena, he at first obtained various brilliant successes, defeating the Austrians at Pastrengo, Goito, Rivoli, and Sommas Campagna. He succeeded also in taking Pizzigheone and Peschiera; but, badly seconded by the Lombard troops, he was, in his turn, beaten at San Donato, by the Austrian Radetzky, and forced to quit Milan precipitately. He was now compelled to solicit an armistice, the terms of which lost him all his former advantages. Yielding to the remonstrances of the ultra party, he imprudently recommenced the war at the expiration of the armistice; but he now experienced nothing but reverses. Losing, in spite of great personal bravery the decisive battle of Novara, on the 23rd of March, 1849, he abdicated on the same day in favour of his son, Victor Emmanuel II. n. a few months after, at Oporto, Portugal. This prince was singularly religious, and it was said of him, "He fought like a hero, lived like a monk, and died like a martyr." He doubtless meant well for Italy, but was not equal to the great task of establishing her unity and independence.

VARIOUS RULERS.

CHARLES, duke of Burgundy, called the Bold, was the son of Philip the Good, whom he succeeded in 1467. He early displayed great courage, verging on rashness, and was constantly at war with Louis XI., king of France. The latter instigated Charles's subjects (the inhabitants of Liège and Ghent) to revolt against him; but they were defeated, and cruelly punished by the duke. Learning that Louis XI. was again tampering with his people, he seized him, and forced him to assist in suppressing the insurrection. Charles then took Guelderland and Zutphen, and, desirous of increasing his dominions, invaded Switzerland, where he committed the most inhuman outrages. The Swiss, however, collected their forces, and the duke was first defeated at Granson, and afterwards at Morat, 1476, where his army was completely destroyed. In 1477, whilst besieging Nancy, in the territory of the duke of Lorraine, he was killed. b. 1433. (See Louis XI.) Charles left one daughter, Marie, who inherited his estates, and added a portion of them to Austria by her marriage with Maximilian, son of the emperor Frederick III.

CHARLES I., duke of Lorraine, was brought up at the French court under Charles V., and reigned from 1391 to 1431. He sustained the rights of his father-in-law, Robert, to the empire, against Wenceslas, fought in the French army at Agincourt, and in 1417 was made constable of France. By some he is called Charles II. b. 1431.

CHARLES II., called the Great, duke of Lorraine, was the son of Duke Francis I. and Christina of Denmark, niece of Charles V. Being only three years old at the death of his father, a joint regency was established under Christina and the bishop of Verdun. This prince was the benefactor of his people, and possessed great administrative abilities. He founded the university of Pont-à-Mousson, and the towns of Clermont, Lunéville, and Stenay. He married Claude, daughter of Henry II. of France, and in 1589 aspired to that throne. b. 1543.

CHARLES III., duke of Lorraine, succeeded to the dukedom in 1624, and unwisely incurring the hostility of France, was despoiled of his estates by Louis XIII. He, however, recovered a portion of them by the treaty of St. Germain in 1641, and that of the Pyrenees in 1659. Having violated these treaties, he was again dispossessed of his provinces. He then joined the army of the emperor, and gained a victory at Trèves, where he took prisoner Marshal de Créqui. b. 1603; d. 1675.—By a will, signed in 1660, he constituted Louis XIV. of France his heir.

CHARLES IV., duke of Lorraine, nephew of the above, succeeded to his rights in spite of the opposition of Louis XIV. Not being able, however, to retain possession of the dukedom, he took service in Austria. Obtaining the friendship of the emperor Leopold, he received the hand of the archduchess Marie-Eleonora, the emperor's sister. He became one of the first generals of the empire, and gained, amongst many other victories, that of Mohatz over the Turks, in 1687. b. at Vienna, 1643; d. 1690.

Charles

CHARLES I., king of Navarre. (See C IV. of France.)

CHARLES II., king of Navarre, called the Bad, was crowned in 1349. Descended from Philip the Bold, king of France, he possessed the right to the throne in case of the extinction of the Valois line. He constantly fomented troubles in the kingdom, with the view of arriving at the crown. Allying himself, with this aim, to Edward III. of England, he urged his pretensions to various provinces, raised Paris in insurrection against the dauphin (Charles V.), endeavouring even to poison him, and became tranquil at last only when he saw that prince firmly seated in the enjoyment of power. Then turning to Spain, he became entangled in the contest between Peter the Cruel and Henry of Trastámara, who disputed each other's right to Castile. Betraying, in its turn, each party, he was at length compelled to give up a portion of his dominions, in 1379. Adversity at last instructed him, and he passed his latter years in peace, engaged in governing his country. b. 1332; d. 1387.—He met with a remarkable death. Being ill of a leprosy, the physicians caused him to be wrapped in sheets dipped in spirits of wine and covered with brimstone. These were sewed about his body, and his page, endeavouring to loosen the bandage, accidentally set fire to it with a taper which he held in his hand. The king was so dreadfully scorched, that he died in great agony, 1387.

CHARLES III., king of Navarre, called the Noble, was the son of the above, and succeeded him in 1387. Desiring to live in peace with all his neighbours, he gave up the pretensions of his father to several provinces of France, and received, in return, considerable sums of money. b. 1425, after a long and tranquil reign. The kingdom of Navarre, at the death of this monarch, passed into the hands of John of Aragon, who had married Blanche, the daughter and heiress of Charles the Noble. At her death, in 1441, her son Charles should have succeeded her as Charles IV. of Navarre; but his father excluded him from the succession, which passed, in 1479, to his sister Eleanor de Foix.

CHARLOTTE, princess of Wales. (See LEOPOLD, king of the Belgians.)

CHARLES, Michel, sak, a distinguished French geometrician, who, by his power of generalization, greatly simplified and extended the most important theories. In 1841 he was appointed professor of astronomy and of applied mechanics in the Polytechnic School, and in 1846 was called to the chair of higher geometry, which was instituted in the faculty of Sciences. In 1851 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. The best of his numerous works is his "Traité de Géométrie Supérieure." b. at Epéron, 1793.

CHARLES, Victor Euphémion-Philarete, a distinguished French littérateur, whose father, from being a professor of rhetoric became a revolutionist, and subsequently a general in the French army. In his 15th year, Victor was apprenticed to a printer, and at the time of the Restoration, was imprisoned for two months, on account of his master being suspected as a plotter against the security of the state. Charles was set at liberty through the intercession of Châteaubriand, when he came to England, where for seven years he directed the printing department of the establishment of Mr. Valpy. Soon after this, he returned to Paris, and entered upon a literary career marked by considerable originality and success. His fecundity in authorship has been so great, that it would occupy a considerable space even to enumerate his works. Besides writing for the "Revue des Deux Mondes," the "Revue de Paris," and other publications, he has composed a number of volumes, embracing a wide range of subjects, under the title of "Studies," and is the author of several works on England and its literature. He is also a professor of languages and European literature in the modern College of France, and a knight of the Legion of Honour. b. at Mainvilliers, near Chartres, 1799.

CHASSE, David Henry, baron, shas'-sai, a brave soldier, who, in 1775, entered the Dutch army as a cadet, but subsequently joined the French, and in 1793 became a lieutenant-colonel. In the war with Prussia, in 1806, he greatly distinguished himself, and in the Peninsula received the nickname of "General Bayonet," from the frequency with which he caused that weapon to be used in battle. In 1811, Napoleon I. made him a baron of the empire, and he continued to fight throughout the campaigns of 1813 and 1814. After the peace, he was appointed governor of Antwerp, and in 1832 defended that city against 75,000 French soldiers, with a garrison of 6000. b. at Thiel, in Guelderland, 1765; d. 1843.

CHASSELOUP-LAURAT, François, marquis de, sha'-sai-loup-to-ba', an eminent French officer of engineers, who fought with credit in the wars of the republic and first empire. Napoleon made him general of division in 1799, and grand officer of the Legion of Honour in 1811. At the Restoration, he gave in his adherence to the Bourbons, and was made a peer of France. b. 1764; d. 1833.

CHASTELARD, Pierre de, sha'-tai-lar, a French gentleman of noble birth, believed to be descended from the chevalier Bayard, was a scion of a poet, and followed Mary Queen of Scots from France after the death of Francis II. Chastelard became madly enamoured of the queen, believed his passion returned, and concealed himself in her majesty's chamber, where he was discovered, tried on a charge of treason, and executed for the crime, in 1563. b. 1540.

CHASTELER, Jean Gabriel Joseph Albert, marquis de, sha'-te'-lai, a distinguished officer in the service of Austria, who was prominent at the assault on Belgrade, in 1709, and was actively engaged against the armies of France for several years. In 1805, he defeated Marmont at Gratz; in 1808, he raised the Tyrolers, and had nearly mastered the province, when Lefevre totally routed his army. He fought against Murat in 1815, and was made governor of Venice, where he died in 1825. b. at Mons, 1763.

CHATEAUBRIAND, François Auguste, viscount de, sha'-to-bre-ang, a distinguished French writer, who was educated for the church, but who subsequently entered the army. After passing through some adventures, he, in 1791, went to America in search of the North-west passage, and had an interview with Washington in the United States. His wanderings through the primeval woods of that country have been described in his "Réné," and his "Atala." On his return to Europe, he joined the army of Condé, and, in 1793, was an exile in London, reduced to a state of great misery. He remained in England seven years, suffering severe hardships, maintaining himself principally by teaching the French and Latin languages, and translating works for the booksellers. In 1797 his "Essay on Revolutions" appeared in London, and in the spring of 1800 he was enabled to return to Paris. He now published his "Atala" in the columns of the "Mercure" newspaper; this was followed by his "Genius of Christianity," which was so fortunate as to attract the attention of the First Consul. The favours of the empire, when he published his celebrated pamphlet "De Bonaparte et des Bourbons," which Louis XVIII. declared was equal to an army of 100,000 men in paving the way for the return of his dynasty to the throne. He now became a favourite at the Tuilleries. After serving in several ministerial capacities, he resigned titles and all he possessed, with the fall of the monarchy of 1830, and sank into despondency, which deepened with his years. b. at St. Malo, 1733; d. 1843.

CHATHAM, Earl of, chat'-am. (See PITT.)
CHATEL, François du, sha'-fel, the favourite pupil of David Tenders, whom he so closely and successfully imitated, that many of the pupil's works have been ascribed to the master. He painted mostly common-place scenes of ordinary life; but sometimes aimed at higher objects, and not without success, as his great picture, the "States of Brabant and Flanders Swearing Allegiance to Philip IV. of Spain, in 1606," in which there are upwards of 1000 figures, yet no confusion or inaccuracy, sufficiently b. at Brussels, 1623; d. 1673.

CHATTERTON, Thomas, chat'-ter-ton, the boy-poet, an extraordinary youth, whose father was the master of a charity-school, and the sexton at Redcliffe church, Bristol. Thomas was educated in writing and arithmetic at Colston's charity-school; after which he was articled to an attorney, with whom he continued till he was 17. Soon after this he went to London, where, for some time, he earned a scanty subsistence by writing for periodical publications; but, being reduced to great distress, poisoned himself at his lodgings in Brook-street, Holborn, and was buried in the parish of St. Andrew, Holborn. b. at Bristol, 1732; poisoned himself, 1770.—In 1773 were published, in one volume 8vo, "Miscellanies in Prose and Verse, by Thomas Chatterton." What, however, has given celebrity to this youth, is the real or pretended discovery of poems, said to have been written in the 15th century, by Thomas Rowley, a priest of Bristol, and found in Redcliffe church, of which Chatterton's ancestors had been sextons nearly a century and a half. His father certainly removed a number of parchment from an old chest in that church, most of which were used in covering books. Young Chatterton, from the perusal of some of these, is supposed to have formed the design of a forgery. In 1768 appeared, in a Bristol article entitled "A Description of the Friars first passing over the Old Bridge; taken from an Ancient Manuscript." This attracted the notice of a Mr. Barrett, who was engaged in writing the history of Bristol (see BARRETT); and he obtained from Chatterton several pieces in prose and verse, purporting to be written by Thomas Rowley and Canynge, the founder of Redcliffe church. The year following, he began a correspondence with Horace Walpole, well known as an antiquary and connoisseur. This gentleman sent the papers to his friends Mason and Gray, who pronounced them forgeries. Chatterton had formed great expectations from the patronage of Mr. Walpole; but finding himself neglected, he wrote him a letter, which Walpole called "impertinent," and their intercourse ended. Rowley's poems were first collected by Mr. Tyrwhitt, in one vol. 8vo, and afterwards in one vol. 4to, by Dean Milles; but the former gentleman gave up the question of their genuineness. A sharp controversy was carried on for some time on the point, between Mr. Warton, Mr. Bryant, Mr. Mathias, and others; but the poems are now generally considered as Chatterton's own productions.

CHAUCER, Geoffrey, chaw'-ser, the father of English poetry, was the son of a wealthy merchant, who gave him a liberal education. He was for some time at Cambridge, and afterwards studied at Oxford. Afterwards he improved himself by visiting foreign countries, and on his return, studied law in the Inner Temple, but soon quitted the law for the court, becoming a yeoman to Edward III., who granted him a pension. In 1370 he was appointed his majesty's shieldbearer. In 1373, being sent to Genoa to hire ships for the king's service, he obtained, when he came back to England, a grant of a pitcher of wine a day, to be delivered by the butler of England, besides the comptroller-ship of the customs of London for wool, &c. Prior to this, he had had a pension of twenty marks a year conferred on him. In the succeeding reign, having embraced the doctrines of Wickliffe, he was obliged to go abroad to avoid the resentment of the clergy. He, however, returned privately, but was taken and committed to prison, whence he was not released till he had made his submission, and discovered the names of those who had associated with him in embracing the new doctrines. For having done this, he was afterwards filled with remorse, and, in his "Testament of Love," deplores the disgrace into which his conduct had brought him. In 1386 he was elected knight of the shire for Kent, and, in 1389, was made clerk of the works at Westminster, Windsor, and other palaces. He was now easy in his circumstances, and composed those immortal works which, from the knowledge they display of human nature, seem to have been produced for all time. b. in London, 1328; d. 1400, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.—Chaucer married Philippa de Rouet, a lady of good family, by which means he became allied to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who was his great patron while he was himself in power. The poet left two sons, one of whom was speaker of the House of Commons and ambassador to France. Of Chaucer's poems, his "Canterbury Tales" are entitled to the first rank, although many of his other pieces possess great beauty and merit. There have been several editions of his works, and some of his poems have been modernized by Dryden, Pope, and others.

CHAUDER, Antoine Denis, shaw'-dai, an eminent French sculptor, many of whose works are in the public institutions of Paris; but one of his admired performances, a bronze statue of Napoleon I., of colossal size, and in Roman costume, which was erected on the column in the Place Vendôme, was melted down in the reign of Louis XVIII. He was likewise a man of some learning, and a good painter, his wife being also possessed of some talent as a genre and portrait painter. b. 1763; d. 1810.

CHAZZELLES, John Matthew, chaz-zell', a French mathematician, who assisted Cassini in drawing the meridian line, and in 1685 was made hydrographical professor at Marseilles. He subsequently paid a visit to Egypt, and measured the pyramids, when he discovered that the four sides of the largest answer to the cardinal points of the compass. He was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences in 1695, n. at Lyons, 1657; d. 1710.

CHEEVER, George Barrell, D.D., chee-ver, a distinguished American divine and literary man, was born at Hallowell, Maine, in 1807, and educated at Bowdoin college, in his native State, and at Andover theological seminary, Massachusetts. He was first settled as a minister at Salem, Mass., and espoused congregationalism and total abstinence principles, his advocacy of the latter having got him into trouble with a distiller whom he had satirized under a fictitious name. He visited Europe in 1836, removed to New York in 1839, and made himself conspicuous by his determined opposition to slavery. He published a great variety of works, which became exceedingly popular with the evangelical section of religionists. Several of his works are written in the style of allegories.

CHEEK, Sir John, cheek, a learned Englishman, who, in 1544, became tutor to Prince Edward (afterwards Edward VI.), at whose accession he was rewarded with a pension and a grant of lands. He was also made provost of King's College, Cambridge, and received the honour of knighthood. Subsequently he was much persecuted on account of his Protestant principles, and died of grief in 1557. b. at Cambridge, 1514.—He wrote a number of learned works, and laboured to reform the mode of pronouncing Greek.

CHELMSFORD, Lord. (See THURSTON, Sir F.)
CHEMNITZ, Martin, shem-nitch, after Luther and Melancthon, perhaps the most distinguished reforming divine of the 16th century, was born of parents in a humble position in life in the Mark of Brandenburg, in 1522. He was educated at Magdeburg and Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, was afterwards schoolmaster at Britzen, and rector of the cathedral school of Königsburg. He devoted much of his time to astronomy, and was appointed, in consequence, librarian to duke Albert of Prussia. He now gave almost his entire attention to the study of theology, and in 1553 returned to Wittenberg, where he delivered lectures on Melancthon's "Loci Communes," and entered into the controversy with Rome, especially directing his attacks upon the Jesuits. He had begun, in addition to his controversial writings, a work on the "Harmony of the Gospels," which was afterwards completed by other hands. He died at Brunswick in 1586, highly esteemed by his contemporaries of all parties, notwithstanding his reputation as one of the fathers of Protestantism.

CHENIER, André Marie de, she'-no-ai, an eminent French poet, was the son of the consul of France at Constantinople, who, having married a Greek lady, his son imbibed from her a passionate love of Greek literature, and was very happy in his imitations of the style of the fathers of classic poetry. He was brought to France when young, was educated at Caracassonne, and sent to London in connexion with the diplomatic service, but principally occupied himself in studying Shakspeare and Milton. On the occurrence of the French revolution he threw himself into it, but soon had occasion to separate himself from the violent spirits who gained the direction of the movement. He satirized Collet d'Herbois and others of the leaders, aided in the defence of the king, was afterwards apprehended as a suspected person, summarily tried, condemned, and guillotined along with 44 others, on July 25, 1794. While in confinement, he wrote the "Young Captive," which was inspired by the fate of Mademoiselle de Coigny, a companion in misfortune. Chenier's poems were collected and published 24 years after his death, were warmly received, and it is generally admitted have exercised a great and beneficial influence on modern French poetry. B. at Constantinople, 1792.

CHENIER, Marie Joseph de, brother of the above, and, like him, a poet. He wrote some tragedies, one of which, "Charles the Ninth," was the piece in which the great French actor, Talma, made his début. Marie Joseph also wrote lyrical verses, his "Chant du Départ" having nearly rivalled the "Marseillaise" in popular estimation. He took a leading part in politics under the republic and the empire, and was especially distinguished for the services he rendered to the cause of education. Marie Joseph was either a very stern patriot or a very unnatural brother, for when André was condemned, instead of endeavouring to save him, he exclaimed in the Assembly, "If my brother be guilty, let him perish." In consequence of this conduct, he used frequently to have the demand addressed to him, "Cain, restore to us thy brother!" B. 1764; D. 1811.

CHEOPS, or CHEOPSSES, kef-ops, a king of Egypt, after king Rampses, who built the famous pyramids, upon which 1000 talents (£362,520) were expended in supplying the workmen with leeks, parsley, garlic, and other vegetables. According to some authorities, he flourished in the 12th century B.C., but monuments lately discovered would seem to place his period before even that of Abraham.

CHEOPSSES, kef-ren, a brother of Cheops, who also built a pyramid. The Egyptians so inveterately hated these two royal brothers, that they publicly reported that the pyramids which they had built had been erected by a shepherd.

CHEERY, Andrew, cher-re, an eminent comic actor and dramatist, was a native of Ireland, and first made his appearance on the stage in a small theatre in Dublin; from thence he travelled the country with a strolling company, but success did not attend him, for he was nearly starved, and was glad to return home to his friends and the trade of a printer, to which he had been apprenticed. Three years afterwards he again took to the stage under Mr. Richard Knipe, whose daughter he married. He played for a time in Belfast, whence he went to the Theatre Royal, Dublin; then to Manchester, Bath, and, in 1802, to Drury Lane, London, in all of which his success was complete. In 1804, Cherry's drama of the "Soldier's Daughter" was pro-

Kean acted under his management in Wales. B. at Limerick, 1762; D. at Monmouth, 1812.

CHERUBINI, Maria Luigi Carlo Zenobi Salvador, ker-u-be-ne, an eminent musical composer, was born at Florence in 1760. He visited

Paris, London, and several continental cities, recon," "Ali Baba," &c., and many minor rubini, famous all over Europe for his operatic instrumental music, is even more esteemed in compositions of a sacred character.

CHESTER, Francis Rawdon, ches-ne, an English major-general, and distinguished explorer in the East. In 1830 he examined the route across the desert from Cairo to Suez; and in the same year accomplished a journey in Syria and Palestine, crossing the Syrian desert, and descending the Euphrates on a raft, supported by inflated skins, to the Persian Gulf. In 1836 he received the command of an expedition to examine the route from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates, and the course of that river to the Persian Gulf. Amid great difficulties he accomplished his task, and in December, 1836, took a mail across the Arabian desert, from the Persian Gulf to Beyrout, on the Mediterranean, without being accompanied by a single European. In 1816 he was made a lieutenant-colonel, and in 1820 published an account of his survey of the Euphrates, &c. In 1851 he became colonel, and in the following year published a work on Fire-arms. In 1854 appeared his " Russo-Turkish Campaigns of 1828 and 1829." B. in Ireland, 1789.

CHESTERFIELD, Philip Dormer Stanhope, fourth earl of, ches-ter-feeld, was, in his day, considered a man of the finest wit, and a model of bon ton. In early life, he was treated almost with indifference by his father, and at the age of eighteen entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he pursued his classical studies with great assiduity. In 1714 he left the university, and set out upon the grand tour of Europe, during which he contracted many of the then fashionable continental vices, which may have had the effect of afterwards inducing that loose tone of morality which pervades his celebrated "Letters to his Son." On his return he was made a gentleman of the bedchamber to the prince of Wales, afterwards George II., and was returned member of parliament for St. Germans, in Cornwall. In 1726, the death of his father removed him to the House of Lords, where he was considered one of the most effective debaters of his time. On the accession of George II., whom he had long faithfully served, he expected to reap considerable advantages; but in this he was disappointed, as that sovereign allowed himself to be swayed by the counsels of his queen rather than by the advice of his mistress, afterwards Lady Suffolk, to whom Chesterfield, as an expectant, had devoted much of his attention. In 1728 he became ambassador to Holland, and being successful in the object of his missions, George II. made him high steward of the household and a knight of the Garter. In 1732 he was recalled from Holland, and took an active part against Sir Robert Walpole, who was then at the head of the affairs of the country. On the resignation of that minister, in 1742, Chesterfield was excluded from the new government, as the king held him in the light of a personal enemy; but he received the appointment of lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In this post he greatly distinguished himself, reducing Ireland to a state of tranquillity, such as it had not hitherto enjoyed. His meritorious services had now greatly allayed the prejudices of the king, who recalled him in 1746, and had him appointed secretary of state. His health, never very strong, was now on the decline, and in 1748, much to the regret of the king, he resigned his office. On this occasion, his sovereign offered to confer the dignity of a duke upon him, but the earl declined the honour. b. in London, 1691; d. 1773.—Chesterfield still enjoys a certain literary reputation, as much, perhaps, from his being the associate of literary men, as from any productions of his own. He was, at different times of his life, the friend of Addison, Arbuthnot, Pope, Swift, Gay, Voltaire, and Montesquieu. His conduct towards Samuel Johnson is as well known as the remarkable manner in which the great doctor resented it. The villa of Pope, at Twickenham, was the place where he and those others who had hoped to rise through Mrs. Howard, the favourite of George II., were wont to assemble, for the purpose of regulating her with the incense of their flattery. (See JOHNSON, Dr.)

CHETILE, Henry, chét-el, an English dramatist, contemporary with Shakespeare, who is said to have written, or assisted in writing, forty different plays; but of which only four have been printed. He appears to have been originally a compositor. The dates of his birth and death, and, indeed, almost every incident of his life, are unknown.

CREVALIER, Michael, she-rall'-e-ai, a distinguished French political economist. In 1833 he published a work on the "Public Roads, Canals, and Railways of France," which has frequently been reprinted. In 1843 he put forth his "Letters on the Organization of Labour," which was designed to refute the revolutionary socialist doctrines then in vogue. The coup-d'état of December 2, 1851, placed him again in possession of all the appointments which he had held previous to the advent of the Republic. Besides the above works, he was the author of many more, social and political; among which may be mentioned the "Gold Question," translated into English by Richard Cobden, and published in 1859. b. at Limoges, 1806.—He is a warm supporter of free trade, and was instrumental in concluding the commercial treaty between France and England negotiated by Mr. Cobden in 1860.

CREVEUIL, Michael Eugène, chev'-re(r)l, a distinguished French chemist, who studied in Paris under Vauquelin. He became director of the dye-works, and professor of special chemistry at the Gobelins, where he innovated upon the laws of associated colours, and drew up a paper for the use of artists, dyers, and manufacturers. He rose to the highest honours in his profession, and did much to advance the state of chemical science. b. at Angers, 1786.—He wrote several works of value, and his "Laws of Contrast of Colour" has been translated into English.

CHICHELEY, or CHICHELEY, Henry, chich'-le, archbishop of Canterbury, was, in 1407, sent ambassador to the pope, who gave him the bishopric of St. David's. In 1414 he was raised to the see of Canterbury, and in that high position obtained many privileges for the clergy, resisting at the same time papal encroachments. b. at Higham Ferrers, 1363; d. 1443.—He was a liberal encourager of learning, and was the founder of All Souls College, Oxford. He also built, at his own expense, the western tower of Canterbury Cathedral.

CHILD, Sir Josiah, Bart., child, an eminent English merchant and writer on political economy and commerce, which he was among the first to treat in a philosophical manner. He was born, 1630, made a baronet, 1678, and died, 1692. He wrote many works on the subjects mentioned, the principal of which are, "Observations concerning Trade and the Interest of Money," 1698; a "Treatise proving that the Abatement of Interest on Money is the Effect and not the Cause of the Riches of a Nation;" "A New Discourse of Trade," &c.

CHILDERER, shil'-dai-bair, the name of three kings of France, who reigned over that kingdom at various periods; I., about 511; II., from 575 to 596; III., from 693 to 711.

CHILDERIC, shil'-dai-rik, the name of three kings of France, who severally ascended the throne in 458, 670, and 743.

CHILLINGWORTH, William, chil'-ling-wurth, an caused him, in 1631, to return to England and the Protestant communion. The Romanists, after this, attacked him with great animosity, and he replied in a work entitled, "The Religion of Protestants a Safe Way of Salvation," printed in 1635. In the same year he was made chancellor of Salisbury, and afterwards prebendary of Brixworth, in Northamptonshire. In the civil war he adhered to the royal cause, and, in 1643, was at the siege of Gloucester as an engineer. In the same year he was taken prisoner in Arundel Castle, Sussex, and conveyed to Chichester, where he died at the bishop's palace in 1644. b. at Oxford, 1602.

CHILLO, kil'-lo, a Spartan philosopher, and one of the seven wise men of Greece. He died through excess of joy, in the arms of his son, who had obtained a victory at Olympia, 597 B.C.

I. and II., shil'-pai-rik, two kings of France, one of whom reigned from 581 to 584, and the other from 715 to 720.

CHING, or XI-HOAM-TI, ching, an emperor of China, who united the various states into one empire. He repulsed the attacks of the Tartars or Mongols, and built the "great wall," to divide China from Mongolia. Reigned 240 B.C.

CHISHOLM, Caroline, chis'-home, an English lady eminent for active humanity, who, in her twentieth year, was married to Captain Alexander Chisholm, of the Indian army. Soon after their marriage, they proceeded to Madras, where she greatly exerted herself in behalf of the daughters and orphans of the British soldiers. The state of Captain Chisholm's health was such as to require a change of climate, when, in 1833, they removed to Australia, and taking up their abode in Sydney, Mrs. Chisholm was struck with the destitution of many emigrant girls, whom she took under her protection, and found for them a place of shelter. Her benevolent exertions were, to some extent, assisted by the colonial government, and by 1845 she had succeeded in obtaining situations and employment for 11,000 females and men in the colony. Many of these she had assisted with the loan of small sums to the extent of £1200, of which she only lost £16; a fact which speaks volumes in favour of their honesty. In 1846 Captain Chisholm and she came to England, and took up their abode in London, where she actively exerted herself in behalf of the poorer classes of intending emigrants. She established a "Family Colonization Society," by which passage-money was collected by weekly instalments, and lectured throughout the country in favour of emigration. The result of this was an impulse to the emigration cause, and the improvement of accommodation on board emigrant vessels, successive ships being despatched with females properly provided for. In 1854 she herself, with her family, proceeded again to Australia, where, she stated, she intended to pass the remainder of her life. B. in the parish of Wootton, Northamptonshire, about 1810.

CHCERILUS, keer'-i-lus, a tragic poet of Athens, who wrote 150 tragedies, of which thirteen obtained the prize.—An historian of Samos.

CHOISEUL, Etienne François, Duc de, shoo'-su(r)l, the principal minister of state during the greater portion of the reign of Louis XV. of France. His administration, however, was very unfortunate. By the Peace of Paris, in 1763, Canada was ceded to England, and in the Seven Years' War, against Frederick of Prussia, France was unsuccessful, in conjunction with Austria, her ally. In 1760 he expelled the Jesuits from France, and is said to have encouraged the British colonies of North America, during the first symptoms of their rebellion against the mother country. He was partial to the arts and literature, being the friend of Voltaire and other men of learning. B. 1719; D. in Paris, 1785.

CHOPIN, Alexandre Etienne, ko'-ruwng, a distinguished French writer on the principles of musical composition, was born at Caen, in 1772, and died at Paris in 1834.—His principal works are "Principes d'Accompagnement des Ecoles d'Italie," "Principes de Composition des Ecoles d'Italie," "Methode Concertante de Musique à Plusieurs Parties," &c. As a composer he was also successful, having produced "La Sentinelle," one of a set of romances, which has become a popular song in France. He was likewise a distinguished linguist, and was possessed of an extraordinarily retentive memory.

CHOSROES I., or KHOSROW the Great, ko'-ro-es, king of Persia, succeeded Cabades in 531. He concluded a peace with the Romans, but afterwards invaded their territories, and was repulsed by Belisarius. In the reign of Justin II., he attacked the Romans again, but was defeated by Tiberius. D. of vexation, 579.—He was fierce, cruel, and rash; but possessed many great qualities, and liberally encouraged the arts and sciences. (See BELISARIUS.)

CHOSROES II. ascended the throne on the deposition of his father Hormidas, in 589. He is accused, on plausible grounds, of murdering his father. His nobility conspired against him on account of his cruelties, and obliged him to fly to the Romans, who replaced him on the throne. He afterwards carried his arms into Judæa, Libya, and Egypt, and made himself master of Carthage; but was defeated by the emperor Heraclius, and thrown into prison by his son, where he died, in 628.

CHRISTERN, or CHRISTIAN I., kris-te-ern, king of Denmark, succeeded Christopher of Bavaria in 1448. In the following year he was elected king of Norway, and, in 1456, of Sweden. In the latter kingdom, however, he had but a title without power, and in 1464 was finally driven out by Charles Canutus. In Denmark he became popular by his prudence, moderation, and liberality. B. 1425 or 1426; D. 1481.—He instituted the order of the Elephant.

CHRISTERN II., called the Cruel, and also, the Northern Nero, succeeded his father John on the throne of Denmark, in 1513, and in 1520 was elected King of Sweden. The cruelties which he practised in the latter country alienated all hearts from him, and he was shortly deposed by an insurrection excited by Gustavus Vasa. He afterwards, in 1523, lost the crown of Denmark from the same cause. B. 1459; D. in prison, 1550.

CHRISTERN III. succeeded to the Danish crown in 1534, on the death of his father, Frederick I. He embraced Lutheranism, and made it the established religion. B. 1502; D. 1559.

CHRISTERN IV., king of Denmark, succeeded his father, Frederick II., in 1558. He made war successfully against Sweden, and in 1625 was elected chief of the Protestant league. The following year, however, he was defeated by the famous Tilly, and forced to sign a humiliating peace at Lubeck. At home he was an able administrator. He fostered commerce and industry, built new cities, and left Denmark peaceful and happy. B. 1577; D. 1641.

CHRISTERN V. ascended the Danish throne in 1670, on the death of his father, Frederick III. He united with the princes of Germany, and declared war against the Swedes, in which he was unsuccessful. In 1673 he allied himself with the Dutch against Louis XIV., and also declared war against Sweden. He took Pomerania from the latter power; but restored it by a treaty made in 1679. In the midst of the wars which he carried on, he compiled a code of laws, which forms the basis of the jurisprudence of Denmark. B. 1648; D. 1699.

CHRISTERN VI., king of Denmark, succeeded his father, Frederick IV., in 1730. During his reign, the kingdom enjoyed continuous tranquillity. Copenhagen, which, in 1729, had been destroyed by fire, was rebuilt with great magnificence. B. 1699; D. 1746.

CHRISTERN VII., king of Denmark, succeeded his father, Frederick V., in 1766. In the same year he married Caroline Matilda, sister of George III. of England. He appointed, as his minister, his doctor, Struensee, whose influence soon became paramount. At the end of two years, however, this minister was disgraced and put to death, all authority passing into the hands of the queen-dowager, Julie Marie of Brunswick. The end of his reign was disastrous. In 1807 Copenhagen was bombarded and taken by the British, and the king's latter days were clouded by insanity. B. 1749; D. 1809.

CHRISTIAN VII., king of Denmark, succeeded his father, Frederick VI., in 1839. This monarch had been proclaimed King of Norway in 1814, by the Norwegians, just after the cession of that country by his father to Sweden, but was compelled to abdicate a few months after. B. 1786; D. 1848.

CHRISTIAN IX., formerly prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glücksburg, succeeded Frederick VII. as king of Denmark in 1863. In 1864 the duchies of Schleswig-Holstein and Lauenburg were taken from Denmark by Prussia. This king is the father of Alexandra, the princess of Wales. B. 1818.

Christina

CHRISTINA, kris-te'-na, queen of Sweden, was the only child of Gustavus Adolphus, whom she succeeded in 1632, when only in her sixth year. She possessed an elevated understanding, and invited to her court the most learned men in Europe. Among these were Grotius, whom she sent ambassador to France; Salmasius, Descartes, Bochart, Huet, Vossius, and Meibom. In 1654 she abdicated in favour of her cousin Charles Gustavus, on the pretence of being already weary of the splendid slavery which attaches to a crown, although only in her 23th year. It is affirmed, however, that the principal reason was her having embraced the Roman Catholic religion. From Sweden she went to Rome, but, after residing there some time, she removed to France, where she was well received by Louis XIV. Whilst residing in that country, she caused Monaldeschi, her favourite master of the horse, to be put to death in her own house, for some alleged crime which, in her estimation, amounted to high treason against his sovereign, whom she still considered herself to be. Even in this act she found defenders; among whom was Leibnitz, who justified the deed in an elaborate pamphlet. Her conduct, however, excited the disgust of the court, when she applied to Cromwell for permission to visit England; but the sturdy Protector turned the shadow of his countenance upon her, and denied the boon. She now returned to Rome, where she resided till the death of Charles Gustavus, when she went to Sweden, with the view of reascending the throne. Her subjects, however, were by this time entirely alienated from her, and she was once more forced to return to Rome, where she died, in 1689. n. 1626.—She left a collection of Maxims, and Reflections on the life of Alexander the Great, of whom she was a great admirer.

CHRISTINA, Maria, mother of Isabel II., ex-queen of Spain, took an active part in the affairs of that country from 1830 to 1854. As queen regent she governed arbitrarily, and in 1854 was compelled to quit Spain, when she retired into exile. n. at Naples, 1806.—Her daughter was compelled to quit Spain in 1803.

CHRISTISON, Robert, M.D., kris'-te-son, an eminent physician and professor of materia medica in the university of Edinburgh, is author of numerous papers on medical subjects, but particularly toxicology, which he has made his especial study, and on which he is now an acknowledged authority: his "Treatise on Poisons," being recognised as the standard work on the subject. He graduated at Edinburgh in 1819; spent some time in the medical schools of London and Paris; commenced practice in Edinburgh soon after his return from the continent; was appointed to the chair of medical jurisprudence in his native city in 1822; and in 1832 was promoted to that of materia medica. His father, the late Mr. Alexander Christison, was professor of Humanity in the Edinburgh University. n. 1797.

CHRISTOPHER, Henry, kris'-toff, negro king of Hayti, began life as a cook at a tavern in Cape Town, St. Domingo. Being of colossal stature, and possessed of considerable force of character, he seemed marked out by nature for prominence among those whose uneducated perceptions enable them to penetrate little beyond what appears on the surface of human character. In 1790 an insurrection of the negroes in St.

Chrysostom

Domingo took place. He was employed by Toussaint L'Ouverture, the generalissimo of the Blacks, and was successful in suppressing various revolts which darkened the dawn of negro freedom. In 1802 he defended Cape Town with valour against General Leclerc, the brother-in-law of Napoleon I., and when forced to evacuate the place, took 3000 men with him and joined Toussaint. Christophe now fought vigorously for the liberation of his countrymen, and in 1806 became generalissimo of the army, and president for life of Hayti. In 1811 he was proclaimed king of Hayti, under the title of Henry I., the crown, at the same time, being made hereditary in his family. He took the French court for his model, and constituted an hereditary negro nobility. In 1812 he was solemnly crowned, and reigned successfully for some years. In 1818 reverses came upon him, and the republican negroes rose against his authority. Whilst lying ill, from the effects of a stroke of apoplexy, in his fine palace of Sans-Souci, he was surrounded by insurgent troops. The duke of Marmalade, one of the highest of his nobles, proclaimed the abolition of monarchy, and Christophe shot himself through the heart. He left a widow and children, but his eldest son and most of his inferior officers were slaughtered. n. 1767; n. 1820.—This sable sovereign was by no means destitute of governing qualities, whilst he encouraged the freedom of the press, and promoted education. He also framed a code of laws, which he dignified with the title of the "Code Henri," in imitation of the "Code Napoleon."

CHRYSIPPUS, kri-sip'-pus, a Stoic philosopher, who succeeded Cleanthes as head of that school, and was looked on as a column of the "Porch." He combated the philosophy of the Epicureans and Academicians, his principal opponent being Carneades. His industry was great, and his erudition profound. He is said to have left behind him 705 works, of which only fragments have come down to us. n. at Soli, 280 n.c.; n. 207 n.c.

CHRYSOSTOM, St. John, kri-sos'-tom, the most eloquent of the fathers of the Christian church, and bishop of Constantinople. His father's name was Secundus, but the son is known only by the surname of Chrysostom, or "golden-mouthed." He was reared for the bar, which he quitted for a religious life, and lived as a hermit in a cave six years; after which he returned to Antioch and was ordained. He became so famous for his eloquence, that, on the death of Nectarius, patriarch of Constantinople, he was, in 397, elected his successor. He there built several hospitals, and gave most of his income to the poor; but in his endeavours to enlarge his episcopal jurisdiction, was involved in a dispute with Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria. This churchman gained the empress Eudoxia to his side, and the consequence was, that Chrysostom was deposed and sent into Bithynia, which occasioned an insurrection at Constantinople. To appease the people, he had to be recalled in triumph. The wrath of the empress, however, was not modified, and happening to oppose the placing of her statue near the church, he was again sent into exile, to a desolate tract on the Euxine Sea. n. at Antioch between 344 and 354; n. at Comana in Asia Minor, overcome by the fatigues of a forced journey, 407.—Thirty-five years after the death of Chrysostom, his remains were carried to Constantinople, and buried with great pomp by Theodosius II.; it is said they were subsequently removed to Rome. His feast is celebrated by the Roman church on the 27th of January, and by the Greek on the 13th of November. His works were edited by Saville, at Eton, in 8 vols. folio, 1613; and by Montfaucon in 13 vols. 1718, Paris. His book on the priesthood is a valuable work, and has been translated into English.

CHYZANOWSKI, Adalbert, kris-an-ow-ski, a Polish general who, after serving in the French army for many years, entered the Russian service after the battle of Waterloo. He took part in the Polish revolution of 1830, after which he retired to Paris. m. 1789; p. 1361.

CHUBB, Thomas, chubb, a notorious deistical writer, who carried on the trade of a glover in Salisbury, was born in 1679, and died in 1746.—He was not possessed of any education, but had a certain talent for controversial reasoning, which caused his tracts, of which he published a great many, to make a considerable noise in their day.

CHUND, chund, a famous Hindoo poet, styled the Homer of Rajpootana, who flourished in the 12th century. His chief poem, which is about 100,000 lines in length, which touches on every conceivable subject, is even now very popular among the Hindoos.

CHURCHILL, church-hill, John. (See MARLBOROUGH, Duke of.)

CHURCHILL, Sir Winston, an English historian, who wrote a "Chronicle of the Kings of England," published in 1673, folio. m. in Dorsetshire, 1620; p. 1638. He was the father of the celebrated duke of Marlborough, and his daughter Arabella became mistress to James II., by whom she had two sons and two daughters.

CHURCHILL, Charles, an English poet, the son of a curate of St. John's, Westminster, received his education at Westminster school, but was refused matriculation at Oxford, on account of his levity when before the examiners. At the age of twenty-five he was ordained, and served a curacy in Wales; but, becoming a dealer in cyder, was unfortunate, and fell into bankruptcy. After this he came to London, and succeeded his father as curate of St. John's, to which he added the profits of a seminary, in which he taught young ladies to read and write. His first-published literary performance was a poem called "Rosalind," written against the principal theatrical managers, which had so great a success that it stimulated him to further exertions in the satirical line. His next was the "Apology," which was succeeded by "Night," intended to serve as an apology for his own nocturnal habits, which were sometimes marked by such shameful excesses as to damage his reputation. After several other performances, in one of which—"Pomposo"—he attacked Dr. Johnson, he wrote, to please Wilkes, "The Prophecy of Famine, a Scotch Pastoral," which met with great success. There seems nothing, however, more difficult to bear with equanimity than sudden prosperity, and Churchill fell into greater irregularities of conduct than ever. His parishioners were forced to remonstrate strongly with him against his vices, and he quitted the clerical profession. He now gave himself up to a dissipated course of life, parted from his wife, and kept a mistress. He continued, however, the friend of John Wilkes, and wrote further satires.

Cialdini

Among others he attacked Hogarth, who revenged himself in his picture of "The Reverend Mr. Churchill as a Russian Bear;" but he has written nothing which has left a permanent impression upon the literature of his country. m. at Westminster, 1731; p. at Boulogne, 1768.

CIALDINI, Enrico, che-ari-de-ne, an Italian general, who has won fame and honour in the national struggles of his country, was born at Modena, August 8, 1811, and though therefore comparatively a young man, he is a "general in the army"—that is to say, equal in rank to a French marshal. All his steps have been won on the field by hard fighting. Enrico Cialdini, when no more than 16 years of age, marched with General Zucchi to aid the Romagna insurrection at Bologna in 1831. After the Austrian intervention in Central Italy he was obliged to emigrate. His father had been arrested, and was poisoned by small doses of belladonna in the dungeons of the duke of Modena. Cialdini went to Paris, where he studied chemistry under M. Thenard, and was preparing to study medicine when a proposal was made to him to go to Spain. The prospect of a pair of eagles tempted him. He went and took part in the War of Succession, and the revolution of 1848 found him a lieutenant-colonel in the Spanish service. Mazzini, in the revolutionary period led Cialdini to the provincial government of Milan, who invited him to take service with them. Cialdini obeyed the call, but on arriving at Milan he found the state of affairs changed. Lombardy had given herself up to king Charles Albert, and governed herself in his name. It was not the moment for hesitating; the king had just been beaten, and Italy was about to fall once more into the clutches of Austria. Cialdini enrolled himself in the corps of General Durando; he marched on Vicenza, and there received three wounds, supposed at the time to be mortal. He was thereby for a year reduced to a state of helplessness. The fate of Italy had been decided at Novara and at Rome, and it was necessary for him again to return to Spain. Cialdini wrote to the Piedmontese minister of war:—"You have more officers than you can find employment for, and, as I am ashamed to be a burden to you, without doing anything, and to go on half-pay at 40, I intend resuming my post in the Spanish army. You will find me there when Italy requires my services." The minister replied by these words:—"Don't go." Then came the expedition to the Crimea. Cialdini went there with the rank of general, and at the battle of the Tchernaya he showed what he was worth. In 1859 Cialdini was the first in the regular allied army who fired a shot on the enemy, executing the passage of the Sesia under the fire of the Austrians, whom he drove from their position. His corps d'armée then went into the mountains to act in the Tyrol. The peace of Villafranca checked him in his career. In 1860 he defeated the army of Lamoriciera, and gained the battle of Castelfidardo; and in 1861, after Garibaldi had expelled Francis II. from Naples, and the people of the Two Sicilies had united themselves with the kingdom of Italy under Victor Emmanuel, Cialdini was sent to command the national troops, and took Gaeta in 17 days; for the 50 days which preceded the bombardment were expended in the construction of the necessary works. Fifteen days after, the general also took the citadel of Messina. He had been made a major-general after the campaign of Umbria, and the king nominated him general of the army after Messina. In 1861 he was made viceroy of Naples, with full powers to suppress the brigandage which prevailed under pretence of endeavouring to restore the deposed king. This service he effectually accomplished for the time, and then resigned the vicerealty, returning to the command of his division in the Emilia. When the question of the cession of Nice and Savoy to France was being discussed in the Italian parliament, and Garibaldi made a severe attack upon Cavour for his share in that transaction, Cialdini wrote a violent letter to the Italian patriot soldier, which caused a temporary quarrel; this, however, was soon appeased by frank explanations on both sides. But in 1862 Cialdini again came into collision with Garibaldi in a more painful manner. When the latter's ill-advised movement in that year began to assume a serious aspect, and all remonstrances had failed to deter him from the prosecution of his project of marching upon Rome, Cialdini was sent to take command of the royal troops in Sicily, and it was under his orders that Garibaldi was attacked and made prisoner at Aspromonte by Colonel Pallavicini—a service which obtained the rank of major-general for the latter, but must have been a painful duty to all concerned.

CIBBER, Caius Gabriel, sib'-ber, a German sculptor, who, about the time of Cromwell's Protectorate, came over to England, and began to pursue his profession in London with some success. The statues of the kings, and of Gresham, in the Royal Exchange, which were burned, were by him, and also the two figures of "Melancholy" and "Raging Madness," at the principal gate of old Bethlehem Hospital. He also executed the bassi-relievi on the pedestal of the London Monument. During the latter years of his life, he was chiefly employed by the duke of Devonshire in decorating the seat of that nobleman at Chatsworth. In the revolution of 1688, he took up arms under the duke, in favour of the prince of Orange, and lived to see the cause for which he fought successful. b. about 1630; d. in London, 1700, leaving a considerable fortune.

CIBBER, Colley, an English poet and playwright, the son of Gabriel Cibber, the sculptor, served in the army of the prince of Orange at the Revolution, and afterwards went on the stage; but not attaining to eminence as an actor, turned his attention to dramatic writing. His first play was "Love's Last Shift," which was performed in 1695, and met with great applause; after which he wrote a number of others. His best work is considered to be the "Careless Husband," performed in 1704; but the "Nonjuror" brought him the most fame and profit. George I., to whom it was dedicated, presented him with £200, and appointed him to the office of poet laureate. b. in London, 1671; d. 1757.—His comedies are light, airy, and pleasant, but his royal odes possess many faults. He wrote an "Apology" for his own life, which is very amusing, as it depicts many of his own foibles and peculiarities with considerable candour.—His son Theophilus followed, for a short time, the theatrical profession, and wrote a ballad opera called "Pattie and Peggy." b. 1703: d. on his passage to Ireland, 1768.

CIBBER, Susanna Maria, was the wife of Theophilus Cibber, and the sister of Dr. Thomas

Cicero

Arne, the musical composer. She, as an actress, became a great favourite with the public, and was considered by many as the best representative of the tragic muse in her time on the stage. b. 1714; d. 1766, and was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.

CICERO, Marcus Tullius, siz'-e-ro, a learned philosopher, and the greatest of Roman orators, was honourably descended both by his father and mother's side. He was instructed in philosophy by Philo, in law by Mutius Scævola, and acquired his military knowledge under Seylla, in the Marsian war. When young, he translated the Greek poem "Phænomena," of Aratus, into Latin, of which some fragments remain. At the age of twenty-six he appeared at the bar, and pleaded the cause of Quinctius, and a year afterwards defended Roscius of Ameria in such a manner as won the applause of the Romans. He then travelled into Greece and Asia, and spent some time at Athens with his friend Atticus in studying the best models of Grecian oratory. On his return to Rome he became distinguished above all other pleaders. After passing through the offices of ædile and prætor, he offered himself as a candidate for the consulship; and, though powerfully opposed, was successful. One of his competitors was the famous Catiline, whose conspiracy against the state he was afterwards the great means of unweaving; for which he was called by the citizens "the father of his country," and the second founder of the republic. (See CATILINE.) His vehemence, however, against Clodius, who was accused of having violated the mysteries of the Bona Dea (see CÆSAR, Julius), brought upon him a train of evils, which finally forced him into voluntary exile; but his banishment was of short duration, for the Clodian faction becoming odious, the senate and people unanimously recalled him. In the quarrel between Cæsar and Pompey, he espoused the side of the latter, and followed him into Greece; but, after the battle of Pharsalia, returned into Italy, and obtained the friendship of Cæsar. He now retired from the arena of politics, and devoted himself to the calmer elegances of literary pursuits, when the assassination of the dictator once more called him upon the political stage. He advised the senate to grant a general amnesty; but when he saw Antony gaining the ascendancy, he removed to Athens, to escape the effects of the enmity of that general. In a short time, however, he returned to Rome, and seemed to enjoy the friendship of Octavius, who nevertheless was induced to sacrifice him to the malice of Antony. Cicero was at Tusculum when he received the news of his proscription. In order to escape the vengeance of his enemies, he set out in a litter for the seacoast, but was overtaken and slain. His head and hands were carried in triumph to Antony, who was mean enough to place them on the rostra in the Forum, where Cicero had so often defended the lives, fortunes, and liberties of the Roman people. b. at Arpinum, 106 b.c.; assassinated near Gaëta, 43 b.c.—The talents of this great man have been the subject of universal admiration, and he possessed eminent public and private virtues, although they were, in some degree, obscured by his excessive vanity. He married Terentia, whom he afterwards divorced, and by whom he had a son and daughter. His second wife was a young woman to whom he was guardian.—His son Marcus served under

OF BIOGRAPHY.

Cid Campeador

Pompey, with great reputation, and Augustus made him augur; but his conduct was licentious, and Pliny says that he was the greatest drunkard in the empire. The works of Cicero have been repeatedly published both collectively and separately.

CID CAMPEADOR, The, sid kam-pai'-a-dor, from the Arabic el seid, "the lord," and the Spanish campeador, "champion," was a Castilian hero, whose exploits are so largely mingled with fable and romance, that it is difficult now, to determine how much of what is relating concerning him and his exploits is true. It would appear, however, that his real name was Don Rodrigo Dias de Bivar, and that he was reared in the court of the kings of Castile. On account of the great prowess he displayed in early years, the honour of knighthood was bestowed on him; and, in 1063, he proceeded with Don Sancho of Castile against Ramiro, king of Aragon, who was slain in battle. On the accession of Sancho, he accompanied him to the siege of Zamora, where the king was killed by treachery, and the Cid led back the troops to Castile, carrying with him the dead body of his

Diego Alvarez, of the Asturias, whom he had slain in single combat, to avenge an insult which Diego had offered to Rodrigo's father. Soon after this he revolted against Alphonso, and committed great ravages in Aragon, penetrating nearly as far as Saragossa, and fixing his residence in a fortress called Peña del Cid, "The Rock of the Cid," where he became an independent chief. In 1094 he took Valencia, and held it till the time of his death. b. at Burgos, 1040; d. 1099. Corneille has written a famous tragedy, embodying the exploits of this warrior. Mr. Southey also published a "Chronicle of the Cid," illustrative of his adventures. There is, however, a Spanish poem of the Cid, which was written in the 12th century by the "Homer of Spain," of whom we have no further knowledge; but whose performance is said, by Southey, to be "the oldest poem in the Spanish language, and, beyond comparison, the finest."

CIGOLI, Ludovico Cardi da, chel'-gol-e, an eminent Florentine painter, who was one of the reformers of the style of the School of Florence, and is among those masters whose works make an epoch in the history of art in Tuscany. He opposed the style of the followers of Michael Angelo, and was the first who successfully combated the anatomical practice indulged in by that school of painters. He followed the characteristics of Correggio and Barocci, and had also much in common with the Caracci. His "Lame Man Healed by St. Peter," was said to be the third best picture at Rome, but is unfortunately now destroyed; it was, however, engraved. His productions are mostly large altar-pieces, and are to be found in many of the churches in Italy. Cigoli was likewise an architect, and something of an author, as he wrote a treatise on perspective. b. 1559; d. 1613.

CRIMABUE, Giovanni, sim'-a-boo-ai, a Florentine painter and architect, considered as the restorer of the art of painting in Italy. He was instructed by the Greek painters whom the senate had summoned to Florence; but he very quickly surpassed his masters. There are still some remains of his works in fresco and distemper, showing signs of genius. His principal picture, however, is the "Madonna," painted for the church of St. Maria Novella. This production, when finished, was escorted to the church by a triumphal procession of the citizens. b. at Florence, 1240; d. 1300.

CIABOSA, Domenico, si'-a-ar-ro'-ta, a musician, who early achieved, by his compositions, great success, and was invited to the courts of the German sovereigns, and also to the court of Russia. He is the author of more than 120 operas, serious and comic; amongst which may be remarked his "Il Matrimonio Segreto," and the "Horatii and the Curiatii." He principally excelled, however, in the opera buffa. b. at Naples, 1749 or 1751; d. at Venice, 1801.

CIMON, si'-mon, an Athenian general, the son of Miltiades. He behaved with great courage at the battle of Salamis, and was afterwards appointed to the command of all the naval forces of Greece. He defeated the Persian fleets and took 200 ships, and totally routed their land forces on the same day, near the river Eurymedon, in Pamphylia. He was shortly after, by the intrigues of Pericles, banished from Athens, but was recalled, and adjusted the dispute existing between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians. He was now appointed to carry on the war against Persia, in Egypt and Cyprus, with a fleet of 200 ships; and, on the coast of Asia, gave battle to the enemy, and totally destroyed their fleet. b. besieging the town of Citium, in Cyprus, 449 b.c. He may be called the last of those Greeks whose spirit and boldness defeated the armies of the barbarians. He fortified and embellished Athens with the captured spoils, and has been highly extolled by his biographers, as well for his liberality as his valour. He was born about 502 b.c.

CINCINNATUS, sin'-a-n-nai'-tus, L. Quinctius, a celebrated Roman, who was informed, as he was in the act of ploughing his field, that the senate had chosen him dictator. Upon this, he left his farm, and repaired to the field of battle, where his countrymen were closely besieged by the Volsci and Æqui. After conquering the enemy he returned to Rome in triumph. Sixteen days after his appointment, he laid down his office, and resumed his agricultural pursuits. In his 80th year he was again summoned against Præneste as dictator; and, after a successful campaign, once more resigned the absolute power he had enjoyed only 21 days, disregarding the rewards that were offered him by the senate. Lived about 520-435 b.c.

CINNAMUS, John, sin'-nam-us, a Greek historian, who wrote the lives of John and Michael Comnenus, the work embracing the period between 1119 and 1186. Printed at Utrecht, 1652, 4to, and at Paris, 1670, folio. The dates of his birth and death are not known.

CINNA, Lucius Cornelius, sin'-na, a Roman consul, who, with Marius, filled Rome with the blood of their slaughtered enemies. He was consul four successive years. Assassinated at Ancona, 83 b.c.—Cornelia, the wife of Cesar, was the daughter of this consul.

CINQ-MARS, Henry Coiffier, Marquis de, sink-mar, a favourite of Louis XIII., befriended by Cardinal Richelieu, who introduced him to the king. Cinq-Mars, however, irritated against the cardinal for his opposition to his marriage with Maria de Gonzaga, instigated Gaston, duke of Orleans, the king's brother, to rebellion.

Between them a secret treaty was set on foot, by which Spain was to render them assistance; but the plot being discovered by Richelieu, the marquis was seized and beheaded, in September, 1642. B. 1620.

CIPRIANI, Giovanni Battista, sip'-re-aw'-ne, a famous Tuscan artist, was born at Pistoja in 1727. After studying at Florence (where his master was an Englishman) and at Rome, he came to England, and was one of the original members of the Royal Academy, and made the design for the diploma, for which he received a silver cup. He is pronounced to have been "fertile in imagination, graceful in his composition, and elegant in his execution." His personal character was also distinguished by probity, simplicity, and benevolence. Died at Chelsea, in 1786. Many of his works were engraved by Bartolozzi; some of his principal pictures are at Houghton.

CISNEROS, Francis de. (See XIMENES.)

CIVILIS, si-vil'-is, a brave chief of the Batavians, the ancient inhabitants of a portion of Holland, who, about 70 B.C., put himself at the head of his countrymen, and drove out the Romans, beating many of their best generals. He finally made peace with Cerialis, Vespasian's commander.

CLAIRAUT, Alexis Claude, klair'-o, a precocious French mathematician, who at the age of four could read and write; at nine had made some progress in algebra and geometry, and solved several difficult problems; and at eleven produced a memoir on curves, which appeared in the "Miscellanea Berolinensia," with an honourable certificate of the Academy of Sciences. That learned body admitted him an associate at the age of eighteen; and he was one of the academicians who went to the north to measure a degree, with the view of ascertaining the figure of the earth. B. at Paris, 1713; D. 1765. —He wrote "Elements of Geometry and of Algebra," a "Treatise on the Figure of the Earth," "Tables of the Moon," &c.

CLAIRFAIT, Count de, klair'-fai, a famous Austrian general, who first distinguished himself against the Turks. In the wars which signalized the close of the 18th century, he fought with great valour against the French; and, in 1795, commanded the army of Mayence, which attacked the French camp formed before that city. This he forced, and took a number of prisoners. Whilst following up his success, he received, at Mannheim, an order to retire, on which he resigned his command. Subsequently he became a member of the Aulic council of war, and shortly afterwards died at Vienna, in 1798. B. at Brussels, 1733. —Clairfait was considered by the French the ablest general opposed to them during the war.

CLAIRON, Claire Josephe de la Tude, klair'-aeng, a distinguished French actress, who in her 12th year first made her appearance on the stage. She subsequently became the greatest tragic performer of her age and country, but lived a licentious life. B. near Condé, 1723; D. 1803.

CLAPPERTON, Hugh, Captain, klap'-per-ton, a distinguished African traveller. At the age of thirteen he was apprenticed to the captain of a ship; but having been caught violating the excise laws, by taking a few pounds of rock-salt to the mistress of the house frequented by the crew of his ship, consented, rather than be subjected to a trial, to go on board a man-of-war, and accordingly joined the Clorinda frigate, commanded by Captain Briggs. Through the interest of his friends, he was promoted to the rank of a midshipman, and in 1814 was made lieutenant. He was now appointed to the command of the Constance schooner, on Lake Erie, in N. America, and was held in high estimation as an honourable member of his profession. In 1822 he went with Major Dixon Denham and Dr. Oudney on an expedition to Central Africa; and on his return was made commander. In this enterprise he and Denham determined the positions of Bornou, Houssa, and Mandara. Oudney had died at an early stage of the journey, in 1824. The principal object of the expedition had been to ascertain the course and the termination of the Niger; but as they were unsuccessful, he was dispatched again, in 1825, on the same journey. He and his party landed, in the month of November, in the Bight of Benin; but they were all more or less attacked with a sickness which proved fatal to several of them. He had proceeded to Chungary, a village four miles from Saccatoo, where he was seized with dysentery, which carried him off. B. at Annan, Scotland, 1788; D. at Chungary, 1827.

CLARE, John, klair, the son of a Northamptonshire farm-labourer, who was early sent to work in the fields, whilst in by-hours he received occasional instruction at a neighbouring parish school. When he became able to read he purchased a few books, and, by degrees, initiated himself into composition in verse. In 1818 he produced a "Sonnet to the Setting Sun," which attracted the notice of a bookseller at Stamford, and led to the publication of a small volume entitled "Poems descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery," which was favourably received. He subsequently produced the "Village Minstrel, and other Poems;" the "Shepherd's Calendar, and other Poems;" and in 1836 the "Rural Muse." These are all pleasing effusions, but exhibiting neither strength nor much originality. Clare, unfortunately, lost his reason, brought on by brooding over some unsuccessful trading speculations, which, although comparatively trifling, to a mind like his were sufficiently overwhelming. B. at Helpstone, Northamptonshire, 1793; D. May 20, 1864.

CLARENDON, Edward Hyde, earl of, klair'-en-don, lord high chancellor of England, studied the law under his uncle, Nicholas Hyde, chief justice of the King's Bench. Being an ardent royalist, he attached himself, during the civil war, to the cause of Charles, and greatly contributed to the Restoration. In the exercise of his judicial functions his conduct was above reproach, yet he became unpopular, and was forced to resign his official situations. To escape the penalties of a threatened impeachment, he prudently retired into exile, and passed the remainder of his days in France. B. at Dinton, Wiltshire, 1609; D. at Rouen, 1674. —Clarendon wrote the well-known "History of the Rebellion," which is held in high estimation, and will transmit his name to a distant posterity. His daughter Anne was married to the Duke of York, who, by her, had two daughters, Anne and Mary, both of whom ascended the English throne.

CLARENDON, George William Frederick Villiers, fourth earl of, succeeded to the title in 1838. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1823 was appointed a commissioner of excise in Dublin, in which capacity he displayed abilities sufficient to recommend him to some high employment by the government. Accordingly, in 1831, he arranged a commercial treaty with France, and in 1833 became minister plenipotentiary at the court of Madrid. When he succeeded to his title, he came to England, and took his seat in the House of Lords. Here he soon distinguished himself, and in 1840 became lord privy seal in the Melbourne administration, and, before the end of the same year, chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. In the following year Sir Robert Peel came into power; but in 1846, when Lord John Russell was appointed to the premiership, Lord Clarendon was made president of the Board of Trade, which office he resigned for the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, on the duties of which he entered in the following year. He continued to exercise his viceregal authority through a very trying course of years till 1852, when, with the other members of the ministry, he resigned, and was succeeded by the earl of Eglinton. On the accession to power of the Coalition ministry, under the earl of Aberdeen, he accepted the seals of the Foreign Office, which he also continued to hold under the administration of Lord Palmerston, cementing the French and Sardinian alliance in reference to the Russian war. If, before that contest, he displayed some disposition, as was said, to yield to the czar, yet his firmness at the congress of Paris in 1856, in respect to the boundaries of Russia and her right to the Isle of Serpents, showed that he well knew how to uphold the honour and interests of his country.—Lord Clarendon went out of office along with the rest of his colleagues, on the defeat of the Palmerston administration on the conspiracy bill, in 1859; and on the return of Lord Palmerston to power, in 1859, Lord Clarendon did not again take office, the seals of the foreign department being given to Lord John (now Earl) Russell. In 1864 he became Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, under Lord Palmerston, and, in the following year, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, which office he held till June, 1866. In December, 1863, he again became Secretary for Foreign Affairs under Mr. Gladstone. b. 1800.

CLARKE, Jeremiah, Clarke, a musician of great promise, but who, having conceived a violent passion for a lady much above him in rank, became afflicted with melancholy, and put an end to his existence in 1707. He was the friend and admirer of Blow, who, in 1693, resigned the situation of almoner at St. Paul's cathedral in his favour. He did not publish much, and what pieces he did are chiefly of a religious kind. They show fine talent and sensibility; so much so, that it was said of him, that "tenderness is so much his characteristic, that he may well be called the musical Otway of his time." His anthems, "Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem," and "I will love Thee," are held in high esteem.

CLARKE, Samuel, a learned English philosopher and divine, who became chaplain to Bishop More, of Norwich, and received from that prelate the rectory of Drayton, in Norfolk. In 1701 he published his "Paraphrase of the Gospel of St. Matthew," which was afterwards extended to the remaining Gospels. In 1706 appeared his Latin translation of Newton's "Optics," for which Sir Isaac complimented him with £500. About this time he was presented to the rectory of St. Bennet's, Paul's Wharf, London, and appointed chaplain to Queen Anne. In 1709 he obtained the rectory of St. James's, Westminster, and took his degree of D.D. at Cambridge. From this period he continued to publish works upon various subjects, some of them of a doctrinal, and others of a deeply philosophical kind; and, in 1727, he was offered the place of master of the mint, vacant by the death of Sir Isaac Newton, but refused it. He was previously presented to the mastership of Wigston Hospital, in Leicestershire. In 1729 he published the first twelve books of Homer's "Iliad," with a Latin version and annotations. The remaining books were published by his son in 1732. b. at Norwich, 1675; d. in London, 1729.—Dr. Clarke was a profound scholar, a close reasoner, an acute critic, well versed in mathematics, philosophy, and metaphysics. He was also a man of unaffected manners; mild, amiable, and charitable to those who differed from him.

CLARKE, Edward Daniel, LL.D., a distinguished modern traveller, who in 1792 accompanied Lord Berwick to Italy, and in 1799 commenced a tour through Denmark, Sweden, Lapland, Finland, Russia, Tartary, Circassia, Asia Minor, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Turkey, and Greece. In 1803 he returned by Germany and France, bringing with him many valuable manuscripts, which he presented to the library at Cambridge. He also presented to that university a fragment of the colossal statue of the Eleusinian Ceres, of the best period of Grecian art, and brought with him, besides, a sarcophagus of Alexander, and a magnificent collection of mineralogical specimens. In 1805 he was appointed professor of mineralogy at Cambridge, in which city and its neighbourhood he passed the rest of his life. b. at Willington, Sussex, 1769; d. in London, 1822.—A complete edition of his works, in 11 vols., was published after his death.

CLARKE, Mrs. Cowden, whose maiden name was Mary Novello, was the daughter of a distinguished musician. In 1828 she married Mr. Cowden Clarke, who had intimate connexion with Charles Lamb, Keats, Leigh Hunt, and other literary celebrities. In 1829 Mrs. Clarke commenced her analysis of Shakespeare's works, and after sixteen years of patient labour and research, produced, in 1845, her "Concordance to Shakespeare," which obtained, deservedly, a great success. b. 1809.—Her husband is the author of one or two books, and her sister, Clara Novello, has attained considerable distinction as a singer.

CLARKE, Adam, LL.D., an eminent divine, deeply skilled in Oriental languages and Biblical antiquities. His studies were pursued at the school founded by John Wesley, at Kingswood, near Bristol, and at the age of eighteen he became a travelling preacher in the Methodist connexion. In the ministerial character his preaching was both attractive and useful; but it is principally on account of his writings that he is noticed in this work. In 1802 he published his very useful "Bibliographical Dictionary," which at once procured for him a literary reputation; and although it does not now rank as a very profound work, still it contains a vast body of well-arranged information, and has been once or twice reprinted. He now continued to produce other works, amongst which may be noticed a laborious "Commentary on the Bible;" a "Narrative of the Illness and Death of Richard Porson;" "Memoirs of the Wesley Family;" "Baxter's Christian Directory," which he edited, and several others of a religious class. His industry was very great; for, besides these and many pamphlets and sermons, he wrote four reports on the state of the public records, and edited the first volume of a new edition of Rymer's "Fœdera." Independently of these labours, his life was devoted to the active promotion of the well-being of his species; and it is impossible to review his character without being impressed with the idea that he was not only a good but a great man. b. 1762; n. at Haydon Hall, seventeen miles from London, 1832.

CLARK, William Tierney, a civil engineer, who, in 1808, went as a draughtsman from Bristol to London, and entered into the service of Mr. Rennie, with whom he remained till 1811, when he was appointed engineer of the West Middlesex Waterworks. This post he retained throughout his life, making great improvements in the establishment, and realizing large profits to the company. In 1819 he undertook the completion of the Thames and Medway Canal, which he successfully accomplished: and, in 1824, commenced the suspension-bridge over the Thames at Hammersmith. In 1827 he finished this work, after which the duke of Norfolk employed him to construct another over the Arun. In 1839 he began another over the Danube, at Pesth, which was not completed till 1849, at a cost of £822,000. This was the greatest work of his life, and it gave so much satisfaction to his royal patron, the emperor of Austria, that he presented him with a box set in brilliants. For a design for a suspension-bridge over the Neva, the emperor of Russia sent him a first-class gold medal. b. in Somersetshire, 1783; d. 1852.—He was a member of several learned societies.

CLARK, Sir James, physician in ordinary to Queen Victoria, and equally distinguished for his public humanity and private benevolence. He received the rudiments of his education at the grammar-school of Fordyce, a maritime parish of Scotland, and afterwards entered King's College, Aberdeen, where he took his degree of M.A. He then went to Edinburgh, where he pursued his medical studies, and, in 1809, received an appointment in the navy, in which he remained till 1815, when he returned to Edinburgh, and, in two years more, took his degree of M.D. in the university of that city. He now set out on a continental tour, and settled in Rome, where he practised for eight years, during which he pursued his professional duties with unwearied zeal, earnestly devoting himself to the great cause of humanity in investigating modes for the alleviation of its suffering, or the cure of those numerous ills to which "flesh is heir." He visited the principal universities and medical schools of Germany, France, and Italy, directing his special attention to the influence of those climates chiefly resorted to by invalids upon various kinds of diseases. The result of these investigations, and his otherwise large experience, was the publication, in 1829, of his work "On the Sanative Influence of Climate," a fourth edition of which appeared in 1856, and is now an authority. Indeed, according to the language of the "London Medico-Chirurgical Review," it is "an indispensable companion to every invalid who seeks restoration of health or prolongation of life beneath a milder sky than that which lowers over his native land." Whilst in Rome, Dr. Clark became known to Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, and, in 1824, was by him appointed his physician. In 1826 he came to England, and settled in London; and was, shortly afterwards, made physician to St. George's Parochial Infirmary. In 1832 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and, in 1835, physician to the duchess of Kent and the Princess Victoria. On the accession of her majesty to the throne, he continued her physician. In the same year of his appointment to that position, he published his treatise "On Pulmonary Consumption," in which he shows that this insidious disease has its origin in a deteriorated condition of the system, an opinion not generally entertained until first clearly demonstrated in this treatise. On the establishment of the London University, Dr. Clark was elected one of the senate; and, with the view of remedying some defects in the system of English "Clinical Instruction," he wrote a pamphlet on that subject. In 1838 he was created a baronet, a title well earned, seeing it has been won in the field of humanity, in endeavouring to promote health and preserve life by every means which a sound judgment, great knowledge, and a large practical experience can place at his command. b. at Cullen, Banffshire, 1788.

CLARKSON, Thomas, Clarke-son, an English philanthropist, one of the first advocates of the emancipation of the negroes, was educated with a view to the church, but relinquished his chances of preferment to advocate the abolition of negro slavery. He laboured, in conjunction with Mr. Wilberforce and other benefactors of mankind, in the cause he had espoused, and lived to see a law for the entire abolition of the traffic in slaves passed, on the 25th March, 1807. It took the labour of another twenty years, however, to effect the abolition of slavery in the islands of the West Indies; but it was accomplished in 1833, when the Emancipation Act liberated, for a compensation of twenty millions to the owners, nearly a million of slaves. Declining health prevented Mr. Clarkson taking so active a part at this period as he had hitherto done; but in the achievement of the work to which he had so long devoted himself, he continued to labour to the last. b. at Wisbeach, 1760; d. at Playford Hall, Sussex, 1846.

CLAUDE LORRAINE, Klawd, a famous painter, so called from the place of his birth. His real name was Claude Gellée, and the poverty of his parents early compelled them to find some employment for their child; and accordingly he was made a pastrycook. Receiving some instructions in drawing, however, he went to Rome, and was employed by the painter Tassi, who grounded him in the principles of his art. Determined to take nature for his master, he passed whole days in the fields, watching their various aspects under the mutations of the skies, and became one of the greatest of landscape painters. He painted in fresco as well as in oil. His works are numerous, and to be found in most of the principal galleries of Europe. b. in Lorraine 1600; d. at Rome, 1682.—England is especially rich in the landscapes of this artist. The National Gallery alone has ten of his paintings, and some of them rank among the finest of his works.

CLAUDIUS, Klaw'-di-av'-nus, a Latin poet, of Egyptian birth, who, at an early age, settled in Italy, and attached himself to Stilicho, the minister of the Emperor Honorius, but was in 408 disgraced, when Stilicho lost his life. He enjoyed, amongst his contemporaries, so distinguished a reputation, that they proclaimed him equal to Homer and Virgil. What, however, has come down to the moderns of his works does not seem to justify these extravagant eulogies. His verses possess harmony, but are monotonous; there is also imagination in them, but little invention and genius. The best of his performances are, a "Panegyric of Stilicho," and his poems on "Rufinus and Eutropius." n. at Alexandria, about 365; n. probably in the second decade of the 5th century. (See STILICHO.)

CLAUDIUS, klou-de-us, a name common to many illustrious Roman emperors, consuls, generals, censors, &c.; of whom the most worthy of remark are the following:—

CLAUDIUS I., Tiberius Drusus Nero, the fourth emperor of Rome, was elected by the soldiers after the murder of Caligula. He made himself popular at first by adorning and beautifying the city with buildings. He passed over into Britain, and received a triumph for victories which were gained by his generals. He was of weak intellect, and though well-meaning at first, followed the example of most of the Roman emperors, and became a sanguinary tyrant. He married four wives, one of whom, named Messalina, he put to death on account of her lust and debauchery. He was at last poisoned by another, called Agrippina, who had made him name her son, Nero, as his successor. n. 54.

CLAUDIUS II., surnamed the Goth, was a Dalmatian, and succeeded Gallienus in 268. He conquered the Goths, Scythians, and Heruli, and killed, it is said, no less than 300,000 in a battle. n. in Pannonia, 270.—This prince has been called the second Trajan, as much on account of his valour in battle as his justice in administration.

CLAUDIUS, Appius, a Roman Decemvir, became enamoured of Virginia, the daughter of Virginius, an officer in the army employed against the Æqui. Endeavouring by every base means in his power to prevail over her virtue, but being constantly baffled, he had recourse to the extraordinary expedient of suborning a man named Claudius to demand her, under the pretence that she was the child of his slave, and brought up as her own by the wife of Virginius. This claim was brought before the tribunal of the Decemvir, who decreed that, till all the witnesses should appear, Virginia should be delivered to the claimant. The people opposed this decree, when Virginius was privily sent for, and appeared before the tribunal. Being unable, however, to get the sentence revoked, he snatched up a butcher's knife, and stabbed his daughter to the heart. An insurrection ensued. The army having joined Virginius, the senate was unable to resist them. Accordingly, the decemvirate was dissolved, and Appius committed to prison, where he died, 449 a.c.—Upon these events, James Sheridan Knowles founded his celebrated tragedy of "Virginius."

CLAUDIUS, or CLAUDE, Clemens, a Spaniard by birth, who attained to the position of bishop of Turin, was the first to protest against the corruptions and superstitions of Popery. n. 839.

CLAUDEL, Bertrand, Count, klou-sel, entered the French army at an early age, and as aide-de-camp to General Pérignon served in the army of the Pyrenees in 1794-95. With General Leclerc he went to St. Domingo, and there commanded a division in endeavouring to suppress an insurrection of the blacks. He next served in Spain, and was severely wounded at the battle of Salamanca. In 1813 he was almost daily engaged with the English during the retreat of the French, before Wellington, &c., France. On the return of Napoleon I. from Elba, he rejoined his standard; but on his fall, he was compelled to leave his country and retire to America. He subsequently returned, and in 1830 succeeded Marshal Bournont as commander-in-chief in Africa, and in the following year was created a marshal. In 1832 he was made governor of Algeria, but being baffled in his attempt on Constantine, in 1836 he returned to Paris with a broken spirit, from which he never revived. n. at Mirepoix, 1772; n. at Toulouse, 1841.

CLAYJO Y FAXARDO, Joseph, klai-re-cho e fax-ar-do, a Spanish writer, who was named keeper of the royal records, and translated from the French the Natural History of Buffon, a work highly esteemed. This procured for him the vice-directorship of the Cabinet of National History. He was afterwards employed by Beaumarchais, the popular writer, the latter fought a duel with Clayjo, and made the Spaniard sign a declaration that he had been guilty of a misdeed, and Clayjo was, in consequence, disgraced by the king for a term. This episode has been dramatized by Gothe and others.

CLAY, Henry, klai, an American statesman, who was called to the bar at an early age, and distinguished himself as an advocate. In 1803 he was elected member of the Kentucky legislature, and in 1809 a member of the senate at Washington. In the year 1811 he was elected a member of Congress, and was made speaker of that body. In 1814 he was one of the commission sent to Ghent to negotiate peace with Great Britain, and in 1825 was appointed, by President Adams, foreign secretary. In 1823 he contested the presidency with General Jackson, but was defeated, and again in 1832, 1836, and 1844, he was a candidate, but did not meet with success. Retiring for a time from public affairs, he returned to take his seat in the senate, and there enjoyed, until a short time before his death, a very great influence. n. in Virginia, 1777; n. 1852.—Henry Clay was the head of the Whigs. Of a conciliatory disposition, he, on two occasions, in 1820 and in 1850, succeeded in effecting a compromise between the slave states and the abolitionists, and his death was felt as a public loss.

CLAY, Cassius M., an American statesman, who has distinguished himself as an advocate of the abolition of slavery, and has given a proof of sincerity by freeing his own slaves. He was born in Kentucky in 1810, studied for the bar, and after holding the position of member of congress, was in 1861 appointed minister in Russia on the formation of the Lincoln cabinet. He subsequently resigned the appointment, and returned to America to take part in the civil war then raging. His writings, with a memoir from the pen of Horace Greeley, were published in 1848.

CLAYTON, Robert, D.D., klai-ton, successively bishop of Killala, Cork, and Clogher, was suspected of a leaning towards Arianism, and on making a motion in the House of Lords, that the Athanasian and Nicene creeds should be expunged from the Church of England Liturgy, was ordered to be prosecuted for heresy, but died before the trial came on. He was author of "An Introduction to the History of the Jews;" "Chronology of the Hebrew Bible vindicated;" "A Dissertation on the Prophecies;" and "A Vindication of the Histories of the Old and New Testaments," which latter work he wrote as an answer to Lord Bolingbroke. B. in Dublin, 1695; D. 1753.

CLAYTON, John Middleton, an American politician, was born in Delaware in 1796; was elected to congress in 1829; resigned in 1836, and became chief justice of his native state; in 1845 he returned to congress; in 1849 became secretary of state under General Taylor, and in that capacity negotiated the famous Bulwer-Clayton treaty on the subject of English and American claims in central America, which has since been the subject of much controversy. Resigned in 1860, and died in 1868.

CLÉANTHES, kle-án'-thees, a Grecian philosopher and disciple of Zeno. While pursuing his studies, he maintained himself by his manual labour,—succeeded his master in the school, and had for pupils kings Antigonus and Chrysippus. Starved himself to death at the age of 80, about 240 B.C.

CLÉARCHUS, kle-ar'-kus, a Lacedæmonian general, who was condemned to death for having abused his authority at Byzantium, where he had been sent as an ally. Retiring into Persia, he offered his services to the younger Cyrus, and raised a body of Greek mercenaries, with whom he acted against Artaxerxes, the brother of Cyrus and king of Persia. After the battle of Cunaxa, where Cyrus fell, and whilst he was leading the retreat of the 10,000 immortalized by his successor, Xenophon, Tissaphernes, the Persian general, inveigled him into an interview, and slew him, 401 B.C.

CLEMENCE, Isaura, klaí'-maunce, a wealthy and illustrious lady of Toulouse, who was descended, it is supposed, from the counts of that city. Towards the year 1490, she instituted at Toulouse the "Jeux Floraux" (Floral Fêtes), and left considerable revenues for the support of these gatherings. B. about 1450; D. 1500 or 1513. These fêtes were established to encourage the art of poesy, and at them were distributed prizes for the best effusions. These prizes consisted of different flowers in gold or silver. Something of the same kind had been commenced in 1322, and in 1695 an academy was founded from the funds, and exists at this day.

CLEMENS, Friedrich, klem'-ens, the name assumed by a German poet of some talent and more eccentricity. He was born at Osnaburg, Westphalia, of poor parents named Gerke, but took the designation of Clemens from his god-father, the Rev. Clemens van Morsey. Friedrich began verse-making when only 10 years of age, and obtained the appointment of assistant letter-carrier by the time he was 14; he then successively studied theology, became an itinerant schoolmaster, a footman, a lawyer's clerk, and a private in the 60th British regiment, which he accompanied to Canada; but disliking soldiering as much as other occupations, he again took to rhyming, and with the money thus procured he purchased his discharge, and returned to Hamburg. Here he lived by selling his verses, which he printed himself at a machine of his own construction, and finally obtained an appointment as inspector of the Hamburg and Altona telegraph. Among his publications are "Specimens of my Poetry;" "Aspirations of the Heart to God;" "Eccentric People;" "The Manifesto of Reason," which caused a great sensation, and was interdicted by the Diet; "Through Night and Fog," a novel, and "The Emigrant on the Ohio," a comedy. His last publication is entitled "All-Book," and aims at preaching the "religion of love," but has not been successful. While officiating as lawyer's clerk, on it is said, fifteen pounds a year, he married a milliner's assistant, who accompanied him in all his subsequent wanderings and vicissitudes. B. January 22, 1801.

CLEMENT I. and II., klem'-ent, popes of Rome, of whom one died about 100, and the other 1047.

CLEMENT III. succeeded Gregory VIII. in 1187, and preached a crusade against the Saracens. D. 1191.

CLEMENT IV. was elected in 1265. He signed with St. Louis of France, the "Pragmatic Sanction," which put an end to the differences existing between Rome and France. D. at Viterbo, 1268.

CLEMENT V. was elected in 1305, and removed the residence of the popes from Rome to Avignon. He was the tool of Philip the Fair of France, and, at his desire, suppressed the order of Knights Templars. D. 1314.

CLEMENT VI. was elected in 1342. In his pontificate, Rienzi attempted to re-establish the republic of Rome. This pope was a learned man, and had a prodigious memory. D. 1362.

CLEMENT VII., cousin of Leo X., succeeded Adrian VI. in 1523. He entered into the "holy league," with Francis I. of France, the Italian princes, and Henry VIII. of England, against the emperor Charles V. In the war which ensued, Rome was taken and plundered, and the pope himself was shut up in the castle of St. Angelo. He had, consequently, to make terms with Charles. Subsequently, Henry VIII. having repudiated Katharine of Aragon and married Anne Boleyn, Clement excommunicated him in 1534. This occasioned a schism, and ultimately resulted in the separation of England from the Romish church. D. 1534.

CLEMENT VIII. was elected in 1592. He absolved Henry IV. of France, upon that monarch making public profession of Catholicism, and was chiefly instrumental in bringing about the peace of Vervins in 1598. He elevated to the rank of cardinal, Baronius, Bellarmine, and other distinguished men, and was a learned and sagacious pontiff. D. 1605.

CLEMENT IX. was elected in 1667. During his pontificate, Candia was taken from the Venetians by the Turks. D. 1669.

CLEMENT X. was the successor of the above. Being of great age, the government was left in the hands of Cardinal Paluzzi, a distant relative. D. 1676.

CLEMENT XI. was elected in 1700. His pontificate was disturbed by the quarrels of the Jesuits and the Jansenists, and on issuing the famous bull "Unigenitus," a schism was produced, which lasted many years, between France and Rome. D. 1721.

CLEMENT XII. succeeded Benedict XIII. in 1730, and reformed many abuses of the church. D. 1740.

C. XIII. was elected in 1758. The Jesuits having been expelled from France, Spain, Portugal, and Naples, he made great but useless efforts to reinstate them. In 1768 he lost Avignon and Benevento. D. 1769.—There is a splendid mausoleum to him in St. Peter's, at Rome, executed by Canova, who was eight years employed on it.

CLEMENT XIV. was the successor of the above. Of a conciliatory disposition, he lived on good terms with all the European courts, and recovered Avignon and Benevento, which had been lost under the preceding pontiff. Pressed to decide the question of the abolition of the order of the Jesuits, he, in 1773, after temporizing for several years, issued the bull ordaining their suppression. D. 1774.

CLEMENT, Francis, a learned French Benedictine monk, who continued the "Literary History of France," commenced by Rivet. He composed the 11th and 12th volumes of that compilation, and also published the 12th and 13th volumes of the collection of French historians begun by Duquet. His greatest achievement, however, was the extension and improvement of the work entitled "L'Art de vérifier les Dates après J.C.," which had been originated by Dantine, and re-written and published by Clémentet. After thirteen years' labour, he raised it to three large vols. folio, which appeared from 1753 to 1792. He was meditating the production of a similar work on ancient chronology, with the title of "L'Art de vérifier les Dates avant J.C.," when he died, in 1793. B. at Bèze, in Burgundy, 1714.—Clement was a laborious writer, and was the author of several other works besides those mentioned above.

Muzio, kle-main'-te, an eminent Italian musical composer, and considered the father of pianoforte music. At an early age he evinced a decided predilection for his art, and even in his ninth year passed his examination as an organist. In his thirteenth, he wrote a mass for four voices, and attracted the notice of Mr. Peter Beekford, an English gentleman travelling in Italy, who became his patron, and took him to his seat in Dorsetshire, in England. Here he devoted himself to other studies, and became accomplished in several languages, as well as in various branches of science, without neglecting the cultivation of his talents in the more particular art in which he seemed by nature designed to excel. In his 15th year he composed his celebrated Opera No. 2, which is considered the basis on which the whole fabric of modern pianoforte sonatas is founded. His fame now extended to the continent, and he rose to the highest rank in his profession. In 1800 he engaged in the music trade, still continuing, however, to devote himself to his art throughout the remainder of his days. B. at Rome, 1752; D. in London, 1832.—He was buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.

CLENNELL, Luke, klen'-el, a painter and engraver, was born in Northumberland, in 1781, being the son of a farmer. After several vain attempts to induce him to settle to farming, tanning, and other trades, he was apprenticed to Bewick, an engraver on wood, and soon displayed considerable ability. In 1804, he removed to London, married, and soon had as much work as he could execute. He engraved

Cleopatra

Stothard's designs in illustration of Rogers's Poems, and Falconer's "Shipwreck," and was finally induced to relinquish the graver and devote himself to the brush. He was very successful, his "Final Charge of the Guards at Waterloo," having procured him the prize of 50 guineas offered by the British Institution. In 1814, he was commissioned to paint a picture commemorative of the visit of the allied Sovereigns to the city of London, and was engaged upon it when his mind gave way: he was hopelessly deranged, and died in a lunatic asylum in 1840. His "Day after the Fair," and "Market-boats at Brighton," are much admired.

CLEOBOTUS, kle-ob'-u-tus, one of the seven wise men of Greece, was the son of Evagoras of Lindos, and was famous for his fine form. His maxims were, "Do good unto your friends, that you may attach them to you the more; do good unto your enemies, that you may make friends of them." D. 560 B.C.

CLEOMBROTUS, kle-om'-bro-tus, king of Sparta, gave battle, at Leuctra, to the Thebans, headed by Epaminondas, and was there killed, 371 B.C.—This battle, where the Spartan army was almost entirely destroyed, put an end to the pre-eminence of Sparta in Greece.

CLEOMENES III., kle-om'-e-nees, king of Sparta, who succeeded his father Leonidas, was of an enterprising spirit, and resolved to restore the ancient discipline of Lycurgus in its full force, by banishing luxury and intemperance. He made war against the Achæans, and attempted to destroy their league. Aratus, the general of the Achæans, who supposed himself inferior to his enemy, called Antigonus to his assistance; and Cleomenes, when he had fought the unfortunate battle of Sellasia, 222 B.C., retired into Egypt, to the court of Ptolemy Evergetes, where his wife and children had gone before him. Ptolemy received him with great cordiality; but his successor, weak and suspicious, soon expressed his jealousy of this noble stranger, and imprisoned him. Cleomenes killed himself, and his body was flayed and exposed on a cross, 220 or 219 B.C.—There were others of this name, but of inferior note.

CLEON, kle'-on, a name common to many eminent Greeks, of whom the most famous is an Athenian, who, though originally a tanner, became, by his intrigues and eloquence, general of the armies of the state. He took Torone, in Thrace, and was killed at Amphipolis, in a battle with Brasidas, the Spartan general, 423 B.C.

CLEOPATRA, kle-o-pat'-tra, queen of Egypt, famous for her great beauty, crimes, and misfortunes, was the daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, who died 51 B.C., leaving his eldest son, Ptolemy Dionysius, and his daughter, Cleopatra, to reign conjointly over the kingdom. They, however, disagreed, and Cleopatra was compelled to seek for safety in Syria. Here she met Cæsar, whilst engaged in the pursuit of Pompey, after the battle of Pharsalia, and, by her fascinating manners, completely won him over to her cause. Accordingly, he determined that she should be seated on the Egyptian throne, which led to an attack upon his own quarters by the king's troops. This resulted in the overthrow of her brother's forces, and himself being drowned in the Nile. Cleopatra then ascended the throne in conjunction with her younger brother Ptolemy, whom she subsequently poisoned. On the return of Cæsar to Rome, she followed him and lived there till his assassination. 44 B.C.

Cleostratus

After this event she returned to Egypt, and about 40 B.C., after the battle of Philippi, was summoned by Antony to answer the charge alleged against her of having assisted Brutus. When she made her appearance before him, however, he could not resist her charms, and was induced to marry her, repudiating his former consort, Octavia, the sister of Augustus. War now ensued between Augustus and Antony, and, at the battle of Actium, Cleopatra fled, and her paramour was defeated. The fallen queen, to escape the humiliation of gracing the triumph of Augustus, applied an asp to her breast, and died of the wound, 39 B.C.—She was a woman of genius, versed in several languages, but ambitious and voluptuous, although in her greatest extravagances there was a splendour and grandeur which seemed almost to refine them. With her ended the dynasty of the Greek kings in Egypt, which began with Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, 323 B.C. (See ANTONY and CESAR.)

CLEOSTRATUS, klee-oh'-trá-tus, an ancient philosopher and astronomer of Tenedos. He is said to have introduced the constellations of the zodiac, and reformed the Greek calendar. Lived between 548 and 432 B.C.

CLER, LE, General, le(ə)'klayr, a distinguished French officer, who fell, mortally wounded, on the field of Magenta, June 4, 1859.

CLERK, John, of Eldin, klerik, the inventor of an improved system of naval tactics, in reference to what is called "breaking the line." This idea was first acted upon by Sir George (afterwards Lord) Rodney, on the 12th of April, 1782, when the French, under De Grasse, were defeated in the W. Indies. His plan was subsequently acted upon by both Howe and Nelson, and uniformly met with success. He published an account of his system in "An Essay on Naval Tactics, &c.," but his claim to the originality of the idea has been disputed by General Sir Howard Douglas, whose father was captain of Rodney's fleet at the time of the action, and who claims the merit for Lord Rodney. Mr. Clerk had never made a single voyage on sea, and was therefore no practical sailor. B. in Scotland; D. 1812.

CLERK, John, Lord Eldin, an eminent Scottish lawyer, was the son of the preceding, and was alike famous for his legal knowledge, his ability as a pleader, his wit, his brusque manners, and his thorough fearlessness and integrity of character. He was called to the bar in 1785, and though his politics, which were liberal, shut him out from official employment, except for a short time as solicitor-general under the coalition ministry of 1805, he soon made his way to the foremost rank in his profession, and for many years enjoyed the largest and most lucrative practice that had up to that time been known in Scotland. He lived in the great literary and philosophical age which procured for Edinburgh the title of the "Modern Athens," and was in habits of friendship with all the great men of the day, including Scott, Stewart, Jeffrey, Brougham, Wilson, &c. He was remarkable for his eccentricities, one of which was an inordinate love of cats and dogs, a host of which he always kept about him. He was raised to the bench in 1823, resigned in 1828, and died in 1832, aged 75.

CLEVELAND, or CLEYVELAND, John, klee'-land, an English poet, joined the army of the cavaliers, and was the first poet who sung in favour of the royal cause. In 1655, being taken prisoner, he was released by Cromwell, to whom he sent a moving petition. B. at Loughborough, 1613; D. in London, 1659. The best edition of his works is that of 1687.—Fuller, in his "Worthies of Leicestershire," says of this poet that he was "a general artist, pure Latinist, exquisite orator, and eminent poet." We have, however, an opportunity of judging, and think that his genius will hardly sustain such extravagant praise. When he was in the zenith of his fame, the sheets of "Paradise Lost" were struggling into a dim light through the mists of bigotry and party prejudice. The great epic was scarcely read, whilst impression after impression of Cleveland's poems was pouring from the press. But how changed are these things now! Milton lives, and shall endure as long as the language; whilst the effusions of the other are never heard of among the people.

CLIFFORD, klif'-urd, the name of a distinguished English noble family, many scions of which have become famous in history, and have well deserved the title of the "Stout Cliffords," which was popularly given to them. The most remarkable of the family were—1. Roger de Clifford, who established himself in the north by inheriting Brougham Castle, in Cumberland, was killed in the wars with the Welsh, and was the father of Henry II.'s "Fair Rosamond." 2. Robert, the son and successor of Roger, a man of heroic and martial spirit, was one of the guardians of Edward II., by whom he was made lord high admiral, and acquired great renown in the wars with Scotland, being rewarded with large grants of lands belonging to the Douglases, Maxwells, &c.; he was killed at Bannockburn, June 25, 1314. 3. Roger, the fifth lord, took a leading part in the wars of Edward III. in both France and Scotland, enjoyed the family estates longer than any of his predecessors, and was the first of the Lords Clifford of the north who lived to be a grandfather. 4. Thomas, the sixth lord, was the famous Clifford of the French wars, in the reign of Henry VII., and also took a prominent part in the Wars of the Roses, in which he espoused the Lancastrian side. He was killed at the battle of St. Albans, in 1455. 5. His son, known as the "younger" and the "black" Clifford, also took a prominent part in the contest between the Red and White Roses, and his ferocity gained him the nickname of the "Butcher." His slaughters at the battle of Wakefield, where both Richard duke of York (the competitor for the crown) and his son, the youthful duke of Rutland, were killed, are strongly condemned by Shakespeare and some of the chroniclers of the time. He was slain, at the age of 26, the day before the battle of Towton, and his body consigned to a pit along with a mass of the vulgar dead. 6. Henry was the eldest son of the last-mentioned, and was only an infant at the time of his father's death. The family estates had been confiscated, and bestowed upon "Crookback," then duke of Gloucester, and afterwards Richard III., and the youthful Clifford was fain to seek a refuge among the peasants of Cumberland, where, disguised as a shepherd, he spent twenty-four years, and hence acquired the name of the "Shepherd Lord." After the close of the Wars of the Roses, and the death of Richard III., at Bosworth, Clifford was restored to his title and estates, and was one of the best of his race and the greatest ornaments of the nobility of England, being deeply read in all the literature, learning, and science then known, to which he had devoted the long years of his peasant life. He was not, however, devoid of the martial qualities of his family, for he mustered his retainers, and appeared at their head at the battle of Flodden, and, though then 60 years of age, showed all the fire and valour natural to his blood. He died in 1528, after having both endured the pain of seeing his son, who was created earl of Cumberland, run the wildest career of dissipation, and enjoyed the pleasure of witnessing the prodigal's reformation. 7. George Clifford, third earl of Cumberland, was remarkable for his love of adventure and his insatiable passion for a nautical life. He made eleven different expeditions, fitted out at his own cost, against the Spaniards and Dutch in the West Indies, on the coast of America, &c.; and had his fill of perils and adventures. He commanded one of the ships that helped to destroy the famous "Invincible Armada," in 1588, and cut a prominent figure in many actions with the would-be invaders, particularly in a battle off Calais. He captured Faval in 1599, and took twenty-eight vessels of different sizes, valued at upwards of £29,000—a large sum in those days. He was a great favourite of Queen Elizabeth, who invested him with the Garter, and bestowed upon him other marks of her approval. He was a keen patron of spectacles, shows, horse-races, &c., and spent large sums in giving magnificent entertainments, the consequence of which was that though he began life immensely rich, he died comparatively poor, in 1605, leaving behind him the reputation of being one of the most singular men, and having run one of the most remarkable careers, on record. 8. Lady Anne Clifford, the daughter and heiress of the above, was the last of her race, and not the least notable. She was born in 1589, and married to Richard, earl of Dorset, a man of talent and spirit, but a great spendthrift. Dorset died in 1624, and Lady Anne married Philip Herbert, earl of Pembroke, in 1630; a union productive of as little happiness as the former. Pembroke died in 1650, shortly after the fall of the monarchy, having previously made himself specially obnoxious to the royalists, who satirized him severely. The extinction of the male branch of the house of Clifford, by the death of Francis, fourth earl of Cumberland, and his son, left Lady Anne sole possessor of the family estates, for which a contest had gone on for thirty-eight years; and she then devoted

CLINTON DE WITT, Klin'-ton, a public active citizen of New York, who filled the office of mayor in 1915, when he became a candidate for the presidency of the United States, but was unsuccessful. Between 1917 and 1926 he was frequently elected governor of the state of New York; but he is noticed here principally on account of his being the most ardent promoter of the scheme for cutting the great canal from Lake Erie to the Atlantic Ocean. B. N. Y. C. 1879; B. Britain, Orange county, New York, 1789; D. 1928.

CLINTON, Sir Henry, an English general, who, in 1773, was appointed to the command of the army in N. America, but in 1781 was so unsuccessful that his conduct was severely censured, and he returned to England in the following year. Soon after, he published a narrative of his conduct, which was replied to by Earl Cornwallis, and again vindicated by Sir Henry. In 1784 he published a farther defence of himself. He then filled the appointment of governor of Limerick, and was just made governor of Gibraltar when he died, in 1793.

CLINTON, George, an American general, who, after serving under Lord Amherst against the French, became brigadier in the continental army on the outbreak of the War of Independence, and succeeded in checking the attempt of General Sir Henry Clinton to relieve General Burgoyne. Though surprised by Sir Henry on this occasion, the British general was forced to abandon the enterprise, and retire. George Clinton was also a member of Congress, and served in the wars against the Iroquois Indians. b. 1739; d. 1812.

CRUSOIX, Olivier de, klis'-son, a gallant French soldier, who was made Constable of France in 1380. He defeated the Flemings at the battle of Rosbecq, in 1382. b. in Brittany; d. 1407.

CLITUS, κλιττος, the most conspicuous of this name was the friend and foster-brother of Alexander the Great. He had saved the king's life in a battle, yet Alexander killed him with a javelin, in a fit of anger, when he was intoxicated, because, at a feast, he preferred the actions of Philip to those of his son. Alexander was afterwards inconsolable for the loss of a friend whom he had so wantonly sacrificed in the hour of drunkenness. D. 323 B.C.

CLIVE, Robert, Lord, of Plassy, clive, was educated at several schools, but with so little success, that his father, despairing of his becoming eminent in any profession, obtained for him for them; she patronized poets and men of letters, wrote memoirs, and made her home, as has been said, "a school for the young and an asylum for the aged, a refuge for the persecuted, and a pattern to all." She died at Brougham Castle in 1673, aged 87.

CLIFF, William, Esq., a distinguished naturalist, and many years conservator of the Hunterian museum, under the supervision of the council of the Royal College of Surgeons. He contributed several papers to the literature of natural history, such as "Description of some Fossil Bones found in the Caverns at Preston," "Experiments to ascertain the influence of the Spinal Marrow on the action of the Heart in Fishes," "On the Megatherium," "On Fossil Remains from the Irrawadi," &c. &c. near Bodmin, 1775; p. 1849.

and entered the army, in which he so highly distinguished himself at the taking of a fort belonging to the rajah of Tanjore, that he obtained the post of commissary-general. Soon afterwards, the French, under Duplexe, began to discover their ambitious designs on India, which roused the jealousy of the English, when war was entered upon, and the genius of Clive had many opportunities of displaying itself. The French and their allies, however, gained numerous advantages. In 1751, Trichinopoly, the seat of Ali Khan, the ally of the English, was besieged by the French; on which Clive's superior genius suggested the advantage of attacking the city of Arcot, and the attempt succeeded beyond expectation. This circumstance drew off the enemy from Trichinopoly to retake Arcot, which Clive defended in such a manner that the siege was raised. This success was followed by a series of victories, and the overthrow of the enemy. In 1753 Clive embarked for England, to rest awhile and recruit his health, when he was presented, by the Court of Directors, with a sword set with diamonds. In 1755 he returned to India as Governor of Fort St. David, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and, shortly after, he assisted Admiral Watson in reducing Angria, the pirate, taking Gheriah, his capital, and all his treasures. In the meantime, Surajah-u-Dowlah, the nabob, had made a successful attack on the British, captured a number of prisoners, and immured upwards of a hundred of them in the "Black Hole" of Calcutta. This brought Clive at once to that place, which he took, completely defeating the army of Surajah, whom, after the victory of Plassy, in 1757, he compelled to sue for peace. Clive now entered Moorshedabad, and placed Meer Jaffer, one of the nabob's officers, on the throne. The Mogul conferred on him the title of omrah of the empire, with a grant of lands, said to produce £27,000 a year. In 1759 he destroyed a large Dutch armament, sent against him, in Bengal; and, in the following year, returned to England, and was created an Irish peer. In 1764 he went to Bengal as president, where he soon restored tranquillity, and returned home in 1767. In 1769 he was made knight of the Bath. In 1773 a motion was made in the House of Commons to resolve that, "In the acquisition of his wealth, Lord Clive had abused the powers with which he had been intrusted." He defended himself with spirit and modesty; and the motion was not only rejected, but the house resolved, that "Lord Clive had rendered great and meritorious services to his country." This ungrateful treatment, however, penetrated his soul, and in a fit of gloom he put an end to his existence in 1774. b. at Styche, near Market Drayton, in Shropshire, 1725.—Lord Chatham called him a "heaven-born general, who, without experience, surpassed all the officers of his time." He represented Shrewsbury in Parliament from 1760 to his death. He left £70,000 to the invalids in the Company's service. His lordship married a sister of Dr. Maskelyne, astronomer-royal, by whom he had five children. A statue was, in 1859, erected to his memory, temporarily, opposite the government offices in Whitehall, with the view of its being ultimately transferred to Shrewsbury.

Clodoald, or St. Cloud, klo'-do-ald, son of Clodomir, and grandson of Clovis, king of France. After the death of his father, and the murder of his two brothers (see Clodomir), he became a monk, and found refuge in a monastery near Paris, which took from him the name of St. Cloud. b. at St. Cloud, 560.

Clopius Publus, klo'-de-us, a turbulent Roman citizen, descended of an illustrious family. He made himself notorious by his licentiousness, avarice, and ambition. He introduced himself in women's clothes into Julius Cæsar's house, whilst Pompeia, Cæsar's wife, of whom he was enamoured, was celebrating the mysteries of Ceres, or Bona Dea, at which no man was permitted to be present. Tried for this violation of human and divine laws, he succeeded in corrupting his judges. From a patrician he became a plebeian, in order to be eligible for the tribuneship; and was an inveterate enemy to Cato and Cicero. By his influence he procured the banishment of the latter, who was, however, soon afterwards recalled. Killed by the slaves of Milo in a quarrel, 52 B.C.

Clodomir, klo'-do-meer, son of Clovis, succeeded, on the death of his father in 511, to the kingdom of Orleans. He fought against Sigismund, king of Burgundy, took him prisoner, and put him to death. He himself was afterwards slain in a battle with Gondemar, Sigismund's successor, in 524.—He left three children, of whom two were murdered by their uncles, and the third, Clodoald, saved himself by flight.

Clootz, Jean Baptist de, klootz, better known by the name of "Anacharsis Clootz," was a Prussian baron, who, at the beginning of the French revolution, distinguished himself by his impiety and extravagances. After performing various feats of madness, calling himself Anacharsis, and the "Orator of the Human Race," he gave a large sum to the Assembly to make war against all kings, and demanded that a price should be put upon the head of the king of Prussia. He also denied the authority of all rulers, even that of the Creator, and published a work to that effect. b. 1755. Guillotined under Robespierre, 1794.—He was nephew to the learned Cornelius Pauw, of Berlin.

Clotaire I., king of France, klo'-tair, was the son of Clovis and Clotilda. He, at first, was only king of Soissons, in 511, but became, in 561, master of the whole of France, on the death of his brothers. b. 497; d. 561.

Clotaire II. succeeded his father Chilperic I., in the kingdom of Soissons, at the age of four months. His mother maintained the kingdom for him against the efforts of Childbert, and afterwards becoming possessed of Austrasia, he reigned over the whole of the kingdom. b. 583; d. 628.

Clotaire III. came to the throne of Burgundy in 568, on the death of his father, Clovis II. b. 552; d. 670. Batilda, his mother, governed during his minority with great wisdom.

Clotaire IV. reigned only in name from 719 to 720, Charles Martel, mayor of the palace, having the real power.

Clovis I., klo'-ve, the founder of the French monarchy, succeeded Childeric, his father, in 481. His kingdom then was bounded by the sea and the river Scheldt on the N. and E., on the W. by the dioceses of Thérouanne and Boulogne, and on the S. by Cambrai. He was not, however, slow in extending these territories. In 496 he attacked Soissons, and made that place his capital. In 493 he took Paris, and removed his residence to that city. Three years later he turned his arms against the Germans, and defeated them at Tolbiac. After that victory he embraced Christianity, at the solicitation of his wife Clotilda, and was baptized at Rheims. He afterwards defeated the king of Burgundy, and, in 507, gained a great victory over Alaric, king of the Goths, whom he killed with his own hand, thus obtaining Aquitaine. He was now at the height of his power, but he sullied the successes of his reign by putting to death several chiefs, whose ambition he feared. b. 465; d. 511, dividing his estates between his four children, Thierry, Clodomir, Childbert, and Clotaire.

Clovis II., was the second son of Dagobert, king of Soissons and Burgundy, whom he succeeded in 639. b. 633; d. 660.

CLOVIS III., was the son of Thierry III., king of France, whom he succeeded in 691, at the age of nine, and reigned five years, under the guardianship of Pepin d'Heristal, mayor of the palace. D. 695.

CLYDE, Lord. (See CAMPBELL, Sir Colin.)

CLUTTERBUCK, Robert, klut'-ter-buk, an antiquary and topographer, who wrote a "History of Hertfordshire," of which county he was a native. B. 1772; D. 1831.

COBBETT, William, kob'-bet, one of the boldest and purest English political writers, was the son of a small farmer and publican in Sussex. He was bred to country life, but going to Portsmouth, in 1782, he first beheld the sea, which seems, at once, to have unsettled all his notions of rural existence, for the next day he made application for employment on board a man-of-war. In this, however, he was not successful, and in the following year, being at Guildford fair, he took the sudden determination of proceeding to London, where he was engaged as a copying clerk to an attorney. Becoming disgusted with this employment, he went to Chatham, where he enlisted in a regiment of foot, and, in a short time, having been made a corporal for good conduct, was landed with his regiment on the shores of New Brunswick, N. America. Here he rose to the rank of sergeant-major, and after a service of eight years, returned to England, where, at his own earnest request, he got his discharge, on account of his good behaviour and the services he had rendered the regiment. Shortly afterwards he went to France, to avoid prosecuting a charge which he had preferred against four officers of his regiment for peculation. He then sailed for New York, where he arrived in 1792. Two years after this, he commenced his political career as a writer, by attacking Dr. Priestley, who had just arrived from England, and who was fiercely denounced in a pamphlet entitled "Observations on the Emigration of a Martyr to the Cause of Liberty, by Peter Forequpine." This was written by Cobbett, who rapidly followed it up by others in the most violent anti-democratic strain. He now became as bold as he was unsparing in his sarcasm, upon all who offered opposition to his views; and the consequence was several prosecutions for libel, which forced him to leave America, and return to England in 1800. Here he commenced, in London, a daily Tory paper, which did not succeed. He next started his "Weekly Register," which commanded a large circulation, and which, we believe, without the intermission of a single week, he continued till the day of his death, a period of thirty-three years. It was commenced as an aid to the Tory party; but it began to change its views in 1803, and finally became thoroughly reforming in its principles. In 1804 two verdicts were obtained against him by the government for libel, and, in 1810, another for a paper which he had written against flogging some local militiamen at Ely. On this occasion he was condemned to pay a fine of £1000 to the king, and to be imprisoned for two years. Having suffered this punishment, he came forth from the house of his confinement as vigorous as ever, and, as might be expected, more hostile against the powers that had incarcerated and amerced him. To annoy the administration, he at once began his "Twopenny Trash," a series of political papers, which had a circulation of 100,000 copies. In 1817, to escape impending persecution, he returned, and commenced a daily paper, which lived only two months. He was again cast in two actions for libel, when, in 1820, he first tried to get into parliament. In this, however, he did not succeed till 1832, when he was returned to the first reformed parliament for Oldham, which he continued to represent till his death. B. at Farnham, 1762; D. 1835.—Cobbett passed an active life, and wrote an excellent Grammar of the English language, besides many other works of high common sense and excellence, independent of his political labours as an editor.

CODDEN, Richard, kob'-den, is the son of a small Sussex farmer, who died whilst Richard was a boy. He was therefore taken charge of by an uncle who had a wholesale warehouse in London, into which Richard was in due time introduced. He afterwards became a partner in a Manchester printed-cotton factory, and occasionally "took the road," as commercial travellers for the house. He subsequently visited Egypt, Greece, and Turkey, and in 1835 went to N. America. The result of his observations in this country, to some extent, appeared in a pamphlet entitled "England, Ireland, and America, by a Manchester Manufacturer." Another pamphlet of his, entitled "Russia," also appeared about this time. In 1837 he contested the borough of Stockport, but was unsuccessful, when he made a journey through France, Belgium, and Switzerland. In the following year he went through Germany, and, soon after his return, commenced his advocacy of the repeal of the taxes on corn. In 1839 the National Anti-corn-law League was formed, and in 1841 Mr. Cobden was elected member of parliament for Stockport. He now continued to advocate, with all his energy, the repeal of the corn laws, and, being an effective public speaker, he won over a great many to his views. His influence gradually rose in the House of Commons, until, on June 29th, 1843, Sir Robert Peel made his memorable speech, wherein he gave all the credit of the repeal of the corn laws to Mr. Cobden. "The name which ought to be," said Sir Robert, "and which will be associated with the success of these measures, is the name of a man who, acting, I believe, from pure and disinterested motives, has advocated their cause with untiring energy, and by appeals to reason, enforced by an eloquence the more to be admired because it was unaffected and unadorned,—the name which ought to be and will be associated with the success of these measures, is the name of Richard Cobden." After this, Mr. Cobden once more visited the continent, and £70,000 was collected by his grateful countrymen and presented to him. In 1847 he became member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, which he continued to represent for several years, when he retired for some time from active public life. In 1859 he revisited America, and during his absence was chosen member for Rochdale. On his return, he was offered the presidency of the Board of Trade, under the Palmerston administration, which he refused to accept. His reasons for not joining the noble lord's government were explained at length by him at a public meeting in Rochdale, in August, 1859. The general purport of these was, that he had been, for many years, a decided opponent of the foreign policy of Lord Palmerston, and which he designated as a war-like one. In 1859-60, Mr. Cobden negotiated with the French government commercial treaties, having for their object to facilitate the commercial intercourse of Great Britain and France, which were subsequently sanctioned by parliament. By these treaties, known in this country as the French commercial treaty and the supplementary treaty thereto, great reductions were made in the scale of duties levied on British goods in France, and corresponding abatements in the British tariff on French wines, silks, and other articles. n. at Dunford, near Midhurst, 1804; p. in London, 1865.

COCHRAN, Robert, kòk'-rân, a Scotch architect, who was employed by James III. of Scotland in building several great structures. That monarch created him earl of Mar, and distinguished him by so many marks of his favour, that several of his nobles rose, seized the favourite in the royal presence, and, making short work of him, summarily hanged him, in 1484, on the bridge of Laurier, which he himself had erected.

COCHRAN, William, a Scottish artist, who, after studying at Rome, settled in Glasgow, where he acquired a considerable fortune by the practice of his art. His "Endymion" and "Daedalus," historical pictures, are held in high esteem. p. 1733; p. 1735.

COCHRANE, Captain John Dundas, R.N., a great traveller, who made a journey on foot "through Russia, and Siberian Tartary, from the frontiers of China to the Frozen Sea and Kamtschatka." He published, in 1824, a narrative of this extraordinary undertaking, and afterwards went to America, where he died, in Columbia, in 1825. p. 1780.—The original intention of this explorer was to travel round the globe, as nearly as it could be done, by land. When he left London for St. Petersburg, his design was to cross from Northern Asia to America at Behring's Straits, and the whole of the journey was to be accomplished on foot; "for the best of all possible reasons," he says,—"that my finances allowed of no other."

COCHRANE, Lord. (See DUNDONALD, Earl of.)

COCHRANE, Admiral Sir Alexander, G.C.B., son of Thomas, eighth earl of Dundonald, entered the navy at an early age, and attained to the rank of post-captain in 1783. After doing good service in various actions while in command of the Hind and the Thetis, he was, in 1799, appointed to the Ajax, of 80 guns, and joined the fleet under Lord Keith, which accompanied the expedition of Sir Ralph Abercrombie to Egypt, and had entrusted to him the duty of providing for the landing of the troops, which service he performed in a most satisfactory manner. He sat in parliament for the Dunfermline burghs from 1804 to 1806; on the rupture of the peace of Amiens, he was appointed to the Northumberland, 74; in the following year was made rear-admiral; was with Nelson in the celebrated pursuit of the French and Spanish fleets; in 1806, in concert with Sir John Duckworth, he pursued and overtook a French fleet sent out to relieve St. Domingo, and, in the action which followed, captured the whole of the enemy's ships except two frigates and a small corvette. For this service, Admiral Cochrane was created a knight of the Bath, received the thanks of parliament, and a sword of honour and the freedom of the city of London. He assisted in the capture of the Danish West India islands, and of Martinique and Guadaloupe, and was appointed governor of the latter island in 1810. In the war with the United States, in 1813, Sir Alexander was nominated to the command on the North American station, and vigorously blockaded the enemy's ports. He was made admiral of the Blue in 1819; and held the command at Plymouth from 1821 to 1824. p. 1753; p. suddenly at Paris, in 1832.—His son, Sir Thomas John Cockrane, K.C.B., is admiral of the White, to which rank he attained in 1856. His most distinguished services were performed under his father's command on the coast of America; against the pirates in the Indian Archipelago in 1844; and at the capture of the capital of Borneo in 1846. p. 1813.

COCKBURN, Henry Thomas, Lord, kò'-burn, was the son of Archibald Cockburn, of Cockpen, one of the barons of the Exchequer in Scotland. He followed the profession of the law, and became one of the Scottish lords of Session. In 1830 he was made solicitor-general for Scotland, and in 1834 was promoted to the bench. As a member of the Scottish bar he achieved many triumphs, and was an early contributor to the pages of the "Edinburgh Review." He also wrote a life of his friend Lord Jeffrey, which was published in 1852. A most agreeable work by Lord Cockburn, entitled "Memorials of my Time," has been published since his death. It gives an account of the leading events which marked the history of Scotland in his day, and is replete with amusing and characteristic anecdotes of the distinguished men who figured in "modern Athens" during her palmiest days. 1779; p. while on the Ayr circuit, 1834.

COCKBURN, Admiral the Right Honourable Sir George, G.C.B., entered the navy in 1781, and early began to distinguish himself. After serving on the East India, home, and Mediterranean stations, in 1795 he shared in the blockade and capture of Leghorn. He subsequently served in the West Indies, where he was the principal means of Martinique being ceded to Britain as a colony. For this he received the thanks of the House of Commons. In 1812, the duty of reconquering Spain and her transatlantic colonies was committed to him, and in 1813 and 1814 he was actively engaged in the American war. After Waterloo, he was deputed to convey Napoleon to St. Helena, and in 1818 entered parliament, representing Portsmouth, Weobly, and Plymouth, till 1830. In 1841 he was returned for Ripon, for which he sat till 1846, when he retired from public life. Before his death he inherited the baronetcy of his brother. p. 1772; p. 1853.

COCKBURN, John, of Ormiston, a distinguished agriculturist, whose efforts to encourage that important branch of industry have procured for him the title of "Father of Scottish husbandry." He introduced the system of granting long leases to tenants, which has been productive of immense advantage to the agriculture of Scotland; he also established a linen factory, a bleachfield, &c., and was thus the means of introducing branches of industry which have since become largely developed in that country. He was a member of the last Scotch Parliament, and the first representative of East Lothian in the imperial House of Commons. n. near the end of the 17th century; p. 1758.

COCKBURN, Mrs., a lady of literary tastes and considerable talent, the authoress of the modern version of the "Flowers of the Forest," and several other pieces of great merit, was the daughter of Rutherford of Fernilee, Selkirkshire, and wife of Patrick Cockburn, advocate, younger brother of Cockburn of Ormiston, the agriculturist. Her house in Edinburgh was the resort of all the most distinguished men of the day then resident in Edinburgh. b. 1794.

COCKBURN, Mrs. Catherine, a self-educated authoress, who, at the age of 17, published a tragedy called "Agnes de Castro," which was well received. Another tragedy by her, "The Fatal Friendship," was produced with great success at the Lincoln's-inn Fields Theatre about two years later, and is considered her best piece; she wrote several others. Mrs. Cockburn also wrote on metaphysical subjects, and composed several pieces in defence of Locke's philosophy, and on kindred themes. After changing from Protestantism to Catholicism, and back to Protestantism again, she married the Rev. Mr. Cockburn, who was for some years incumbent of Long Horsley, near Morpeth. Her maiden name was Trotter. b. 1679; d. 1740.

COCKBURN, Sir Alexander James Edmund, lord chief justice, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1825 he was admitted of the Middle Temple, and in 1829 was called to the bar. In 1841 he became Q.C., and on account of the great ability with which he defended Lord Palmerston's foreign policy in the Don Pacifico debate, and the assistance which he gave to the liberal party from time to time, he was appointed solicitor-general, in 1850, by Lord John Russell, and received the honour of knighthood. He then became attorney-general under Lord Aberdeen, and subsequently chief justice of the court of Common Pleas. On the overthrow of the Derby administration in 1859, he was appointed to the lord chief justiceship by the government of Lord Palmerston. b. in London, 1802.

COCKER, Edward, kok'-er, an industrious schoolmaster and penman. He published fourteen copy-books, a small English dictionary, a book for writing, called "Cocker's Morals," and wrote a treatise on arithmetic, which had a great success. Almost every similar treatise since his time has been "according to Cocker." b. 1632; d. about 1675.

COCKERELL, Charles Robert, R.A., kok'-er-el, an eminent architect, who made the usual tour of the continent, and in Italy, as well as in Asia Minor, made the grander architectural remains a subject of study. From Egina and Phigaleia, and other places, he brought to England several antiquarian fragments, which have found a place in the British Museum. He early attracted notice in his profession, and has had a great many public buildings intrusted to him. Among these may be named the New Library at Cambridge, the university galleries at Oxford, the college at Lampeter, and several others in the provinces. In London, the Sun Fire Office, in Bartholomew Lane, the Westminster Fire Office, in the Strand, and, in conjunction with Mr. Tite, the London and Westminster Bank, St. George's Hall, and the assize courts at Liverpool, were also carried out by Mr. Cockerell; and many other buildings of public interest. In 1829 he was chosen an A.R.A., in 1836 R.A., and in 1840 he became professor of architecture in the Royal Academy. b. in London, 1788. d. 1863.

COOLES, Publius Horatius, ko'-kles, a celebrated Roman, who alone, in 507 B.C., opposed the whole army of Porsenna at the head of a bridge, while his companions were destroying it behind him. When this was effected, Cooles, though wounded by the darts of the enemy, and impeded by his arms and armour, leapt into the Tiber, and swam safely across. Of this episode, Lord Macaulay thus sings in one of his "Lays of Ancient Rome:"—

"Never, I ween, did swimmer,
In such an evil case,
Struggle through such a raging flood,
Safe to the landing-place;
But his limbs were borne up bravely
By the brave heart within,
And our good father Tiber
Bore bravely up his chin."

1794, he served under Lord Howe in the Charlotte, when the French were defeated at Brest, and was deputed to be the bearer of the duplicate despatches to England. For this but in that year he received the command of the Orion, 74, and fought at Trafalgar. In 1808 he was appointed to the command of the Leander, accompanied the expedition to Walcheren, and in 1809 forced the Scheldt. For this service he was publicly thanked. In the three following years he was employed off the coast of Spain, and in 1813 returned to England. In 1814 he sailed for N. America, and took part in the attack on New Orleans. In 1815 he came home and was created a knight-commander of the Bath. His services had now been considerable, and in 1821 he was made a vice-admiral. In 1826 he was appointed to command the squadron in the Mediterranean, and, in conjunction with the Russian and French fleets, destroyed the Turco-Egyptian fleet at the battle of Navarino, fought October 20th, 1827. For this he was made a knight grand-cross of the Bath, but was recalled from the Mediterranean in 1828. In 1832 he was elected member of parliament for Devonport, which he represented in several successive parliaments. In 1837 he was made an admiral, and in 1839 resigned his seat, on being appointed commander-in-chief at Portsmouth. b. 1770; d. in London, 1851.

CODRINGTON, Sir William John, K.C.B., son of the preceding, entered the army in 1821. In 1836 he became lieutenant-colonel in the Coldstream Guards; in 1840, colonel; and in 1854 was raised to the rank of major-general. Being at Varna before the expedition departed for the Crimea, he was there appointed, by Lord Raglan, to the command of the first brigade of the light division, and afterwards led his troops with great steadiness at the battle of the Alma, although he had never before seen active service. At Inkermann his bravery was conspicuous; and when, in consequence of a wound, Sir George Brown had to leave the Crimea, Major-General Codrington was appointed to the command of the light division. On the subsequent retirement of Sir George Brown, he succeeded to this command, and led the unsuccessful attack on the Redan, at Sebastopol, September 8, 1855. On the resignation of General Simpson, he was appointed commander-in-chief of the British army in the Crimea; and, for his services, was created a knight-commander of the Bath. He afterwards represented Greenwich in the House of Commons, and was subsequently appointed to the chief command in Gibraltar. He was made a general in 1563. n. 1500.

CODRUS, *ko'-dru*s, the last king of Athens, celebrated for his patriotism, was the son of Melanthus. Having learnt from the oracle that, in the invasion of Attica by the Heraclidae, victory would remain with those whose chief should fall in battle, he threw himself into the midst of the conflict, and was slain, 1070 b.c.—To pay more honour to his memory, the Athenians made a resolution, that no man after Codrus should reign in Athens under the name of king; and therefore the government was put into the hands of perpetual archons.

COELLO, Claudio, ko-el'-yo, a famous Spanish

Rubens, which he copied in the palace at Madrid. He produced some good altar-pieces and frescoes; and in 1630, was appointed cabinet painter to Charles II. of Spain. His masterpiece is the "Collation of the Host on the altar of the Sacristy in the Escorial," which ceremony took place in 1634 in the presence of the king and the officers of state. This picture occupied Coello three years; contains upwards of fifty portraits; is considered one of the finest productions of the Spanish school; combines the excellence of design of Cano, the colouring of Murillo, and the effect of Velasquez; and is not surpassed by the works of Raffaele, Titian, and the best masters of Italy or Flanders. Several other of his works are in Madrid, and some at Saragossa. n. at Madrid, it is said, in the year 1621; died of jealousy because Luca Giordano was invited by the king to paint frescoes in the Escorial, 1633.

COHOEN, Menno, ko'-horn, a Dutch engineer, surnamed the Dutch Vauban, who early became a soldier, and rose to the ranks of general of artillery, director-general of fortifications, and governor of Flanders. In 1692 he defended the fort of Namur against Louis XIV. with great gallantry, although he was forced to surrender. He defended other places with equal bravery, and was a skilful engineer. The fortifications of Bergen-op-Zoom are considered his masterpiece. n. in Friesland, 1641; n. at the Hague, 1704.—In 1685 he published his "Three Systems of Fortification," which are adapted only to the defence of ground of little elevation above the sea-level.

COKE, Edward, koke, an English judge, educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, whence he removed to Clifford's Inn, and afterwards to the Inner Temple. In 1579 he was called to the bar, and chosen reader at Lyon's Inn, in which office he so soon distinguished himself by his learning and intelligence, that his practice became enormous. In 1586 he was chosen recorder of Norwich, and in 1591-92 was unanimously elected to the same office in London. This, however, he resigned in 1592, on receiving the appointment of solicitor-general. In 1594 he became attorney-general, about which time the enmity, which continued throughout the life of Lord Bacon, arose between him and that distinguished man. In 1600 he prosecuted the earl of Essex, and in the trial behaved with uncommon asperity. Three years afterwards, he received the honour of knighthood, and, in 1603, conducted the prosecution against Sir Walter Raleigh in such a manner as severely to reflect upon his character for prudence and humanity. His speeches at the trial of Father Garnet, and the other conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot, in 1605, are deemed his forensic masterpieces, and with them his career as an advocate terminated. In 1606 he was appointed chief justice of the Common Pleas, and in 1613 was removed to the King's Bench, at which time he was sworn of the privy council. In the prosecution of the murderers of Sir Thomas Overbury, in 1615, he conducted himself with such spirit as to raise him many enemies, and soon afterwards fell into disgrace for opposing the king's prerogative, and holding his opinion with an honesty and determination of purpose which, in the eye of posterity, must do him high honour. In 1616 he was removed from his office, as Lord Chancellor Egerton, one of his enemies, said, on account of his "excessive popularity." After this Sir Edward never filled a judicial situation, although he was, in some measure, restored to the royal favour. He was now engaged in several commissions of a public nature, and in 1620 was returned member of parliament for Liskeard, in Cornwall. In this parliament he joined the popular side against the court, and was greatly instrumental in getting the Commons to pass the celebrated resolution "that the liberties, franchises, privileges, and jurisdictions of parliament, are the ancient and undoubted birthright and inheritance of the subjects of England." For this and other alleged causes the king was highly incensed against him, and had him committed to the Tower, where he lay only a short time, but never recovered the good opinion of king James. In 1623 he was chosen member for Suffolk and Buckingham, but he took his seat for the latter, and although in his 79th year, defended the constitutional rights of the people with all the vigour of youth and the experience of age. He was the principal framer of the Bill of Rights, and mostly through his influence both the Lords and the king were brought to assent to its becoming the law of the land. One of the last acts of his public life was to denounce the duke of Buckingham as the author of all the calamities of the nation; and, on the dissolution of parliament, he retired to his seat in Buckinghamshire, where he spent in peace the remainder of his days. n. at Milleham, Norfolk, 1551; n. 1633.—Coke lived in trying times, and through many changes, but, on the whole, merits the gratitude of his country. The first part of his reports appeared about 1600, and the last, or thirteenth, about 1655. His "Institutes of the Laws of England" are invaluable; the first is a translation and comment on Sir Thomas Littleton's Tenures, and is commonly known as "Coke upon Littleton, or the First Institute." There are also other law pieces of his in print.

COLBERT, John Baptist, kol'-bair, a distinguished French statesman, was the son of a silk-merchant, and in 1643 became clerk to Le Tellier, secretary of state, whose daughter he married. He next entered into the service of Cardinal Mazarin, who sent him to Rome on some important business, which he managed with great dexterity. The cardinal, at his death, recommended him to his master, Louis XIV., as the most proper person for comptroller-general of the finances, which post he obtained, and he is generally considered as the inventor of the theory of the balance of trade. In 1661 he was appointed superintendent of the buildings, and greatly improved Paris by erecting elegant structures. But architectural pursuits did not engross the whole of his attention. He laboured to improve the state of the arts, and to extend French commerce and manufactures. He founded Quebec and Cayenne, made settlements in India and Africa, and fostered the colonies of St. Domingo and Martinique. He also founded the dockyards of Brest, Toulon, and Rochefort, and in every possible manner gave a new impetus to the commerce of his country. Besides these works, he instituted the Academy of Painting and Sculpture, and the Academy of Sciences, and by his recommendation the Royal Observatory was built. In 1689 he was made secretary of state and marine minister, which offices he discharged to the satisfaction of his sovereign and the benefit of the people. b. at Rheims, 1619; d. at Paris, 1683.—Notwithstanding the immense benefits which Colbert had conferred on his country, he had to be buried in the night with a military escort. On account of the taxes he was forced to impose for the wars and pleasures of Louis, the people threatened to tear his body in pieces. He was, however, a great man, with a fine as well as a comprehensive mind. The gardens of the Tuilleries, the Hôtel des Invalides, the façade of the Louvre, the triumphal arches of the Boulevards, St. Denis and St. Martin, were all executed under him. He was, however, absolute in his temper, repellent in his manners, and destitute of feeling in carrying out his plans.

COLBY, Thomas, kol-be, an eminent English engineer, and a major-general in the army, rose successively through the various subordinate ranks, and surveyed a large portion of England and Ireland. He accompanied Biot, the French engineer, on his trip to Shetland, in 1817, and afterwards assisted in connecting the French with the English triangulation across the Straits of Dover. In 1821 he was made a major, and in 1825 became lieutenant-colonel. In 1848 he rose to the rank of major-general, when his connexion with the survey ceased. He was a member of several scientific associations, and took an active part in establishing the Astronomical Society; but perhaps his greatest work was a series of tidal observations, which he made round the coast of Ireland, "and which," said the astronomer-royal, "are the most important that ever were made." b. at Rochester, 1784; d. at Liverpool, 1852.

COLCHESTER, Charles Abbot, Lord, kol-ches-ter, was the younger son of the Rev. John Abbot, D.D., rector of All Saints, Colchester, and, in 1775, was elected a student of Christ Church, Oxford. In 1777 he won the chancellor's medal for Latin verse, and in 1783 took his degree as B.C.L., and soon after was called to the bar. In 1795 he left the bar and became clerk of the rules in the Court of King's Bench, and in the same year was returned member of parliament for Illestone, in Cornwall. He now laboured in introducing practical reforms of the law, and the improvement of the public records. In 1800 he obtained leave to bring into the House a bill for taking a census of the population of the kingdom, and the following year the census was taken, and has continued to be taken ever since, decennially. He was now appointed chief secretary for Ireland, and keeper of the Irish privy seal; but these offices he scarcely held a year, when, in 1802, he was elected speaker of the House of Commons, which he continued to be till 1817, when, in May, a stroke of erysipelas forced him to resign. On the 3rd of June following he was raised to the peerage as Baron Colechester, with a pension of £4000 a year, an £3000 a year to his next successor to the title. b. at Abingdon, 1757; d. in London, 1824.

COLDEN, Cadwallader, kol-den, a distinguished historian, physician, and botanist, was the son of the Rev. Alexander Colden, of Dunse, London, he, in 1718, established himself in New York, where he filled several public offices with much ability. He wrote a "History of the Five Indian Nations;" "The Cause of Gravitation;" "The Principles of Action in Matter," &c. He is said to have given Franklin the first hint of stereotyping, but which was not acted on during his life. b. 1688; d. 1777.

COLL, Sir G. Lowry, kol, a British officer of great distinction in the Peninsular war, under the command of Wellington. For his services in the campaigns of 1812-1814 he received the thanks of parliament, and was appointed governor of the Cape of Good Hope. b. 1772; d. 1842.

COLE, Henry, C.B., kol, an indefatigable promoter of art-industry, connected with the Record Office, took an active part in bringing the Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations in 1851 into the order which it assumed before the eyes of the public. For his great exertions in this noble undertaking he received the honour of companion of the Bath, and was appointed to the direction of the schools of design throughout the country. The South Kensington Museum was established at his recommendation, and was placed under his superintendence. Mr. Cole was in 1855 appointed English commissioner at the Universal Exhibition at Paris; and was also actively engaged in organizing the International Exhibition of 1862. He was secretary of the Royal Commission for the Exhibition held at Paris in 1867. b. at Bath, July 19, 1808.

COLEBROOKE, Henry Thomas, kol-brook, an eminent Oriental scholar, was in 1782 sent out to Calcutta, where, after serving several years, he became attached to the revenue department at Tirhoot. He was afterwards removed to Purneah, and began to devote himself to the study of those languages in which he afterwards attained to considerable eminence. Shortly after the foundation of the college at Fort William, he was appointed professor of Sanscrit, from which situation he was raised to a chief judgeship of one of the law-courts. He next became President of the Board of Revenue, and a member of the Supreme Council of Bengal. He now began to publish a great number of papers connected with Hindoo literature and science, among which are:—"Essays on the Religious Ceremonies of the Hindoos;" "On the Sanscrit and Praerit Languages;" &c.; "On the Vedas, or Sacred Writings of the Hindoos;" "On the Indian and Arabian Divisions of the Zodiac;" "On Ancient Monuments containing Sanscrit Inscriptions;" "On Sanscrit and Praerit Poetry;" "On the Philosophy of the Hindoos;" "Grammar of the Sanscrit Language" &c.; besides numerous translations from Sanscrit and other Oriental languages. returned to England after many years' service in India, and died in London, March, 1837. n. in 1785.—His son, Sir Thomas Edward Colebrooke, succeeded to the title and fortune of his uncle, Sir James Edward Colebrooke, Bart., in 1839, and was afterwards M.P. for Lanarkshire.

COLERIDGE, Samuel Taylor, kole'-ridj, was the youngest of a large family, and an orphan at the age of nine. He was educated at Christ's Hospital, and at "a very premature age," he says of himself, "even before my fifteenth year, I had bewildered myself in metaphysics and in theological controversy. Nothing else pleased me. History and political facts lost all interest in my mind. Poetry itself, yea novels and romances, became insipid to me." The "Sonnets" of Mr. Bowles, however, had such a charm for him that he turned from metaphysics to the study of poetry. In 1791 he entered Jesus College, Cambridge, which he left during the second year of his residence there, came to London, and, under the name of Comberbatch, enlisted in the 15th Dragoons. From the life of a soldier, he was, almost immediately, released by his friends purchasing his discharge. He then went to Bristol, and shortly after started a periodical called the "Watchman," which enjoyed an existence only to its ninth number. In 1795 he married Miss Sarah Fricker, and in the following year, published a small volume of poems, which went through a second edition. By this time he had gone to live in a cottage at the foot of the Quantock hills, in Somersetshire, where, in conjunction with Mr. Wordsworth, who was his neighbour, he formed the plan of the famous Lyrical Ballads. In 1797 he wrote his "Ancient Mariner," the first part of "Christabel," and his tragedy of "Remorse." About the same time he was preaching in a Unitarian chapel. In the following year, through the kind liberality of Messrs. Wedgwood, he was enabled to visit Germany, in company with Wordsworth, and at Göttingen, he attended Blumenbach's lectures on physiology, whilst at the same time making himself intimately acquainted with German literature. On his return, in 1798, he took up his residence at the Lakes, where both Southey and Wordsworth had settled, and published his translation of Schiller's "Wallenstein." In 1800 he began to contribute to the London "Courier" newspaper, which he continued to do till 1814. In the interval he had visited Malta, had lectured on the fine arts at the Royal Institution, and had produced "The Friend," a periodical which did not live beyond its twenty-seventh number. He now published several works on different subjects, and, during the latter years of his life, became domesticated with his friend Mr. Gillman, of Highgate Grove. For some years, as an academician of the Royal Society of Literature, he was in receipt of £100 a year from George IV., which, on the death of that sovereign, he lost. n. at St. Mary Ottery, Devonshire, 1772; n. 1834.—The fame of Coleridge principally rests on his powers as a critic in poetry and the fine arts.

COLERIDGE, Hartley, the elder son of Samuel Coleridge, produced some excellent poems, and from 1820 to 1831 was a contributor to "Blackwood's Magazine." He also wrote some excellent biographies of "The Worthies of Yorkshire and Lancashire." He lived mostly in the neighbourhood of the lakes Grasmere and Rydal, pleasing himself, rather than pleasing others, by the indulgence of an unfortunate propensity to intemperance, which he had contracted at college. n. 1796; n. 1819.

COLERIDGE, Derwent, the younger son of Samuel Coleridge, became principal of St. Mark's College, Chelsea, and a prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral. He is the author of a work "On the Scriptural Character of the English Church," and wrote some pieces, under the signature of Davenant Cecil, for "Knight's Quarterly Magazine." n. at Keswick, 1800.

COLERIDGE, Sara, daughter of Samuel Coleridge, and inherited much of the rich genius of her father. Her education was superintended mostly by Southey, who had married a sister of her mother, and to whose fostering care the whole family of Coleridge owed a deep debt of gratitude. She was reared under his roof, and, as she grew up, she endeavoured to lighten the literary labours of Southey by giving him all the assistance she could. In 1822 she produced "An Account of the Abipones, an Equestrian People of Paraguay, from the Latin of Martin Dobrizhoffer." This was her first literary performance and had been undertaken at the suggestion of Southey, who pronounced it admirable. In 1829 she married her cousin, Henry Nelson Coleridge, and on the death of her father, in 1834, in conjunction with her husband, undertook the task of giving to the world the poet's unpublished works. Whilst engaged in this duty, her husband died, when the completion of the task they had undertaken together, devolved wholly upon herself. She, however, proved quite equal to its performance, and executed it with great ability. It is upon her commentaries on her father's works that her fame chiefly rests, although she produced the "Phantasmion," a fairy tale, rich in invention, and redolent of poetic beauty. n. at Keswick, 1803; n. 1852.

COLERIDGE, Henry Nelson, was the son of Colonel Coleridge, a brother of the poet, and after distinguishing himself at school, became a contributor to "Knight's Quarterly Magazine." His papers in that periodical were chiefly historical, biographical, and critical. In 1825 he took a voyage to the West Indies for the improvement of his health, and, on his return, produced "Six Months in the West Indies," which ran through several editions. Shortly afterwards he was called to the bar by the society of the Middle Temple, and then married Sara, the daughter of the poet Samuel Coleridge. He rose to a good chancery practice, and in 1830 published an "Introduction to the Study of the Greek Classic Poets." In 1835 he produced his "Specimens of the Table Talk" of the late Samuel Taylor Coleridge." In 1836 appeared, in two volumes, the first instalment of "The Literary Remains of S. T. Coleridge;" and, in 1838, another volume was given to the world. Immersed in his business whilst pursuing these literary labours, and with health scarcely sound, he was, in 1842, again taken ill. For many months he was confined to his bed, and at length passed into the "undiscovered country," and was buried by the side of his uncle, in Highgate old churchyard. n. 1800; n. 1843.

COLERIDGE, Sir John Taylor, one of the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, the son of James Coleridge, esq., of Heath's Court, Devonshire, and nephew of S. T. Coleridge, the poet, was educated at Oxford, where he became a fellow of Exeter College; was first class in classics, in 1812; and won the Latin verse prizes of 1810 and 1813, together with the English verse prize in the latter year. He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in 1819; became a serjeant-at-law in 1832; and was raised to the bench and knighted in 1835. Justice Coleridge, an accomplished man of letters, was a contributor to the "Quarterly Review," which he edited for a time; and published, in 1825, an edition of Blackstone's "Commentaries," with original notes. b. 1790, at Tiverton, Devon.

COLERIDGE, Sir John Duke, eldest son of the above, was called to the bar in 1847, and was made a Q.C. in 1861. He was returned to parliament as member for Exeter in 1865 and 1868, and in the latter year became solicitor-general under Mr. Gladstone. b. 1821.

COLET, John, kol'-et, an English divine, educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, where he obtained his degree of D.D. In 1565 he was installed in the deanery of St. Paul's, where, by his preaching and other labours, he greatly advanced the Reformation. He was a liberal encourager of learning, particularly of the Greek language, and founded St. Paul's school. b. in London, 1466; d. 1519.

COLIGNY, Admiral Gaspard de, ko-lé-ne, a French general and statesman, greatly distinguished in the religious wars of his country, who was made admiral of France in 1552. He served in Italy under Francis I., in the campaign of 1543, and was at the battle of Cerisoles in 1544. He afterwards served in Flanders, where he greatly contributed to the victory at Renti, and subsequently prosecuted the war with vigour against the Spaniards in Artois and Picardy. He valiantly defended St. Quentin, and after the death of Henry II. joined the Huguenots, and, next to the prince of Condé, was at the head of the Protestant party. He now took up arms against the Guises, and fought at the battles of Dreux, St. Denis, Jarnac, and Moncontour. In these conflicts he was unsuccessful, but showed great celerity in repairing his losses, and in always being ready again to meet the enemy. In 1570 he made an advantageous peace for the Huguenots, and afterwards was invited to court. Here he was graciously received only to be betrayed. Charles IX. affected great regard for him; but, a few days after the marriage of the king's sister with the young king of Navarre, Coligny was wounded by a musket-ball, shot from a window. This attempt was instigated by the duchess of Nemours, whose first husband, Francis, duke of Guise, was assassinated by a Huguenot fanatic, and Coligny was unjustly suspected of being the mainspring in the deed. Two days after this attempt on the life of Coligny, the massacre of St. Bartholomew took place, and he was among the first of its victims. Whilst sitting in his room, a party, headed by Besme, one of the domestics of the duke of Guise, rushed into his room with a drawn sword, and piercing him, the admiral fell, wounded to death, at the feet of the duke. His body was hung by the feet on a gibbet, and his head cut off and sent to Catherine de Medici. b. at Châtillon-sur-Loing, 1516; killed in Paris, 1572.

COLIX, Alexander, ko'-lî, a Belgian sculptor, who executed the celebrated tomb of Maximilian I., at Innspruck. The sculpture on this tomb records the principal acts and victories of the emperor Maximilian, and is surrounded by twenty-eight gigantic statues of the heroes of the middle ages. He also executed two monuments of his patron, the archduke Ferdinand of the Tyrol, and his first wife, Philippa. These are likewise to be seen at Innspruck, and are extremely elaborate works. He became court sculptor to the emperor Ferdinand I., and also to his son, Ferdinand of Tyrol. b. at Mochlin, 1526; d. at Innspruck, 1612.

COLLARD-ROYER. (See ROYER-COLLARD.)

COLLATINUS, L. Tarquinus, kol-la-ti'-nus, a nephew of Tarquin the Proud, who married Lucretia, to whom Sextus Tarquin offered violence. He, with Brutus, drove the Tarquins from Rome, and were made the first consuls. He afterwards laid down his office, and retired to Alba in voluntary banishment. Lived in the 6th century b.c.

COLLIER, Jeremy, kol'-yer, a learned divine, and the son of a clergyman at Stow-qui, in Cambridgeshire, was educated by his father, and then removed to Caius College, Cambridge, where, in 1676, he took his degree of M.A., and entered into orders. In 1679 he received the rectory of Ampton, in Suffolk, which he afterwards resigned, and came to London, where, in 1685, he was chosen lecturer at Gray's Inn. At the Revolution, he not only refused the oath, but wrote in vindication of the abdicated monarch, for which he was imprisoned in Newgate. He was, however, discharged without being brought to trial. In 1692 he was again committed to the Gate-house, on suspicion of corresponding with the exiled king; but was, shortly afterwards, admitted to bail. In 1694, when Sir John Friend and Sir William Perkins were executed for what was called the Assassination Plot, Mr. Collier and two other nonjuring clergymen attended them to the place of execution, where all three joined in absolving them by the imposition of hands. This circumstance made a great noise, and two of the ministers were arrested, but Mr. Collier absconded, and was declared an outlaw. When this storm subsided, he published three volumes of excellent Essays upon Miscellaneous Subjects. These appeared severally in 1697, 1705, and 1709, and passed through many editions, being valued not only on account of the freedom of their style, but for the wit and humour with which they abound. He next directed his attention to the immortality of the stage, which was very licentious. This drew him into a controversy with several eminent poets, amongst whom was Dryden; but the latter made an honest confession of his fault, and Collier came off completely victorious. The town was on his side, and the dramatic writers afterwards wrote with more regard to decency. His next work was a translation and continuation of Moreri's "Historical Dictionary," under the title of "Geographical, Genealogical, and Poetical," which met with a very favourable reception, and was, in 1721, completed in 4 vols. folio. At the accession of Queen Anne, he had great offers of preferment, which he steadily refused. In 1714 he published, in 2 vols. folio, "The Ecclesiastical History of Great Britain," brought down to the death of Charles II.; and, in 1713, was privately consecrated a bishop by Dr. George Hickes, who had been himself consecrated suffragan of Thetford by the deprived bishops of Norwich, Ely, and Peterborough, in 1694. Old age was now fast drawing upon him; but he did not cease his active labours till affliction incapacitated him for further work. n. at Stow-Qu, in Cambridgeshire, 1650; p. in London, 1720.—Besides the above works, Collier published a volume of sermons, a translation of Marcus Antonius, and numerous pamphlets. He was buried in St. Pancras churchyard.

COLLIER, John Payne, an ardent labourer in the field of dramatic literature, was educated for the bar. In 1820 appeared his "Poetical Decameron; or, Ten Conversations on English Poets and Poetry, particularly of the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I." In 1825 he issued an allegorical poem, entitled "The Poet's Pilgrimage." In 1827 appeared his edition of Dodsley's "Old Plays," and, in 1831, his "History of English Dramatic Poetry," &c. In 1835-6-9 appeared successively "New Facts regarding the Life of Shakspeare;" and, in 1841, his edition of Shakspeare, founded upon an entirely new collation of the old editions. In 1843 appeared "Shakspeare's Library; a Collection of the ancient Romances, Novels, Legends, Poems, and Histories used by Shakspeare as the Foundation of his Dramas." Besides other works too numerous to mention here, he published a second edition of his Shakspeare in 1853, and a new edition of Spenser's Works in 1862. Since that time he has produced reprints, in fac-simile, of several old English poems and pamphlets. n. in London, 1759.

COLLIER, Sir Robert Porrett, eldest son of the late John Collier, member for Plymouth from 1832 to 1841, was called to the bar in 1813. After acting as recorder of Penzance for some years, he entered parliament as member for Plymouth in 1852. He was made solicitor-general in 1863, and retained office until the fall of the Russell ministry in 1868. In 1868, on the retirement of Mr. Disraeli, and the acceptance of office by Mr. Gladstone, he was made attorney-general. n. at Plymouth, 1817.

COLLINGWOOD, Cuthbert, Lord, kol'-ling-wood, an English admiral, who, in his thirteenth year, entered the navy, and gradually rose through the subordinate ranks, until, in the action of June 1, 1794, we find him flag-captain to Admiral Bowyer, on board the Prince. In 1797 he commanded the Excellent at the battle of Cape St. Vincent, and subsequently rose to the rank of vice-admiral of the Blue. This placed him second in command to Nelson at the battle of Trafalgar, where, on October 21, 1805, in the Royal Sovereign, he was the first to attack and break the enemy's line. It was on this occasion that Nelson exclaimed, "See that gallant fellow, how he carries his ship into action!" When England's greatest naval hero fell, mortally wounded, Collingwood completed the victory, and continued in command of the fleet. His services were now deemed worthy of a peerage, which he received. For nearly three years he continued the blockade of Cadiz, the Straits of Gibraltar, and the neighbouring coasts, and evinced a perseverance almost unexampled in the annals of naval warfare. Remaining at his post to the last, he sailed up the Mediterranean, where he became involved in some political complications, which, however, he managed with great sagacity. Worn out and worn out in the service of his country, he was at last compelled to "strike his colours" to the King of Terrors. n. at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1750; p. near Port Mahon, in his ship, the Ville de Paris, 1810.

COLLINS, Anthony, kol'-lins, a controversial writer and sceptic, author of "Priestcraft in Perfection," "A Discourse of Free-thinking," "A Philosophical Inquiry concerning Human Liberty," &c. His books are more distinguished for ingenuity and technical skill in reasoning than for profundity of thought or fairness of argument. He was answered by Drs. King, Bentley, Wharton, Hare, Hoadley, &c. n. 1676; p. 1729.—He seems to have been on intimate terms with Locke, who left him some property.

COLLINS, William, an English poet, educated at Winchester School, whence he removed to Queen's College, Oxford. In 1741 he was chosen demy of Magdalen College, where he took his degree of B.A., and, while there, published his "Oriental Eclogues." About 1744 he went to London, where he suffered extreme poverty; but an uncle, dying, left him £2000, which saved him from utter wretchedness, although he did not live to enjoy it. Before his death, his mind sunk into a state of complete imbecility. n. at Chichester, 1720; p. 1766.—Dr. Johnson has included Collins in his "Lives of the Poets," and says that he paid him a visit at Islington, and found him with a book in his hand. This turned out to be the New Testament, which he said was the best in the world. His ode on "The Passions" is the poem by which he is best known, and which has long ago been ranked among the order of the sublime. His "Dirge" written in imitation of that given by Shakspeare in "Cymbeline," is likewise an excellent effusion, although in another style.

COLLINS, William, R.A., a modern English artist of high eminence. In 1807 he entered as a student at the Royal Academy, and, in the same year, became an exhibitor, by contributing two small "Views on Millbank." From that time, for nearly forty years, he was an annual exhibitor, with the exception of a couple of years, when he was pursuing his studies in Italy. At first he distinguished himself by his groups of rustic children, engaged either in play or some juvenile trick; but after he had become an associate of the academy in 1814, he began his representations of coast scenery, in which he gained a most distinguished position. Amongst the numerous works which time, well employed, enabled him to produce, we may mention, as perhaps the most popular, his children swinging on a gate, and entitled "Happy as a King;" "The Stray Kitten;" "Putting Salt on the Bird's Tail;" and "The Newly-found Nest." n. in London, 1787; p. 1847.

COLLINS, William Wilkie, elder son of the above, published a life and memoirs of his father in 1848. He is a contributor to "All the Year Round," and other high-class periodicals, and has written several excellent novels, the best of which is the "Moonstone," which was published in 1868. n. 1825.

COLLINS, Charles Alston, younger son of William Collins, is an artist, painting in the style adopted by Millais and others, and called "Pre-Raphaelite." Like his brother he has written various works of travel and fiction.

COLLOT-D'HERBOIS, Jean Marie, kol'-lo dair'-baw, a ferocious French revolutionist, was for twenty years a strolling player. In 1792, however, he received a prize from the Jacobin Society, became one of its members, and also of the Convention. He was the first who moved for the abolition of royalty, and, on the trial of the king, sat next to Robespierre. In 1793, he accompanied Fouché to Lyons, and was one of the principals in the destruction of 1600 persons by the guillotine and artillery. History hardly presents us with such a monster as this. He actually made it a crime to show sympathy, by the countenance, for the unfortunate. In proof of this, he issued an order "that all those whose countenances testified to any inward emotions of grief or pity, should be treated as suspected." In 1794, an attempt made to assassinate him only increased his popularity. He became president of the Convention, and took part in the impeachment of the infamous Robespierre. He aided in bringing that monster to the scaffold; but his own time had come. He was denounced in the October of 1794, and in the following March was transported to Cayenne, where he shortly afterwards died of the fever natural to the climate. b. in Paris, 1750; d. 1798.—This human destroyer was not entirely destitute of talent. He wrote the almanack of Father Gerard, which obtained for him the prize from the Jacobin Society, and some dramatic pieces, the best of which is an imitation from the Spanish of Calderon, entitled "Le Paysan Magistrat."

COLMAN, George, kol-man, usually called the "Elder," was the son of Thomas Colman, Esq., resident at the court of the grand duke of Tuscany, by a sister of Anna Maria Pulteney, the countess of Bath. He received his education at Westminster school, and Christ-church, Oxford, where he engaged with Bonnel Thornton in writing a periodical paper called "The Connoisseur." On leaving the university he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar, but quitted the law for dramatic composition. In 1780 his first piece, "Polly Honeycomb," was successfully performed at Drury-lane Theatre; and the next year his comedy of the "Jealous Wife" was similarly received. In 1784 Lord Bath died, and left him an annuity, which was increased by General Pulteney. In 1788 he became a patentee of Covent-garden Theatre, but, soon after, sold his share, and purchased Foote's theatre in the Haymarket, which he held to his death, in 1794. b. at Florence, 1733.—Besides the above pieces, he wrote the "Clandestine Marriage," and altogether adapted and wrote upwards of thirty pieces for the stage, besides translating "Terence," and "Horace's Art of Poetry," with a considerable degree of elegance and fidelity.

COLMAN, George, the "Younger," was the son of the preceding, and was also designed for the profession of the law. Thems, however, proved an uncongenial companion, when compared with the charms of Thespis, and he commenced writing for the stage. On the demise of his father, George III. transferred the patent of the Haymarket Theatre to him. He produced a number of excellent plays and farces; among which may be mentioned, "John Bull," "Inkle and Yarico," "The Heir-at-Law," "Love laughs at Locksmiths," "The Iron Chest," etc., etc., and wrote the comic tales called "Broad Grins." He also published his own "Memoirs," up to the time of his undertaking the management of the Haymarket. b. in London, 1763; d. 1836.—George IV. appointed Colman exor of the yeoman guard, but he resigned this, and became lord chamberlain's examiner of plays, which office he retained till his death.

COLONNA, Prospero, kol-on-na, an Italian general, who, with Fabrizio, a relative, entered the service of Charles VIII., king of France, and assisted him in the conquest of Naples. They afterwards left him, and contributed to the recovery of that kingdom for the house of Aragon. Prospero, after distinguishing himself in many battles, was, in 1515, made prisoner at Villafranca. On regaining his liberty, he attacked the French with vigour, and having defeated them at the battle of Bicoesa, relieved Milan in 1522. b. 1452; d. 1523.

COLONNA, Vittoria, the daughter of Fabrizio Colonna, mentioned above, was married, in 1507, to the marquis of Pescara, and on his death, in 1525, she retired to a monastery. Her beauty, talents, and virtues have been celebrated by many distinguished contemporary Italians, particularly Ariosto, in the thirty-seventh canto of the "Orlando Furioso," and by the great painter and sculptor Michael Angelo. She was held generally in very high esteem, and was designated "the model of Italian matrons." She was a very elegant poetess, and her works, entitled "Rime Spirituali di Vittoria Colonna di Pescara," have been often reprinted, and are much and deservedly admired. b. at Marino, 1490; d. at Rome, 1547.

COLONNA, Pompeo, a Roman cardinal, who, although a churchman, was strongly imbued with a military disposition. After he became bishop of Rieti, he had a quarrel with a Spaniard, whom, on account of his profession, he dared not fight, and therefore revenged himself upon his own episcopal garments, by tearing them in pieces. On a false rumour of the death of Pope Julius II., in 1512, Colonna, with Savillo, a young nobleman, excited the Roman people to a revolt, and seized the Capitol, for which he was deprived of his preferments. He recovered the pope's favour afterwards, and Leo X. made him a cardinal. In 1526 he engaged in another conspiracy to surprise Rome, and to put the pope to death, which, however, was defeated, and he suffered deprivation. This occurrence was the occasion of the sack of Rome by the constable Bourbon. Colonna, however, had sufficient influence to obtain the liberty of the pope, who restored him to his rank. He afterwards became viceroys of Naples, and died in 1532. He wrote a poem, entitled "De Laudibus Mulebrum."

COLONNA, Marco Antonio, duke of Pagliano, served with such reputation in the famous battle of Lepanto, gained over the Turks in 1571, as to be honoured with a triumphal entry into Rome by the pope. He was made constable of Naples and viceroy of Sicily. d. 1594.

COLONNA, Fabio, an Italian philosopher, who made great progress in the languages, mathematics, law, and the fine arts; but applied himself principally to physic and botany. At the age of twenty-four he published an elegant botanical work, the plates of which he executed himself. In 1610 he issued another, which was not completed till 1616. He was the first who distinguished the petals of flowers by names distinct from the leaves, and used the method of arrangement afterwards adopted by Tournefort. He was also the inventor of a musical instrument, called a pentachordon. b. at Naples, about 1567; d. 1650.

COLUMBA, St., kol-um-ba, a native of Ireland, who founded the monastery of Iona, or Icolmkill. He went into Scotland about the year 563, after preaching 16 years in Ireland, and ultimately settled in the island of Iona, where he established a famous seminary. He died in 597, after having by his learning and excellent qualities acquired great influence, which he always exercised for beneficial purposes. He was subsequently canonized.

COLUMBUS, Christopher, kol-um'-bus, a celebrated Genoese navigator, whose origin was humble, and in whose life there is little of interest till 1470, when he settled at Lisbon, where his brother Bartholomew was employed as a maker of charts. Here Christopher married the daughter of an Italian naval commander, called Patrestrello, who had been employed in voyages of discovery. From the journals and charts of this seaman he acquired a considerable share of nautical knowledge, and traded, himself, several years to the Canary Islands, Madeira, the Azores, and the coast of Africa. Meanwhile, he began to entertain the idea of the existence of a new continent beyond the Atlantic Ocean. The more he considered the subject, the more he became confirmed in his opinion, when, communicating his plan to the republic of Genoa, it was rejected as extravagant. He next applied to John II., king of Portugal, who dishonourably sent other navigators to test the value of the scheme of Columbus, but who, despairing of its success, returned to Lisbon in disgust. The great Genoese was enraged at such treatment, and despatched his brother Bartholomew to Henry VII. of England; but, on the voyage, he was taken by pirates. In the mean time, Columbus, after many disappointments, obtained an audience of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain. These sovereigns received him favourably, and in 1492 granted him three vessels to prosecute discoveries in those regions which, it was generally believed, had no existence, save in his own imagination. The conditions stipulated between him and his royal employers were, "that if he made no discoveries he should have no reward; that if he did, he should be viceroy by land and admiral by sea, and have the tenths of the profits of all the countries discovered by him; and that these privileges should descend to his family." On August 3, 1492, Columbus and his little squadron set sail on their perilous voyage, from the bar of Saltes, near Palos, and, after some misgivings and many trials, on account of the superstitious terrors of his crew, landed October 12, on the island of Guanahani, and erected the Spanish flag. This island, one of the Bahamas, he called St. Salvador. Hence he sailed to Cuba, and afterwards to Hispaniola. Having discovered other islands, and taken possession of them in the name of their Catholic majesties, Columbus set sail for Europe on January 4, 1493, bringing with him some of the natives. On March 15 he arrived at Seville, and immediately went to Barcelona, where Ferdinand and Isabella received him under a canopy of cloth of gold, and made him sit beside them whilst they conferred on him several marks of favour. Columbus sailed on his second voyage from Cadiz, September 25, 1493, and discovered the Caribbean islands, Puerto Rico, and Jamaica. On his return he suffered great hardships from sickness and disaffection among his men. Nevertheless, he conducted himself manfully, and arrived at Cadiz, June 11, 1496. On his arrival he found that, during his absence, calumny had been doing its work against him; but he refuted all that had been alleged, and, on May 13, 1498, embarked on his third voyage with only six vessels. In this expedition he discovered the island of Trinidad, the mouths of the Orinoco, the coast of Paria, the Margarita and Cubagua islands, and, on his arrival at Hispaniola, found the colony which he had settled there in a state bordering on civil war. He succeeded in restoring peace; but some of the settlers, envious of him and his brother Bartholomew, whom he had appointed his lieutenant, sent home such accusations against them, that Queen Isabella revoked the appointment of Columbus, and sent out Francis de Bovadilla to take his place. This man, on his arrival, caused the brothers to be put in chains, and, in that condition, sent them to Europe. The captain of the ship in which Columbus was now a prisoner would have taken off his fetters; but he refused to be liberated, except in the presence of his sovereigns. "I will wear them till the king otherwise commands, and then I will preserve them as memorials of his gratitude;" an expression indicative of a mind by far too lofty to be in the power of kings to humiliate. All Spain felt, with indignation, the insult offered to so great a man. He was instantly set at liberty, and rewarded, instead of being punished, Ferdinand himself avowing shame at the transaction. Columbus, however, always preserved his fetters, and ordered that they should be buried with him. In 1502 he made another voyage, in which he traced the coast of Darien, thinking to find a passage to the East Indies, coasted Honduras, the Mosquito shore, Costa Rica, and Veragua. He returned to Spain in 1504, and found Queen Isabella dead, and the king once more prejudiced against him. Worn out in body and broken in spirit, he lingered out the short remainder of his existence in neglect, poverty, and pain. b. at Genoa, 1415-6; p. at Valladolid, 1506.—His remains were interred in the cathedral of Seville, where a monument was erected to his memory, bearing this inscription:—"To Castile and Leon, Columbus has given a new world." Yet this brave adventurer had not the honour of giving his name to the world he discovered; for that was enjoyed by Amerigo, or Americus Vesputius, a Florentine. This voyager, it is said, did not see the New World till he sailed with Ojeda, as a pilot, to the coast of Paria, in 1499.—Bartholomew Columbus died in 1514.—Diego, the son of Christopher, was ennobled, and obtained his father's honours and grants.—Ferdinand, another son, embraced the ecclesiastical state, and formed a rich library, which he left to the cathedral of Seville. He wrote the life of his father, and died about 1530.

Combe

COLUMELLA, Lucius Junius Moderatus, kol-u-mel'-la, a native of Gades (Cadiz, in Spain), who wrote twelve books on agriculture, of which the tenth, on gardening, is in verse. The style is elegant, and the work displays the genius of a naturalist and the labours of an accurate observer. Lived in the 1st century A.D.

COMBE, George, a distinguished Scotch phrenologist, educated for the legal profession, in which he practised for upwards of twenty years. Made a convert to the principles of Gall and Spurzheim, when about thirty years of age, he began to apply himself zealously to their further elucidation, and in 1819 published his "Essays on Phrenology." From that time he continued to expound the phenomena of mental organization, and in 1828 published "The Constitution of Man, in relation to External Objects." This work became extremely popular, and both in Britain and America enjoyed a large circulation. In 1833 appeared his lectures on "Popular Education," which he had previously delivered in various parts of Britain, and which have been translated into several continental languages. In 1838 he became a candidate for the chair of logic and metaphysics in the university of Edinburgh, but the honour was awarded to Sir William Hamilton. Subsequently, Mr. Combe made a tour through the United States, lecturing to distinguished audiences, and, at the same time, keeping himself before the public eye by the publication of several pamphlets. He also visited Germany, and in 1845 published "Notes on the New Reformation in Germany, &c.," and an essay on the "Relation between Religion and Science." In 1850 he edited the "Life and Correspondence" of his brother Andrew, and in 1855 produced a work entitled "Phrenology applied to Painting and Sculpture." These are his most prominent labours in literature and moral science; but he has written upon educational and other kindred subjects. n. at Edinburgh, 1788; n. near London, 1859.—

COMBE, Andrew, younger brother of the above, a medical practitioner, who became physician to the king of the Belgians. He wrote and published several excellent works on physiological science. A late biographer of Dr. Andrew Combe says—"His writings have done for the human body what those of Locke did for the mind. He explained the laws of physiology rather than the structure of organs, and was the first to apply the great principles of human physiology to the prevention of disease, and the prolongation of human life." His best works are—"Principles of Physiology applied to Health and Education;" "Physiology of Digestion;" "Physiological and Moral Management of Infancy." n. at Edinburgh, 1797; n. 1847.

COMBERMERE, Stapleton Cotton, Viscount, korn'-ber-meer, was the eldest son of Sir E. S. Cotton, M.P. for Cheshire, and in 1781 entered the army. Engaged, first in Flanders, next at the Cape of Good Hope, and then in India, he saw a good deal of service, when he returned to England, and accompanied the duke of Wellington to the Peninsula. Here he greatly distinguished himself, and in 1810 was appointed, under the duke, to the command of the allied forces. He continued actively engaged till the close of the war, and in 1817 was appointed governor of Barbadoes, with the command of the forces in the West Indies. This position he, in 1822, exchanged for the command of the British troops in India, and in 1825 distinguished himself at the siege and capture of the fortress of Bhurtpore. On the death of the duke of Wellington he became constable of the Tower of London, and lord-lieutenant of the Tower Hamlets. For his services in the Peninsula he had received a peerage, and for those in India he was created a viscount. In 1855 he became a field-marshal, and also held the appointment in the court as gold stick in waiting on her majesty Queen Victoria. n. 1773. n. 1865.

COMMERSON, Philibert, korn'-mair-sawing, a celebrated French botanist, who made a voyage round the world, and collected a vast variety of plants. He did not live long enough to describe his discoveries, but his collection and drawings were deposited in the Jardin des Plantes, at Paris. n. at Châtillon, Ain, 1727; n. at Mauritius 1773.—To him we are indebted for several beautiful flowers which came originally from China and the Moluccas.

COMINES, Philip de, korn'-d'-nes, a French statesman and historian, who was descended from a noble family, and became eminent at the court of Louis XI. He was first attached to Charles the Bold, of Burgundy, but, in 1472, transferred his services to Louis. After the death of this monarch, he joined himself to the party of the duke of Orleans, who afterwards became Louis XII., but was unfortunate in being imprisoned and having his property confiscated. Shortly after the accession of Louis XII., who did not please to remember the sacrifices he had made for him, he retired to the country, and passed the remainder of his days in writing his memoirs. n. at the Château de Comines, near Comines, 1445; n. at Argenton, in Poitou, 1509.—His "Memoirs of his Own Times" show a great knowledge of men and things, an acuteness of judgment in tracing circumstances to their causes, and are enriched with a variety of excellent observations. The best edition of the original is that of Fresnoy, 1747, 4 vols. 4to; and in English, the translation of Uvedale, with curious notes, in 2 vols. 8vo.

COMMONS, L. Aurelius Antoninus, korn'-modus, a Roman emperor, son of Marcus Aurelius, succeeded his father in 180. He was naturally depraved and licentious, committing the most terrible cruelties and crimes. Of great stature and strength, he would fight with the gladiators, and boasted of his dexterity in killing wild beasts in the amphitheatre. Poisoned by Martia, one of his concubines, whose death he had meditated, 192. n. 161.

COMNENUS. (See ALEXIS, ANNA, ISAAC, &c.)

COMPTON, Henry, korn'-ton, an English prelate, son of the earl of Northampton, who fell in the royal cause at the battle of Hopton Heath. Originally in the army, he entered into orders, and in 1674 was preferred to the bishopric of Oxford, and the year following, translated to London. He now had the charge of educating the princesses Mary and Anne, afterwards queens of England. James II., on the bishop's refusal to suspend Dr. Sharpe, removed him from his episcopal functions; but, before the Revolution, he was restored. On the landing of the prince of Orange, he conveyed the princess Anne from London to Nottingham, and exhibited great zeal in placing William and Mary on the throne, at whose coronation he officiated, instead of archbishop Sancroft. n. 1632; n. at Fulham, 1713.—This prelate was fond of botany, having the finest garden of exotics in England, and greatly assisted Ray, Plukenet, and other naturalists.

COMTE, Auguste, konte, a modern French speculative philosopher, who commenced his public life as a follower of Saint-simon, and, in 1820, prepared a work explanatory of the system of that enthusiast. He subsequently became mathematical professor at the Polytechnic School; but, on the accession of Louis Napoleon to the empire, he was deprived of that office. Between 1830 and 1842 he published, in six large volumes, his "Course of Positive Philosophy," the object of which was to show that the human mind passes through three successive stages in its meditations upon all subjects. The first the theological; the second, the metaphysical; and the third, the positive, in which the mind is supposed to have attained its great power of comprehending all things connected with those laws by which the universe is governed. His system, however, is too elaborate to be entered upon here. In 1843 he published a mathematical work, and in the following year, a "Discourse," intended to enforce the views of his larger work. M. Comte's theories, whatever may be their value, attracted a considerable number of ardent admirers, especially amongst the disciples of St. Simon and Fourier. At Paris a kind of institution was formed, of which he himself was the high priest, and of which all the members worked, with much activity, to spread the ideas of their master. These ideas were developed in a series of works, of which the first was his "Positive Philosophy." This was translated into English by Miss Martin au. B. at Montpellier, 1793; D. at Paris, 1857.

COMYUS, Sir John, kum'-i-us, author of a "Digest of the English Law," which he left in MS., but which was translated and published under the superintendence of his nephew in 1762-67, in five volumes, to which a supplementary one was added in 1776. The work has gone through several editions. Some other law works of his have also been published. Little is known of the particulars of his life; but he had, before his death in 1740, attained to the position of lord chief baron of the Exchequer. B. 1667.

CONCINO CONCINI, kon-che'-ne, called Marshal d'Ancre, went, in 1600, from Florence to France, with Mary de Medici, wife of Henry IV. After the death of that king, he obtained a marquise and some considerable appointments. At the same time, he was first minister of the young king, Louis XIII., over whom he exercised great influence. He, however, incurred the jealousy of the nobles, and at their instigation, Concini was assassinated, 1617.—His wife was afterwards condemned to death for the practice of sorcery, and their son declared, by the parliament, disennobled, and incapable of holding any estates in the kingdom.

CONDÉ, Louis, kon'-dai, the first prince of, a chief of the Huguenots, was the son of Charles of Bourbon, duke of Vendôme. He displayed great courage at the battle of St. Quentin; but, on the death of Henry II. of France, he became so discontented with the measures of the duke de Guise, that he joined the Huguenot party. He was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Dreux, in 1562, and slain in that of Jarnac, 1569; B. 1530.—The deeds of his son and grandson, Henry I. and Henry II., do not call for any special notice. The latter's greatest glory, according to Voltaire, was that he was the father of the great Condé.

CONDÉ, Louis II., prince of, known as the "Great Condé," was the son of Prince Henry II. of Condé, and was first known as duke d'Enghien. In early years he showed great military genius, and at twenty-two entirely defeated, in 1613, the Spanish at Rocroy, although very inferior to them in numbers. The following year he gained the battle of Friburg, and, in 1615, that of Nordlingen, in Germany. Less fortunate in Catalonia, he failed in his attempt to take Lerida, but, soon after, defeated the archduke Leopold at Lens, which led to the peace with Germany, in 1643. During the troubles of the Fronde, Condé, who had, at first, taken part with the court, afterwards sided against Mazarin. In 1650 he was arrested and deprived of his liberty for thirteen months. Set free, he hastened to avenge his wrongs, and, levying a body of troops, marched on Paris, but, after some successes, was beaten by Turenne, in the Faubourg St. Antoine. He then joined the Spaniards in the Netherlands, when, in 1659, the peace of the Pyrenees restored him to his country. War afterwards breaking out between France and Spain, he, in 1663, conquered Franche-Comté in three weeks, and in 1672 evinced great talents in the war with Holland. The hard-fought battle of Senef was his last exploit. His closing days he spent at Chantilly, enjoying the friendship of Boileau, Molière, and Racine. B. at Paris, 1621; D. 1696.—Bossuet delivered his funeral oration, which is considered a masterpiece of eloquence.

CONDÉ, Jose Antonio, a Spanish orientalist, who distinguished himself, in 1796, by his translations of some of the Greek minor poets, and in 1799 by a translation of "Al-Edrisi's Description of Spain," from the Arabic. He subsequently became a member of the Spanish Academy, and superintended, in conjunction with two other litterateurs, the continuation of the collection of early Castilian poetry by Sanchez. When the French invaded his country, he was appointed by Joseph Bonaparte chief librarian of the Madrid library. After the French were expelled from the Peninsula, he went to Paris, where he resided for some years, and returned to Spain only to pass the remainder of his days in obscurity, neglect, and poverty. B. at Paraleja, in the province of Cuenca, 1765; D. at Madrid, 1820.

CONDÉE, Josiah, kon'-der, was the son of a bookseller, which trade he himself followed, and became the proprietor and editor of the "Eclectic Review." In 1810 he retired from the bookselling business, but continued to manage the Review till 1837. In 1824 his "Modern Traveller" was commenced, and extended to thirty-three volumes. He continued producing other works of a useful and some of a religious tendency, till 1832, when, in the interest of the dissenters, he undertook the editorship of the "Patriot" newspaper. In this situation he continued for twenty-three years, occasionally publishing pamphlets on passing topics, and works of greater importance. Amongst these latter may be noticed, "An Analytical and Comparative View of all Religions;" and "The Harmony of History with Prophecy." B. in London, 1789; D. 1855.

CONDILLAC, Etienne Bonnot de, kon-de'-yak, a distinguished French metaphysician, whose admiration of the English philosopher, John Locke, led him, in 1746, to publish his "Essay on Human Perceptions," which in 1749 he followed by his "Treatise on Systems." The former was designed to advance the opinions of Locke, and the latter to oppose the abstract theories of Leibnitz and Spinoza, as being opposed to ideas received from experience. His third work was a "Treatise on the Sensations," which is considered his masterpiece, and in which his philosophical system is fully unfolded. After the publication of these works, he was appointed tutor to the prince of Parma, and in this situation, published his "Course of Studies," which he divides into the arts of writing, reasoning, and thinking, followed by a general history of men and empires. When he had finished the education of his royal pupil, he resigned himself once more to philosophical meditations, in which he passed the remainder of his days. Previous to his death, however, he published a work on "Logia." B. at Grenoble, 1715; D. 1790.—However ingenious Condillac may be, he is to be considered neither a faithful nor a profound expounder of the views of Locke. His system may be characterized as one of nearly absolute sensation, whilst that of Locke unites sensation with reflection.

CONDORCET, John Anthony Nicholas Caritat, marquis of, kon-dor-sai, a French philosopher, educated at the college of Navarre, where he soon distinguished himself as a geometer. In 1765 he published his first work, "On the Integral Calculus," which was received with approbation by the Academy of Sciences. In 1767 he published his treatise, "Of the Problem of Three Bodies;" and the year following his "Analytical Essays." In 1769 he was chosen member of the academy, and in 1773 secretary, in which capacity he distinguished himself by the elegance of his eulogies on those academicians who had died since 1699. His "Life of Turgot" is reckoned an admirable piece of biography; but that of Voltaire, of whom he was an original disciple, is flattering beyond bounds. On the approach of the Revolution, he endeavoured, by his writings, to extend its principles, and, in 1791, became a member of the National Assembly, and of the Jacobin club. He offered many insults to King Louis in his misfortunes, though he opposed his being brought to trial. When Robespierre arrived at power, Condorcet was denounced as a Girondist, and concealed himself for some time in the house of Madame Verney. Fearing, however, that she might suffer on his account, he voluntarily quitted her roof, and became a houseless wanderer in the country around Paris, with nowhere to lay his head. At last the necessities of hunger drove him into a small inn at the village of Clunart, where he was taken and committed to prison. On the following morning he was found dead in his cell, having terminated his existence by taking poison, which, to save himself from the ignominy of the scaffold, he always carried about with him. b. near Nion, in Dauphiny, 1743; p. in the prison of Bourg-la-Reine, 1794. —He left "A Sketch of the Progress of the Human Mind," a "Tract on Calculation," and an "Elementary Treatise on Arithmetic." He had a lofty mind, and endeavoured to make his philosophy applicable to the happiness of his fellow-men, and influential in ameliorating the severities of social institutions. His manners were cold, but his heart was warm. D'Alembert said of him, that he was a volcano covered with snow.

CONFUCIUS, or KOONG-FU-TSE, kon-fu'-sho-us, a Chinese philosopher, whose extraordinary precocity enabled him to be a mandarin in the third year of his age. He lost his father before this; but he had a learned man for his grandfather, who bestowed great pains upon him, and early brought his understanding to maturity. When he was 19 he took a wife, by whom he had a son, who died at the age of 60, and left a son called Tson-tse, whose character stood high for wisdom and virtue. At the age of 23 he formed the project of a general reformation in the kingdom of Loo, and carried it out with success. At that time, however, the Chinese empire was not consolidated under one sovereign, but seems to have been divided into several separate kingdoms. Notwithstanding the respect which the king and the people of Loo had for the great wisdom of Confucius, he was driven from the country, and became an outcast and a wanderer. He continued, however, to disseminate his doctrines, passing through several states, endeavouring to bring mankind to wisdom and happiness. His followers became numerous, and of them he selected ten as his chosen disciples, to whom he imparted the treasures of wisdom. These assisted in spreading his tenets, until they were almost universally adopted by the people, when they became the great authority of Chinese politics and morals. Lived about the 6th century b.c.—When the king of Loo was informed of the death of the great philosopher, he burst into tears and said, "that Heaven, being displeased with him, had taken away Confucius." From that time his memory was cherished as that of a saint, and several magnificent structures were raised to his honour. His books are regarded by the Chinese as the fountain of wisdom; and, according to all authorities, they deserve the praise bestowed upon them, as far as regards a pure morality. Their instructions are cherished not only by the Chinese, but by the Cochinchinese and the Coreans, and other people, forming, altogether, perhaps not less than nearly half the population of Asia. His descendants are held in veneration, and enjoy extra privileges, at this day.

CONGLETON, Henry Brooke Parnell, Lord, kon-gel-ton, a distinguished politician of the advanced Whig or Liberal party, was the son of Sir John Parnell, chancellor of the Irish Exchequer, and Letitia Charlotte, daughter of Sir Arthur Brooke, of Colebrooke, Fernanagh. He was also connected with the Portarlington family, having, in 1801, married the daughter of the first earl of Portarlington. Lord de Vesci was his cousin, being the son of his mother's sister. With such connexions, it was no difficult matter for Mr. Parnell to obtain a seat in Parliament. Accordingly he was returned, in 1802, for the borough of Portarlington, but soon resigned, and remained out of Parliament till 1806, when he was elected for Queen's County; and, though he had to encounter severe contests with the Tory party, he retained the seat till 1832, when he declined a contest with the then powerful repeal party. In 1833, he was returned for Dundee, in Scotland, which he continued to represent till 1841, when he was elevated to the House of Peers, by the title of Lord Congleton of Congleton, county of Chester. He had previously (in 1812) succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of his elder brother; and held at different periods under the Whig government the offices of lord of the Irish Treasury (1808); Secretary at War (1830); and Paymaster of the Forces (1835-1841). As Sir Henry Parnell (by which name he is best known) he took an active share in the debates in the House of Commons; and made the motion on the Civil List which upset the ministry of the Duke of Wellington in 1830. Lord Congleton published a number of pamphlets, &c., on subjects connected with currency, banking, trade, the penal laws against the Irish Catholics, financial reform, roads, &c. b. 1776; committed suicide while labouring under aberration of mind, in 1842.

CONGREVE, William, kon-greev, an English dramatic poet, brought up in Ireland, and educated at Trinity College, Dublin; after which he entered of the Middle Temple, but never followed the law. His first literary production was a romance called "Incognita, or Love and Duty reconciled," written at the age of seventeen. In 1693 appeared his comedy of the "Old Bachelor," which was received with great applause at Drury Lane, and drew from Dryden the remark that he had never seen such a first play. It was the means of recommending him to the earl of Halifax, who made him a commissioner of the Hackney-coach office. His next performance was the "Double Decker;" and in 1695 he brought out his "Love for Love," and two years afterwards his "Mourning Bride." His next piece was "The Way of the World," which was so ill received, that it disgusted him with the stage, and determined him no longer to write for it. n. at Bardsa, near Leeds, Yorkshire, 1670; p. in London, 1729.—His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. Besides the above pieces, he wrote the "Judgment of Paris," a masque; "Semele," an opera; and some poems. He left his fortune to Henrietta, duchess of Marlborough.

CONGREVE, Sir William, Baronet, entered the army, and in 1816 was made a lieutenant-colonel, when he retired from the service. In 1808 he invented the Congreve rocket, for which he received from the emperor of Russia the decoration of St. Anne, for the effects it produced at the battle of Lelispic, in 1813. It proved similarly effective at Waterloo; but before either of these battles, it was employed by Lord Cochrane in his attack on the French fleet in the Basque Roads and at Walcheren. It is now in universal use in an improved form. Sir William sat in parliament for various constituencies, and was inspector of the royal laboratory at Woolwich. In 1826 he engaged in some mining transactions, which resulted in a suit in chancery and a decision against him for fraud. This was on May 3, 1823, when Sir William hastened to Toulouse, where, eleven days afterwards, he died. n. in Middlesex, 1772.

CONON, ko'-non, a famous general of Athens, who became governor of all the islands of the Athenians, and was defeated in a naval battle by Lysander, near Egospotamos. He voluntarily went into banishment to Evagoras, king of Cyprus, and afterwards to Artaxerxes, king of Persia, by whose assistance he delivered his country from the Spartan yoke. He defeated the Spartans near Cnidus, in an engagement where Pisander, the enemy's admiral, was killed. By his means the Athenians fortified their city with a strong wall. n. about 388 B.C.

CONRAD I., count of Franconia, kon'-rad, was elected emperor of Germany in 911. p. 918.

CONRAD II., son of Herman, duke of Franconia, was elected emperor of Germany in 1024. In 1027 he was crowned at Rome, as emperor of the East. He also obtained, in 1033, the kingdom of Burgundy by the will of King Rodolphus III. p. 1039.

CONRAD III., son of Frederick, duke of Suabia, was elected emperor of Germany in 1138. After a long war with the duke of Saxony and Bavaria, he, in 1147, set out with Louis VII. of France for the Holy Land, laying siege unsuccessfully to Damascus. p. 1093; p. 1152.

CONRAD IV. was elected emperor of Germany after the death of his father, Frederick II., in 1250. Pope Innocent IV., who claimed the right of disposing of the crown, nominated William of Holland, and preached a crusade against Conrad. Conrad thereupon marched into Italy, took Naples, Capua, and other places, but died in the midst of his victories, 1254.

CONRADIN, or CONRADINO, kon-rä'-in, was 290

the son of Conrad IV., and the acknowledged duke of Suabia; but his inheritance of Sicily and Apulia passed away from him finally by the battle of La Grandella, in 1265. In 1267, in his sixteenth year, Conradin took the field at the head of 1000 men, and after various successes, met Charles of Anjou at Tagliacozzo, where he was defeated, in 1268. He fled from the field, and, after passing through a series of misfortunes, not uncommon to crowned heads who have been unsuccessful in the field, he was caught and delivered into the hands of Charles for a sum of money. He was taken to Naples, and, with Frederick of Austria and several of his followers, condemned to suffer on the scaffold. Beheaded 1268.—There is a story about Conradin's throwing from the scaffold a glove to be given to Peter of Aragon, the husband of Constance, the daughter of Manfred, who first held his inheritance of Sicily and Apulia, and who fell at La Grandella. It rests, however, on doubtful authority. The mother of Conradin, when she heard of her son's capture, hastened from Germany to ransom him. She, however, was too late; when she applied the money to the founding of the great convent del Carmine, where, behind the great altar, the remains of Conradin and Frederick were deposited.

CONSCIENCE, Henri, kon'-shens, or kon'-shai, one of the most distinguished fiction writers of the Netherlands, was the son of a dealer in old iron, who determinedly opposed the literary bent of his son's mind. Opposition, however, was of no avail, and Henri, after serving some years in the army, obtained the patronage of King Leopold, and soon made himself a name famous not only in his own country, but throughout Europe. The scenes of his country's history, and the manners and mode of life of the people, are the themes Conscience delighted to portray. n. at Antwerp, 1812.

CONSTABLE, John, kun'-sta-bel, an eminent English artist, who began life as a miller with his father, but whose genius early led him into a very different pursuit. Having discovered a decided taste for drawing, he received much encouragement from Sir George Beaumont, and took instructions from R. R. Reinagle, R.A. Landscape-painting became his profession, and in 1795 he went to London, but does not seem to have received much encouragement. In 1799 he again visited the metropolis, and in 1800 was admitted a student in the Royal Academy. Previous to this he had chiefly lived in Suffolk. He now became a steady exhibitor at the Royal Academy, and gradually worked himself into notice and fame. It was not, however, till 1829 that his merits received the acknowledgment they had long deserved. In that year he was elected a Royal Academician. n. at East Bergholt, Suffolk, 1776; p. at Hampstead, 1837.—Constable made nature his study, and he painted many admirable pictures. Among these may be mentioned his "Cornfield" and his "Valley Farm." When yet a young man, he was asked by his patron, Sir George Beaumont, what style he intended to adopt. "None but God Almighty's," Sir George," was the reply. He could not have adopted a better. "I love," he used to say, "every stile and stump and lane in the village; and as long as I am able to hold a brush, I shall never cease to paint them." (See "Life," by Leslie, London, 1842.)

of his connexion with Sir Walter Scott and the "Edinburgh Review." p. 1775; p. 1827.

CONSTANT, Henri Benjamin, kon'-stang, a distinguished French writer and statesman, studied English literature at Oxford, Scotch philosophy at Edinburgh, and German learning at Erlangen, and among his personal friends were all the great thinkers of the day—Kant, Goethe, Wieland, Gibbon, Mackintosh, &c. He was republican in his politics, but subsequently supported the constitutional monarchy, though always steadily maintaining the public liberties. Between 1818 and 1830, he was prominent in the chambers and elsewhere in discussing all great events. He was the founder of the "Constitutionnel" newspaper, which, under his auspices, was singularly successful. Though the recipient of favours from Louis Philippe, he carefully guarded against the idea that he thereby forfeited his independence of action, telling the king on one occasion that if the government made blunders, he would be the first to expose them notwithstanding his majesty's favours; to which the royal reply was, that "He expected and desired nothing else." Constant's great work, and his last, was "Religion, considered as regarded its Service, its Forms, and its Developments." He was author of several books besides. p. at Lausanne, 1767; p. at Paris, Dec. 1830, and was buried in the Pantheon.

CONSTANTINE, kon'-stan-tine, a name very common to the emperors of the East, the most celebrated of whom was Flavius Valerius, the son of Constantius, and surnamed "the Great" from the grandeur of his exploits. He conquered Licinius, his brother-in-law and colleague on the throne, and obliged him to lay aside the imperial power. It is said that, as he was going to fight against Maxentius, one of his rivals, he saw a cross in the sky, with this inscription, en toutō nika,—in hoc vince. This was about the year 312, when he became a convert to Christianity, and obtained an easy victory, ever after adopting and using a cross as his standard. He soon rose to be sole emperor, and began to reform the state. He prohibited nocturnal assemblies, and abolished many of the obscenities of paganism. In 321 he ordered the observance of the Sunday, and abstinence from work on that day; caused the Christian churches which war had destroyed to be rebuilt, and in 325 assembled the first universal council at Nicæa; abolished the consulting of oracles, and the fights of gladiators; but in 326, upon a false accusation, caused his son Crispus to be beheaded for attempting to seduce Fausta, his own step-mother. She herself, however, was afterwards put to death. In 328 he founded a city where Byzantium formerly stood, and called it after his own name, Constantinopolis. Here he transported part of the Roman senate; and, by keeping his court in it, raised it to be the rival of Rome in population and magnificence. From that time the two imperial capitals began to look upon each other with an eye of envy; and soon after the age of Constantine, a separation was made of the two empires, and Rome was called the capital of the western, and Constantinopolis the capital of the eastern. p. 274; p. at Nicomedia, 337. This emperor has been distinguished for personal courage, for the protection he extended to it, but the murder of his son Crispus has been deservedly censured. His remains were carried to Constantinople, where they were sumptuously interred. He was placed by the senate of Rome among the gods, and by the Christians of the East, among the saints. His festival is celebrated on the 21st of May by the Greek, Russian, and Coptic churches. He left three sons, Constantinus, Constans, and Constantius, among whom he divided his empire. The other distinguished emperors of this name are the following:—

CONSTANTINE II., called the "Younger," eldest son of the above, received, as his share of the empire, on the death of his father, Gaul, Spain, and Great Britain. Desirous, however, of possessing himself of the territory of his brother Constans, he invaded Italy, but was defeated, and killed near Aquileia, 340.

CONSTANTINE III., surnamed Pogonatus, or the "Bearded," who was the 10th emperor of the East, mounted the throne in 663, with his two brothers, Tiberius and Heraclius, on the death of their father, Constans II. He waged war successfully against the Saracens, but rendered himself odious by the murder of his two brothers, and died 665.—It was under this prince that the "Greek fire" was first employed.

CONSTANTINE IV., the 25th emperor of the East, succeeded his father, Leo the Isaurian, in 741. He sided with the Iconoclasts, who hurled down the images of the saints, and persecuted the followers of the Romish church. p. of the plague, in an expedition against the Bulgarians, 775.—He was surnamed Copronymus.

CONSTANTINE V., the 30th emperor of the East, succeeded his father, Leo IV., in 780, his mother Irene being regent. She at length took complete possession of the throne, and was cruel enough to put out the eyes of her younger son, who died 797. p. 770.—(See IRENE.)

CONSTANTINE VI., who was surnamed Porphyrogenitus, emperor of the East, son of Leo the Wise, mounted the throne in 911, at the age of six, under the regency of his mother Zoe. He was deposed in 919 by Romanus I., surnamed Lecapenus, but regained the throne in 945. He continued to reign without any associate in the imperial power until 959, when he was poisoned by his daughter Theophania at the instigation of her brother Romanus, who succeeded him.

CONSTANTINE VII., the third son of Romanus I., reigned with his father and his two brothers, from 919 to 945, during the time that Porphyrogenitus was deposed.

CONSTANTINE VIII., second son of Romanus I., succeeded John Zimisces, and was proclaimed emperor of the East, with his brother, Basilus II., who held the principal authority till 1025, when he died. Constantine was after that sole emperor. p. 1028. (See BASILUS II.)

CONSTANTINE IX., who was surnamed the "Gladiator," obtained the empire in 1042, having married the empress Zoe, widow of Romanus III. This prince is known alone for his debaucheries. He allowed the Turks to increase their territories at his expense, and to establish themselves in Persia. p. 1000; p. 1054.

CONSTANTINE X., who was surnamed Duca, succeeded, in 1059, Isaac Comnenus, who had adopted him. In his reign the Scythians ravaged the empire, and some cities were destroyed by earthquakes. p. 1067.

CONSTANTINE XI., a son of the preceding, who was associated with his brother Michael VII. on the throne of the Eastern empire. He ceased to reign in 1078, when Constantine was taken by Nicephorus

CONSTANTINE XII., (Palæologus), the last emperor of the East, the son of Manuel II., succeeded his brother John Palæologus II., 1448. In 1453, Mahomet II. laid siege to Constantinople with a formidable army. Constantine defended the city bravely, but, abandoned by the princes of Christendom, he was unable to hold the place, and died, fighting like a hero, in the breach, 1453. His death was followed by the capture and pillage of Constantinople, which Mahomet made the capital of the Ottoman empire.

CONSTANTINE, Flavius Julius, an usurper, who was proclaimed, in 407, although a private soldier, emperor of the West, by the Roman soldiery in Great Britain, and for some time sustained his dignity by the victories he won. He fixed his court at Arles, in France; but the emperor Honorius laid siege to this place, forced him to surrender, and put him to death, 411.—About this time Arcadius, the brother of Honorius, was emperor of the East.

CONSTANTINE, Paulovitch, the second son of the emperor Paul of Russia. The name of Constantine was given him at baptism, in the hope that he would one day reign at Constantinople. This, however, was not destined to come to pass, for, from some unaccountable cause, he took a disgust at the honour designed for him, and at the age of seventeen, married a sister of the duchess of Kent, with whom, however, he did not live happily. In four years they parted by mutual consent. In 1799 he fought under Suwarrow in the Italian campaign, and distinguished himself by his personal bravery, though not by his capacity for command. In 1805 he headed the reserve on the field of Austerlitz, where he withstood the fierce and energetic charges of Bernadotte, and, when the battle was lost, retreated in good order. Throughout the remainder of the wars with Napoleon I. he preserved the character of a brave and resolute soldier. At the close of the war he became generalissimo of Poland, but had little sympathy with the nation over whose destinies he held the military power. In 1820 he procured a divorce from his wife, and married a beautiful Polish lady; and in 1825 the emperor Alexander died at Taganrog. He was the presumptive heir to the throne, and when the news of the death of the emperor reached St. Petersburg, Nicholas called the council of the empire together, and required them to take the oath of allegiance to his brother, who had now become viceroy of Poland. The council, however, produced a paper in which Constantine renounced his claim to the throne, and desired that it might be transferred to the next heir, who was the grand-duke Nicholas, and who, consequently, ascended the throne. Constantine was present at the coronation of his brother in Moscow, after which he returned to his government of Poland at Warsaw. Here he continued to reside till 1830, when an insurrection of the brave-spirited Poles took place, and he was driven from his palace of the Belvedere, and forced to quit Poland. War now commenced between the Russians and the Poles; but the best days of Constantine had passed. a. at St. Petersburg, 1799; d. of cholera, at Witepsk, 1831. (See NICHOLAS.)

CONSTANTINE, Pope, was elected to the papacy in 708. p. 715.—There was also an anti-pope of this name, who usurped the holy office in 767.

CONSTANTINE, Nicholasievich, the second son of the emperor Nicholas of Russia, was designed for the navy, and in 1831, when only four years of age, was declared admiral of the fleet. With increasing years he became more and more imbued with a desire to excel in his profession, and received nautical instructions from Admiral Lütke, a seaman as well as a man of science. In 1845 he paid a visit to Constantinople, being the first imperial prince of Russia that had done so; and in 1847 he visited England with Admiral Lütke, as commander of the Inggermanland, on his way to a voyage up the Mediterranean to visit his mother, then an invalid at Palermo. Whilst in England, on this occasion, he left a very favourable impression, being of a lively disposition, and speaking English as well as French with great fluency. In the war of 1854-56 he had the defence of the Baltic intrusted to his care, in conjunction with Admiral Lütke. Whilst engaged in this duty, however, he scarcely sustained his reputation for spirit, seeing that the Russian fleet did all that it could to avoid a contest with the British and French fleets, even in what might be called the duke's native seas. In 1859 he paid another visit to England, where he made an inspection of its great naval arsenal at Portsmouth, the Great Eastern steam-ship, and many public works. p. 1827.

CONSTANTIUS I., kon-stan'-she-us, a Roman emperor, was adopted, in 292, by Maximian, and became emperor in 305. He reduced the Britons to subjection, who had risen against the Romans, and died at York, 306.—He was the father of Constantine the Great.

CONSTANTIUS II., was the second son of Constantine the Great, and had, for his share of the empire, the East and Greece. His brothers having died in the West, he, after defeating Magnentius and Decentius, became, in 353, sole possessor of the empire. p. on his march against the emperor Julian, who had been proclaimed by the soldiery, 361.

CONYBEARE, John, D.D., kon'-e-beer, bishop of Bristol, to which see he was elevated in 1750, was the author of a "Defence of Revealed Religion," written in reply to Tindall's "Christianity as old as the Creation." p. 1692; p. 1755.

CONYBEARE, Very Reverend William Daniel, was distinguished as a geologist, and was one of the earliest promoters of the Geological Society. He discovered the antediluvian monster called Plesiosaurus, for which he was highly complimented by Cuvier. He also directed his attention to the coal-fields of several districts, and pointed out many facts in their physical geography, which enabled practical adventurers proceed upon more certain data in making their mineralogical discoveries. In 1819 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and became dean of Llandaff in 1845. p. in London, 1787; p. 1857.

COOK, James, Captain, hook, a celebrated navigator, who, at an early age, was apprenticed to a shopkeeper at Staithes, Yorkshire, but being inclined to the sea, his master gave up his indentures, when he bound himself to a Mr. Walker, a shipowner in the coal trade at Whitby. He served nearly seven years in this line, after which he became mate in the same employ. On the breaking out of the war, in 1755, he entered on board the Eagle man of war, and in 1769, in the capacity of master of the Mercury sloop of war, was at the reduction of Quebec by Wolfe. While on that station, he was employed in taking the soundings of the river St. Lawrence, and, afterwards, was engaged in making a chart of the same river, which he executed with great accuracy. He was next with Lord Colvil as master, in the Northumberland man of war, and was at the retaking of Newfoundland, of which coast he made a survey. On his return to England, in 1762, he married a respectable young woman at Barking, in Essex, and in 1764, when Sir Hugh Palliser was appointed governor of Newfoundland, Cook became marine surveyor of that coast and of Labrador. The manner in which he performed his duties in this situation was the principal cause of his being chosen to conduct an expedition for astronomical and geographical purposes into the South Pacific Ocean. Accordingly, with the rank of lieutenant, he entered on board the Endeavour, and set sail in August, 1768. He was accompanied by Mr. Green, as astronomer, Sir Joseph Banks, and Dr. Solander, and arrived at Otaheite, where the transit of Venus was observed, and where he remained till the 13th of July, 1769, when he resumed his voyage, and discovered a number of islands, to which he gave the name of Society Islands. On October 6th he reached New Zealand, which he circumnavigated. He then visited New Holland and New Guinea, and the description he gave of these new regions caused the settlement of Botany Bay, so long known as a penal colony. He returned to England in June, 1771, and was, shortly afterwards, appointed a commander in the navy. An account of this voyage was published from the captain's journals and other documents, by Dr. Hawkesworth. The existence of a southern continent being still an undecided question, in order, if possible, to ascertain that point, Captain Cook was employed in another voyage, and sailed with two ships, the Resolution, commanded by himself, and the Adventure, by Captain Furneaux, in the July of the following year. In this voyage they explored the southern hemisphere as high as latitude $71^{\circ} 10'$, and, after making many additions to our geographical knowledge, but without attaining the main object, he arrived safe at Spithead in July, 1774, having lost only one man out of 118. He was now raised to the rank of post-captain, and appointed to a post in Greenwich Hospital. The Admiralty having resolved to determine the disputed question as to there being a northern communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, Captain Cook volunteered his services for the enterprise, and in the July of 1776 sailed from Plymouth in the Resolution. After sailing as high as lat. $70^{\circ} 41' N.$, the ships were obliged to shift their course to the south, and in November 1778, reached the Sandwich Islands to pass the winter. Here Captain Cook was slain in a quarrel with the natives, at Owhyhee, the largest of the Sandwich Islands, February, 1779. a. at Marton, Yorkshire, 1728.

COOK, George, D.D., an eminent Scottish divine, was the son of John Cook, professor of moral philosophy in the university of St. Andrews, and after going through the usual curriculum required from divinity students by the Scotch church, was licensed to preach the gospel in 1796, and was ordained minister of the parish of Laurencekirk, Kincardineshire, in the same year. Here he remained till 1833, when he was nominated to fill the chair at St. Andrews formerly occupied by his father. Dr.

Cooper

Cook espoused the views of the moderate party in the Scottish church establishment, of which he was for many years the recognised leader. He was an able and voluminous writer on divinity, church history, &c. b. 1793; d. 1845.

COOKS, Benjamin, an eminent composer, who was a pupil of Dr. Pepusch. The university of Cambridge conferred on him the degree of Doctor in Music in 1777. He became organist of St. Martin-in-the-Fields in 1782. He was the author of "Hark! the lark," and several well-known glees and catches. b. 1739; d. 1791.

COOKE, George Frederick, an English actor, who was bred to the trade of a printer, at Berwick-upon-Tweed; but imbibing a passion for the stage, made his first public appearance at Brentford, in the character of Dumont, in "Jane Shore." In 1778 he appeared in London, but was not successful. After an absence of twenty-two years, however, he reappeared in the character of Richard III., at Covent Garden, with the most complete success. He continued for a number of years to perform leading parts in the drama, until, in 1810, he sailed for New York. Here violent excesses in drinking, to which he had long given way, proved too much even for his constitution, which had been one of the most powerful, and he died in September, 1812. a. at Westminster, 1755.—Edmund Kean, his great successor in tragedy, during one of his visits to America, had a monument erected over Cooke's grave.

COOLEY, Thomas, kool'-ai, architect of the Royal Exchange and Newgate Prison, Dublin, the former of which, though of but moderate size, is considered one of the finest, most elegant, and at the same time most convenient, public buildings of the kind in existence. He also commenced the erection of the noble pile, known as the "Four Courts," in the same city; but only lived to complete the west wing, the remainder having been executed by Gandon, but with some variations from the original plans. b. 1740; d. 1784.

COOPER, Sir Astley, koop'-er, a distinguished surgeon and anatomist, who rose to the summit of his profession, and in 1820 was called in to attend George IV., and removed a tumour from the royal head. In the same year he received a baronetcy, which, it was stipulated, was to descend to his adopted son and nephew Astley Cooper, he himself being without a son. In 1823 he was elected one of the court of examiners of the College of Surgeons, and in 1827 president of the college. In 1828 he became sergeant-surgeon to the king, and in 1830 vice-president of the Royal Society. In 1834 he received from Oxford the honorary degree of doctor of civil law, and subsequently visited Edinburgh, where the university made him an LL.D., and the freedom of the city was voted to him. Old age and ill-health had, with all his honours, now gathered upon him, and in 1840 he was struck with an illness which shortly afterwards carried him off. b. at Brooke, Norfolk, 1768; d. in London, 1841.—A statue by Baily was erected to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral. (See Life, by Bransby B. Cooper.)

COOPER, Samuel, a celebrated English painter, who excelled in miniature portraits, inasmuch that Louis XIV. of France offered £150 for his picture of Oliver Cromwell. He was called "Vandyck in Little." b. in London, 1699; d. in London, 1672, and was buried in old St. Pancras church, where his epitaph, in Latin, may be seen, calling him the Apelles of his age. His wife was the sister of the poet Pope's mother.—He had a brother, Alexander Cooper, who became painter to Queen Christina of Sweden.

COOPER, James Fenimore, a distinguished American novelist, whose father was a judge in the state of New York. After passing through Yale College, he, in 1805, entered the navy as a midshipman, and for six years followed the sea, when he retired and got married. He now took up his abode in Cooperstown, a village founded by his father, on Lake Otsego, in Western New York. It was not, however, till 1821 that Mr. Cooper ventured to appear as an author. Then he produced his "Precaution," which was not well received; but which, being shortly afterwards succeeded by his "Spy," it may be presumed gave him courage to proceed in the style of novel-writing. This second production was a decided success, and led the way to a long list of fictions, which it would occupy a considerable space even to name. Among them we may specify his "Pioneers," and his "Pilot," "The Last of the Mohicans," "Lionel Lincoln," "The Red Rover," and "The Water-witch," as sufficiently indicating the characteristics of his genius. b. at Burlington, New Jersey, 1789; d. at Cooperstown, 1851.—Cooper wrote in other paths besides those of the imagination. He produced "Lives of Distinguished American Naval Officers," "Sketches of Switzerland," "Gleanings in Europe," and several other works. Many of his stories have been translated both into German and French; and it is also affirmed that some of them are to be found even in one or more of the Oriental tongues.

COOPER, Thomas Sydney, began life as a scene-painter in the theatre at Canterbury, and, in 1823, went to London to enter the Royal Academy; but he was forced to return to the former town, and there he remained, giving instructions in drawing, till 1827. In that year he went to Holland, and there, under the animal-painter Verbeeckhoven, made that particular branch of art the subject of his ardent study. In 1831 he returned to England, and adopted animal-painting as his special branch. In 1833 he exhibited his first picture in the gallery of the Society of British Artists, and from that time he steadily advanced in fame and fortune. In 1845 he was chosen an associate of the Royal Academy, and may be pronounced one of the finest cattle-painters England has produced. b. at Canterbury, 1808.

COOTE, Sir Eyre, koot, an English general, who entered the army at an early age, and fought against the followers of Charles Stuart in 1745. In 1754 he went to India, where he distinguished himself in many important actions, particularly at the siege of Pondicherry. On account of his conduct there, the directors of the Hon. East India Company presented him with a diamond-hilted sword. In 1769 he was made commander-in-chief of the Company's forces; but quitted Madras at the end of the following year, and returned to England, where he was appointed governor of Fort St. George, and made knight of the Bath. In 1781 he proceeded again to India as commander-in-chief, and, at the head of 10,000 men, defeated Hyder Ali, whose forces numbered 150,000. b. in Ireland, 1728; d. at Madras, in 1783.—There is a fine monument to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

COPE, Sir John, kope, an English general, best known in connexion with the total defeat the royal army under his command sustained from the rebels under Prince Charles Edward Stuart, at Prestonpans, near Edinburgh, on September 21, 1745. Cope allowed himself to be completely surprised by the Highlanders, and, according to popular tradition, rather prematurely quitted the field, never drawing rein till he reached Berwick-upon-Tweed, where he was the first to announce his own defeat. His conduct on the occasion was mercilessly, and perhaps somewhat unfairly, ridiculed by the Jacobite writers of the time, particularly in the song beginning,

"Hey, Johnny Cope, are ye waling yet?"

COPE, Charles West, R.A., an English artist, who, in 1843, was one of the three successful competitors for the prizes offered by the Royal Commission of the Fine Arts in cartoons. His subject was "The First Trial by Jury." The fresco competition of the following year brought him forward with "The Meeting of Jacob and Rachel," which caused him to be selected to paint one of the six frescoes for the House of Lords. The subject which he chose for this was "Edward III. conferring the Order of the Garter on the Black Prince." For the same building he afterwards executed "Prince Henry's Submission to the Law," and "Griselda's First Trial," deemed his masterpiece in fresco. In 1843 he was elected an A.R.A., and in 1848 a R.A. He was a frequent exhibitor at the Royal Academy, and, both in imaginative and historical painting, reached a high standard of excellence. His works are numerous; among which the principal are—"The Last Days of Cardinal Wolsey," painted for Prince Albert; "Lear and Cordelia;" "Othello relating his Adventures;" and "The Children of Charles I. in Carisbrook Castle." b. at Leeds, 1811.

COPERNICUS, COPERNIK, or ZEPERNIC, as he has been differently called, Nicholas, ko-per-ni-kus, was a famous Prussian astronomer, whose family was noble, and whose uncle was bishop of Warmia. He was educated at Cracow, where he became a doctor of medicine. He afterwards went to Italy, and in 1500 obtained a professorship of mathematics at Rome. He subsequently returned to his native country, where he became a canon in the church of Frauenburg. Here he passed the remainder of his days a quiet and grave man, deeply immersed in astronomical researches, whilst healing the poor by his medical knowledge, and comforting them by his ecclesiastical duties. The result of his solitary vigils appeared in his great work entitled "De Revolutionibus Orbium Coelestium," which overturned the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, and established for himself an enduring fame. This system makes the sun the "centrum mundi," round which the earth and other planets revolve. The MS. of his great work remained in his possession some years before he would publish it. At length he gave it to the world, and only lived to see a printed copy of it a few hours before his death. b. at Thorn, in Prussia, 1473; d. 1543, and was buried in the cathedral to which he belonged.

COPLEYSTON, Edward, D.D. kop-el-ston, bishop of Llandaff, was the son of the rector of Offwell, Devonshire, and was educated at Oxford. He became fellow of Oris College in 1795; in 1802 he succeeded Hurd as professor of poetry; in 1810-11 he vindicated the university from some attacks made upon it in the "Edinburgh Review;" in 1814 he was elected provost of Oriel College; was appointed dean of Chester in 1826; and in 1827 became the successor of Dr. Charles Sumner in the see of Llandaff. Among other works he was author of an "Inquiry into the Doctrines of Necessity and Predestination;" "Prelectiones Academicæ;" an "Essay on Agriculture;" all of which are distinguished for learning, elegance of diction, and purity of taste. b. 1776; d. 1849.

COPLEY, Sir John Singleton, kop'-ley, a distinguished artist, born in America, but claimed by Ireland as a native, from his first "seeing the light" almost immediately after the arrival of his parents, who were from Ireland, in the United States. By natural impulse he became a painter, and rose to eminence in his profession on both sides of the Atlantic, before he had visited either England or Italy. In 1775, however, he arrived in London, and took up his residence in George-street, Hanover-square. During the previous year he had visited both England and Italy, and had now determined to settle in the former. In 1777 he became an associate of the Royal Academy, and in 1783 a member. He devoted much of his attention to illustrations of history, and his "Death of Lord Chatham" is, perhaps, his best work. b. at Boston, United States, 1737; d. 1815.—He was the father of the venerable Lord Lyndhurst.

CORAM, Thomas, Captain, kor'-am, an English philanthropist, who instituted the London Foundling Hospital, an establishment founded for the maintenance and education of exposed and deserted children. He was bred to the sea, in the merchant service, and spent all that he had on this and other benevolent schemes, so that in his old age he was obliged to be supported by the contributions of several noble patrons, among whom was Frederick, prince of Wales. b. 1668; d. in London, 1751, and was buried in the Foundling Hospital, on the gate of which there is a statue of him.

CORBET, Richard, kor'-bet, an English prelate, but better known for his poems, mostly of a humorous and satirical character, which were first printed in 1647, under the title of "Poetica Stromata," and have since been several times reprinted. Many of them are satires on the Puritans, of whom Corbet was a decided, though not vindictive opponent. He was the son of a rich gardener at Ewell, in Surrey, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, of which he became dean; was successively bishop of Oxford and Norwich; and was noted in his day for the eccentric but genial tone of his mind. b. 1592; d. 1636.

CORBOLD, Edward Henry, kor'-bold, a skilful artist in water colours, and has also been successful in oil-painting. His themes are historical incidents, which he treats more in a romantic than in a realistic style. In 1843 he sent in a cartoon for the decoration of the Palace at Westminster, and obtained a prize of £100 under the second award. He was, in earlier life, a successful illustrator of books, and also painted well in fresco. The subjects of some of his pictures are—"The Plague of London;" "The Assembling of the Canterbury Pilgrims at the Tabard Inn, Southwark;" "The Baptism of Ethelbert;" and a scene from Tennyson's "Morte d'Arthur." b. 1815.

CORDAE D'ARMANS, Marie Anne Charlotte, kor'-dai, was born of a good family, who resided army, who was denounced by Marat, and caused to be assassinated. This event animated Charlotte with a passion for vengeance against Marat, whom she regarded as the oppressor of her country. She hastened to Paris, and on being, after some difficulty, admitted to his presence, stabbed him to the heart, July 13, 1793. Far from attempting to escape, she confessed the fact, and was condemned to suffer death, and was accordingly guillotined on July 17, 1793. b. near Sees, 1703.—This circumstance was attended by another equally extraordinary. As she was being conducted to the scaffold, a deputy of the city of Mayence, named Adam Lux, was so transported with admiration of her beauty and heroism, that he hastened to the tribunal, and demanded to suffer death in her stead. This, however, was not conceded to him; but he was also condemned and executed with the same instrument.

CORMENIN, Louis-Marie de la Haye, Viscount de, kor'-me-ni, a distinguished French political writer, was at the age of twenty-two called by Napoleon I. to the council of state, was made a baron by Louis XVIII., and a viscount by Charles X. He was a member of the chamber from 1828 to 1846, and in all these positions distinguished himself as much by the originality of his genius as by independence of character. Cormenin was by profession an advocate; in politics he was opposed to every party in turn in which egotism, privilege, or administrative rapacity, was to be resisted; but the cause of political and social progress had no more earnest defender than he. He wrote the best treatise on administrative law yet published in France; and under the nom-de-plume of "Timon," published a vast number of pamphlets on almost every political topic of importance that had occupied attention in France during many years. His "Book of Parliamentary Orators" is held in high esteem by all thinking Frenchmen; and great powers of logic, wit, and sound knowledge rendered him one of the most powerful writers of his day. M. Cormenin was in 1855 added by imperial ordinance to the Institute, as member of the administrative section of the Academy of the Medical Sciences. b. at Paris, 1788.

CORELLI, Arcangelo, ko'-rail-le, called by his countrymen "the divine," was an Italian musical composer, whose greatest work is his "Concerti Grossi," or twelve concertos. b. at Fusignano, 1653; d. at Rome, 1713.—As a violinist, he was unrivalled, and his compositions for that instrument are regarded as of standard excellence.

CORIOLANUS, kor'-i-o-lai'-nus, the surname of C. Marcius, from his victory at Corioli. His story, as given by the Roman historians, is regarded as a fiction by Niebuhr, who thinks it ought to be excluded from history. It is stated, however, that the consulship, which he had solicited, was refused him, he having rendered himself distasteful to the people on account of his haughty character. He afterwards proposed measures hostile to the interests of the people, and opposed the gratuitous distribution of the corn which had been sent, in a time of scarcity, by Gelo, king of Sicily. Eager for vengeance, Coriolanus offered his services to the Volsci, and soon appeared at their head, ravaging the Roman territory, and laying siege to the "Eternal City" itself. The inhabitants, terrified, sent several embassies to him; but he was deaf to all their entreaties. He was about to deliver the assault, when Veturia, his mother, followed by his wife and a train of Roman women, arrived at his camp, to supplicate him to pause. Conquered by their tears, Coriolanus consented to raise the siege. He was assassinated some little time after, about 488 B.C., by the Volsci; although, according to others, he lived to an advanced age.—Shakspeare and other poets have dramatized his life.

CORNEILLE, Peter, kor'-nai, an eminent French dramatist, who was brought up to the bar, for which his genius was entirely unsuited. Accordingly, he quitted it, and commenced writing for the stage. His first comedy, "Mélite," was produced in 1629, and was followed by "Clitandre," "La Veuve," "La Galerie du Palais," and "La Place Royale," when, in 1637, appeared his "Cid," founded on the "Cid" of Guillen de Castro, of Spain. This performance filled the Parisians with enthusiasm. It carried their conceptions into new regions of dramatic history, and its author became "Le Grand Corneille." Whatever gratification this might bring to the vanity of the author, it was not quite universal. He had been so unfortunate as to offend the Cardinal Richelieu, who had himself some poetical pretensions, and who, as the founder of the French Academy, used his influence in endeavouring to abate the public admiration. One of the members of that learned body, therefore, wrote an elaborate critique on the "Cid," hinting at a deficiency of inventive genius in Corneille, seeing that he had borrowed the plan of his drama from a Spaniard. Such an insinuation was too damaging to be taken with indifference by Corneille, who set to work and produced his "Horace," and his "Cinna," which are in themselves sufficient to establish a claim to ingenious originality. In 1640 appeared his "Polyeucte," which was succeeded by "La Morte de Pompée," "Le Menteur," and several others; none of which, however, nearly approached the "Cid." Nay, they betokened an evident declension of genius, and, in 1653, his "Pertharite" decidedly proclaimed him a fallen star. This disgusted him with the stage, and he turned his attention to other kinds of poetical composition. His success in these, however, was not great, and he returned to the drama. In 1659 he produced his "Œdipe," and continued to write, but with no steady success. In 1673 his "Pulchérie" appeared, and, in 1674, his "Suréna;" but he had already ceased to be popular. B. at Rouen, 1606; D. at Paris, 1684.—For thirty-seven years he was a member of the Academy.

CORNEILLE, Thomas, brother of the above, was also a poet, a member of the French Academy, and of that of Inscriptions. He wrote no fewer than forty-two pieces, which, with the exception of "Ariane" and "Le Comte d'Essex," have all passed into oblivion. Of this number, however, many met with the greatest success in their day. They were published, with those of his brother, in 1738, in 11 vols. 12mo. D. 1625; D. 1709.—Besides his plays, he wrote a "Dictionary of Arts" in 2 vols. folio, and a "Geographical and Historical Dictionary," in 3 vols. folio.

daughter of Metellus Scipio, accompanied her husband in his flight after the battle of Pharsalia, and saw him massacred before her eyes in the harbour of Alexandria. (See POMPEY).—The mother of the Gracchi, and daughter of Scipio Africanus. She directed the education of her sons, and was greatly admired for her virtues. When a Campanian lady once made a show of her jewels at Cornelia's house, and entreated her to favour her with a sight of her own, Cornelia produced her two sons, saying, "These are the only jewels of which I can boast." In her lifetime, a statue was raised to her, with this inscription, "To Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi." Lived in the 2nd century B.C. (See GRACCHUS).—The daughter of Cinna. (See CÆSAR, JULIUS.)

CORNELIUS, Peter von, kor-nai'-le-oo, an eminent German artist, who became a painter by choice, and who, in his nineteenth year, was engaged to ornament, with figures in chiaroscuro, the cupola of the old church of Neuss, near Düsseldorf. After this, he proceeded to Frankfort, where he executed a series of designs illustrative of the "Faust" of Goethe, to whom the engravings were dedicated. His reputation was now fast rising, when he proceeded to Rome, where he united himself with several kindred spirits, and commenced studying with a view to found a new school of German art. To accomplish this, fresco was the style adopted, and Cornelius was commissioned to paint the walls of the villa of Bartholdy, the Prussian consul-general. The subjects he chose were, "Joseph Recognising his Brethren," and "Joseph Interpreting the Dream of Pharaoh's Chief Butler," which were a decided success, and excited general admiration. He now rose higher and higher in his profession, and left Rome, 1819. At Düsseldorf, he remodelled the academy, and then had two spacious halls assigned him to paint, in the Glyptothek at Munich. In one of these—the Hall of Heroes—he represented, in colossal proportions, the leading events of the "Iliad;" in the other—the Hall of the Gods—he symbolized the Grecian mythology. These works were not completed till 1830, and are conceived and executed with such a grandeur of effect as to command universal homage. He became director of the Munich Academy, which, under him, rose to be a great school of art. B. at Düsseldorf, 1787. D. 1887.

CORNERO, or CORNARO, Louis, kor-nar'-o, a Venetian nobleman, remarkable for protracting his life to a considerable length by a course of regimen. In his youth he lived freely, which brought him into a bad state of health. On this, he formed the resolution of confining himself to twelve ounces of food and fourteen of wine daily; by which means, with exercise, he acquired a vigorous constitution. The system he practised, included spare and simple diet, avoidance of heat and cold, late hours, sexual indulgences, and over-fatigue. It required gentle and pleasing excitements, occasional riding on horseback, field sports, and the hearing of music. All violent passions were to be restrained or repressed, and no indulgence allowed to envy, hatred, ambition, jealousy, and the like. The result of his plan was perfect health, cheerful spirits, and long life. At an advanced age he wrote his popular book on "Health and Long Life," which has been translated into most languages; he also wrote a "Treatise on Waters," particularly the lagoons about Venice. B. at Venice, 1463; d. at Padua, 1566. His wife, who survived him, lived to about the same age.—The conclusion to be drawn from Cornaro's book on health is, that all men, or most of them, shorten their lives by over-eating and drinking.

Cornwallis

CORNWALLIS, Charles Mann, marquis of, Kornwallis, entered the army at a very early age, and in 1758 was made a captain in the light infantry. Three years afterwards he was aide-de-camp to the marquis of Granby, whom he accompanied in Germany till the end of the war. In 1761 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and the year following, succeeded, on the death of his father, to the title of Earl Cornwallis. On the breaking out of the American war, he was ordered to embark for that country, where he displayed great military talents, highly distinguishing himself at the battle of Brandywine and the reduction of Charlestown. He won the battles of Camden and Guilford, but in 1781 was forced to surrender at York Town to the united American and French army, in consequence, he declared, of the inefficient support he received from Sir Henry Clinton. Soon after this, he returned to England. In 1786, the affairs of British India wearing a critical aspect, he was appointed governor of Bengal, where, in December, 1790, he took Bangalore. This success he followed up by defeating Tipoo Saib, who delivered to his lordship his two sons as hostages. Having successfully brought this war to a close, he returned to England, was created a marquis, and appointed master-general of the ordnance. In 1793 he was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland, where he quelled an insurrection, defeated an invading French force, and succeeded in effecting the important measure of a union between the two kingdoms. In 1801 his lord-lieutenancy expired, when he was employed as minister plenipotentiary in France; in which capacity he signed the preliminary treaty of the peace of Amiens. In 1804 he accepted the governor-generalship of India, where, soon after his arrival, he fell ill of a fever, on his march to join the army at Ghazepore, in the province of Benares. b. 1738; d. 1805.—Napoleon had a high opinion of the abilities and honesty of Cornwallis. He was a good soldier and statesman, and a man of undoubted integrity.

CORREGGIO, Korrai-dje-z, a celebrated Italian painter, whose real name was Antonio Allegri, but called Correggio from having been born in the town of that name. His life is shrouded in obscurity. The little that is known of him seems to be rather the offspring of conjecture, eked out with imaginary probabilities, than facts obtained as the result of ascertained data. It is not known by whom he was instructed in his art; but Bianchi, Bartolotto, Lombardi, his uncle Lorenzo, and Mantegna, have all been named as his teachers. We believe that he was mostly self-taught, seeing that he seems never to have lived at Rome. His manner, however, combines grandeur of design with sweetness and gracefulness of execution. It is said that he married, in 1520, a lady of a Mantuan family, whose name was Girolama Merlini. She is the original in the picture of his Holy Family, "La Zingarella." None have excelled him in the delicacy of his flesh-colouring; and his "Penitent Magdalen" is affirmed to be the most exquisite female figure ever painted. Four of his best pictures are in the National Gallery of Great Britain:—"Mercury instructing Cupid in the presence of Venus," an "Ecce Homo," "La Vierge au Panier," and "Christ's Agony in the Garden." The first two, in 1534, were purchased by the British Government from the marquis of Londonderry for £10,000. b. at Correggio, 1494; d. 1534, and was buried in the church of St. Francis, at Correggio.

CORT, Cornelius, kort, a famous engraver, was a native of Holland. In 1593 he went to Italy, and was received into the house of Titian, at Venice, and engraved several of that master's pictures. He ultimately settled in Rome, where he established a school for teaching engraving, and is said to have given lessons to Agostino Caracci, which, however, is doubted. Cort engraved upwards of 150 pictures, among which are specimens of Raffaele, Caravaggio, Correggio, Michael Angelo, and other eminent masters. He was also a designer. b. 1536; d. 1573.

CORT, Henry, of Gosport, invented the process by which pig-iron was converted into malleable iron by the flame of pit-coal in the puddling furnace. Before his time, English ironmasters were compelled to employ charcoal for fuel. Having got pig-iron into a malleable condition, he further invented a process for drawing it into bars by means of grooved rollers. In other words, he reduced the labour and cost of producing iron to one-twentieth of what they were before his day, and the iron was of a better quality. In perfecting these inventions, Cort expended a fortune of upwards of £20,000, yet was robbed of the fruits of his discoveries by the villany of an official in a high department of government, and, both cheated and persecuted, he was ultimately allowed to starve, by the apathy and selfishness of an ungrateful country. In 1859 a public appeal for the benefit of his family was made, and, looking at the services he rendered to the iron trade and our iron constructions, there can be no hesitation in assigning to the name of Cort a place beside the illustrious names of Watt, Arkwright, and Wedgwood. b. 1740; d. 1800.

CORTES, Hernando, kort-tais, the conqueror of Mexico, a celebrated Spanish adventurer, whose family was respectable, but not opulent. He was bred at Salamanca, to the law, which he renounced to follow a soldier's life. The governor of Hispaniola was his relation; and Cortes, in 1504, went to St. Domingo, where he was appointed to several valuable posts. In 1511 he accompanied Velasquez in his expedition to Cuba, and displayed so much skill and bravery in the conquest of that island, that he was chosen to conduct a similar enterprise for the conquest of Mexico. Accordingly, in 1519, he set out on his expedition, and first landed at Tabasco, where, after several bloody battles, he compelled the natives to submit to the Spanish yoke. Thence he sailed to St. Juan de Ulloa, in the Bay of Mexico, where he was met by several messengers from the governors of the province. Assuming now the title of ambassador of the king of Castile, he insisted on having an audience with Montezuma, the emperor, and for that purpose gave out that he intended to march on the capital. In the mean time, he founded a settlement on the coast, to which was given the name of Vera Cruz, at the same time declaring himself independent of the governor of Cuba. For some time he had tried in vain to negotiate a friendly intercourse with Montezuma, and now, at the head of 500 Spaniards, indifferently armed he marched up the country.

THE DICTIONARY

Coryate

After various events, on 7th July, 1520, he defeated the Mexicans in the great battle of Otumba, and finally succeeded in establishing himself in their capital. Meanwhile, a commission was sent from Spain to deprive him of his post; but this he contrived to elude, and afterwards obtained from Charles V. the appointment of governor of New Spain. His conduct to the natives was merciless in the extreme, and a new commission of inquiry arriving, he returned to his native country to vindicate his honour, in 1528. Having made his defence to the satisfaction of Charles, he was created marquis of the Valle de Oajaca, and obtained a large grant of land in New Spain, where he proceeded in 1530. After an absence of ten years, he returned, to be treated with cold civility by Charles, and with neglect by his ministers. Disgusted alike with king, court, and courtiers, he, after an unfortunate expedition to Algiers, in which he served as a volunteer, retired to a residence in the vicinity of Seville, and there passed the remainder of his days. B. at Medellin, a village of Estremadura, 1485; D. near Seville, 1547.—W. H. Prescott, the American historian, has written a full and interesting account of the "Conquest of Mexico," in which full details are given of the life and deeds of Cortez.

CORYAT, Thomas, kor'-i-at, an English traveller, who called himself the "Odeombian leg-stretcher." He was the son of the rector of Odecombe, and in 1611 published an account of his travels on the continent, with the singular title of "Coryat's Crudities." In the following year he set out again, with the design of spending ten years in the East. He rambled through Greece, Turkey, Syria, Egypt, and Persia, and died at Surat, in 1617. B. at Odecombe rectory, in 1577.—"Coryat's Crudities" is now a rare book, and fetches, whenever it is sold, a very high price. It affords good illustrations of the state of society in the 16th century.

COSSE BRISSAC, Charles de, kos bree'-sak, a celebrated French marshal, who successfully commanded the French army in Flanders and Piedmont, under Francis I., Henry II., and Charles IX. He acquired so high a reputation, that nobles and princes came to him to learn the art of war. B. 1505; D. 1563.

COSWAY, Richard, R.A., kos'-wai, a distinguished painter, who, by his skill in miniatures, rose to the highest rank in his profession. He took immense sums, and was patronized by the prince of Wales, afterwards George IV., and all the leading members of the aristocracy. He married Maria Hadfield, a lady also of considerable artistic talent, and who, after his death, retired to Lodi, in Italy, where she kept an educational establishment, and acquired great respect in the neighbourhood. Cosway lived in the greatest splendour throughout his career, and was, in 1771, elected a member of the Royal Academy. B. at Tiverton, in 1740; D. 1821.

COTTE, Francis, R.A., kotes, one of the originators of the Royal Academy of London, and distinguished as a drawer of portraits in crayons. In oil-painting he was regarded by many as superior to Reynolds. His most celebrated works are a full-length portrait of the queen of George III., with the princess royal in her lap, and another of the beautiful daughter of Wilton the sculptor. B. in London, in 1725; D. 1770.

COTMAN, John Sell, kol'-man, an artist famous for his etchings of architectural subjects, such as old castles, cathedrals, churches, and other antiquities, was a native of Norwich. He published several volumes of etchings of the antiquities of Yorkshire, Norfolk, Normandy, &c. He was, for a few years, teacher of drawing in King's College, Somerset House; but the greater part of his life was spent in his native county. B. about 1780; D. in London, 1843.

CORTA, Bernhard, kol'-ta, an eminent German geologist, and author of a variety of works on that and cognate sciences, among which may be mentioned: "Geognostic Charts of Saxony and Thuringia;" "Geognostic Wanderings;" "Introduction to the Study of Geognosy and Geology;" "Inner Structure of Mountains;" "Letters on Humboldt's Kosmos," &c. B. 1803.

CORTON, Sir Robert Bruce, kol'-ton, a celebrated English antiquary, and founder of the famous Cottonian library, now at the British Museum, was educated at Cambridge, and, having acquired a high reputation for talent, learning, and integrity, was the adviser both of the king and the leading statesmen of the time. James I. first knighted him, and subsequently created him a baronet. Sir Robert, however, espoused the views of the reformers of the period, and joined, though with moderation, in urging redress of grievances. He, in consequence, became obnoxious to the court; a treatise, in manuscript, on a political topic, was surreptitiously obtained from his library; he was cast into the Tower, and his whole library seized. His constitution suffered from confinement, and this harsh treatment ultimately led to his death, which occurred in 1631. B. in Huntingdonshire, 1570. His valuable library, now the property of the nation, and full of most precious books and rare MSS., was subsequently enlarged by his son and grandson.

COULOMB, Charles Augustin de, kol'-lomb, a French mathematician, who, in 1779, produced a treatise on the "Theory of Simple Machines," which gained the prize of the Academy. He is regarded as the founder of experimental physics in France, and is the inventor of the torsion balance. There are few to whom the theory of electricity is so much indebted as to this philosopher. B. at Angoulême, 1736; D. 1806.

COURTNEY, William, koor'-ten, an ingenious English naturalist, whose collections were purchased for £20,000, and deposited in the British Museum. B. in London, 1643; D. 1702.

COURTOIS, Jacques, koor'-twa, commonly called Borgonone, was the son of an obscure painter, who instructed him in his art. Jacques spent some years in the French army, and made sketches of all the most striking scenes of the camp, the march, and the battle-field. He left the army after three years' service, and elevated himself to painting battle-pieces, for which he became very famous. At Bologna he studied under Guido and Albani, but finally settled in Rome, where he became a lay brother of the Jesuits, for whose establishment he executed some religious works, besides the numerous battle subjects which he painted for others. There are specimens of Courtois at Florence, Venice, and other towns in Italy. B. near Besançon, Franche-comté, 1821; D. at Rome, 1876.—His younger brother, Guillaume Courtois, was also a famous painter, but of sacred subjects; his masterpiece being a great battle of Joshua, which was engraved by Clouet, and dedicated to Casimir, king of Poland. Several of this artist's paintings have been engraved, and he occasionally etched himself. b. 1623; d. at Rome, where he chiefly lived, 1679.

Cousin, Jean, koo'-sā, an eminent French painter, sculptor, and geometrician. At the courts of Henry II., Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry IV., he was the principal favourite, and is the first French artist who excelled as an historical painter. His most celebrated picture is "The Last Judgment," now in the Louvre. His greatest work in sculpture is the monument of Admiral Chabot, in the church of the Celestines. His book on geometry was published in 1560. b. at Soucy, near Sens, about 1500; d. about 1590.

Cousin, Victor, a distinguished French inquirer into the systems of mental philosophy, and lecturer on philosophy at the Faculté des Lettres, in Paris. The original idea upon which his own system is based is, that every system is true, but incomplete in itself; but when all systems are united, and suitably, as it were, dovetailed together, a complete system would be obtained. After various vicissitudes, incident to the political changes in France, he became, under Louis Philippe, a counseiller of state, an officer of the Legion of Honour, and a peer of France. Cousin wrote largely on educational as well as philosophical subjects, and translated the works of Plato, in thirteen volumes. b. at Paris, 1792; d. 1867.

Couthon, Georges, koo'-tawng, was brought up to the bar, but on the outbreak of the French revolution, he became a member of the National Assembly, and of the Convention, and was one of the most sanguinary of the Mountain party. He strained all his efforts to accomplish, first, the destruction of the monarchy and the death of the king, and next, to effect the ruin of the Girondists. He was the close friend and associate of Robespierre, and, along with him, initiated the most atrocious measures. He possessed considerable oratorical powers, which he invariably used in support of an extreme policy. He proclaimed death to all tyrants, and expressed a wish that kings might no longer have an earth to support, or a sun to enlighten them. He was sent as commissioner to Lyons, where he enacted terrible scenes of bloodshed and proscription. On one occasion, he struck with a hammer the noblest edifices in the city, exclaiming, "Down, ye monuments of pride, I condemn you to destruction!" Like his chief, and other leaders in that terrible epoch, Couthon was of mild features and suave manners; and so decrepit in body that he was allowed to sit while speaking in the Convention. He shared in the fall of Robespierre, and was guillotined, July 28, 1794. b. at Orsay, a village in Clermont, 1756.

Coutts, Angela Georgina Burdett, koots, a lady possessed of great riches, and the daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, who for many years represented Westminster, as a Reformer, in parliament. Her grandfather, Mr. Coutts, the banker, having, at a late period of life, married Miss Mellon, an actress, bequeathed to the latter his very large fortune, which acted as a temptation to the duke of St. Albans to marry her. The duchess dying in 1834, without issue, left to Miss Burdett her immense wealth, estimated at £2,500,000, on the condition that she would assume the name and arms of the Coutts family. This she accordingly did, and devoted her life to charitable purposes generally, and the promotion of the English church especially.

b. 1814.—Her great wealth attracted many admirers, among whom were named the duke of Norfolk's eldest son and Prince Louis Bonaparte, afterwards Napoleon III.

COVERDALE, Miles, kuv'-er-dail, a distinguished reforming English divine, who, in 1532, united with William Tyndale in translating the Scriptures. In 1551 he became bishop of Exeter. b. in Yorkshire, 1487; d. in London, 1563.

COWLEY, Abraham, kow'-le, an English poet, educated at Westminster school. After passing, through various vicissitudes on account of his loyalty to the Stuart dynasty, he, on the death of Cromwell, obtained a lease of a farm at Chertsey, valued at about £300 a year. Early in life, however, he produced a small volume of poems, called "Poetical Blossoms," which gained him a considerable reputation. Dr. Johnson places him at the head of those whom he calls metaphysical poets; but though he is sometimes sublime, always moral, and frequently witty, yet he is both tedious and affected. His Anacreontics are reckoned his best productions. He also wrote a comedy called "Cutter of Coleman Street," and some pieces in prose, particularly a "Discourse on the Government of Cromwell," and a "Proposition for the Advancement of Experimental Philosophy." b. in London, 1618; d. at Chertsey, 1687, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, where there is a monument to his memory.

COWLEY, Mrs. Hannah, a poetess, whose effusions are perhaps more remarkable for their affectation than their merit. She wrote three narrative poems, called "The Scottish Village," "The Siege of Acre," and "The Maid of Aragon." For these, however, her name is not here preserved, but on account of her "Belle's Stratagem," and "A Bold Stroke for a Husband," which are her two best comedies, of the nine which she wrote. b. at Tiverton, 1743; d. at Tiverton, 1809.—Her maiden name was Parkhouse, and her husband a captain in the service of the East India Company.

COWLEY, Henry Richard Wellesley, Lord, many years British ambassador at Paris and other courts, was the son of the first Lord Cowley, better known as Sir Henry Wellesley. At an early age, he entered the diplomatic service, and in 1852 succeeded the Marquis of Normanby at the Tuilleries. In conjunction with Lord Clarendon, he represented England at the congress of Paris, held in 1856. b. 1804.

COWPER, William, kow'-per, and sometimes pronounced koo'-per, a celebrated English poet, was the son of Dr. Cowper, chaplain to George II., rector of Berkhamstead in Hertfordshire, and nephew to Lord-Chancellor Cowper. Being designed for the law, William, after finishing his education, was placed under an eminent attorney, and, at the age of 31, was nominated a clerk in the House of Lords. A constitutional timidity of disposition, however, prevented him from accepting it. He was next appointed clerk of the journals, a situation which, it was supposed, would require no personal attendance; but when he found that it would be requisite for the clerk to appear at the bar of the House, it had such an effect on his nerves, that he was obliged to resign the office. A morbid melancholy now seized him, and it was found necessary to place him under the care of Dr. Coates, at St. Albans, where he gradually recovered the use of his faculties. In 1765 he settled at Huntingdon, where he formed an acquaintance with a clergyman of the name of Urwin, in whose family he became an inmate. That gentleman being killed by a fall from his horse, in 1767, Cowper and Mrs. Unwin took up their abode at Olney, Buckinghamshire, where they contracted an intimacy with Mr. Newton, then curate of that parish, and where Cowper devoted himself to poetry. To a collection of hymns published by that gentleman, Cowper contributed sixty-eight. In 1782 he published a volume of his poems, which did not excite much attention; but another volume, in 1785, stamped his reputation as a true poet. His "Task," "The Sofa," "John Gilpin," and other productions, will immediately occur to the reader's mind as works of enduring excellence. He afterwards engaged in translating Homer into Miltonic verse; and though his version is not so pleasing as that of Pope, it renders the original with greater fidelity. In 1786 he removed, with Mrs. Unwin, to Weston, Northamptonshire, where he continued to cultivate his literary tastes. In 1794 his intellect again gave way, and not even frequent change of scene could rouse him from his despondency, for he was now sunk into a state of complete dejection, from which he never after recovered. B. at Berkhamstead, 1731 p. at Dereham, in Norfolk, 1800, and was buried in the parish church, where a monument is erected to his memory.

COX, Richard, kox, an English prelate and one of the translators of the "Bishops' Bible," to which he furnished the four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistle to the Romans. He was bishop of Ely, but suffered a good deal of persecution on a charge of heresy, but was ultimately raised to that see by Elizabeth. B. 1499; p. 1531.

COX, David, a distinguished water-colour artist, who unweariedly devoted himself to the study of Nature under her ever-varying aspects, and reaped his reward in the general admiration which was awarded to his pictures. Although the opinion prevailed that they were merely rough sketches, being mostly executed on coarse paper, yet they exhibit a breadth and poetical embodiment, which stamp them with the mark of genius, and as the offspring of a highly vigorous and observing mind. He was one of the earliest members of the Society of Painters in Water-colours, and in the gallery of that society, in London, his pictures were almost exclusively shown. B. at Birmingham, 1793; p. at Harborne, near Birmingham, 1859.

COXES, William, archdeacon of Wilts, and author of the following among a great variety of other works:—"Sketches of the Natural, Civil, and Political State of Switzerland," "Travels in Poland, Russia, Sweden, and Denmark," "History of the House of Austria," "History of the Bourbon kings of Spain," "Memoirs and Correspondence of John, Duke of Marlborough," "Memoirs of Sir Robert Walpole," "Account of the Russian Discoveries between Asia and America," "Correspondence of Charles Talbot, duke of Shrewsbury, with William III. and others," &c. B. 1747; p. 1823.

CRABBE, Keverand George, kräb, an English poet, who rose, from very humble circumstances, to hold the rectory of Trowbridge, in Wiltshire. He was educated for the medical profession; but being unsuccessful, applied to Burke, the great statesman, for poetical patronage. The politician took him under his protection, and advanced his fortunes by opening a path for his preferment in the church.

Cranmer

His principal poems are "The Library," "The Village," which was revised by Dr. Johnson; "The Newspaper," "The Parish Register," and the "Tales of the Hall," for which Mr. Murray, the publisher, gave him £3000, with the remaining copyright of his previous poems. B. at Aldborough, in Suffolk, 1754; p. 1832.—The poetry of Crabbe is remarkable for its individuality, and the minuteness with which every picture is painted. Of the higher quality of invention he had none. He could paint what he beheld with pathos, vigour, and originality, although the colours which he sometimes uses have a tendency to repel, rather than invite, readers of delicacy and taste to the contemplation of his pages.

CRATE, George Lillie, kräik, a Scotch littérateur, who, in 1824, went to London, and when the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge commenced its labours, wrote for it a work called "The Pursuit of Knowledge under Difficulties." This brought him into notice, and he became a large contributor, in history and biography, to the "Penny Cyclopædia." In 1839 he assumed the editorship of the "Pictorial History of England," to which he contributed several of its most important chapters. These were subsequently published in an independent form, under the titles of "The History of British Commerce," and "The History of Literature and Learning in England." He also published a work on "Spenser and his Poetry," and in 1849 became professor of History and English Literature in Queen's College, Belfast. Besides the above works, he produced the "Romance of the Peerage," "Outlines of the History of the English Language," and contributed to periodical publications. B. 1799; p. 1868.

CRANBORNE, Lord. (See SALISBURY, Mar. of.)

CRANACH, Lucas, krä'-nak, one of the most eminent of the old German painters, called after the place of his birth, but whose family name was Sunder. He produced a great many works, which are to be seen chiefly in Upper Saxony. He excelled in portraits and altarpieces, the principal of these last being the "Crucifixion," in the church of Weimar. He was court painter to three electors of Saxony, Frederick the Wise, John the Constant, and John Frederick the Magnanimous. He was also the friend of Luther, and is said to have been the means of bringing about the marriage of the great reformer with Catharine Bora. B. at Cranach, near Bamberg, in 1472; p. at Weimar, in 1553.

CRANMER, Thomas, krän'-mer, archbishop of Canterbury, whose opinion on the question of the divorce of Henry VIII. recommended him to that monarch, and whose first service, after his appointment, was to pronounce the divorce between the king and Katharine. He zealously furthered the Reformation, and by his means the Bible was translated and read in churches. On the death of Henry, he was named in the will of that monarch one of the regency of the kingdom, and as Edward VI. was brought up chiefly under his care, the Reformation, under this youthful sovereign, assumed a consistent form. The liturgy, homilies, and articles of religion were now framed, and in all of these, Cranmer had a principal hand. On the accession of Mary, he was condemned, first for treason, and pardoned; but a charge of heresy being afterwards brought against him, he was sent to the Tower, whence, with Ridley and Latimer, he was removed to Oxford, to hold a public disputation. The fate of these men seems, without doubt, to have been already determined. The archbishop was tried by the pope's commissioners, and convicted, when, after enduring great hardships for upwards of three years, he was at length induced to sign his abjuration of the Protestant faith, on the promise of life. For having committed this act, however, he was struck with deep remorse, and when brought into St. Mary's Church, Oxford, to read his recantation in public, he, instead of complying, besought God's forgiveness for the apostasy of which he had been guilty, and exhorted the people against the errors of Rome. This greatly enraged his adversaries, who, denouncing him as a hypocrite and heretic, dragged him to the stake, opposite Balliol College. Here he endured the terrible fiery trial with patience and fortitude, holding his hand in the flame, and often exclaiming, "This unworthy hand!" B. at Aslacton, in Nottinghamshire, 1489; burned at Oxford, 1555.

CRASSUS, M. Licinius, kri'-sus, surnamed the "rich," a distinguished Roman, who decisively defeated Spartacus, who, at the head of the gladiators, had for some time defied the power of Rome. Afterwards, he formed one of the triumvirate with Cæsar and Pompey, and had the province of Syria allotted to him. Attempting to possess himself of Parthia, he was defeated by Surenæ, the Parthian general, who, subsequently, treacherously got possession of his person, and put him to death, 53 B.C.

CRATEBUS, krai'-e-rus, one of Alexander the Great's generals, conspicuous for his literary abilities as well as for his valour. He received as his share of Alexander's kingdom, Greece and Epirus, and wrote the history of his great commander. Killed in a battle against Eumenes, 321 B.C.

CRATES, krai'-tes, a philosopher of Bœotia, remarkable for his eccentricities. In the summer he would clothe himself as warm as possible, while in the winter his garments were uncommonly thin. B. 324 B.C.

CRATINUS, krai'-ti-nus, a satirical poet of Athens, who wrote twenty-one plays, and invented or improved comic poetry. D. 431 B.C.

CREBILLON, Prosper Joliot de, kre-be'-yawnng, a French dramatic poet, who studied for the law, but, being attached to theatrical representations, became a dramatic writer. His first popular performance was "Atreus," which was followed by his "Electra" and "Rhadamistus." He next produced some tragedies, which procured for him the name of the French Æschylus. For many years he retired into seclusion. B. at Dijon, 1674; D. in Paris, 1762. By order of Louis XV. a monument was erected to his memory in the church of St. Gervois. His works have been published in 12 vols. 4to.—His son, Claude Prosper Joliot de Crebillon, was also a man of letters, and wrote several esteemed novels, the principal of which is entitled, "Les Egaremens du Cœur et de l'Esprit." B. 1707; D. 1771.

CREECH, Thomas, kreetch, an English poet, who wrote some original pieces, which are now almost forgotten. He is, however, known as a translator, of classical poetry, having executed versions in English verse of Lucretius, Horace, Theocritus, &c. He was educated at Sherborne Free School, and afterwards at Wadham College, Oxford. B. 1659; committed suicide, 1701.

CRESWICK, Thomas, R.A., kres'-wik, an eminent English landscape-painter, who produced a great many "Scenes," "Spots," "Shades," and "Streams," redolent of poetic beauty. In 1843 he became an associate in the Royal Academy, and, in 1847, exhibited his two greatest works, entitled "England," and "The London Road a Hundred Years ago." B. at Sheffield, 1811.

CRICHTON, James, kri'-ton, a celebrated Scotchman, of whom so many wonderful things are related as to have procured him the name of the "Admirable Crichton." He was educated at St. Andrews, and, at the age of twenty, visited Paris. Here he acquired great reputation not only as a disputant, but for his skill and activity in games of all sorts, as well as martial exercises. He next went to Rome, and displayed his talents in the presence of the pope and cardinals. Thence he travelled to Venice, where he became intimate with the learned Aldus Manutius, who dedicated to him the Paradoxes of Cicero, in a strain of panegyric which borders on the ridiculous. At Padua he held disputations with the most learned professors on a number of subjects, but particularly on the Aristotelian philosophy. At Mantua he slew a famous fencing-master in a duel. The duke of Mantua admired him so much, as to appoint him tutor to his son, a licentious young man, by whom, it is said, he was assassinated in the public streets, during the carnival. B. in Perthshire, 1560; assassinated, 1583.

CRÆSUS, kre'-sus, the last king of Lydia, of the race of the Mermeradæ, celebrated for his great riches. His court was the asylum of learning; and here were to be found Æsop and Solon. Showing, with pride, his treasures to the latter, that philosopher said, "Call no man happy before his death;" and, in truth, misfortune soon came upon the rich king. He was conquered by Cyrus, King of Persia, and placed on a burning pile, when, exclaiming "Solon, Solon," with great energy, his captor asked him the reason of such an exclamation. Cræsus then repeated the conversation he had had with Solon on human happiness. Cyrus, moved at the recollection of the instability of human affairs, ordered Cræsus to be taken from the burning pile, and became one of his most intimate friends. Mounted the throne, 560 B.C. The manner of his death is unknown.

CROKE, or CROOK, Sir George, kroke, an able and upright English lawyer, sprung from a family famous for producing men of talent in that profession, was a native of Buckinghamshire, received his education at University College, Oxford, and studied law at the Inner Temple. He was knighted in 1623, and made king's serjeant; he was created one of the justices of the Common Pleas in 1625; in 1628 he succeeded Sir John Doddridge as justice of the King's Bench; in 1636 he took the part of Hampden on the question of ship-money, refusing to concur with the other judges in condemning the patriot for refusing to pay that illegal imposition. Sir George gained great popularity for his conduct on this occasion, but, such was his high character for rectitude, he still retained the favour of the king. His law reports obtained a high position for authenticity and impartiality, as well as for sound legal knowledge, and have been many times reprinted, translated, and edited, with notes, additions, and explanations. His arguments on ship-money, especially, attracted much attention, and were printed with those of Sir Richard Hutton. B. at Chilton, 1559; D. 1641.

THE DICTIONARY

Croker

CROKER, Right Honourable John Wilson, kro'-ker, was educated for the bar, and, in 1800, was entered a student at Lincoln's Inn. He devoted much of his time, however, to literature and politics, displaying in the latter field strong Tory tendencies. In 1807 he became member of parliament for Downpatrick, in Ireland, and in 1809 secretary to the Admiralty. This post he held for twenty years, during which he sat as member in the House for various boroughs. Meanwhile he was almost continually engaged with his pen, and was a ready and versatile writer. His most extensive production is an edition of "Boswell's Life of Johnson," which Macaulay criticised with great severity in the "Edinburgh Review." He wrote, besides, "Stories from the History of England," and edited "The Suffolk Papers," "Walpole's Letters to Lord Hertford," and several other works. b. in Galway, Ireland, 1790; d. at Hampton, 1854.

CROLY, Reverend George, kro'-le, a modern poet and imaginative writer, as well as the rector of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, and St. Benet's, London. His principal effusions are "The Angel of the World;" a tragedy entitled "Catiline;" a comedy called "Pride shall have a Fall;" "Salathiel," a romance; and "Marston," with "Tales of the Great St. Bernard," both works of fiction. He has likewise written a "Life of Burke;" but it was as a popular preacher that his fame was most extended. b. at Dublin, 1789; d. 1860.

CROMPTON, Samuel, kromp'-ton, an ingenious mechanic, the inventor of the spinning mule, was born near Bolton-le-Moors, Lancashire, in 1753. Bolton then was really "in the Moors," and only numbered about 5000 inhabitants, which, mainly through the influence of Crompton's invention, had, in 1861, increased to upwards of 70,000. His youth was spent in a large picturesque old house, with quaint timber front, and there the thoughtful young weaver occupied his days with working upon Hargreaves's newly-invented jenny, and soaced his evenings with his violin—the first triumph of his mechanical skill. At the age of twenty-one he commenced the construction of a spinning-machine, which he called a "mule," because it united the features of Arkwright's and Hargreaves' machines. For five years did Crompton perseveringly work, with scarcely any tools except his clasp-knife, and a few others which he purchased with money earned by playing his violin in the orchestra of the Bolton theatre. He made his machine at length, but had to hide it in a garret, lest his ignorant neighbours should destroy it. As secretly as he could, for his house was besieged by the curious, Crompton and his wife worked upon the wheels, and spun yarn of such a fineness that manufacturers saw they would be able to produce in this country material similar to the much-coveted muslins of the East Indies. Being a man of simple habits, of great industry, of unquestioned probity, and of deep religiousness, one would have supposed that now a career of unexampled success and honour was open to him. Yet such is the singular history of his life, that with the triumph of his mechanical genius commenced a series of personal and family misfortunes that would have crushed the spirit of an ordinary man. Efforts were made to get from Crompton his secret, which he gave up with his first-made mule to a number of gentlemen on the promise of a subscription being raised to remunerate him. Only enough money, however, was raised to enable him to replace his mule with one of four more spindles than that had which he had given up. Crompton struggled on in poverty, while others with his mule were laying the foundations of colossal fortunes. In the year 1800, when the mule had been given to the public about twenty years, some gentlemen in Manchester promoted a subscription in favour of Crompton, and realized between £400 and £500, with which he increased his little manufactory for spinning and weaving. In 1807, when the nation had been immensely benefited by the increase of trade consequent upon the use of the mule, Crompton made some efforts to obtain a national recognition of his services. These efforts being without satisfactory result, four years later they were renewed. When Mr. Perceval was shot in the House of Commons, he had a paper in his hand relative to Crompton's claim, and he had said but a few minutes before that it was the intention of the government "to propose £20,000 for Crompton." But Perceval's assassination dashed the eup from Crompton's lips, and the parliamentary proceedings eventuated in a vote of £5000, barely sufficient to pay the expenses of the application. Crompton was greatly disappointed. After that time he engaged in several businesses, in all of which he was pursued by an apparent fatality; he became very shy, and at last fell into poverty. From this he was relieved by the purchase of a small annuity, which he enjoyed only three years. He died on the 26th of June, 1827, aged seventy-four years, and was buried in the old churchyard, where two slabs of polished grey granite, surmounting a massive block of Lancashire gritstone, cover his remains. A monument to his memory was erected in his native town in 1862, and publicly inaugurated on the 24th of August of that year.

CROMWELL, Oliver, krom'-well, the great Protector, came of a good family on both sides, and after passing about a year at Cambridge, was removed to Lincoln's Inn, with the view of prosecuting his studies for the bar. It has been said that he was much addicted to low pleasures and gaming in his youth; but when we find him, in his twenty-first year, marrying the daughter of Sir John Bourchier, and spoken of by religious men as a professor of religion, we are inclined to believe that he has been vilified by malice, rather than spoken of with justice. In 1628 he was elected member of parliament for Huntingdon, and, in the following year, distinguished himself by his zeal against the bishops. When the parliament was dissolved, he retired into the country, and took a grazing farm at St. Ives, where he became overseer of the parish, and a zealous member of the religious community with which he had connected himself. In 1636 Sir Thomas Stuart, his maternal uncle, died, leaving him property in the "Isle of Ely" worth £500 a year. To this place he now removed his family; but being disgusted with the measures of the government, he in 1637 actually took a passage for himself and family in a ship lying in the Thames, and bound for New England, in America. This vessel was detained by proclamation; but if she had been suffered to proceed on her voyage, the head of Charles I. would, perhaps, never have been forfeited to his country; England would never have been a commonwealth, nor Oliver Cromwell its Protector. In 1649 he was returned to parliament for Cambridge, and, by this time, had become a popular leader, being called "Lord of the Fens," for having defended a portion of the fen country of Cambridgeshire from being wrested from the people by the grasping hands of certain proprietors who had been draining them for themselves. In 1642, when parliament determined upon hostilities, he went to Cambridge, where he raised a troop of horse, and which he himself so ably commanded, that he soon acquired the rank of colonel, and a great reputation for military skill and valour. His men were well disciplined, and, under his leadership, at the battle of Marston Moor, in 1644, acquired the name of "Ironsides." At Stamford, and in the second battle at Newbury, Cromwell greatly distinguished himself, and received from his party the title of "Saviour of the nation." This party consisted of the Independents, who had gained so great an influence in parliament as to pass the famous self-denying ordinance, by which all members of either House were excluded from commands in the army. From this, however, Cromwell, on account of his value to the cause, was excepted; a stroke of policy which preserved his ascendancy in the army, and paved the way for his future advancement. He was now made lieutenant-general, and by his conduct in 1645, the battle of Naseby, which decided the fate of the royalists, was won. This victory was followed by a series of successes, for which he was voted a pension of £2500 per annum, and the thanks of the House. When the king was handed over by the Scotch to the parliament, Cromwell determined to get him into his own power. This he effected in 1647, by means of Cornet Joyce, a young and spirited soldier. He now obtained the chief command of the army, and at a conference at Windsor, which he himself opened with prayer, propounded the bold measure of punishing the king by a judicial sentence. Charles was now in the Isle of Wight, when Cromwell was called into the north against the Scots, and into the west against the Welsh. Wherever he fought, success attended him, and returning to London, he purged the parliament house of its members, by means of his troopers, under the direction of Colonel Pride. In the January of 1649 the king's trial commenced. Cromwell was the third to sign the warrant for his execution, and the monarch suffered accordingly. Cromwell was now called into Ireland, where he took a terrible vengeance upon the inhabitants of Drogheda, Wexford, and several other places. In 1650 he returned to England, and was sent against the Scots, who had armed to restore Charles II. On September 3, 1650, he gained the battle of Dunbar; and that day twelvemonth he defeated Charles at Worcester. The sovereign power was now within his reach, and he did not hesitate to grasp it. Accordingly, on February 16, 1653, he was invested with the dignity of Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, in the Court of Chancery. In this capacity, he vigorously directed the affairs of the kingdom, making the English flag, borne by men like Blake, respected wherever it was seen. In 1658, however, he became moody and suspicious. In the August of that year, his favourite daughter, Mrs. Claypole, died at Hampton Court. This event, with the publication of a pamphlet by Colonel Titus, entitled "Killing no Murder," tending to prove the assassination of a tyrant a public duty, produced a slow fever, from which he never rallied. He was, by order of his physician, removed to Whitehall for change of air, but nothing would avail him now. He died on the 3rd of September, 1658, the anniversary of his victories at Dunbar and Worcester, and a day which he was accustomed to consider especially fortunate to himself. n. in the town of Huntingdon, 1599.—His corpse was interred on the 25th of April, in Henry the Seventh's chapel, whence, at the Restoration, it was taken and exposed on, and, it is said, buried under, the gallows at Tyburn. It is needless here to enter into the character of Cromwell. That he was one of the greatest statesmen and most valiant warriors England has produced, none will deny; and that he was as good, if not better, than most men would have been under the same circumstances, few will be inclined to dispute.—Cromwell had six children; viz., Richard, Henry, Bridget, Elizabeth, Mary, and Frances. Richard succeeded him in the protectorate; but when affairs turned, and he found his post no longer tenable, he resigned and went abroad. Richard Cromwell subsequently returned to England, and a story is told of him, to the effect that, while a suitor for the restoration of his property he was met in Westminster Hall by one who mistook him for a countryman viewing the place, and remarked that, perhaps, he had never seen such a grand place before. "No," replied Richard, "not since I sat in that chair," pointing at the same moment to the chair of state which then occupied a prominent place in the justice-hall at Westminster. A portion of his property was restored to him, and he died at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire, in 1712.—Henry went to Ireland, as lord-lieutenant, and bore a good character. It was the general opinion at the time, and has since been fully endorsed, that the Protector made a mistake in naming the mild and gentle Richard as his successor instead of Henry, who possessed more of the vigour, energy, and genius of his great father. n. in 1674.—Bridget married, first, General Ireton, and afterwards General Fleetwood.—Elizabeth, Cromwell's favourite daughter, married John Claypole, Esq., of Northamptonshire.—Mary married Lord Fauconberg, and is supposed to have assisted in the restoration of Charles II. She died in 1712.—Frances married, first, a grandson of the earl of Warwick, and secondly, Sir John Russell of Cambridgeshire.—Elizabeth, the wife of Cromwell, was a woman of strong mind, and a constant spur to her husband in his career of ambition. She also governed her household with great address, and died in 1685.

CRONIN, William, krotch, doctor of music, whose almost infant performances are said to have rivalled those of Mozart. In 1797, when only twenty-two, he was appointed musical professor at Oxford, and in 1822, principal of the Royal Academy of Music. He composed a large number of pieces, both for the pianoforte and the organ, besides an opera called "Palestine," n. at Norwich, 1775; d. at Taunton, Somersetshire, 1847.

CROWNE, John, krown, an industrious writer of plays during the reign of Charles II., who was set up by the earl of Rochester as a dramatic rival of Dryden, but whose productions—tragedies and comedies, for he wrote both—are of an inferior order, as well as plot, construction, language, and morals. Nevertheless, of his tragedies (two) one called "The Destruction of Jerusalem," was popular when first produced; and his "Sir Courty Nice," a comedy, was more than once reprinted. He was the son of an Independent minister in Nova Scotia, where he was born, but in what year has not been ascertained. b. about 1703.

CRUDEN, Alexander, kroo-den, a laborious compiler, who, in 1728, went from Aberdeen to London, and settled there as a bookseller. In 1737 he published his "Concordance to the Bible," a book of great merit. b. 1770.—He was a very pious man, but at times deranged in his mind.

CRUKSHANK, George, krook-shānk, the son of an artist, and an artist himself, devoted his time mostly to the humorous or political illustration of works. His "Comic Almanac" was published, with unflagging originality of design, for about twelve years; and some of the fictions of Mr. Charles Dickens were accompanied by sketches from his pencil. Subsequently, he published "The Bottle," a series of eight drawings, showing the progressive effects of intemperance upon a family; and then became a professional painter in oil. In this path he executed, among other pictures, "Tam O'Shanter," "Titania and Bottom the Weaver," and a very curious allegorical picture called the "Worship of Bacchus." His excellence, however, lay in comic etchings for woodcuts. b. in London, 1792.

CRÆSIVUS, te-sib-e-us, a mathematician of Alexandria, the inventor of the pump and other hydraulic instruments, also of a clepsydra, or water-clock. Lived in the 2nd century b. c.

CRÆTIPHO, tes-i-fo, an Athenian, who counselled his fellow-citizens to present Demosthenes with a golden crown for his probity and virtue. Lived in the 4th century b. c.

CUDWORTH, Ralph, kud-worth, a learned divine, who wrote upon "The True Intellectual System of the Universe," and whose attainments were of the highest order. His writings set men to think, and gave rise to much controversy. b. at Aller, Somersetshire, 1617; d. at Cambridge, 1688.

CULPEPER, Nicholas, kul-pep-er, an English astrologer and herbalist. He was the son of a clergyman, was bred an apothecary, and settled in Spitalfields, where he practised physic and astrology with great success. b. 1651.—He wrote several books, the most celebrated of which is a Herbal, wherein he describes the good and bad qualities of plants according to the sidereal influence.

CUMBERLAND, William, duke of, the second son of George II., kum-ber-land, was, in 1743, with his father, present at the battle of Dettingen, where he was wounded in the leg. He, in 1745, commanded the British at the battle of Fontenoy, where they were defeated by the French, in consequence of not being properly supported by the Dutch. In 1746, at Culloden, he defeated Charles Stuart, and received the thanks of both houses of parliament. b. 1721; d. 1765. Cumberland pursued the adherents of the Stuarts with such remorseless severity, and broke up the clan system of the Scottish highlands with such unflinching determination, as to acquire the title of "The Butcher," by which name his memory is still execrated on the hills and in the glens of the Scottish highlands.

CUMBERLAND, Richard, an English dramatic and miscellaneous writer, was educated for the church, but became secretary to the Board of Trade, and, in 1780, was despatched to Madrid, on a secret and confidential mission. In this office he considerably exceeded the expenditure allowed him; and subsequently, on a compensation allowance, retired to Tunbridge Wells, where he entirely devoted himself to literature. From this retreat he poured forth essays, operas, comedies, tragedies, poetry, novels, and pamphlets on various subjects. It is as an essayist, however, that he is most favourably known; for, out of upwards of thirty dramas, there is scarcely one which is now remembered. b. at Cambridge, 1732; d. at Tunbridge, 1811.

CUMMING, John, D.D., kum'-ing, a Scottish divine, and minister of the Scotch Church in Crown Court, Covent Garden, London. He published a great many works on religious subjects, chiefly bearing on the fulfilment of the prophecies; and, as secretary to the Protestant Reformation Society, was frequently called upon to take a prominent part in questions of dispute between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants. b. in Aberdeenshire, 1810.

CUNNINGHAM, Allan, kun'-ning-ham, a Scottish peasant, who was apprenticed to the trade of a stonemason; but, in his leisure, applied himself to the cultivation of the homely Doric muse of his country, and rose to a considerable eminence as a lyric poet. In 1810 he went to London, where he eked out a subsistence by reporting for the newspapers and contributing to periodicals. He subsequently obtained the situation of manager of the extensive studio of Chantrey, which enabled him to pursue his literary tastes in accordance with his own sentiments, and without the usual hazards attending the precariousness of the profession of literature. Considering his education and occupation, his works may be viewed as both numerous and excellent. The principal of them are the novels of "Paul Jones," "Otterburn," and "Sir Michael Scott;" "Songs of Scotland, with Critical and Historical Notes;" "Sir Marmaduke Maxwell," a drama; "The Lives of the most Eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects;" "The Life of Burns," and "The Life of Wilkie." He was highly appreciated by Sir Walter Scott, much admired by Hogg, and affectionately esteemed by Chantrey, who bequeathed him £2000, and an annuity of £100. b. in Dumfriesshire, 1785; d. in London, 1842.

CUNNINGHAM, Peter, the eldest son of Allan Cunningham, was educated at a private school, and entered the public service as a clerk in the Audit Office. In 1854 he was promoted to one of the chief clerkships, and gave to the world some of the fruits of his leisure hours. In 1833 he published a "Life of Drummond of Hawthornden;" and, in 1835, "Songs of England and Scotland." In 1841 a new edition of Campbell's "Specimens of the British Poets," and in 1849 a "Handbook of London." Beside these, he edited Johnson's "Lives of the Poets," Goldsmith's works, and contributed to "Fraser's Magazine," and several other periodicals, articles of light literature. b. in London, 1816.

CUNNINGHAM, William, D.D., late principal of the New (or Free Church) College, Edinburgh, was one of the leaders of the "Non-intrusion" party in the Scottish church, whose struggles eventuated in a large proportion of the clergy and people of that church renouncing its authority, and establishing what is called the "Free Church." The question in dispute was as to the right of the people to refuse clergymen appointed by the patrons of livings, the privilege of vetoing such appointments being all that was at first claimed; but the views of the leaders of the anti-patronage party gradually developed themselves into a claim of the right of election by the people. This was denied by the law courts and the legislature; and the result was that a large portion of the clergy and people repudiated state connexion and control, and set up the "Free Church," though still maintaining their right to be regarded as the national church. This claim was of course only recognised by themselves; and they now occupy the position of an ordinary dissenting body, though probably the most numerous and influential one in Scotland. Dr. Cunningham, after passing through the ordinary educational curriculum, was appointed assistant to one of the ministers of Greenock, was afterwards removed to Trinity Church, Edinburgh; and, having taken a leading part in the ecclesiastical discussions which preceded and followed the disruption, on the formation of a denominational hall of divinity, was appointed one of the professors, and on the death of Dr. Chalmers in 1847, succeeded him as principal and professor of divinity in the New College. Dr. Cunningham was more distinguished for intellectual power and learning than for eloquence as a preacher; but his unquestionable talent and high character gave him much influence in the body to which he belonged. n. at Dunse, Berwickshire, October, 1806; d. 1861.

CURIUS DENTATUS, Marcus Annii, ku'-re-us de-n-tai'-tus, a Roman, celebrated for his bravery, fortitude, and frugality. He was victorious over various nations, and when the Samnites attempted to bribe him, he said, "I prefer my earthen pots to all your vessels of gold and silver, and my desire is to command those who are in possession of money, while I have none, but live in poverty." Lived in the 3rd century n.c.

CURIUS, Marcus, kur-she-us, a Roman, who devoted himself to the infernal gods for the safety of his country. A wide chasm having suddenly appeared in the Forum, the oracle had said that it would never close until Rome threw into it its most precious possession. Thereupon Curtius, arming himself, mounted his horse, and solemnly threw himself into the abyss, which instantly closed over his head, 300 n.c.

CUVIER, Georges Christian Leopold Dagobert, Baron, koo'-re-ai, a distinguished French naturalist, who, at the age of 21, became tutor to the only son of Count d'Hérivy in Normandy, where, having a residence by the seacoast, he commenced the study of marine animals. In a short time he sent some papers to the Society of Natural History, and in 1795 received the appointment of assistant to Mertrud at Paris, in the Jardin des Plantes. Here he commenced his collection of comparative anatomy, and in 1796, when the National Institute was formed, became one of its first members. He now began a series of works illustrative of fossil remains, and in 1800 was appointed professor of natural philosophy at the College of France, but still continued to lecture on comparative anatomy at the Jardin des Plantes. In 1802 he was chosen by the first consul, Bonaparte, one of the inspectors-general to establish public schools in France, and became perpetual secretary to the Institute for the department of Natural Sciences.

Dacier

He now rose to the highest honours, and in 1814, just before the abdication of Napoleon I., was named a councillor of state, which appointment was confirmed by Louis XVIII. His greatest advancement was to the chancellorship of the university, which he held till his death. In 1819 he was created a baron; in 1820 Charles X. conferred on him the decoration of grand officer of the Legion of Honour; and in 1822 Louis Philippe created him a peer. n. at Montbéliard, 1760; d. at Paris, 1832. Cuvier greatly advanced the natural sciences, the true object of which is, he declares, "to lead the human mind towards its destination,—a knowledge of truth." His works are very numerous, and, perhaps, his greatest is his "Theory of the Earth."

CUVIER, Frederic, was a younger brother of the above, and was also devoted to the pursuit of natural history. His most scientific work is "On the Teeth of Animals," published in 1822. n. at Montbéliard, 1773; d. at Strasburg, 1833.

CYP. (See CYPR.)

CYNÆGIUS, sin-e-jii'-rus, an Athenian, brother of the poet Æschylus. After the battle of Marathon, he pursued the flying Persians to their ships, and seized one of their vessels with right hand, which was immediately cut off by the enemy. Upon this, he grasped the vessel with his left hand; and when he had lost that also, retained his hold with his teeth.

CYPRILAN, St., Thascius Cædilius, si-pr'e-an, a learned father of the Latin church, who, in 246, embraced Christianity, on which he wrote his book "De Gratia Dei," addressed to Donatus. Persecuted and beheaded at Carthage, 253.—His works were edited by Bishop Fell, at Oxford, in 1632; and rendered into English by Dr. Marshall, in one vol. folio.

CYRUS, si'-rus, king of Persia, son of Cambyses and Mandane, daughter of Astyages, king of the Medes. There are different accounts of his youth. He restored the independence of Persia, which had long been under the domination of the Medes, and caused himself to be proclaimed king about 559 n.c. In a short time he extended the limits of his empire, which soon became the greatest in Asia. He decisively defeated Croesus, king of Lydia, invaded Assyria, and took Babylon by turning the channel of the Euphrates. He afterwards, however, was beaten by the Scythians, taken prisoner, and put to death by their queen, 629 n.c.—Historians do not agree, however, as to the manner of his death. (See CROESUS.)

CYRUS, called the "Younger," was the youngest son of Darius Nothus, and brother of Artaxerxes, king of Persia. When the latter mounted the throne, he was made governor of Asia Minor. Desirous, however, of the supreme authority, he levied forces against his sovereign. A great battle was fought between the brothers at Cunaxa, 401 n.c., where Cyrus was defeated and himself slain by Artaxerxes. Cyrus had in his service Clearchus and Xenophon. (See XENOPHON.)

scholar, who, with his wife, produced the "Delphin" edition of the Classics for the use of the Dauphin. His translation of Horace appeared the same year; and, in 1691, his translation of the "Reflections of Marcus Antoninus," and the next year Aristotle's "Poetics." For his services to literature, he was appointed perpetual secretary to the Academy, rewarded with a pension of 2000 livres, and made keeper of the cabinet of the Louvre. B. at Castres, 1651; D. 1722.—Besides the works above mentioned, he translated Plato into French; the "Lives" of Plutarch, the "Manual" of Epictetus, and several others.

DACIER, Anne, wife of the above, and daughter of Le Père, professor of Greek at Saumur, received a liberal education. In 1674 she published an edition of Callimachus, and, in 1681, a translation of Anacreon and Sappho, which was followed by versions of some of Plautus's comedies, and of the "Plutus" and "Clouds" of Aristophanes. In 1683 she married M. Dacier, and, in 1711, produced her translation of the "Iliad." Three years after, appeared her version of the "Odyssey;" and this closed her literary labours. B. at Saumur, in 1654; D. 1720.—Madame Dacier was as remarkable for her modesty as her erudition. A learned German having paid her a visit, begged that she would write her name and a sentence in his book. She excused herself as long as she could, but being strongly importuned, she complied, and added to her signature the sentence from Sophocles, "Silence is the ornament of the female sex."
